South Africa: The Cordoned Heart is made possible by the Second Carnegie Inquiry into Poverty and Development. In the foreword, Desmond Tutu outlines and condemns the poverty-generating system of apartheid in South Africa. He points out the internal contradictions: in the land which pioneered heart transplants inhabitants cannot be protected from cholera; in the land where Family Day is a public holiday, it is a crime for a woman to be found in bed with her husband; looking for work is illegal if you are the 'wrong' colour; forced removals to make room for the white minority are the order of the day.

First class photographs, selected from the thousands submitted by twenty South African photographers, illustrate these contradictions. The book's professed aim is to show how the gap between ordinary people and artists, photographers, and writers can be narrowed. Unlike an enquiry into poverty sixty years previously which looked only at whites, the current Carnegie inquiry has deliberately looked at every section of the population affected by the South African system including those in the neighbouring states such as Lesotho. The photographers are taking risks in doing that. In the words of the editor: 'None of us knows who will survive the coming days, who will succumb and leave the country, who will disappear mysteriously into the night, or who will lose heart in the face of the government's onslaught against its opponents. But I am sure that no amount of repression will stifle the voice of ordinary people for peace and democracy.'

The pictures translate the words into manifest realities. People have to fetch water three times a day from about four miles away, or seven in a drought year in the Transkei, or queue from two in the morning to ensure they get water. Pictures of women carrying water bring this home. Old women carrying firewood from distances which are increasing with the depletion of the countryside, illustrate another aspect of the poverty being forced on people.

About 50 per cent of the population live below the poverty line. Pictures of a growing number of elderly people who are dying of hunger because they have had no pension schemes while they were day labourers are quite distressing. More malnourished children and infants are queueing for 'injection' at clinics. Displaced people housed in a TB clinic or pensioners either waiting at a collecting point or being carried in a stretcher because they are too weak to walk are among the common scenes that are included with the pictures.

The whole economy of South Africa is based on migrant labour coming from as far afield as Lesotho, Mozambique and Zambia. A scene of a recruitment centre in Lesotho depicts the desperation to which Africans are pushed. As migrant workers, they also have to suffer living in single sex compounds that look like barns, and sleep on bunk beds made of concrete. Quite an inhuman picture captured by the shrewd cameras.

The apartheid system is designed to keep local Africans away from the prospering areas of the country. Bulldozers are shown removing migrant labourers' shanty towns or other homes; sometimes owners dismantle their own dwelling because the government forces them to move. As such pictures show there is no end to the misery of Africans in the land.

The book depicts the protest meetings, demonstrations, strikes and funeral marches which have become familiar in the South African struggle. These pictures are however interspersed so that the theme of struggle is considerably played down. Instead a remark is made about the rising crime rates attributed to overcrowding and lack of employment. Unfortunately this trivialises the armed struggle against colonialism; at best it gives it a criminal context. The intense discontent of the Africans is nevertheless demonstrated by the theme of the struggle of women for their rights. Pictures of women working in cleaning and other menial jobs, while at the same time struggling for their rights in the unions and elsewhere, bring this home to the reader.

Working Women in South Africa by Leslie Lawson is like a companion to the South Africa: the Cordoned Heart although they came out of different projects. It focuses on women, mostly in the service sector of domestic work, nursing, teaching, machinist work and agricultural labour. Unlike the previous book which relies on commentary, the photographs in this one are accompanied by interesting reported speeches. Time and again women describe their lives with a thorough assessment of the political situation in which they find themselves.

A historical outline contrasts the current position of women with the independence women formerly enjoyed when they owned their own fertile lands and travelled about as they pleased. The discovery of gold in 1886 led to urbanisation and prosperity, first allowing urbanites to employ rural men and women as domestics, then as factory workers and finally in other services such as office cleaning, cooking fast food, hairdressing, waitressing and tea-making. The pictures put faces to the names and stories recounted.

Low value is placed on the work done by black women. There is no legal minimum wage for example for domestic employees, although the South African Domestic Employees Association (SADWA) is now fighting for one. We are given glimpses of some of those involved in the movement.

The 'minimum' factory wage is very low and African women have been trapped within it. In the 1960s, when factory owners brought machinery which required only semi-skilled workers, a large number of African women were employed from the rural areas and given very low wages. The government's introduction of the pass laws, however, has created a division between those who qualify for employment and those who do not. Even those who qualify can work only in the so-called 'home-like' industries of food, clothing, textiles and leather under very bad conditions. There is discrepancy in the pay of men and women doing the same work; maternity rights are almost non-existent and the health hazards are such that a woman was cut in half by a machine, and a heavy pressing machine causes miscarriages. Women are also subjected to sexual harassment in the process of getting jobs or of keeping them. Newspaper cuttings and women in meetings illustrate the development of that history.

The government's influx control laws have separated women from their husbands and other family members so that they are the household heads and bread winners. Some women become self-employed working in precarious jobs such as running shebeens or brothels, or selling vegetables and clothes. For a change pictures of shebeen queens are there to make a point rather than to attract customers.

BOOK REVIEWS

Wherever they work they have to send remittances to their families in the rural areas too. In the rural areas, employment is available only for seasonal farm labourers. The scarcity of factory work in the bantustans makes women very vulnerable as employers ignore minimum wage limits and mistreat their employees in more ways than one. Individual women's daily routines are recorded to put across that side of their lives.

Women have a double shift because even in the case of those who have remained married, men are little inclined to work in the house looking after the children or even themselves. Women have very little time to rest, visit friends or sleep. Pictorial examples are given of how children die because mothers have neither the time nor the money for them; or how they feel like domestics within their own homes.

The main issues women workers address through the trade unions are equal pay, the pass system, the shift system, maternity rights and the rights of domestic workers to organise. Developing leadership skills within the unions and asserting them are some of the in-house fighting they have to do. Examples are given of women taking the fight into their homes as well.

Factory and Family: The Divided Lives of South Africa's Women Workers is introduced by a short paragraph summing up the demands, aspirations and expectations of '992 women' who speak on behalf of 'thousands' of Black—African, Indian and Coloured—women of all ages and educational background, working in the factories in the big city and in on the edges of the 'homelands'.

The book is presented first as a conversation between six women, one of whom is a researcher at the Institute for Black Research (IBR), and then between three other women. Pictures of jobless men, idle children and heavily loaded, hard working men and women, emphasise the points they make. Taking full account of women's work at home and in the factory, a sharp contrast is drawn between the lives of men and women. Pictures of men idling at home or supervising at work are interspersed with pictures of women at work, or snatching a nap on their desks, that being the only free time they have. These factory workers are obviously of a different class than the migrant workers we saw in the other books. Their priorities are luxury consumer goods: 'If we did not work we wouldn't be able to buy clothes; we would not be able to pay our hire purchase instalments.'

A heavy emphasis is also put on the conditions of the work place. Two clothes factories, one of them in a border area, are discussed in detail. Very poor health facilities and poor amenities, such as lack of sick pay are accompanied by pressures such as controlling the time women spend in the toilet. Promotional chances are very limited. For example only men are the pattern makers, and women cut and serve as machinists. At lunch time the racial and sexual segregation is maintained heavily (evidenced by the pictures) although they work together at other times. The pressure is made worse as women are unable to belong to unions. Most cannot afford the time as they have to travel long distances to work from the ramshackle accommodation the government has removed them to. Others cannot afford to be seen devoting time to union activities since most husbands are not supportive at home. They all need whatever money they can earn as husbands spend earnings on drinks and other personal requirements.

The report ends with an appeal for help for women who are threatened by the loss of jobs for themselves and their husbands, the loss of their homes and the loss of money with which they could pay for their hire purchase furniture. Like the other two titles this book unfortunately categorises people and situations to blame. The idling men, held responsible for the demise of the women, and the women themselves, are now engaged in an armed struggle, a fact which none of these books has made an effort to highlight.

Interestingly, the last book is both in English and in Zulu. This obviously has the advantage of recording the vocabulary of the period of struggle in South Africa; it also has its potential readership in the local African population. This bilingualism helps the spirit of defiance to the white minority rule in South Africa.

While the three books suffer from their failure to address the nature of the struggle in South Africa, each has its particular merits. Apart from the political and social points they make the photographers have captured each situation with the most striking and powerful images. The pictures alone are quite captivating for any reader.

Marxist states in Africa

Ben Turok

Military Marxist Regimes in Africa

Journal of Communist Studies

London: Frank Cass. Special Issue 1 (3-4) September-December 1985.

Ethiopia: Politics, Economics and Society

Peter Schwab

London: Frances Pinter. 1985. 134pp. £17.50hb/£6.95pb

Angola: Politics, Economics and Society

Keith Somerville

London: Frances Pinter. 1985. 207pp. £17.50hb/£6.95pb

Ghana: Politics, Economics and Society

Donald I Ray

London: Frances Pinter. 1986. 192pp. £17.50hb/£6.95pb

Third World Marxist-Leninist Regimes: Strengths, Vulnerabilities, and US Policy

Special Report.

Institute for Foreign Policy Analysis

New York: Pergammon Press for IFPA. 1985. 130pp. n/p

These are hard times for leftists in Africa mainly because regimes which cannot deliver on promises are prone to suppress their critics. There is scant scope for socialist opponents of colonialism and neo-colonialism to develop substantial movements. It is rather paradoxical therefore that there are so many Marxist states scattered across the continent and that many commentators expect more to follow. The fascination for the Marxist phenomenon in Africa is spawning a growing literature, of which the Marxist Regimes Series published by Frances Pinter in London, with no less than nine books on Africa, is but the latest manifestation.

Given the absence of a visible and strong Marxist pan-African movement or political culture, analysts have puzzled over the origins of these Marxist regimes. Two categories are identified, those regimes which originate in a struggle for national liberation and where the source of Marxism is in a political movement, eg Angola and Mozambique, and those where a military group seize power by coup d'état and then adopt Marxism as the state ideology, sometimes after a considerable period. In neither case is the working class the main vehicle nor are there classical communist parties leading the way to a socialist revolution. In short, Marxism is being put on the agenda in Africa in unexpected and unorthodox ways. This phenomenon, perhaps without equal elsewhere in the world, naturally produces a wide range of differing explanations, with even those authors who are grounded in the Marxist-Leninist classics seemingly unable to establish agreed positions.

The Journal of Communist Studies has devoted a special double issue to 'Military Marxist regimes in Africa' attempting to arrive at some definitional clarity of this process. In a somewhat contradictory editorial John Markakis argues that there is an attempt by 'soldier rulers to shore up the foundations of the post-colonial state by constructing a new political consensus based on Marxism'. At first sight this seems a strange thing for soldiers to do. In Latin America and elsewhere in the world soldiers are more likely to adopt fascist ideology to shore up reactionary states. So why Marxism in Africa? He then goes on to admit that there is an element of idealism among these soldiers, that 'radical soldiers were attracted by this (socialist) promise'. They see themselves carrying out a 'revolution from above' using the state as the principal means. He nevertheless concludes that socialism is unlikely to be realised under this type of regime.

The co-author of the editorial, Michael Waller, raises a more interesting point. He asks whether, in the conditions of Africa, armies can do the party's work in creating the conditions for a socialist revolution? Can the army serve as the vanguard of the party? Given that political power is seized by coup d'état and not through struggle by political parties, how can their actions be consolidated into a new social system? Waller seems to have no doubt that in certain cases the military did set out to 'overturn existing social relationships' and establish a 'strong collectivist state'.

Waller argues that once the new regime is established, nationalism loses its appeal and Marxism-Leninism takes its place, performing three functions: it legitimates the regime, it facilitates mobilisation behind an austere development programme, and it gives the regime a historically progressive flavour at home and abroad. All this would seem to indicate that in some subtle way the peoples of Africa are seen by the military as having a substantial sympathy for genuine socialist ideas which mesh in with their own concern for social change.

Other articles in the Journal are more negative about the military's resort to Marxism. An excellent essay on the Horn of Africa by Markakis nevertheless concludes that these are but 'garrison states' with invocations of socialism being used to defend the state against its critics. Writing about Benin, Congo, Burkina-Faso, Somalia, Libya, Ethiopia and Madagascar, Decalo portrays the coups of the soldiers who later adopt Marxism as a non-ideological revulsion against the corrupt ruling groups in Africa. The turn by middle and lower rank soldiers to Marxism is ascribed to pragmatism. They only started reading their Marx after the coup had succeeded, according to one commentator. Even then, though these regimes resort to some important measures such as nationalisation, centralisation of power and the use of cultural nationalism, their actions are ineffective and of 'little import'. Yet, even Decalo concedes that these regimes 'have a certain aura of permanence', that 'military Marxism could well be the wave of the future in much of the continent', and that the 'appeal of Marxism cannot but grow'.

Peter Schwab's study of Ethiopia, Ethiopia: Powers, Economics and Society, has none of these reservations. He believes that Ethiopia has moved 'light years' in a decade in not only destroying the feudal autocracy but in socialist construction, and all this under a military vanguard. Acknowledging that there are massive economic problems and that many plans have gone awry, Schwab argues that the political import of the Dergue revolution remains substantial. There has been a move from feudalism to state socialism in a short space of time without going through intervening stages, though this demanded a massive upheaval in which many suffered but from which the great majority have benefited. The most important instance is that of land reform where the political dimensions of social change far outweigh the economic weaknesses.

BOOK REVIEWS

Schwab's book provides the historical backdrop necessary for understanding the process of radicalisation of the military in Africa. He describes the growth of political consciousness of the military and the students after the failed coup in Ethiopia in 1960, leading to the militant upheavals in 1974. By 1975 Marxists were in command in the Dergue and a socialist path was laid down. Apart from the land reform based on the slogan 'land to the tiller', banks, insurance and manufacturing and commercial firms were nationalised.

But many on the left were opposed to the military assuming the role of political vanguard and Schwab describes how various movements composed of intellectuals and students rose against the Mengistu regime, implementing a 'campaign of terror' which, according to Schwab, led the regime to unleash a 'red terror' in response. Hundreds of people were killed and the streets were dripping with blood, but 'It was not the Dergue that initiated the violence against the civilian population.'

Be that as it may, Schwab does not understate the centrality of one man, Mengistu, in the whole political process, and the role of the military. Four mass organisations were created, for the peasantry, the urban dwellers' associations (kebelles), the Trade Union movement, and the women's association, but all were ultimately under the direct control of Mengistu and his political/military structures.

Thus, this book brings us back to an important theme of current analysis of radical military regimes in Africa, namely what is the relationship of the military to the political and whose interests do the military represent. Schwab is unequivocal on both points. The civilian left were adventurous and irresponsible while the military were performing a political role and soon came to represent the interests of the peasants and the working class as a whole. (Markakis concedes that in Ethiopia the military did not carry out 'a revolution from above' but were themselves infected by the general radical fervour, whence they came to lead the revolutionary current. Schwab holds that the seizure of political control by the military in Ethiopia was the crucial element in the start of real social transformation. Although the actions of the urban masses are given due recognition, it was the military who established themselves in power and then moved to install socialist policies.

However, missing from the book is a thorough discussion of the problems of socialist transformation in military-led Marxist regimes. Focusing on the political process, many other issues are by-passed, leaving us with the essential question posed in all these studies. Having seized power, how does a Marxist military also bring about a socialist transformation?

A similar weakness informs Keith Somerville's book on Angola. While he refers to the context within which Angola's Marxist leaders are attempting to create the conditions for socialism (namely, a struggle for party unity, national integrity, economic survival, and internal and external security) we are not given enough of a feel from inside of what the problems really are. We have a list of socialist objectives—nationalisation of vital industries, state control of foreign trade and greater control of foreign companies, among others, but it is not clear how implementation is attempted. No doubt Somerville's difficulty arises from the war situation in Angola. Everything is distorted by the war effort, economic measures to develop the economy, social measures to redress the legacy of colonialism, and political processes to create the necessary social forces are all bogged down by the war crisis, holding up the difficult march to socialism.

So Somerville focuses on the political, and it is a fascinating account. How the MPLA was transformed from a liberation mass movement into a vanguard party embracing Marxism-Leninism is quite different to the process in the military regimes. It is quite evident that key personnel in the MPLA's leadership were already Marxist before the seizure of power, and believed that the problems of post-independence development could only be tackled on the basis of class analysis and by rooting the party in the working class and peasantry. Here classical Marxism-Leninism emerges in familiar form as does a move to identify with the world movement for socialism, according a special role to the Soviet Union and Cuba.

Evidence of leanings towards classical Marxism-Leninism is found in the emphasis on the leading role of the party in the state and society as a whole. However, we are also introduced to the difficulty of creating democratic structures among the people, especially under the conditions of constant military threat from within and without. But efforts to establish the vanguard role of the party has also been persistently undermined by internal dissension. Indeed, it is a matter for wonder that the present leadership and the state itself has survived the terrible haemorrhaging brought about by factional battles, which became at several points actual coup attempts.

Although Angola has special links with the Soviet Union and Cuba, Western speculation about the personal commitment of individual leaders to a Soviet link is shown to be groundless, particularly when this is the basis for explanations of internal changes in leadership. The MPLA has gone through many such crises, but the evidence of this book is that the explanations must be sought in the problems arising within the system itself rather than aspirations by some faction for closer ties with the Soviet Union, or worse still, to satisfy Soviet rather than Angolan objectives.

Indeed, it is the merit of the books being reviewed here that, with one exception, scholars give responsible accounts of the work of Marxist regimes in the context of their own problems rather than that of a conspiracy of world communism.

While the authors dealt with thus far exhibit a substantial understanding of Marxism as a theory, the same cannot be said of Donald Ray whose book on

BOOK REVIEWS

Ghana is wholly misplaced in a series on Marxist regimes. While it is the case that Rawlings was associated with Marxists during the process of seizing state power, and some Marxist influence remains even now, he himself has never declared himself for Marxism and has actually opposed the incorporation of socialism as a goal in his political manifestos.

This book must therefore be read outside a Marxist typology and its value lies largely in its account of how a lower rank coup took place and how it rapidly abandoned its early promise of social reform even accepting that the early objectives were limited to such matters as clearing away corruption and abuse of power and not to social transformation. This is confirmed in Ray's last sentence; 'The PNDC has decided that until economic recovery has taken hold, social and political programmes will be put in abeyance. Rawlings, the IMF and the World Bank all see Ghana as the test case for West Africa.' This conclusion belongs to Ray, not Rawlings, but it is nevertheless rooted in the regime's policies.

Should Rawlings' Ghana be considered at all in an examination of radical regimes in Africa? The answer must be affirmative, because the actions of Rawlings inspired a great social ferment among the masses and gave considerable scope, quite unexpectedly it seems, for the left. While the Rawlings regime articulated only the vaguest of revolutionary ideologies, there rapidly grew a socialist literature and even an organisation which was both anti-capitalist and anti-imperialist. Most importantly, followers of Nkrumah who had lain low for almost two decades joined in the popular upsurge and sought to give concrete organisational form to the rhetoric emanating from on high.

The questions posed by the Rawlings experience are not those of Ray who struggles to locate the regime in an inappropriate Marxist framework. What is more relevant is the question whether Rawlings has advanced the cause of socialism or not. Many hold a negative view, and the decimation of the left and its lack of opportunity to express itself tends to confirm this. At the same time, it cannot be denied that at least for a brief period, the slogan and practice of 'power to the people' flourished in Ghana, providing the people of Ghana and Africa with a reminder that the rule of the bourgeoisie is not necessarily permanent.

If the author of the book on Ghana revealed a certain naive ignorance about Marxism, the authors of Third World Marxist-Leninist Regimes exhibit qualities of a different kind. Produced by the Institute for Foreign Policy Analysis at Tufts University, USA, it violates its claim of being an 'independent, non-partisan research organisation' for scholars, students, and the general public. Being 'non-partisan' it recommends as follows:

History shows that no Marxist-Leninist regime has ever been overthrown except by foreign invasion, and since opportunities such as that in Grenada are not likely to come very often, it would be better to prevent the consolidation of such regimes than to hold out a military expedition as a policy tool as a last resort.

The means for doing so are also set out. A 'special group' needs to be established divided into three branches focused on 'countering insurgency, assisting insurgency, and devising anti-terrorist initiatives'. In case the meaning is still unclear, the report proposes 'the United States must develop strategy and capabilities which permit it to strike pre-emptively, to carry out reprisal raids, to deal with more than one terrorist action simultaneously, and to use intelligence in timely fashion.' But the most chilling proposal is non-military. It is for a 'counter-insurgency strategy that focuses on civic action'. That is it must focus equally on 'the socio-economic, political and psychological dimensions of civic action. This will require greater involvement by civilian specialists from other parts of the national security community.' Such 'civic action' would not elicit 'the damning charge of "military intervention"'.

Are African Marxist regimes being subjected to these attentions and can this account for some of their problems? How can we know? But the warning has been given, in a non-partisan manner.

Radical interpretations of African literature

Alastair Niven

Towards the Decolonization of African Literature. Volume 1: African Fiction and Poetry and their Critics

Chinweizu, Onwuchekwa Jemie and Ihechukwu Madubuike

Washington DC: Howard University Press. 1983. 318pp. $7.95pb

Art Ideology in the African Novel: A Study of the Influence of Marxism on African Writing

Emmanuel Ngara

London: Heinemann. 1985. 126pp. £6.95pb

Come to Laugh: African Traditional Theatre in Ghana

Kwabena N Bame

New York: Lilian Barber Press. 1985. 192pp. $19.95hb/$9.95pb

The Afro World: Adventures in Ideas

Edited by O R Dathorne

Coral Gables, Florida: Association of Caribbean Studies and the University of Wisconsin. 1984. 174pp. n/p

It is not hard, from their titles alone, to see what links these books and makes them appropriate candidates for a collective review. They are all concerned with radical definitions of literature and with shifting the spotlight from the high ground of 'elite' culture to the grassroots of popular tradition. The four books are works of criticism, united by their belief that elevated aesthetic doctrines or Eurocentric liberal humanism are inadequate guides to the interpretation of African literature.

It is hard to overestimate the impact which Towards the Decolonization of African Literature made when it first came out in 1980. The publisher was Fourth Dimension of Enugu, eastern Nigeria. This in itself was important. No major book of literary criticism had previously been published indigenously in Africa: conference proceedings and essay collections, yes, but no work which could instantly be regarded as seminal in its probable influence. Though Chinweizu, who of the three authors is the one most known outside Nigeria (he is the author of The West and the Rest of Us), describes himself in the descriptive biodata as 'an occidentalist' the central thread in this book is a conviction that Africa must draw from its own traditions and not live in awe of Europe's. It follows, therefore, that the central fact of commitment which every author has to make—ie to the publisher—is a particularly sensitive matter among contemporary African writers, far more ideologically indicative than the choices made by most of their Western counterparts. The uncomprehending outsider may think it does not much matter where a book makes its first appearance but that is not how it will appear in African literary circles where issues of publisher and language choice are pivotal. The fact that Ngara's Art and Ideology in the African Novel, which in its way is every bit as challenging a work as that by Chinweizu et al., has been published first by a multi-national in London will have affected the way it is perceived, whether that is fair or not, and neither Ngara's book, nor any of those with which this review is concerned, has made an impact.

Towards the Decolonization, full of lapses and polemic though it is, dropped into the centre of African literary debate and set up ripples which are still being felt.

What is it about the book which caused that effect? When I first reviewed it, for The Times Literary Supplement, I praised it for its energy, its refusal to be confined within the constraints of academic politesse, its conviction politics and its recognition of the antiquity of the African literary tradition. These still seem to me to be sterling qualities, though I am glad of the opportunity to re-assess the book in the light of the offence it has given and the reputations it has assailed. It is surely precisely because it lacks the scholarly knowledge, the scrupulousness and the mandarin objectivity of routine criticism that it has caused so much discussion. In saying that, one risks the accusation that one is losing sight of the values that make academic debate worth having. I am not, however, saying that this book is inaccurate in its details or irrational in its arguments: only that it does not aim at respectable neutrality. It is not impressed by anyone's name for its own sake. Perhaps most of all it has broken out of the predictable ideologies and '-isms' which have been at war with each other in European criticism or among the commentators on African literature in the 1960s and 1970s. It establishes its own doxology, not yet fully worked out, sometimes tending to overstatement rather than authority, but fresh with the spirit of people saying something genuinely new and captivating.

Towards the Decolonization of African Literature examines the African novel and its critics, 1950-75 (a chapter which accounts for nearly half the book), tendencies in recent criticism of both fiction and poetry, and tasks facing the African critic in the process of decolonising assumptions. The arguments are not, in fact, all that revolutionary. There is little in the first chapter which Ayi Kwei Armah was not saying in his famous attacks on Larsony and Eurocentrism some years earlier. Ngugi wa Thiong'o has been asserting some of the same points since at least the early 1970s, and it is a weakness of the Chinweizu approach that it does not put Ngugi more centrally into the picture. As for Ngara, he is not mentioned. In reprinting the book there was surely an opportunity to widen the examples. After all, the preface opens 'We are three Nigerian writers and critics who are intensely concerned for the health of African culture.' They may dislike Eurocentrism, but not a concept of Africanness, in which case more recognition of what East, Southern and North Africa—no Fanon, one mention of Nkosi—have given to the re-definition of African aesthetics was surely necessary. But within its partiality and its larger claims to radicalism than can be justified this remains the key statement of Afrocentric literary values.

I can recall when European critics first started writing about African literature in the early 1960s. Almost invariably they praised the writers for being reminiscent of European masters. The late Anne Tibble was a particular offender. In African/English Literature she managed to compare Amos Tutuola to Dante, Hans Christian Andersen, R L Stevenson, Bunyan and several others within a few sentences, but she did not see the link with D O Fagunwa, now authenticated as an obvious Yoruba model. Gerald Moore at least saw that link but he also, though an admired and innovative critic, tended to validate African authors by European comparisons. As early as 1965 the Nigerian critic Obiajunwa Wali lashed out at these paternalistic claims and uttered a famous refutation of the notion that an African writer can be legitimately African if he writes in a European language. That debate rumbles on, dominating virtually all colloquia on Africa literature, though one has to say, a little sardonically, that the debate is necessarily argued in English. The ultimate put-down to the notion that there is no valid reason for an African writer these days to write creatively in English was expressed by Lewis Nkosi at the 'New Directions in African Writing' conference held in London in 1984 when he posed a lengthy question to the arch-advocate of that view, Ngũgĩ, and did so in his native Zulu. Answer came there none. But the Chinweizu resentment of European cultural domination is based less on a distrust of the use of the basic language per se, than on a surely justifiable belief that 'It is therefore pernicious, and a manifestation of cultural imperialism, to try to constrain fresh developments by demanding strict and exclusive adherence to the characteristics of one of the parent strains.' Looked at closely this is a moderate proposition.

Another central premise of the 'Decolonisation' thesis is that the great tradition of African literature is oral. The word 'orature' has since the publication of this book become as current a term in African literary criticism as 'structuralism' is in the West. It is likely to prove less faddish. Perhaps there is no continent left with as active an oral tradition in its cultural self-expression as Africa. It impinges upon almost everyone's life. Despite a tendency among some of the younger urban Nigerian novelists to show otherwise, there is a sense in which every African is still a villager, gravitating back to his birthplace whenever possible—if, that is, he has ever left it. There can be no African writer who is unaware of village story-telling, praise poems, traditional rites and festivals incorporating oral performance. Indeed, the element of performance in African literature is something which even Chinua Achebe and Ngũgĩ—take Arrow of God or Devil on the Cross, for example—have tried to render on the flatness of the page: there is a sense in which these novels require, at least in part, to be read aloud. So the emphasis which 'Decolonisation' places on retention of the oral mode results from a practical recognition that it is the life-blood of the literature, without which modern African writing would be a synthetic alien. Hence the high praise accorded to Okot p'Bitek's Song of Lawino and the disdain for Wole Soyinka's Idanre.

Soyinka so obviously bestrides modern African writing that the attacks upon him in this book must seem like the baying of hounds at midnight. He is accused of turgidity and obscurantism. Readers of Madmen and Specialists or Season of Anomy may sympathise with this view, but these works are not the object of the 'decolonisers' critique so much as the earlier, to many of us much clearer, Soyinka. Since Chinweizu et al. first published their book Soyinka has brought out Aké, his autobiography of childhood, which seems to me one of the masterpieces of this difficult genre. The charge of intellectualism for its own sake disintegrates beside such a precise and affectionate recollection, and must inevitably make the alert reader return to the 'difficult' works feeling that when Soyinka writes elliptically, mythically or in a symbolist manner he is doing so for a sharply focused purpose.

Soyinka does not engage much of Ngara's attention. Indeed, his choice of examples in some ways counterbalances that of the 'decolonisers'. Ngugi is prominent, Armah, Maillu, the late Alex La Guma, Nadine Gordimer. (But women writers are shamefully neglected in both these books.) Much of Art and Ideology in the African Novel is discursive, but it is a no less assertive work than Chinweizu's: 'the dynamics of political struggles and social change affect the content and form of works of art, so that if we are to understand fully and appreciate the rise, development, concerns and styles of the literature of a nation we must see that literature in relation to the history and struggles of its people, and in relation to the various ideologies that issue from socio-economic conditions.' Ngara's hostility to Eurocentric evaluations of African writing is strongly presented and his faith in a Marxist perspective is explicit, but this does not lead him into intransigence. He admires Achebe, I sense, because by any criterion the author of Things Fall Apart and Arrow of God is a superb artist, even when he does not confirm to some of the tenets which are central to Ngara's position. The teacher of African literature will find Ngara's book well informed, positive and signposted—in pedagogical terms probably a more useful, and certainly a more researched, work than Towards the Decolonization of African Literature. But in the end it is the difference between the ideologist with a grounding in old-fashioned practical literary criticism, now modified to fit his present aims, and the campaigner advocating a creed. Though they do not match in all respects, Ngara and the 'decolonisers' should be read side by side. By doing this the reader will have laid out before him the ground-plan for the most positive, and in my estimation, despite the rhetorical flourishes, the most reasonable aesthetic for talking about contemporary African writing.

The Afro World assembles, under the experienced editorship of O R Dathorne, nine pieces, plus introductions and postscript, on aspects of black literature. Two of them are about women, including a fascinating account of group activities among female slaves. Deborah G White has to admit that 'slave women wrote few of the sources that are now used to examine their lives', but she nevertheless conveys a sense of thorough documentation. There is some creative writing in this miscellany, including a short story by Jan Carew, a worthy study by Marian M McLeod of a missionary called Thomas P Callender, who was influential in the development of the Jamaican church, and an introduction by Lloyd W Brown to the predicament of West Indians settled in Canada which will particularly interest people engaged with their counterpart community in Britain. The Afro World has all the signs of a journal special issue, but it is a lively contribution to the growing number of studies of the black diaspora.

BOOK REVIEWS

Come to Laugh bears out much of what is explicit in Chinweizu and Ngara, implicit among the contributors to The Afro World. I do not claim to know a lot about the Ghanaian concert party tradition, though I lived in Ghana for three years in the 1960s and attended some performances. I cannot imagine, however, a more readable and accessible introduction than this by Kwabena N Bame. This history of concert parties, along with audience responses to them, actors' approaches, production methods and social values ascribed to them are all examined. Bame does not make the mistake of analysing humour over-earnestly. He includes transcripts of two concert parties. This is an essential book for anyone interested in African popular theatre.

Not all of these books will be easy to find, even in London and New York bookshops. Indeed, Towards the Decolonization of African Literature was, when only published in its Fourth Dimension edition (admirably produced though that was), like gold dust. So I end on a small campaigning note of my own. Why should such excellent publications as these be so difficult to buy? If it is hard to find publications from or about Africa and Central America in Western bookshops then how much more difficult it is in those continents themselves. Book distribution in the Third World is in crisis. Deliberations about how writers should write are valueless if what they publish can be read only by a favoured few, eg reviewers and their like. Impoverished distribution of printed matter perpetuates elitism. None of the authors I have discussed here would dissent from that fact or be happy with it.

The international journal covering all aspects of land use

Land Use Policy

Government policy, planning, economics, urban and rural development, agriculture, forestry, irrigation, landscape, transport – all affect land use and are all brought together in Land Use Policy. The journal gives the reader a single source of information on the many factors which influence the formulation and implementation of land use policy. It provides the background and international perspectives needed by both planners and analysts, and is a valuable teaching resource.

In addition to major research and policy papers, each issue offers thought-provoking viewpoint articles which are always topical and contentious. The book reviews, conference reports and conference calendar keep readers up-to-date with events and publications in the field – a unique service provided by Land Use Policy.

As the Times Higher Education Supplement commented, the journal is “both informative and interesting, should stimulate debate”.

Land Use Policy is published quarterly in January, April, July and October by Butterworth Scientific Ltd., Westbury House, Bury Street,
Guildford GU2 5BH, UK

For your free sample copy write to Peter Lake

ISSN 0264-8377

Recent Publications

BOOKS*

- Adamu, Mahdi and Kirk-Greene, A H M (eds): Pastoralists of the West African Savanna. Manchester: Manchester University Press. 1986. 359pp. £35.00hb.
- Anker, Richard and Hein, Catherine (eds): Sex Inequalities in Urban Employment in the Third World. London: Macmillan. 1986. 387pp. £15.00hb.
- al-Quaid, Yusuf: War in the Land of Egypt. London: Al Saqi Books. 1986. 192pp. £4.95pb.
- Bagley, Bruce Michael, Alvarez, Roberto and Hagedorn, Katherin J (eds): Contadora and the Central American Peace Process. Boulder, Colorado: Westview (distributed in the UK by Information Publications International). 1985. 297pp. £30.00pb.
- Balassa, Bele, Bueno, Gerardo M, Kuczynski, Pedro-Pablo and Simonsen, Mario Henrique: Towards Renewed Economic Growth in Latin America. Washington DC: Institute for International Economics (with El Colegio de México and Fundacao Getúlio Vargas). 1986. 205pp. $15.00hb.
- Banks, Arthur S (ed): Political Handbook of the World. New York: Center for Social Analysis, State University of New York at Binghamton. 1986. 805pp. n/p.
- Bascom, Harold: Apata. London: Heinemann. 1986. 279pp. £3.95pb.
- Berg, Robert J and Whitaker, Jennifer Seymour (eds): Strategy for African Development. London/Berkeley: University of California Press. 1986. 603pp. £33.50. £13.50pb.
- Bermudez, Fernando: Death and Resurrection in Guatemala. Maryknoll, New York: Orbis Books. 1985. 77pp. n/p.
- Blum, William: The CIA: A Forgotten History. London: Zed. 1986. 428pp. £24.95. £8.95pb.
- Boon, Gerard K, Ernst, Dieter, Friedmann, Efrain, Resnick, Dan, Soupizet, J F, Stern, Paul, Valentin, Robert L and Beer, Barbro: The Informatics Revolution and the Developing Countries. Islamabad: North South Roundtable. 1986. 127pp. n/p.
- Buzan, Barry and Rizvi, Gowher: South Asian Insecurity and the Great Powers. London: Macmillan. 1986. 257pp. £27.50hb.
- Calman, Leslie J: Protest in Democratic India: Authority's Response to Challenge. Boulder, Colorado: Westview (distributed in the UK by IPI). 1985. 258pp. £21.50pb.
- Cheema, G Shabbir (ed): Reaching the Urban Poor: Project Implementation in Developing Countries. Boulder, Colorado: Westview (distributed in the UK by IPI). 1986. 264pp. £25.00pb.
- Christensen, Hanne: Refugees and Pioneers: History and Field Study of a Burundian Settlement in Tanzania. Geneva: United Nations Institute for Social Development. 1985. 144pp. n/p.
- Cimade Inodep and Mink: Africa's Refugee Crisis: What's to be Done? London: Zed. 1986. 158pp. £10.95hb/£6.95pb.
- Cossali, Paul and Robson, Clive: Stateless in Gaza. London: Zed. 1986. 159pp. £18.95hb/£5.95pb.

* This is a list of books that have been received by Third World Quarterly for review. They are not available for sale through Third World Quarterly.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS

- Dobson, Christopher and Payne, Ronald: War Without End: The Terrorists: An Intelligence Dossier. London: Harrap. 1986. 279pp. £9.95hb.
- Das, Dillip K: Migration of Financial Resources to Developing Countries. London: Macmillan. 1986. 263pp. £29.50hb.
- Dore, Isaak I: The International Mandate System and Namibia. Boulder, Colorado: Westview (distributed in the UK by IPI). 1985. 230pp. £24.50pb.
- Echewa, T Obinkaram: The Crippled Dancer. London: Heinemann. 1986. 227pp. £3.95pb.
- Fall, Bernard B: The Two Vietnams: A Political and Military Analysis. Boulder, Colorado: Westview (distributed in the UK by IPI). 1984. 507pp. £47.00pb.
- Fayad, M and Motamen, H: Economics of the Petrochemical Industry. London: Frances Pinter. 1987. 241pp. £19.50hb.
- Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations: FAO: The First 40 Years, 1945-85. Rome: FAO. 1985. 155pp. n/p.
- Gilroy, Beryl: Frangipani House. London: Heinemann. 1986. 111pp. £3.95pb.
- Gowda, K Venkatagiri: Eradication of Black Wealth and Black Money (A Scheme of Monetary Reform). Bangalore: World View Publications. 1986. 134pp. n/p.
- Greer, Joel and Thorbecke, Erik: Food Poverty and Consumption Patterns in Kenya. Geneva: International Labour Office. 1986. 170pp. n/p.
- Grootaert, Christiaan: The Role of Employment and Earnings in Analysing Levels of Living: A General Methodology with Applications to Malaysia and Thailand. Washington DC: World Bank. 1986. 278pp. n/p.
- Hardgrave, Robert L Jr: India Under Pressure: Prospects for Political Stability. Boulder, Colorado: Westview (Distributed in the UK by IPI). 1984. 214pp. £21.00pb.
- Harris, Myles: Breakfast in Hell: A Doctor's Experiences of the Ethiopian Famine. London: Picador. 1986. 221pp. £3.50pb.
- Harris, Nigel: Destiny or Development: The Fate of the Third World. London: I B Tauris. 1986. 220pp. £14.95hb.
- Havet, Jose: The Diffusion of Power: Rural Elites in a Bolivian Province. Ottawa: University of Ottawa Press. 1985. 156pp. $18.00pb.
- Helleiner, Gerald K (ed): Africa and the International Monetary Fund. Washington DC: IMF. 1985. 277pp. $10.00pb.
- Hirschman, Albert: A Bias for Hope: Essays on Development and Latin America. Boulder, Colorado: Westview (distributed in the UK by IPI). 1986. 374pp. £31.00pb.
- Hurtado, Osvaldo: Political Power in Ecuador. Boulder, Colorado: Westview (distributed in the UK by IPI). 1985. 398pp. £36.00pb.
- Independent Commission on International Humanitarian Issues: Disappeared! Technique of Terror. London: Zed. 1986. 107pp. £16.95hb/£2.95pb.
- Independent Commission on International Humanitarian Issues: Modern Wars: The Humanitarian Challenge. London: Zed. 1986. 195pp. £18.95hb/£4.95pb.
- Independent Commission on International Humanitarian Issues: Refugees: Dynamics of Displacement. London: Zed. 1986. 152pp. £17.95hb/£3.95pb.
- Independent Group on British Aid: Missed Opportunities: Britain and the Third World. London: IGBA. 1986. 66pp. £1.50pb.
- Inter-American Development Bank: Economic and Social Progress in Latin America, 1986 Report. Washington DC: I-ADB. 1986. 446pp. n/p.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS

- International Television Trust for the Environment: Switching on to the Environment. London: ITVE. 1986. 143pp. £5.95pb.
- Khanh, Huynh Kim: Vietnamese Communism 1925-1945. New York: Cornell University Press. 1986. 379pp. $14.30pb.
- Kinsey, B H: Creating Rural Employment. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 116pp. £19.95hb.
- Korn, David A: Ethiopia: The United States and the Soviet Union. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 199pp. £19.95hb.
- Korner, Peter, Maass, Gero, Siebold, Thomas and Tetzlaff, Rainer: The IMF and the Debt Crisis: A Guide to the Third World's Dilemmas. London: Zed. 1986. 226pp. £18.95hb/£6.96pb.
- Kumar, Raj: The Forest Resources of Malaysia: Their Economics and Development. Oxford: Oxford University Press. 1986. £34.00hb.
- Kumar, Satish (ed): Yearbook on India's Foreign Policy, 1982-83. London: Sage. 1985. 266pp. £24.00hb.
- Kumar, Satish (ed): Yearbook on India's Foreign Policy 1983-84. London: Sage. 1986. 270pp. £24.00hb.
- Kunio, Yoshihara: Philippine Industrialisation: Foreign and Domestic Capital. Oxford: Oxford University Press. 1986. 180pp. £11.95pb.
- Lal, Deepak and Wolf, Martin (eds): Stagflation, Savings and the State: Perspectives on the Global Economy. London: Oxford University Press for International Bank for Reconstruction and Development/World Bank). 1986. 402pp. n/p.
- Lapping, Brian: Apartheid: A history. London: Grafton/Granada TV. 1986. 199pp. £12.95hb.
- Lawrence, Peter (ed): World Recession and the Food Crisis. London: James Currey/African Review of Political Economy. 1986. 314pp. £25.00hb/£9.95pb.
- Leatt, James, Kneifel, Theo and Nurnberger, Klaus (eds): Contending Ideologies in South Africa. Grand Rapids, Michigan: Eerdmans. 1986. 318pp. $16.95hb.
- Lider, Julian: Correlation of Forces: An Analysis of Marxist-Leninist Concepts. London: Gower. 1986. 384pp. £30.00hb.
- Loescher, Gil and Scanlan John A: Calculated Kindness: Refugees and America's Half-Open Door 1945-present. London: Macmillan. 1986. 346pp. £27.95hb.
- Lomax, David F: The Developing Country Debt Crisis. London: Macmillan. 1986. 317pp. £29.50hb.
- Lorentzen, Anne: Capital Goods and Technological Development in Mexico. 1985. 113pp. n/p.
- Lovelace, Earl: The Wine of Astonishment. London: Heinemann. 1982. 146pp. £3.95pb.
- Lowder, Stella: Inside the Third World Cities. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 292pp. £25.00hb.
- Mallison, W Thomas and Mallison, Sally V: The Palestine Problem in International Law and World Order. London: Longman. 1986. 546pp. £35.00hb.
- Marantz, Paul and Steinburg, Blema (eds): Superpower Involvement in the Middle East: Dynamics of Foreign Policy. Boulder, Colorado: Westview (distributed in the UK by IPI). 1985. 301pp, £24.00pb.
- Markakis, John and Ayele, Nega: Class and Revolution in Ethiopia. New Jersey: The Red Sea Press. 1986. 191pp. $19.95hb/$7.95pb.

- Mariam, Mesfin Wolde: Rural Vulnerability to Famine in Ethiopia, 1958-77. London: Intermediate Technology. 1986. 191pp. £7.95pb.
- Mason, Philip: A Matter of Honour: An Account of the Indian Army, its Officers and Men. London: Macmillan. 1986. 580pp. £6.95pb.
- Mathur, Om Prakesh: Project Analysis for Local Development. London: Westview (distributed in the UK by IPI). 1985. 210pp. £20.00pb.
- McCloud, Donald: System and Process in Southeast Asia: The Evolution of a Region. London: Frances Pinter. 1986. 315pp. £22.50hb.
- Melber, Henning: Our Namibia: A Social Studies Textbook. London: Zed. 1986. 267pp. £18.95hb/£6.95pb.
- Middlebrook, Kevin J and Rico, Carlos (eds): The United States and Latin America in the 1980s: Contending Perspectives on a Decade of Crisis. Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania: University of Pittsburgh Press. 1986. 648pp. $34.95hb/$16.95pb.
- Mikesell, Raymond F: Stockpiling Strategic Materials: An Evaluation of the National Program. Washington DC: American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research. 1986. 68pp. $4.95pb.
- Mikkelsen, Britha: Formation of an Industrial Labour Force in Kenya: Experiences of Labour Training in the Metal Manufacturing Industries. Copenhagen: Centre for Development Research. 1986. 137pp. DKK 20pb.
- Munslow, Barry (ed): Africa: Problems in the Transition to Socialism. London: Zed. 1986. 221pp. £18.95hb/£6.95pb.
- Naff, Thomas and Wolfgang, Marvin E: Changing Patterns of Power in the Middle East. London: Sage. 1985. 223pp. £14.95hb/£9.95pb.
- Nagenda, John: The Seasons of Thomas Tebo. London: Heinemann. 1986. 154pp. £3.95pb.
- Ola, C S: Nigerian Income Tax Law and Practice. London: Macmillan. 1986. 566pp. £9.50pb.
- Onn, Fon Chan: Technological Leap: Malaysian Industry in Transition. Oxford: Oxford University Press. 1986. 230pp. £25.00hb.
- Onwuka, Ralph I, Abegunrin, 'Layi and Ghista, Dhanjoo N: African Development: The OAU/ECA Lagos Plan of Action and Beyond. Lawrenceville, Virginia: Brunswick. 1985. 241pp. n/p.
- Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development: Financing and External Debt of Developing Countries: 1985 Survey. Paris: OECD. 1986. 235pp. n/p.
- Ousmane, Sembene: God's Bits of Wood. London: Heinemann. 1986. 244pp. £3.96pb.
- Peberdy, Max: Third World Conundrum: A Call to Christian Partnership. Exeter, Devon: Paternoster Press. 1986. 118pp. £2.95pb.
- Pepper, David and Jenkins, Alan (eds): The Geography of Peace and War. Oxford: Blackwell. 1985. 222pp. £24.50hb/£7.95pb.
- Peterson, M J: The General Assembly in World Politics. London: Unwin and Hyman. 1986. 320pp. £30.00hb.
- Petras, James F, et al: Latin America: Bankers, Generals and the Struggle for Social Justice. Totowa, New Jersey: Rowman and Littlefield. 1986. 187pp. $28.50hb/$12.50pb.
- Piscatori, James P: Islam in a World of Nation-States. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1986. 193pp. £25.00hb/£8.95pb.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS

- Pollack, Benny and Rosencranz, Hernan: Revolutionary Social Democracy: The Chilean Socialist Party. London: Frances Pinter. 1986. 234pp. £18.50hb.
- Posner, Michael: Problems of International Money, 1972-85. Washington DC: International Monetary Fund. 1986. 189pp. n/p.
- Raj, K N, Bhattacharya, Neeladri, Guha, Sumit and Padhi, Sakti (eds): Essays on the Commercialisation of Indian Agriculture. Oxford: Oxford University Press. 1986. 354pp. £13.50hb.
- Ramos-Horta, Jose: Funu: The Unfinished Saga of East Timor. Trenton, New Jersey: The Red Sea Press. 1987. 207pp. $29.95hb/$9.95pb.
- Reynolds, Lloyd G: Economic Growth in the Third World: An Introduction. London: Yale University. 1986. 149pp. £4.95pb.
- Richards, Paul: Coping with Hunger: Hazard and Experiment in an African Rice-Farming System. London: Unwin and Hyman. 1986. 176pp. £20.00hb.
- Rosenthal-Urey, Ina (ed): Regional Impacts of US-Mexican Relations. 1986. 154pp. n/p.
- Sau, Ranjit: Economy Class Society. Madras: Universities Press (India). 1986. 294pp. RS55.00hb.
- Shome, Parathasarathi: Fiscal Issues in South East Asia: Comparative Studies of Selected Economies. Oxford: Oxford University Press. 1986. 237pp. £17.50hb.
- Scheetz, Thomas: Peru and the International Monetary Fund. Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania: University of Philadelphia Press. 1986. 257pp. $23.95hb.
- Sheffer, Gabriel (ed): Modern Diasporas in International Politics. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 349pp. £22.50hb.
- Singh, Inderjit, Squire, Lyn and Strauss, John (eds): Agricultural Household Models: Extension, Applications and Policy. Baltimore and London: Johns Hopkins University Press for World Bank. 1986. 335pp. n/p.
- Sivaramakarishnan, K C and Green, Leslie: Metropolitan Management: The Asian Experience. Oxford University Press for World Bank. 1986. 290pp. n/p.
- Skalnes, Tor and Egeland, Jan (eds): Human Rights in Developing Countries 1986. Oslo: Norwegian University Press. 1986. 312pp. £9.50pb/$14.00pb.
- Sklar, Holly: Reagan, Trilateralism and the Neoliberals: Containment and Intervention in the 1980s. Boston, Massachusetts: South End Press. 1986. 76pp. $4.75pb.
- Somjee, A H: Parallels and Actuals of Political Development. London: Macmillan. 1986. 141pp. £25.00hb.
- Stuart-Fox, Martin: Laos: Politics, Economics and Society. London: Frances Pinter. 1986. 220pp. £22.60hb/£6.95pb.
- Sundaram, Jomo Kwame: A Question of Class: Capital, the State, and Uneven Development in Malaya. Oxford: Oxford University Press. 1986. 360pp. £35.00hb.
- Thee, Marek (ed): Arms and Disarmament: SIPRI Findings: 20 Years of Studies by the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute. Oslo: Norwegian University Press. 1986. 545pp. n/p.
- Thiong'o, Ngugi Wa: Petals of Blood. London: Heinemann. 1977. 344pp. £3.95pb.
- Traber, Michael (ed): The Myth of the Information Revolution: Social and Ethical Implications of Communication Technology. London: Sage. 1986. 146pp. £16.75hb.
- Tullis, F Lamond and Hollist, W Ladd (ed): Food, the State and International Political

- Economy: Dilemmas of Developing Countries. London: Nebraska University Press. 1986. 351pp. £29.95hb.
- Union of International Associations (ed): Encyclopedia of World Problems and Human Potential. London: K G Saur. 1986. 1439pp. £123.00hb.
- United Nations Department for Disarmament Affairs: The United Nations and Disarmament: 1945-1985. New York: United Nations. 1985. 166pp. n/p.
- United Nations Economic and Social Commission for Asia and the Pacific: Economic and Social Survey of Asia and the Pacific 1985. Geneva: United Nations. 1986. 227pp. n/p.
- Vanden, Harry E: National Marxism in Latin America: José Carlos Mariategui's Thought and Politics. Boulder, Colorado: Lynn Rienner. 1986. 198pp. £17.50hb.
- Vincent, R J (ed): Foreign Policy and Human Rights: Issues and Responses. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1986. 283pp. £25.00hb.
- Wade, Michael: Nadine Gordimer. London: Wade. 1986. 232pp. £6.80hb/£4.65pb.
- Walsh, Julia A and Warren, Kenneth S (eds): Strategies for Primary Health Care: Technologies Appropriate for the Control of Disease in the Developing World. Chicago/London: University of Chicago Press. 1986. 330pp. n/p.
- Wells, Jill: The Construction Industry in Developing Countries: Alternative Strategies for Development. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 184pp. £25.00hb.
- Westling, Arthur H (ed): Global Resources and International Conflict: Environmental Factors in Strategic Policy and Action. Oxford: Oxford University Press for Stockholm International Peace Research Institute. 1986. 280pp. n/p.
- Witherall, Julian W: Afghanistan: An American Perspective: A Guide to US Official Documents and Government-Sponsored Publications. Washington DC: The Library of Congress. 1986. 157pp. $5.00pb.
- World Health Organisation: Energy and Protein Requirements: Report of a Joint FAO/WHO/UNU Expert Consultation. Geneva: WHO. 1985. 699pp. SW FR 17.00pb.
- Yahuda, Michael: Towards the End of Isolationism: China's Foreign Policy. London: Macmillan. 1986 279pp. £6.95pb.
- Yousuf, Hilmi S: African-Arab Relations. Brattleboro, Vermont: Amana Books. 1986. 212pp. $12.50hb/$9.95pb.

Panama: the roots of current political instability

In mid-1981 Panamanians, even those bitterly opposed to the rule of General Omar Torrijos Herrera, would have felt it incumbent upon themselves to give the devil his due. There had been thirteen years of political stability—a duration unprecedented since the separation from Colombia in 1903—and, while virtually all other economies in the hemisphere (including that of the USA) were in recession or catastrophic depression, Panama's national income continued to register moderate if not impressive increases. Social unrest which festered and flared repeatedly had been quelled by highly visible programmes of social reform, and the most volatile issue in Panamanian history—sovereignty over the national territory—apparently had been resolved in the country's favour through the Carter-Torrijos Canal Treaty. Six years later it is a different Panama that one perceives: a country racked by social strife, governed by alleged drug dealers and assassins, in economic decline, and, some would say, in danger of losing the limited gains in sovereignty promised in the 1977 treaty.

The present political instability ought not to come as a surprise. The relative tranquillity of the Torrijos years represented an atypical interlude rather than a break with the past; indeed, in important respects the Torrijos dictatorship intensified the country's plight and laid the basis for the current social strife.¹ Panama is a country characterised by three fundamental economic, political, and socio-historical distortions, and each is almost without parallel in the hemisphere. The fundamental aspect of these distortions is that they serve to alienate and disarticulate the Panamanian people (of all classes) from the country in which Panamanians live. Perhaps the key to understanding the Panamanian dilemma is to understand that the Panamanian nation, although it has a clear and distinct cultural and historical identity, lacks a country except in the most formal sense;² and that the present upheavals are the most recent manifestation of that nation seeking to construct a country.

¹ In the category of forecasts that go unrealised is the following, written about six months after the death of Torrijos in an air crash, 'Contrary to the predictions shortly after the death of General Omar Torrijos Herrera, his disappearance [from the political scene] on 31 July 1981 did not provoke a political crisis . . .' Inforpress Centroamerica, Centro America 1982. Guatemala: Inforpress, Junio de 1982, Panama, p 36 (author's translation from the Spanish). Between 1982 and 1986 Panama had five presidents, prompting the opposition press to nickname the last 'Su Turno' ('Your Turn').

In the first section which follows, the socio-historical distortion is discussed, which is the particular way in which Panama became a formally independent country. Second, and closely related to this, is the political distortion, the overwhelming influence of the US government over the day-to-day political life of Panamanians, so overwhelming that it is possible that the term 'domestic politics' is a misuse of words. Third, the economic distortion, the fact that there is not a 'Panamanian economy' as such, is examined and its implications discussed. With these distortions as a background, the rest of the paper seeks to understand political events and social tension in Panama since the death of Torrijos.

Panama: a society distorted

The socio-historical distortion

It is the curse of the collective consciousness of the Panamanian nation that it can take no pride in its formal creation, and that its founding fathers are justifiably branded as agents of a foreign power. Yet, the Panamanian independence movement is not without its heroes and proud moments, reaching back into the nineteenth century. Cut off from Colombia by tropical swamps and rain forest which have yet to be crossed by road,³ the province of Panama developed independently from the rest of the country of which it was a part, and the population emerged with its own particular cultural identity. In the nineteenth century there was for a brief period (1840-41) an independent Panama, though the government came and went before formal diplomatic recognition had been gained.

Whether Panamanians (largely by their own efforts) would have succeeded in creating an independent country or whether, in absence of foreign intervention, the northern border of Colombia would today abut upon Costa Rica are moot points, for external events decided the future of the Panamanian nation. In the early 1850s, a railroad, financed

² This distinction will be used throughout. 'Nation' will refer to cohesion of a people in terms of culture and history, and is appropriate independent of the geographical and legal entity in which those people live. 'Country' refers to a geographic area with a state whose formal sovereignty over its territory is internationally recognised.

³ The Pan-American Highway has yet to be completed and ends one hundred miles south of the Canal Zone.

by US capital, was constructed across Colombian territory at the Isthmus of Panama. This railroad soon became inadequate to the task of transporting a growing volume of trade, and, at the end of the nineteenth century, the government of the United States committed itself to the construction of a trans-oceanic canal. Opinion differed as to whether the optimal route would be through Panama or Nicaragua. While the transit distance in the former case was much less, the position of San Juan River and Lake Nicaragua appeared to indicate that the engineering work would be less formidable if Nicaragua were chosen.

At the turn of the century, negotiations began between the governments in Washington and Managua for the rights to a canal route through Nicaragua. At the time Nicaragua was ruled by the last great Central American leader who attempted to dominate the region, Jose Santos Zelaya.⁴ Since independence and the creation of the Central American Federation (which collapsed in the midst of civil war in 1838), the region had been dominated by local despots with foreign powers playing a substantial but secondary role.⁵ It was Zelaya's goal to maintain this situation and resist the imposition of protectorate status which Washington clearly intended as the future for the region. The conflict between the US government's ambitions for hegemony and the Nicaraguan dictator's nationalism came to a crisis over the canal issue.

As would later be the case with the puppet government of Panama, the Theodore Roosevelt Administration demanded that Zelaya surrender sovereignty over the proposed Canal Zone, and accept that the USA had an unlimited right of military intervention. Zelaya refused to concede this and negotiated for an agreement accepting limited sovereignty. In practice, this proved unacceptable to Washington, and the US government treated the agreement as doing no more than preclude competition from other countries (e.g. Britain and France) for a Nicaraguan canal. They sought a more favourable treaty elsewhere. The Isthmus of Panama provided the most attractive alternative, and there the US government had been active politically and economically since construction of the railroad in the 1850s. Indeed, US troops had been dispatched to the province in the 1880s to meet an alleged threat to the railway line. Troops were sent again in 1902; perhaps to set the tone for negotiations with the Colombian government. A year later, in 1903, the two governments reached agreement on a Canal Treaty. The Colombian Congress, however, rejected the surrender of sovereignty embodied in the Treaty and refused to ratify it. This show of Colombian nationalism led to the loss of the province of Panama in 1903.

⁴ Despite the despotic nature of Zelaya's rule, he is recognised as a nationalist hero in Nicaragua for expelling the British from the Atlantic Coast of the country and thereby bringing the entire national territory under his rule. No thorough analysis of his role has yet been done, but a useful description of events is found in Ralph Lee Woodward Jr., Central America: A Nation Divided, New York: Oxford University Press, 1973.

⁵ Britain was the most influential power in the region in the mid-nineteenth century, and some historians, particularly those from Central America, credit British agents with undermining the Central American Federation. See Mario Rodriguez, Central America, Englewood Cliffs, New Jersey: Prentice-Hall, 1965, pp 80ff.

Having been rebuffed twice in its diplomatic attempts to annex a canal route across the Isthmus, the US adopted more direct means. Through a mining engineer and Panamanian agents, Washington provoked a show of insurrection in the province. The complicity of Panama's 'founding fathers' with the territorial designs of the US government is a matter of historical record. In September 1903, Manuel Amador Guerrero, soon to become President of the new Panamanian state, wrote to a colleague telling him that US support for independence had been secured through an American agent.⁶ In November 1903, as agreed, US warships moved into the coastal waters of Panama, preventing the intervention of Colombian troops to quell the Panamanian revolt, and on 3 November 1903 Panamanian independence was declared, if 'independence' it could be called. That the purpose of the exercise was a Canal Treaty there is no doubt.⁷ Two weeks later the new Panamanian government signed an agreement that granted the US government a strip of territory which it could administer indefinitely 'as if it were sovereign'.

It is doubtful that any other nominally independent country in times of peace has ever granted a foreign power such power over its territory and population as was surrendered by the Treaty of 1903. De jure and de facto, the Canal Zone became US territory, administered by an American governor. The government of Panama had no rights within the Zone, and American employees of the Zone were not subject to Panamanian courts. Not until 1962 could the Panamanian flag be flown in the Zone. Within the Zone fourteen US military bases were eventually constructed, and in 1971 military facilities were estimated to be worth almost $5,000 million, accommodating 14,000 soldiers. The only other country in the hemisphere that has permitted the presence of a US military base was another de facto protectorate, Cuba.⁸

⁶ Amador Guerrero wrote to Jose Agustin Arango on September 5, 1903, reporting that he had received affirmative answers to the following questions posed to William Nelson Cronwell: 'What conditions are required for United States recognition of our independence with protectorate [status]? Will the warships arrive at our ports when independence is declared? What resources will be given us to help the movement?' Cited in Revista Epocas No. 27, Ano 2 (Enero 25 de 1948), p. 13 (author's translation).

⁷ At six o'clock in the evening of the day of declaration of independence, Amador Guerrero sent a telegraph to John Hay, US Secretary of State, 'Proclaimed independence of Isthmus without bloodshed. The Canal Treaty saved.' Cited in '3 de Noviembre de 1903', Dialogo Social Ano XVI (Nov-Dic de 1983), p. 20 (author's translation).

The legal power of the US government was not limited to the Zone. The Treaty of 1903 granted an unlimited right of military intervention throughout the country should Canal security require it. While Washington softened its position on this issue in 1939, the option to intervene unilaterally was not in principle changed and was re-affirmed in the Carter-Torrijos Treaty of 1977. In terms of domestic governance, Panamanian presidents ruled at the pleasure of Washington and, until the 1950s, the US government discouraged the development of an effective national army, fearing it might pose a threat to US control of the Canal. Perhaps the most grotesque symbol of Panama's protectorate status is the fact that Panama has never had a central bank and does not print its own currency—US dollars circulate as the medium of exchange.⁹

There are strong elements of both farce and tragedy in the manner by which Panama became nominally independent. The farce lies in the pretence of the initial rulers of the country that they embodied national aspirations for independence, when in fact their rule was based upon US military and geo-political interests and their primary function was to serve those interests. Tragic is the fact that there was at the turn of the century a coherent Panamanian national identity and an aspiration for independence. The consequence of this contradiction is to rob the Panamanian people of pride in the creation of their country. Certainly, Panama is not the only country in the hemisphere in which foreign powers played a significant role in gaining independence—Uruguay and Cuba come to mind. However, in the case of Uruguay, it could reasonably be argued that the role of British sea power was no greater than the presence of French warships off the coast of Virginia at the time of the decisive battle of Yorktown in 1781. And while the USA granted independence to a puppet government in Cuba, this had been preceded by a long and fierce national struggle against both Spanish colonialism and US occupation.

In the case of Panama, 3 November 1903 marks a bogus event, a declaration of independence of no substance and little form, for it did not even establish the minimal conditions of sovereign status; that is, formal sovereignty over the national territory and a nominally independent foreign policy. While one must be cautious in attributing too much importance to intangible factors such as perception of national heritage, the collective consciousness of a farcical birth of the nation is a burden upon Panamanian nationalism which it is difficult for outsiders to appreciate.

⁸ After the defeat of Spain in the Spanish-American War, Cuba was granted independence by the USA subject to the Platt Amendment, which established protectorate status for Cuba.

⁹ The non-existent Panamanian currency has a name—the balboa—but its only form is in coin.

The political distortion

From 1903 until 1968, Panama provided a stereotype of political instability—thirty-eight governments each with four presidents between 1918 and 1949. It is defensible to assert that no President of Panama has ever come to power as an expression of popular will; or, if he did, he did not rule for long.¹⁰ This apparently chronic political instability has relatively little to do with the character of the body politic or with an abstract category called 'domestic politics'. Rather, it reflects a distortion of the relationship between the rulers and the ruled resulting from the subservience of Panamanian governments to successive US governments.

The geo-political importance assigned to Panama by Washington and a US military presence in the Canal Zone larger and vastly better equipped than the Panamanian National Guard (later called the 'Defence Force') has had a profound effect on the governance of the country. First, no government could pursue policies which significantly deviated from what US officials conceived to be the national interests of their government in Panama and the region as a whole. To a significant degree the hegemonic influence of the US government has been exercised by the military commanders in the Canal Zone, where the headquarters for all US military operations in Latin America and the Caribbean is located. The direct intervention of US military commanders in local political affairs—a task usually monopolised by the civilians in the State Department and Central Intelligence Agency (CIA)—is virtually unique in the hemisphere. In El Salvador there are US military 'advisers' and in Honduras there is the US-funded 'contra' army. The relatively 'high-profile' role in Panama gives the US generals the appearance of commanders of an army of occupation rather than as protectors of the Canal.¹¹

¹⁰ Arnulfo Arias was declared the winner of the 1967 presidential election and most certainly won a majority of votes cast. He was overthrown by a coup the next year. The dubious character of Panamanian elections has been conceded even by government officials. In December 1986, Rolando Murgas, Vice-President of the national Election Tribunal (which had certified the results of the extremely controversial election of 1984, discussed below) observed that 'our political history, lamentably, is full of blemishes and electoral corruption.' See Central American Report, Guatemala: Inforpress, 30 January 1987.

As a result of this overt and dominant role of the US government, the governments of Panama have usually found—if they wish to remain in office—that it is considerably more important to keep Washington content than to keep content their own population. Accommodating Washington was certainly the deciding factor in the continued health of Panamanian governments from 1903 until the 1950s. During this period the country was ruled by the principal oligarchic families—the Arias, the Arosemena and the Chiari being the most prominent. These families competed among themselves for political office, with little attempt to accommodate or co-opt the emerging middle class, much less the mass of the population. With their power guaranteed by the presence of thousands of US troops, their rule was even more narrowly based than that of other oligarchies in Central and South America.¹²

The overwhelming dominance of American governments over Panama distorted political life both between the rulers and the ruled and within the elite itself. Relieved of the burden of consolidating its rule over the population, the Panamanian elite failed to develop effective, long-term institutions of political accommodation and co-optation. Indeed, beginning in the 1940s, the most serious manifestations of popular unrest were directed primarily at the US presence in the Canal Zone and secondarily at the government of the day as accomplices.

The most obvious manifestations of political instability, (governments and presidents coming and going with alarming frequency) were the result of a second distortion. With a foreign power playing such a dominant role in the affairs of the country, it was a small and obvious additional step for the US Embassy and the military to serve from time to time as arbitrators in intra-elite conflicts. Therefore, it was extremely tempting for Panamanian factions out of immediate power to petition to the American patrons to intervene and shift the balance of political power. Even when US agents chose not to exercise this informal viceroy role, the realisation that it might be exercised created an inherent instability in intra-elite struggles for power.

¹¹ Roberto Eisenmann, editor of the independent newspaper La Prensa, has commented upon the role in 1986 of the US military in Panama, referring specifically to General John Galvin, head of the Southern Command, and General Manuel A Noriega, the de facto dictator of Panama. '... [T]he US ambassador has a lot of competition, when it comes to stating the US position, with the General [John Galvin] who commands the US Southern Command ... We [at La Prensa] got hold of a memorandum from Noriega to Galvin ... which had the tone of an underling reporting to his boss.' Council on Hemispheric Affairs, News and Analysis, Washington DC, 12 June 1986, p 2. See reference to Eisenmann in note 44.

¹² The role of US governments differed in kind in South America and Mexico, but only in degree in Central America. In Central America the extremely narrow political base of the oligarchy was also the result of forced labour systems considerably more rigid than in Panama. See John Weeks, 'An interpretation of the Central American crisis', Latin American Research Review 21(3) Fall 1986.

The rise in importance of the Panamanian military, beginning in the 1950s, magnified the political distortion. Since the primary policy-orientation of the US government in Panama had always been military—the defence of the Canal and the geo-political focus of the Southern Command—preservation of the influence and prestige of the Defence Forces became a goal in and of itself for US national security planners. This development—namely, the US government assigning increasing importance to the Panamanian military as a source of stability in Panama—was not without its irony.

The most important consequence of the distortion of political conflict by the role of the USA was for the issue of nationalism and national self-esteem to dominate all others. Despite the relatively rapid growth of a working class in the urban centres of Colon and Panama City and the substantial proletarianisation of the agricultural labour force, political conflict and political parties did not develop along class lines. Even the distinction between Left and Right is of questionable relevance for analysing the political scene. The first mass political movement began in the 1940s; it was built around a single personality, Arnulfo Arias, whose political career was constructed on one issue—the Canal.

Unquestionably the most popular political figure in Panama from the 1940s until Torrijos, Arias has been compared to another populist demagogue, Haya de la Torre of Peru. Like de la Torre, Arias contested presidential elections for four decades, running last in 1984 at the age of 82; an election he most certainly won, but was denied by fraud. While there are similarities between the two men—a gripping oratorical style and a wordy populism aimed at the petty bourgeoisie and workers with little explicit class content—the similarities are superficial. Despite the dominance of his personality over his followers, Haya's political party APRA won an overwhelming victory in the presidential elections that followed his death in the early 1980s. While the Aprista Party proved to be considerably more than just the inspiration of one long-lived leader, the Panamanista Party is little more than the extension of Arias' personality. Further, while the Aprista Party is social democratic in its outlook, Arias' politics (beyond the nationalist issue of the Canal) is decidedly right-wing, leading him to be described as 'corporatist' and 'fascist'.

The emergence in Panama of a right-wing populist seizing on nationalism is a symptom of the political distortion. The emergence of an urban middle class in the 1940s created the opportunity for a nationalist leader. During the war the political Left, particularly the Communist Party, had compromised itself with regard to nationalism by uncritically supporting the Allied Powers in World War II; in the Panamanian context, this meant supporting the oligarchy closely tied to the US government. Into this vacuum of nationalism stepped Arias, seizing upon the single issue that could unite Panamanians against the rule of the traditional elite. Arias' political fortunes waxed and waned with popular outrage over the Canal, and his success in cornering the market on nationalism left the parties of the Left and the centre continuously without an effective electoral strategy.¹³

While nationalism is a powerful political force in all countries of Latin America, in no country but Panama (and possibly Cuba) has it played such an overwhelming role. Furthermore, because the nationalist issue was monopolised for so long by a right-wing populist, the explosive issue of the Canal was effectively divorced from issues of social reform. This separation of issues is in stark contrast to the nationalist struggle in Nicaragua, where the overthrow of the Somoza dynasty was inseparable from a call for a general and radical reorganisation of society. In Nicaragua an initially narrow nationalist struggle brought social and political issues to the fore; in Panama, national outrage against US domination has been narrowly focused upon the status of the Canal, with the result that until recently other issues have been eclipsed. Fundamentally, the political distortion created by US dominance has denied Panamanians a national political consciousness, just as the historical distortion robbed it of a national history.

The economic distortion

Mainstream Western economic theory ('neoclassical' theory) makes great use of the term 'distortions' when referring to economies.¹⁴ In the framework of this theory these alleged distortions are always the result of state interventions which prevent an economy from approximating to an ideal result implied by a model of perfect competition ('the invisible hand'). Thus, for example, minimum wages, subsidies on commodities and tariffs divert the economy from an optimally efficient use of resources. The economy of Panama, which has evolved under policy attitudes of relatively little state intervention and regulation compared to most underdeveloped countries, is by any reasonable measure one of the most distorted in the world and has become more so in the last two decades.

¹³ Arias won the presidency in 1948, following major and violent demonstrations the previous year against the American presence; he won again in 1967 after violent riots in 1964 and his successor's failure to negotiate a new Canal treaty.

¹⁴ See discussion in World Development Report 1983, where it is claimed that 'price distortion' accounts for a third of measured growth performance in selected developing countries. World Bank, World Development Report 1983, London: Oxford University Press, p 3.

The economy of Panama has a structure which makes it sui generis in the hemisphere, an economy in which relatively rapid measured growth of national income has been associated with a declining importance of production in the normal sense of that word. Until the 1960s, Panama's economic life, like its political life, was dominated by the Canal. This narrow strip of waterway divides the country in two parts, with virtually all economic activity taking place along its borders or in the north of the country. Only a small portion of the tonnage carried by ships passing through the Canal either comes from or lands on Panamanian soil. The Canal is thus a singularly appropriate symbol of the economic life of Panama, for the country has no national economy as such.

'National economy' is an elusive concept, but one that plays a central role in economic theory.¹⁵ It is useful to ask what are the characteristics of a national economy; for example, to ask what characteristics make it appropriate to refer to the economic relations between Canada and the USA as 'international', and those between Wisconsin and Minnesota (on the Canadian border) as 'internal' or 'domestic'. First and most obviously, Canada and the USA have separate currencies and provinces of a country do not. The absence of a national currency has a number of quite important consequences for economic policy. Without a national currency, a government cannot borrow from itself (that is, print money or buy national currency bonds from itself). Since the Panamanian government must borrow in dollars, there is no internal (non-convertible) debt;¹⁶ indeed, any borrowing by the private sector or the state adds to the foreign debt.

¹⁵ In neo-classical economic theory internal trade and foreign trade are governed by two different principles. In the first case, competition results in specialisation according to which producer has the lowest absolute cost ('absolute advantage'). Between countries, competition results in specialisation according to relative cost differentials ('comparative advantage'). The least-cost producer drives the others out of business within a country but not among countries. In this analysis, a 'country' is an entity with its own money supply and for which the in-migration of labour is limited.

Second, the absence of a national currency precludes certain basic policy instruments at the heart of national economic policy. With no separate currency, the government of Panama cannot devalue in an attempt to redress a balance-of-payments deficit, nor can it restrict foreign exchange flows by limiting the conditions of currency convertibility. While one can question the effectiveness of such policy measures, they are commonly used throughout the developed and developing world. Further, and even more fundamental, the government of Panama has virtually no control of its domestic rate of inflation, no more, say than the local governments of Bavaria or California. This is for two reasons: first, there is no money supply to attempt to regulate; and, second, the value of the medium of circulation, the dollar, is determined in the money and commodity markets of the industrial capitalist countries.

To appreciate the full implications of this situation, consider the options open to the Panamanian government if faced with a severe balance-of-payments crisis. No relief could be sought through devaluation, nor could the government seek to increase the competitiveness of its exports (and domestic import-substitutes) by restrictive monetary policy aimed at lowering the Panamanian price level relatively to the price level of its trading partners. The only viable option would be to attempt to depress money wages, thereby reducing production costs. This is not a policy that is likely to enhance political and social stability.

In practice, government policy in Panama over the last two decades has been not to promote exports, though foreign exchange earnings have increased at an extremely rapid rate. The distorted character of the Panamanian economy is demonstrated by two distinctions it held in the hemisphere in the 1980s—it is not only the country with the largest ratio of foreign exchange inflow to national income but also the country that exports the smallest proportion of its national production. This unlikely combination is the consequence of the increasing denationalisation of the Panamanian economy—inherent in the role of the Canal—which was greatly intensified during the Torrijos years. Much is written about the phenomenon of 'denationalisation' of Latin American economies, this term referring to the buying-up of private national capital by foreign capital, particularly during the 1950s and 1960s. In Panama a much more profound form of 'denationalisation' has occurred: the structure of the economy has shifted from the production of commodities to the servicing of other countries' economic activities; and, within the commodity producing sectors, from using Panamanian resources to assembling and processing intermediate products supplied from abroad.

¹⁶ Even were the Panamanian government to borrow from its citizens, the debt held by these Panamanians would still be 'foreign' in that it must be repaid in a foreign currency, the US dollar. These dollars cannot be created by the Panamanian government, but must be obtained through exports of commodities and services or capital inflows.

The prime vehicle for the shift away from commodity production is the International Financial Centre (IFC) a major economic legacy of the Torrijos government. Established in the early 1970s, the IFC quickly became one of the world's largest 'off-shore' banking centres, a refuge for financial capital safe from taxation and regulation and enjoying a guarantee of total secrecy in dealings and movement. By its peak of success in 1982, the IFC accommodated the operations of over 120 international banks, with capital on deposit of $48,000 million dollars. Foreign exchange inflow from the operation of the IFC reached 6,000 million in 1983, over three times the value of commodity exports.¹⁷ As a consequence of this ratio, commodities represented only about 15 per cent of the current account of the balance of payments compared to 85 per cent for the five Central American countries.¹⁸

The operations of the IFC can hardly be considered a part of a national Panamanian economy. Whatever other effect the financial capital resting in the IFC may have, it has no impact upon the Panamanian economy except as a source of foreign exchange earnings. Along with the other service activities which provide over 80 per cent of Panama's foreign exchange, international banking activities have few linkage effects and generate little employment—only 8,000 jobs for a sector whose measured share of national income is 6 per cent.¹⁹ Perhaps more serious than the limited level of employment is its inherent nature. Virtually all the employees in the banking sector are 'white-collar workers', so that expansion of the sector has little if any impact on the unskilled, who account for most of Panama's urban unemployed. To compound matters, the level of prosperity of the banking sector has little influence on the level of employment. Once the buildings were constructed and the office equipment put in place, a given number of employees can move a virtually limitless amount of money, for little more than ledger entries are then involved. More difficult to measure than the employment effect of banking are the negative consequences of the IFC on the Panamanian government's economic and political autonomy. An economic strategy based upon attracting foreign direct investment has major political implications, for governments must maintain what is called a 'favourable investment climate'. Even more restrictive of political and social policy is the need to provide a favourable environment for short-run financial capital. As a rule, productive investors cannot afford to be as fickle as financial depositors. A factory or plantation is an illiquid asset, not easily converted to money and expatriated. By contrast, the slightest hint of regulation or restrictions upon the privileges of depositors could prompt a massive flight of short-term capital from Panama to more compliant locations such as the Cayman Islands.²⁰ While Torrijos is viewed by many as a great Panamanian nationalist,²¹ it may be that the international banking sector which he fostered has created constraints on political sovereignty as limiting as those in force when the country was a virtual protectorate of the USA.

¹⁷ Inforpress, Central American Report, 23 February 1985. Earnings from services other than banking were $742 million, while commodity exports were $1,778 million.

¹⁸ For a comparison of the structure of the Panamanian external sector to that of the Central American countries, see John Weeks, The Economies of Central America, New York: Holmes and Meier, 1985, pp 96-7.

¹⁹ Inforpress, Central American Report, 23 February 1985.

A second major innovation of the Torrijos years further contributed to the denationalisation of the Panamanian economy, the Colon Free Trade Zone. This industrial estate, in the country's second largest city, grew from nothing to a total export value of $1500 million in less than two decades, with its production based largely on imported inputs. As in the case of the IFC, there are few linkages to the rest of the economy, although in this case increased production does require increased employment. The employment generated is not great considering that the Colon FTZ's international cost advantage is cheap labour. Together the FTZ and the IFC account for less than 5 per cent of the country's labour force, while generating over 80 per cent of foreign exchange earnings.

The economic strategy based on international banking and the FTZ cannot be judged a great success. During the 1970s, Panama had a slower rate of aggregate economic growth than any Central American country, considerably below its own rate for the 1950s and less than half its rate during the 1960s.²² After 1980 the Central American countries suffered a severe economic depression and Panama's growth performance was considerably better by comparison. However, close inspection of the statistics raises doubt as to what 'growth' implied in the Panamanian context. To take an extreme example indicative of the contradictions in the Panamanian economy, in 1981 measured national income rose by 4 per cent in constant prices. This was despite declines in all commodity-producing sectors: a negative 2.5 per cent in agriculture and manufacturing, and a negative 7 per cent in construction. A statistical recording of positive aggregate growth was achieved by an 8 per cent increase in transport and communications, and an 11 per cent increase in commerce and banking.²³ One's usual expectation is that these tertiary sectors grow because there are more commodities to be transported, exchanged, and financed; that is, that these economic activities are means to an end. In fact, one discovers that in 1981 Panamanians enjoyed a lower domestic supply of commodities; that production in agriculture, manufacturing and construction was down, and that the volume of commodity imports was also down. The profound 'denationalisation' of economic activity in Panama is dramatically demonstrated by the fact that the measured rate of growth of the economy could be positive in a year in which, on average, material well-being declined. One concludes that much of the growth of the Panamanian economy in the last decade has been a statistical illusion.²⁴ Alienated from its own history and politics, the Panamanian nation is also alienated from its own economic life, living in a society so constructed that expansion and contraction of the dynamic sectors of the economy have little direct impact on the livelihoods of the mass of the population.

²⁰ The difficulty of maintaining a favourable amount for financial capitalisation is discussed further in John Weeks, The Economics of Central America, New York: Holmes and Meier, 1985, Chapter 4. Specifically on the concern by a Panamanian official about the consequences of easing banking secrecy laws, see Central American Report, 10 August 1984.

²¹ The case for Torrijos as a Panamanian nationalist is presented in Inforpress, Centroamerica, Centro America 1982.

Under Torrijos, some steps were taken to revitalise the productive sector of the economy. From 1969 to 1977 the government implemented a highly-publicised land reform, involving the expropriation or purchase of 500,000 hectares of land. However, this land reform ²² Rates of growth of gross domestic product by decade were: 1950s, 4.7 per cent; 1960s, 9.0 per cent; and 1970s, 3.5 per cent. The average for the five Central American countries by decade was 4.6, 6.5, and 5.9 per cent, respectively. See Weeks, The Economies of Central America, pp 61-3.

²³ Weeks, The Economies of Central America, pp 195-6.

²⁴ Steve Ropp, in a review of recent economic trends, refers to 'two economies' in Panama: The dynamic service and financial centre and the stagnant productive sector. 'General Noriega's Panama', Current History, 85(550) December 1986, p 423.

affected only 10 per cent of rural families and has not arrested the decline of the peasant sector. In 1960, 16 per cent of peasant families derived their incomes from agricultural wage employment, and in 1979 this had risen to 27 per cent,²⁵ an increase indicating growing landlessness despite the agrarian reform.²⁶ For rural families retaining land, conditions have worsened for the smallholder. Despite a rise in the average size of all farms (due to out-migration to urban areas), the average size of farms less than ten hectares (60 per cent of all farms) declined in the 1970s.²⁷ Even more indicative of the plight of the small peasant is data on yields per unit of land. In most of the developing world there is an inverse relationship between output per unit of land and farm size, since smallholders tend to work land more intensively than is the case on large estates.²⁸ Apparently, this is not the case of Panama. For the most important food crop, rice, the yield per hectare in 1960 was virtually the same on small and large farms, but over the next twenty years land productivity declined absolutely on small holdings.²⁹ In the early 1980s, a hectare of land on large farms yielded almost three times as much rice as a hectare on small farms.³⁰

Decline of peasant agriculture during the 1970s stimulated an exodus from the countryside. Evidence indicates that rising per capita income in Panama during that decade, at about 1 per cent per annum, had little impact on the level of poverty. In 1975, 173,000 families were estimated to be in poverty, 68 per cent of which were in rural areas. In 1980, the total number of households in poverty had risen to 213,000, only 56 per ²⁵ Much of the increase in wage employment in agriculture has been the result of the growth of sugar production. With the world price of sugar extremely low and a reduction in Panama's quota to the United States by the Reagan Administration, the future of this sector is in doubt.

²⁶ One study shows an increase in landlessness from 34,000 families in 1970 to 55,000 at the end of the decade. The total number of rural families at the middle of the decade was about 150,000. See Weeks, The Economies of Central America, p 123 and Roberto Pinnock and Charlotte Elton, 'Rural poverty in Panama: trends and structural cases', World Employment Programme Research Working Paper 10-6/WP 60, Geneva: ILO, September 1983, pp 10-15.

²⁷ Pinnock and Elton, Rural Poverty in Panama . . . and Marco A Gandasegui, Hijo, La Fuerza de Trabajo en el Agro: Experiencia del desarrollo capitalista en Panama, Panama: CELA, 1985, pp 102ff.

²⁸ See, for example, FAO, 'The Effects of Land Tenure and Fragmentation of Farm Holdings on Agricultural Development', Rome: FAO, December 1986, Document No. COAG/87/8, pp 34-46.

²⁹ The yield estimates come from studies in which the definition of 'small' and 'large' varies according to quality of land. Average size of small farms was approximately 11 hectares. See Pinnock and Elton, Rural Poverty in Panama . . . , p 17.

³⁰ For the 1959-60 crop year, rice output per hectare on small farms was 27 quintals and 25 quintals on large farms. In 1971-72 the averages were 20 quintals and 51 quintals, the gap increasing subsequently. See Republica de Panama, Contraloria General del la Republica, Boletines de produccion agropecuaria, Panama, various years.

cent of which were rural.³¹ A relative reduction in rural poverty has come about in Panama by the poor moving to urban areas. This demographic shift together with other causes has increased the rate of urban unemployment. In the early 1970s, the urban unemployment rate averaged about 7 per cent per annum, rising to an average of 11 per cent for 1981-83.³² While unemployment has been growing, those urban Panamanians with blue-collar jobs have enjoyed no improvement in their real wages in two decades. Real wages rose from 1965 to 1970 and remained virtually constant until 1980, when they slipped back to the level of the mid-1960s. Furthermore, the purchasing power of the minimum wage for Colon and Panama City fell by 30 per cent from 1971 to 1982.³³ While the IFC has prospered from the inflow of short-term capital and the FTZ has bustled with activity, the economic plight of most Panamanians has deteriorated. It is not unknown for per capita income in a country to rise with no benefit accruing to the mass of the population; this was the case with the distribution of gains from growth in the countries of Central America during the 1960s and 1970s (except for Costa Rica). However, the failure of most Panamanians to benefit from the growth of measured national income over the last fifteen years has not been a distributional phenomenon as such, but rather a phenomenon of disarticulation. The vast majority of Panamanian peasants, wage-workers, and white-collar employees have no link, however tenuous, to the dynamic sectors of the economy, no mechanism by which the income generated in those sectors would reach them except through government expenditure of state revenues generated by those sectors. The fence around the Colon FTZ and the guards restricting entry to the IFC are singularly appropriate symbols of the relationship of these economic entities to the Panamanian nation.

Political instability in Panama in the 1980s

The success of Torrijos

Omar Torrijos is commonly perceived as a great Panamanian nationalist, notwithstanding the fact that he pursued an economic strategy which 'denationalised' Panamanian economic life beyond anything achieved by US economic and political domination. One indicator of this perception is the fact that the Moscow-line People's Party of Panama gave Torrijos virtually unqualified support throughout his rule (and then transferred its support to his successor as Head of the Defence Forces, General Noriega). This contradiction between Torrijos the nationalist in rhetoric and Torrijos the facilitator of international banking and Free Zone manufacturing is explained in terms of historical and political distortions.

³¹ Pinnock and Elton, Rural Poverty in Panama . . . , pp 32-3 and A Cordero et al, Distribucion del ingreso en Panama, Panama, 1980.

³² Commission Economica para America Latina (CEPAL), Balance Preliminar del la Economia Latinoamericana en 1984, Santiago: CEPAL, 1985.

³³ Programa del Empleo para America Latina y el Caribe (PREALC), Empleo y Salarios. Santiago: PREALC, 1983, and PREALC, Panama: Evolucion y Estructura de los Salarios. Santiago: PREALC, Junio de 1985.

Domestically, Torrijos initiated two highly visible social reforms; land reform and the reform of labour relations. Land reform did little if anything to improve the plight of the peasantry or agricultural workers, though it probably had a major effect on temporarily defusing rural unrest. Labour reform apparently had great potential to alter the bargaining relationship between capital and labour. From 1969 to 1977 the government legally recognised 131 new unions (over 60 per cent of all workers' organisations), and approved over 500 collective agreements, compared to only thirty for the period 1965-69.³⁴ As shown in the previous section, these measures had no obvious effect upon the trend in real wages: average urban real wages rose 12 per cent from 1965 to 1970, then were virtually constant throughout the 1970s, declining in the 1980s. Perhaps one reason that Torrijos is perceived as significantly shifting the balance of power from capital to labour is the obsession shown by the World Bank over revisions in the country's labour code, discussed below.

The real basis of Torrijos' popularity lies in his adroit appropriation of the Canal issue from Arias and the subsequent use of that issue as a nationalist rallying cry. As Torrijos' critics have stressed, no elected government of Panama would have dared to conclude an agreement with the USA embodying so many fundamental compromises of national sovereignty as the Carter-Torrijos Treaty of 1977. Although the Treaty provided for the formal transfer of Canal ownership to Panama in the year 2000, it did not amend the fundamental compromise of Panamanian sovereignty—for the USA was granted the unilateral right to intervene militarily in Panama should there be any perceived threat to the 'neutrality' of the Canal. That Torrijos could achieve such a nationalist reputation in face of evidence to the contrary is graphic evidence of the distortion of Panamanian politics and national consciousness resulting from seventy-five years of US domination.

³⁴ Inforpress Centroamerica, Centro America 1982, Panama, p 38.

What Torrijos did undeniably achieve was the establishment of temporary political and social stability in the country, based on an unlikely coalition of segments of the peasantry, the urban working class, the middle class and the capitalists. Briefly, the peasantry saw the land reform as partial fulfilment of its aspirations; the labour reforms seemed to create the possibility for gains for the working class; the short-term boom created by the construction of the IFC and the FTZ brought prosperity to the middle class and the business community also anticipated substantial gains from this prosperity. The anti-imperialist rhetoric associated with the new Canal Treaty touched the nationalism of all these groups. Briefly, Torrijos had a project that probably united a majority of Panamanians and obscured the fundamental distortions of society. By the time of his death the project was already floundering, and it was left to his successors to reap the fruits of disillusionment.

Disillusionment sets in

In 1978 Torrijos organised an indirect election of a new President of Panama which optimists interpreted as a step towards democratisation. This election had two major consequences. First, it demonstrated the weakness of the government in terms of popular support; the official Revolutionary Democratic Party (PRD) secured only about 40 per cent of the vote, achieving a majority only in coalition with the People's Party (a Moscow-line Communist Party) and a second partner, the Frente Amplio Popular (FRAMPO). If considered as a referendum on ten years of military rule, the election result was ambiguous at best. Second, it established the essentially powerless role of Panama's Head of State, a situation which continued for subsequent Presidents however chosen. In 1982 Torrijos' hand-picked President, Aristides Rojas, was replaced by Ricardo de la Espriella, an indication that the real power struggle was going on behind the scenes within the Defence Forces. From the death of Torrijos until early 1984, the most important factor determining the immediate political future of Panama was who would emerge as the dominant figure in the Defence Forces: General Ruben Dario Parades (the commander who succeeded after Torrijos), or perhaps one of two of his subordinates, Colonel Manuel Antonio Noriega (Head of Military Intelligence) or Roberto Diaz Herrera (a cousin of Torrijos).

This struggle for control of the Defence Forces (and thereby of political power) became complicated by the intervention of two external factors, the IMF and the World Bank. In 1979 Torrijos had reached an accord with the IMF, receiving a credit line of $80 million conditional upon a reform of the tax system and a reduction of state subsidies, particularly on agriculture. These IMF-fostered measures proved unpopular, both as an affront to nationalism and because of their direct economic effects. By 1983 another approach to the IMF was necessary, and it was clear that this time 'conditionality' would be considerably more stringent. The urgency for an agreement arose from the necessity to renegotiate Panama's foreign debt. Most of this debt had been contracted with private international banks, which made a prior accord with the IMF and/or the World Bank a condition for serious negotiations.

Given the urgent need to restructure the debt and the IMF-World Bank austerity measures that would be necessary to facilitate renegotiation, it was clear in the early 1980s that whoever was President of Panama for the foreseeable future would present an unpopular agenda for the country. Torrijos' vehicle of a figure-head President offered the military leadership an escape from this dilemma, for they could rule without appearing to govern. The strategy would have to be a subtle one, for a President of the stature of Rojas or de la Espriella would fool no one as to where real power lay. As the May 1984 elections approached, a singularly unlikely candidate emerged as the choice of the official PRD—Nicolas Ardito Barletta, a Vice-President of the World Bank.

In some respects Barletta was the ideal candidate to follow in the footsteps of Rojas and de la Espriella, for he had no political constituency of his own in Panama, was untainted by corruption or nepotism and, given his position at the World Bank and training as an economist, he could be trusted to carry out competently the negotiations with the multilateral agencies and private banks. On the negative side, he might prove too independently-minded and his University of Chicago view of economics would offend the left-wing of the Torrijos coalition. When, in early 1984, a five party coalition was formed to support Barletta (the National Democratic Union, UNADE), the Peoples Party denounced the leadership of the PRD for abandoning torrijismo and put its own candidate into the race.

Seven presidential candidates contested the election of 1984, but only Barletta and 82-year-old Arnulfo Arias had serious prospects of winning. There is some evidence that early in the campaign the Reagan Administration favoured Arias, but as election day approached its preference had changed to Barletta.³⁵ An opinion poll in March 1984 indicated Barletta and Arias to have roughly equal shares of public support, promising a close election. Close the election was and rife with fraud, according to neutral observers. The military intervened to seize the ballot-boxes, and after a delay of two weeks, Barletta was officially announced the winner by a majority of 1713 votes out of 600,000 votes cast. The incidence of fraud was so great that few doubted that Arias had actually won, prompting the opposition press to nickname Ardito Barletta, 'Fraudito'. Two years later Seymour Hersh of the New York Times would write a series of articles with overwhelming evidence that Arias had won by a margin of 25,000–30,000 votes; evidence that was available to the US government immediately after the election.³⁶ Undeterred by intelligence from the US Embassy in Panama that the new President had been elected as the result of an electoral fraud carried out by the military, the US Secretary of State, George Shultz, attended Barletta's Investiture and expressed words of praise for the new President and 'Panamanian democracy'.

While the election campaign had diverted attention, the struggle for power within the military resolved itself with Colonel (now General) Noriega becoming Head of the Defence Forces. Barletta, with no political base and holding office on the basis of a fraudulent election, served at the behest of the new military chief. The military found it convenient that Barletta appeared to rule in order that a civilian President would assume the responsibility for yielding to World Bank and IMF pressure and reversing the reforms of the Torrijos period. Throughout Barletta's eleven months as President, opposition increased from both the Panamanian business sector and the trade union movement. So effective was the military in hiding its political role that some groups on the left, such as the People's Party, supported it as the progressive and anti-imperialist alternative to a President judged to be pro-American and economically reactionary.³⁷

There seems to have been little difference between the policies of the civilian President and the military leadership during 1985 with regard to either domestic or foreign policy, only a division of labour. If Barletta stood accused of compromising Panama sovereignty in economic matters, then the military stood equally suspect in its own field. In January 1985, joint Panamanian-US military exercises were held, involving about 10,000 American troops. These exercises, lasting four months, occurred whilst Panama was nominally an active member of the Contadora group. For several years the Contadora countries had sought a peaceful solution to conflicts in Central America, in the face of clear US opposition. Indeed, Barletta's Administration hosted a meeting of the Contadora ministers while the military exercises were in progress.³⁸ Further joint exercises were held in 1986 and early 1987, indicating a growing and overt cooperation between the Southern Command and the Defence Forces.

³⁵ See Central American Report, 16 March 1984; and Seymour M Hersh, 'Panama General reported to rig election in 1984', New York Times, 22 June 1986.

³⁶ Hersh, New York Times, 22 June 1986.

³⁷ After the forced resignation of Barletta, the People's Party openly supported the military and Noriega in particular, referring to him as part of the Panamanian 'national liberation struggle'. See the summary of a Miami Herald article of 2 August 1986, in Latin American Monitor 3(6) August 1986, p 325.

As 1985 proceeded, less and less was left of the limited substance and extensive rhetoric of the Torrijos period. In foreign policy Panama moved into closer accord to US goals in the region, with joint military exercises and only formal participation in Contadora. On the economic front, Barletta sought to implement the conservative austerity package urged upon him by the World Bank and the IMF. Strong opposition from the business sector (who were opposed to increased taxation) and from organised labour (who objected to reform of the Labour Code) delayed matters, even forcing Barletta to reverse several decisions.³⁹ These vacillations increased the impression that Barletta's capacity to implement policy was extremely limited. There is some evidence that Noriega was planning to remove the civilian President as early as December 1984,⁴⁰ and an overt demonstration that the military effectively governed came in May 1985. For the first eight months of his short presidency, Barletta directed a multi-party cabinet in which the party of the military (PRD) held a minority of positions. In early May 1985, the leadership of the PRD gave Barletta an ultimatum to restructure his cabinet by the end of the month, with rumours of an intended coup providing the implicit sanction for non-compliance. Within a few days of the demand a new Cabinet had been formed which was overwhelmingly dominated by the PRD. Those who interpreted the military pressure for a Cabinet change as an expression of disapproval with Barletta's conservative economic policies were disappointed: in late June a new agreement was reached with the IMF whose secret provisions were rumoured to involve further and severe austerity measures.

³⁸ Perhaps even more in contradiction with alleged nationalist tendencies in the military leadership, the exercises were in progress on 9 January 1985, the 'Day of National Dignity'. On this date in 1964, the Panamanian military had refused to disperse people demonstrating against the US presence in the Canal Zone. US troops opened fire upon the demonstrators, killing twenty-one and injuring about 500; see Central American Report, 25 January 1985.

³⁹ Soon after assuming the presidency, Barletta announced an austerity programme, then withdrew it in the face of strong opposition in November 1984; see Central American Report, 22 February 1985. In June and July 1985 opposition from organised labour (including a two-day general strike, 1-2 July) forced a retraction of proposed changes in the Labour Code; see Central American Report, 28 June 1985 and 5 July 1985.

⁴⁰ In August 1985, La Prensa reported that a New York Public relations firm had supplied to Noriega in December 1984 a plan 'to transform General M A Noriega into the protector of Panamanians and their civil liberties'. The report allegedly involved a campaign to present the general as a Gaullist figure; see Central American Report, 23 August 1985.

Thus in mid-1985 Panama was swept by social unrest, headed by a President with no power or authority, and, perhaps most serious of all, who had lost the rhetoric of nationalism which had been so crucial to national stability during the Torrijos years.

Things fall apart

In October 1985 Nicolas Ardito Barletta resigned as President of Panama in favour of his Vice-President, Eric Arturo Delvalle, a millionaire businessman. That Barletta resigned following pressure from Noriega is beyond doubt, but considerable controversy surrounds Noriega's motives.⁴¹ After the fall of Barletta, political life in Panama began to change significantly. For more than two decades Panama had been a country whose democratic credentials were dubious, but in which there was considerable individual and political freedom, particularly freedom of expression. Major abuses of human rights had been rare, and during the 1970s the country had become a haven for political refugees from the rest of Latin America, particularly the Southern Cone. However, a year and a half after the blatant demonstration of military control over government by the forced resignation of Barletta, Panama had acquired a number of the characteristics of a police state.⁴²

One of the most ominous of recent events occurred in September

⁴¹ 'Ardito's fall a mystery'. Central American Report, 18 October 1985.

⁴² '... [I]t appears that Panama, once proudly distinguishing itself from the dirty human-rights records of some of its Central American neighbors, may be slipping into the abyss as well, with the Defense Forces playing the role of final arbiter in any and all social conflicts.' See Central American Report, 31 January 1986, p 29. A prominent Panamanian opponent of the Noriega regime summed up the situation in January 1987 with the observation, 'Today it is a humiliation to be Panamanian.' In the present political context in Panama it is unwise to identify hostile commentators.

1985, just before the fall of Barletta, when the decapitated body of Hugo Spadafora was discovered just across the border with Costa Rica. A colourful and extremely popular politician of left-wing populist tendencies, Spadafora had been an outspoken critic of the military. Shortly before his death he had accused high-ranking officers of drug trafficking, saying that he had evidence to substantiate this. Allegations of drug trafficking on the part of the military were not new. In subsequent months it emerged that if Spadafora did have evidence of such criminal activity, he had not been alone in that regard.

For several years US officials had believed that banks in Panama served as conduits for money obtained from drug trafficking. Following Spadafora's allegations, the US entered into negotiations with Delvalle to seek an amendment of the strict secrecy laws of the IFC.⁴³ The Panamanian government was hardly enthusiastic about changing the banking regulations in order to facilitate investigation of a relatively small sum of money.⁴⁴ Any change could dampen the enthusiasm of depositors in general and lead to massive capital flight. However, in June 1986 unnamed American officials dropped an undiplomatic bombshell by leaking to the Press that Noriega himself was suspected to be the major drug trafficker in Panama, and that he was involved in a number of other criminal activities.

The most serious of the accusations were: 1) that Noriega was a major intermediary in the smuggling of drugs to the USA; 2) that for fifteen years he had passed on sensitive intelligence information to the government of Cuba; 3) that he was implicated in the murder of Hugo Spadafora;⁴⁵ 4) that he was personally responsible for the electoral fraud of 1984; 5) that he facilitated the supply of arms to the M-19 guerrilla movement in Colombia and, 6) that he was a major investor in a Panamanian firm which sold to Cuba and Eastern Europe items of US technology whose export to those countries was restricted for reasons of national security.⁴⁶ Even at the height of its anti-Sandinista polemics, the Reagan Administration had not accused a Nicaraguan leader of such an array of crimes. Coming on the heels of negative comments by the new US Ambassador to Panama and criticisms of Panama by the US Under-Secretary of State for Latin America,⁴⁷ the allegations against Noriega seemed a part of an orchestrated destabilisation campaign. The most astounding accusation against Noriega came in October 1986 at a semi-public academic conference in Washington on recent political events in Panama. Norman Bailey, a former adviser to the US President, took an opportunity to allege that a few months earlier Noriega had attended a meeting of major Latin American drug dealers in Cuzco, Peru. According to Bailey's account, the participants in the meeting had discussed the elimination of Spadafora before damaging evidence was revealed.⁴⁸

⁴³ In August 1984, the US District Attorney in Miami was quoted as saying, 'Evidence developed . . . shows that substantial sums of money derived from narcotics sources have been funneled through some Panamanian banks.' At this time a Panamanian military officer, Lieutenant-Colonel Julian Melo, was arrested for drug trafficking. See Central American Report, 10 August 1984, p 246.

⁴⁴ The sum alleged by US officials to be from drug sources was $600 million, compared to $40,000 million in total deposits in the IFC. The head of the Panamanian Banking Commission pointed out that total drug sales in the United States were commonly estimated to be $100,000 million, so even if allegations against Panama were true, the IFC comprised less than one per cent of the US drug problem. See Central American Report, 11 July 1986.

⁴⁵ At the time of Spadafora's death his family had contended that military intelligence agents had arrested him at the orders of Noriega. See Central American Report, 31 January 1986.

The most surprising aspect of this series of extraordinary charges is that having accused Noriega of being a drug-pusher, murderer, and an agent for the Communist bloc, the USA in no significant way changed its behaviour towards Panama. The new ambassador duly arrived in Panama City, Panama's special trade concessions within the Caribbean Basin Initiative continued, and joint US-Panamanian war games went on as planned in January 1987. No less surprising is the fact that little response came from the Panamanian government, other than a resolution in the National Assembly against the United States and a pro-Noriega street demonstration. The only groups to take up the allegations of criminal activity were those of the domestic Panamanian opposition. Both the right and the left (with the exception of the People's Party) denounced Noriega and called for his resignation. This provoked a series of repressive measures by the military, including Press repression that sent two of Panama's most prominent journalists into exile in the United States.⁴⁹

⁴⁶ These allegations appeared in articles by Seymour Hersh in the New York Times and in several other newspapers in June 1986 when Noriega was visiting the USA.

⁴⁷ At his confirmation hearing before the US Senate, Ambassador-designate Arthur H Davis said that the Panamanian government should be warned about human rights investigations and pressed to investigate the murder of Spadafora. Two months later, Elliot Abrams, Under-Secretary of State, listed a number of criticisms of the Panamanian government in a press interview. See Central American Report, 7 March 1986 and 23 May 1986.

⁴⁸ The author was present at this conference, which was organised by the School of Advanced International Studies of Johns Hopkins University. Bailey's comments were widely reported. See Central American Report, 17 October 1986.

⁴⁹ Roberto Eisenmann left Panama to take up a fellowship in the USA, then chose not to return due to death threats. The associate editor of Eisenmann's paper, La Prensa, took refuge in the Venezuelan Embassy in July 1986 after death threats and also being charged by the government with various offences. He eventually made his way to the USA.

A number of explanations have been ventured for this total contradiction between words and action by the government of the United States. One hypothesis postulates a split in the Reagan Administration and the US Congress between foreign policy pragmatists who viewed Noriega as a source of stability in Panama and a bulwark against 'Sandinista expansionism', and a group of right-wing ideologues hoping for a compliant pro-US government which would agree to cancel the planned transfer of the Canal to Panamanian control in the year 2000.⁵⁰

That such a split existed there is no doubt, but the entire episode reflects a much more profound phenomenon—the grotesque distortion of US–Panamanian relations resulting from seventy-five years of domination and clientage. The charges against Noriega represented but one further example of direct manipulation of Panamanian politics which has characterised US policy since American warships had intervened to create the country in 1903. While the Reagan Administration is more heavy-handed than its predecessors, its treatment of Panamanian internal affairs as a proper arena for direct action is consistent with the history of US governmental policies. In effect, the USA treats Panama as a military protectorate and its politicians, be they civilian or military, as clients to be manipulated.⁵¹ The political genius of Torrijos lay in his ability to obscure this client status of Panama while doing nothing of importance to alter it. The patron–client relationship remains, perhaps stronger than ever, and it is this distortion which robs Panama of 'domestic politics' as such and leaves the Panamanian nation, after seventy-five years of existence, still struggling to establish itself as a sovereign country.

⁵⁰ Extreme right-wing Senator Jesse Helms of North Carolina is usually identified as the leading spirit in the campaign to prevent transfer of the Canal.

⁵¹ If this statement seems too strong and polemical, refer to the US Department of Defense document obtained by the Council on Hemispheric Affairs, a Washington human rights and lobbying group. In the discussion of US policy toward Panama, one reads a passage that goes beyond the allegations of the most paranoid Panamanian nationalist: 'A policy of systemic change [in Panama] is a deliberate effort by a component of the US government to modify or remove one of more elements or characteristics . . . which along with other elements comprise [a country's] basic internal "system". Such elements or characteristics may include a particular law, a prevalent pattern of behavior, rules and regulations . . . a system of values, the nation's governmental structure, or its ideology.' United States Southern Command, Department of Defense, Memorandum for Director, Planning and Strategy: Preliminary Assessment of the Applicability and Utility of a US Policy of Systemic Change for Panama, Quarry Heights, Panama, 1 November 1985, p 1.

Mexico's challenges: sovereignty and national autonomy under interdependence *

As Mexico struggles to emerge from an economic crisis already half a decade old, the terms of the debate on development strategy are changing. From the late 1940s until the late 1970s, it would have been accurate to characterise the development debate as one centred on how best to insulate the domestic political economy from the vagaries of the international political economy. There were disagreements about the specific policy options, but the advocates of each strategy shared an emphasis on insulation as the best means of defending national sovereignty. While such insulation meant foregoing some of the opportunities afforded by closer integration into world markets, the decreased risks and potential benefits resulting from internally-oriented growth and industrialisation promised to offset such potential losses.

Today, after some dramatic gains, that inward-orientation seems to offer Mexico little hope for future advances in growth or welfare. Dissatisfaction with the old strategy arises from the political and economic problems attendant on both its successes and failures. Among the most important results are the near completion of the easy stages of import substitution, its demonstrated inability to create sufficient employment opportunities, and the need to generate foreign exchange to service a large foreign debt, contracted in part to sustain the old development strategy. Consequently, the terms of the development debate in Mexico now increasingly revolve around the means by which closer integration into the liberal international economic order could be used to defend national sovereignty.

These political and economic debates over the often contradictory pulls of interdependence and national autonomy have both international and domestic implications. In the 1980s, the international division of labour seems to offer an opportunity for some developing countries to better their position within it. Brazil and South Korea appear poised to move up; the question is whether Mexico can join them. There are also important domestic concerns. How will the gains and losses of whatever development strategy chosen be distributed among social groups within, as well as outside, Mexico?

* Support for this paper was provided by the Centre for Advanced Study in the Behavioral Sciences and the National Science Foundation (#BNS 84-11738)

This article reflects this complexity of issues and alternatives. First, it examines the concepts of sovereignty, autonomy and interdependence, as well as the relationships between them. Then it analyses the political economy of Mexico's international and domestic response to the new international opportunities and constraints. Its conclusions fall short of the dramatic, because the relevant choices have not yet been made and, perhaps more importantly, neither of the present contenders seem to offer any answers.

Sovereignty, autonomy and interdependence

These three concepts play fundamental roles in the literature of political economy. Sovereignty is intimately linked with the legitimacy of central state authority vis-à-vis competing claimants in both the domestic and international arenas.¹ However, political leaders are not only concerned with recognition of their right to make decisions affecting their country's political economy, but are also interested in safeguarding their ability to do so. The question of this ability brings in the concept of autonomy. In the context of development policy, autonomy can be defined as the ability to manage the domestic economy in accordance with a pattern of growth and welfare which corresponds to policymakers' perceived requisites for remaining in power. This ability is tempered by the need to make domestic economic decisions in response to the demands of the external trade and capital accounts, which represent the constraints on national policy deriving from the international political economy.²

Defining sovereignty and autonomy in this manner enables us to see that there is no necessary one-to-one relationship between the two. From this perspective one can certainly argue that Mexico's current debt crisis represents not so much a challenge to its absolute right to make choices (sovereignty intact) as to development strategies, as a narrowing of those choices to take account only of external rather than internal needs (a decrease in autonomy).

¹ John Gerard Ruggie, 'Continuity and transformation in the world polity: toward a neorealist synthesis', World Politics 35(1) 1982-3, p 276.

² Thomas L Ilgen, Autonomy and Interdependence: US-Western European Monetary and Trade Relations, 1958-1984, Totowa, New Jersey: Rowman and Allanheld, 1985, p 8.

Interdependence is the result of the increased integration of national markets into one international market. National economic policy can be seriously constrained by such integration because the behaviour of buyers and sellers in one country tends quickly and easily to equilibrate the prices of the same goods in the interdependent countries.³ This economic sensitivity leads to the key political issue: the vulnerability of states. The degree of vulnerability is best understood as reflecting the opportunity cost to an actor of foregoing the relationship,⁴ and thus can pose a threat to national autonomy. Interdependence can be asymmetric, with one country finding it easier to take advantage of the opportunities and manage the costs, of interdependence. North-South relations are conducted in such asymmetric terms, although many Northern analysts often attempt to mask the power relations in interdependence by portraying a certain equality of vulnerability.⁵

The concern with sovereignty, autonomy and interdependence is not peculiar to Third World countries. The difference between the general manner in which Southern and Northern countries attempt to develop a balance among the three which suits the domestic political economy, derives mainly from differences in the internal and external resources of each.⁶ Countries deal with the challenges of interdependence in three general fashions. Actual policy may combine the three, but with a clear bias towards one. Policy can be oriented towards submission to interdependence; insulation of key sectors of the domestic political economy from interdependence; or, acceptance of interdependence but with an effort to negotiate increased benefits and decreased costs.⁷

³ Richard N Cooper, Economic Policy in an Interdependent World: Essays in World Economics, Cambridge, Massachusetts: MIT Press, 1986, passim.

⁴ The interdependence literature, including its dependency variant, is examined in David A Baldwin, 'Interdependence and power: a conceptual analysis', International Organization (34) Autumn 1980, pp 471-506.

⁵ For an examination of this political use of interdependence in USA-Mexico relations, see Carlos Rico, 'Las relaciones mexicano-norteamericanas y los significados de la interdependencia', Foro Internacional (74) October-December 1978, pp 256-91.

⁶ This is the general argument presented in Stephen D Krasner, Structural Conflict, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1985. Krasner, however, plays down the tension between autonomy and interdependence in the North. For a better understanding of the complexity of, and concern over, this issue in the North, see Ilgen, Autonomy and Interdependence.

⁷ Some will argue that there is a fourth possibility, namely, rejection of the capitalist system and alliance with the socialist world led by the Soviet Union. In the case of Latin America, economics and politics both make such a route impractical, as Fidel Castro noted very early to the Sandinistas in Nicaragua.

A submissive response allows the international market to set the incentives which will determine the allocation of resources in the national economy and, consequently, how that national economy will be integrated into the international political economy. The greatest exponents of this development strategy have been the so-called 'Chicago boys', whose ideas dominated policymaking in Chile, Argentina and Uruguay in the 1970s, and Bela Belassa's World Bank group.⁸ Under this kind of response, sovereignty in the economic realm is given up, with perhaps a weakening of sovereignty in the politico-military realm. The effect on autonomy depends on yet another choice. If the international market is allowed to distribute the costs and benefits of interdependence, autonomy would be lost. But if political leaders intervene to alter such distribution, autonomy would survive, perhaps in an even stronger form than the autonomy preserved under failed programmes of insulation or negotiation.

Allowing the market free rein has three major problems for Southern countries. First, even if the international market itself were free of distortions, the cost to an individual country of change in response to international signals could be extremely high.⁹ Second, if they had followed international market signals, even the Newly Industrialising Countries (NICs such as Taiwan, South Korea, Brazil and Mexico) would probably have been prevented from attaining their present levels of industrialisation.¹⁰ Third, both international and national markets suffer from distortions. At the international level, Northern countries attempt to use their political and economic power to structure incentives to support Northern dominance. At the national level, markets in even the most developed countries of the Third World tend to be fragmented, and thus 'getting prices right' may not lead to the expected outcome.¹¹

⁸ On the 'Chicago Boys' and their experiments see, Rene Villarreal, La contrarevolucion monetaria, Mexico, DF: Oceana, 1983; Alejandro Foxley, Latin American Experiments in Neo-Conservative Economics, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1983; and Joseph Ramos, Neoconservative Economics in the Southern Cone of Latin America, 1973-1983, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1986. For a collection of Belassa's writings see, Bela Belassa, The Newly Industrializing Countries in the World Economy, New York: Permamon Press, 1981.

⁹ Even an ideological free-marketer such as President Ronald Reagan of the USA has sanctioned intervention into foreign currency markets because he perceives that his administration and the American position in the international political economy are extremely vulnerable to continued record trade deficits.

¹⁰ For an argument about the role of the state in export-led growth, with examples from South Korea, see Stephen Haggard and Chung-in Moon, 'The South Korean state in the international economy: liberal, dependent, or mercantile?' in John Gerard Ruggie (ed), The Antinomies of Interdependence, New York: Columbia University Press, 1983, pp 131-89.

Another means of addressing the challenge of interdependence is to seek to insulate those sectors of the national economy which are fundamental both to national standing in the international political economy and to the legitimacy of policymakers at home, from current international signals. This is not a policy of autarky. In its most popular Latin American variant it emphasises import-substitution industrialisation (ISI), financed by external links via primary sector exports, foreign loans and direct foreign investment. This response protects economic sovereignty, but its impact on national autonomy depends upon the success of the insulated sectors. If these sectors develop efficiently, autonomy is enhanced. But if protected sectors increasingly use resources inefficiently, a foreign exchange bottleneck and balance-of-payments crisis could undermine national autonomy.

The insulation strategy was fundamental to the industrialisation which allowed the NICs to exploit the workings of the product cycle in labour-intensive manufactures.¹² But the economic and political limits of ISI are well established,¹³ and the NICs may have moved beyond the point at which insulation's benefits outweigh its costs. South Korea and Taiwan abandoned that strategy in the early 1960s, before reaching its limits, although South Korea flirted briefly with import substitution in heavy industry during the 1970s. Brazil took steps in the late 1960s to diversify its strategy. In the 1970s Mexico vacillated between prolonging the life of ISI and following the diversification strategy. The recession in the early 1970s, the balance-of-payments crisis in 1976 and the debt crisis of 1982 were each followed by liberalisation and restructuring efforts, each more drastic than its predecessor.

A final, general orientation towards interdependence falls between the poles of submission and insulation. It accepts interdependence but stresses the need to negotiate with the major participants in the international political economy for a better deal than that offered by a ¹¹ Richard Cooper, 'Economic mobility and national economic policy', in his Economic Policy in an Interdependent World, p 74; see the Villarreal, Foxley and Ramos citations in footnote 6 for examples.

¹² On the product cycle and the NICs see the collection of essays in Louis Turner and Neil McMullen, The Newly Industrializing Countries: Trade and Adjustment, London: George Allen & Unwin for the Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1982.

¹³ On the economic limits, see Ian Little, et al, Industry and Trade in Some Developing Countries. London: Oxford University Press, 1970. Albert O Hirschman, 'The political economy of import-substituting industrialization in Latin America', Quarterly Journal of Economics (82) February 1968 pp 2-32, emphasises the socio-political obstacles to the continued success of ISI.

MEXICO'S CHALLENGES

static view of comparative advantage. For those countries with the resources with which to bargain,¹⁴ the goal is to find a niche for their products in the international market, with the highest possible value added, while structuring incentives at the domestic level to induce the allocation of resources by the private and public sectors in support of the production of those goods and/or services. At the same time, such countries should negotiate mutual adjustment with external agents who control both national consumer markets, and the flow of capital and technology. In short, the strategy entails creating comparative advantage in products attracting higher levels of value added.¹⁵ This response defends both sovereignty and autonomy, although at the expense of a degree of autonomy. The degree of autonomy lost will depend upon the negotiating resources and skill of the country.

Each of these responses to interdependence has implications for the resultant distribution of costs and benefits, at both the international and national levels. Internationally, none of the strategies will bring fundamental changes in the general relationship between North and South, but they may make a difference for individual Third World countries. By the same token, adherence to a strategy after it has become dysfunctional may threaten the progress made and call for a shift in orientation. For example, if large numbers of Third World countries were to choose the negotiated path, Northern markets might prove politically incapable of adjusting, thereby increasing the attractiveness of the insulation route.

The different responses may also influence the distribution of costs and benefits within the national political economy. But here the causal path is more complex because it is conditional upon the political arrangements adopted to implement the strategy nationally. Despite attempts to tie the political and economic repression of labour in Latin America to export production, evidence suggests no causal link.¹⁶ Analysis of the politics of adjustment among small Northern countries demonstrates that social democratic forms of governing, distributing benefits and cushioning the costs of international competitiveness are both politically and economically feasible.¹⁷ The failure in theoretical or empirical terms to make the link between production for export and repression suggests the importance of domestic politics in understanding how development strategies affect social classes.

¹⁴ For a study which emphasises the possibilities of this strategy see, David B Yoffie, Power and Protection, New York: Columbia University Press, 1983; for a stress on its limits see, L N Rangarajan, Commodity Conflict, Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1978.

¹⁵ Theoretical justification for this strategy and a model of how the components interact can be found in David R Mares, Penetrating International Markets: Theoretical Considerations and a Mexican Agriculture Case, New York: Columbia University Press, 1987.

¹⁶ David Collier (ed), The New Authoritarianism in Latin America, Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1979.

In sum, Mexico faces two challenges at the moment. One is to review its strategy for dealing with the dilemmas of sovereignty and autonomy in an interdependent world. While interdependence among the capitalist nations has a logic of its own, policy choices can have a significant impact on its international distribution of benefits and costs. A second challenge lies in devising domestic political strategies to bring about structural change in the economy, at social and political costs which are at a level that will not undermine the chosen development strategy. How is Mexico addressing these twin challenges?

Mexico's political economy under transition

Brief historical overview

The modern Mexican state emerged after almost two decades of revolution, civil war, and military revolts (1910–29). Out of this turmoil was constructed an elite-centred consensus that allowed regional strongmen to dominate their areas in return for peace in national politics. Under the presidency of Lázaro Cárdenas (1934–40) this elite coalition was broadened to include labour and peasants. In addition, the representation of business and industry was formalised through mandatory membership in peak associations. These corporatist organisations not only serve as channels by which societal forces gain access to decision makers, they also permit representatives of the government to influence the content and presentation of societal demands.¹⁸

These broader alliances were constructed on the basis of material and ideological interests. Peasants were given land reform, and the urban industrial labour force the support of organisation and strikes. Entrepreneurs gained state subsidies for their enterprises in the form of import protection and below-cost sales of inputs produced by state-owned enterprises. They also benefited from control over labour and peasant demands for a more equitable distribution of the benefits of economic growth. Among the ideological factors supporting the coalition have been social justice and national sovereignty.

¹⁷ Peter J Katzenstein, Small States in World Markets, Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 1985.

¹⁸ The English-language literature on Mexico's political economy is vast. Standard introductions include Raymond Vernon, The Dilemma of Mexico's Development, Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1963; Clark Reynolds, The Mexican Economy, New Haven: Yale University Press, 1970; Roger D Hansen, The Politics of Mexican Development, Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1971; Susan Kaufman Purcell and John F H Purcell, 'State and society: must a stable polity be institutionalized?' World Politics (32) January 1980; and Latin American Perspectives, Summer 1975, special issue.

Although the ruling coalition includes all important social groups, the distribution of influence and benefits within the coalition varies. This variation is determined by the need for the coalition to respond to the pressures that accumulate under the pattern of economic growth as well as the authoritarian nature of the political system. For example, when the reality of Mexico's skewed distribution of income (the top 10 per cent of the population receives 40.6 per cent of total national income while the bottom 20 per cent gets only 2.9 per cent¹⁹) threatened to diminish political support from the poor, extensive social welfare programmes were introduced.

The state-led ISI development strategy implemented after 1940 and defended until the late 1970s was used to meet the demands of the political coalition. Protection and subsidies were distributed to the private sector while labour was fragmented into two factions, one privileged and granted social welfare programmes in return for disciplined support to the political coalition and the other, disorganised, defenceless, and generally marginal to the welfare state. ISI itself promised to insulate the domestic economy from much of the international fluctuation to which developing countries were especially vulnerable. Its initial successes led policymakers to perceive autonomous national development as a goal which was not only desirable but, with the correct state policies, attainable.

To safeguard the states' ability to influence investment patterns, group mobilisation and inter-group conflicts, over time political institutions developed significant insulation from societal forces. For example, although the single-term limit on elected public office was a demand of the Mexican Revolution in response to electoral manipulation by the Porfirian dictatorship, it has also served to marginalise the electorate's ability to sanction individual office holders.

In addition, social forces have given great autonomy to the political system through two political bargains. These deals help to ensure that the leaders of each group will continue to identify their own interests in remaining within the coalition. The first bargain involves continued support for the system even in the face of short-run losses, because of the existence of a guarantee of compensation in the long run. The second bargain involves joining an alliance for economic growth to allow the peaceful distribution of an ever-expanding pie.²⁰

¹⁹ 1977 figures cited from the World Bank, World Development Report 1986 by Jorge G Castaneda in 'Mexico's coming challenges' Foreign Policy (64) Fall 1986, p 127. The economic crisis beginning in 1982 most certainly increased inequality in Mexico.

Partly as a result of these factors, presidential dominance over the political apparatus is virtually complete for a period of five years (once his successor is chosen, a year before taking office, the President becomes a 'lame duck'). Congress does the President's bidding (the rejection of presidential proposals is unheard of and even modification is rare); the judiciary generally follows the President's lead; and most major political posts (governorships and party offices) are selected by the President. The dominant party (PRI) uses the finances and other resources of the government. All major office holders are members of the party, and the electoral machinery is controlled from the centre. The result is that the President has many tools that increase his leeway to formulate and implement policy. His freedom of action is not absolute, but the constraints on his policymaking ability are severely limited.

The system was not perfect. There were major political clashes with labour in the late 1940s and 1950s, with landless peasants in 1958, and with the middle class in the 1952 presidential elections. There were also economic anxieties in the early 1950s and 1960s. But the overall level of political stability and economic growth was sufficient to lead many to marvel at Mexico's peaceful economic 'miracle', known as 'Stabilising Development'.

After 1968, however, serious challenges arose. The children of the middle class were massacred in the streets in 1968, the traditional high population growth rates and the capital intensive nature of the country's industrialisation led to significant underemployment in the urban areas and millions of landless peasants in the countryside. Sources of domestic capital became concerned about the slowdown in economic growth. In addition, the current account deficit now threatened to constrain domestic economic policy: its 1970 level of more than one billion US dollars represented a 50 per cent increase over 1969 and tripled that of 1966.²¹ The legitimacy of both the authoritarian ²⁰ Jorge I Domínguez, 'Introduction' in Domínguez (ed), Mexico's Political Economy: Challenges at Home and Abroad, Beverly Hills, California: Sage, 1982, pp 10-11; and Purcell and Purcell, 'State and Society'.

²¹ René Villarreal, El desequilibrio externo en la industrialización de México (1929-1975), México: Fondo de Cultura Económica, 1976, p 110.

corporatist political system and the ISI development strategy was under great stress.²²

Luis Echeverría (1970–76) sought to address these problems with a modification of the ISI strategy, dubbed 'Shared Development'. It had four pillars: the use of public expenditure to stimulate demand and broaden the domestic market; the fuller use of existing productive capacity; the deepening of import substitution; and the expansion and diversification of exports to help to confront the foreign exchange bottleneck. On the political side, electoral reform was offered. These moves represented an effort to revitalise a strategy of insulation and to introduce a different domestic distribution of gains and losses.

Domestic capital, labour, peasants and opposition political parties threatened, however, non-participation in 'official' reform and Echeverría had to find other means to support 'Shared Development'. The choice fell on an expansion of the public sector deficit (from an average annual rate of 2.5 per cent of GDP in 1965–70 to 9.5 per cent in 1976²³) and an increase in the external debt; by 1976 Mexico's public foreign debt was US$20 billion.²⁴ These alternative means of supporting 'Shared Development' proved unsustainable, however, and in 1976 the development strategy collapsed in the midst of domestic political and foreign debt crises. Ironically, this failure to revitalise ISI created domestic challenges to the state's sovereignty and foreign constraints on its autonomy.

Jose Lopez Portillo (1976–82) began his administration with an International Monetary Fund (IMF) stabilisation programme, calls for structural change, an emphasis on anti-corruption and electoral reform. From 1977–79 some progress was achieved in stabilisation and structural change because there appeared to be no alternative but to accept interdependence. Once petroleum revenues finally began coming in (its export value was less than US$1 billion in 1977²⁵) and transnational banks returned to offer new money, Mexican leaders' calculations changed.

It was now believed that the foreign exchange bottleneck which had ²² I have dealt with the political economy of the period 1970–82 elsewhere, so here I present only a quick description of events. For a detailed analysis, see David R Mares, 'Explaining choice of development strategies: suggestions from Mexico 1970–1982', International Organization 39(4) Autumn 1985, pp 667–97 and the sources cited therein.

²³ Sidney Weintraub, 'Case study of economic stabilization: Mexico', in William R Cline and Sidney Weintraub, (eds), Economic Stabilization in Developing Countries, Washington DC: Brookings Institution, 1981, p 19.

²⁴ Figures taken from lecture by Jesus Silva Herzog, Stanford University, 15 January 1987.

²⁵ ibid.

caused ISI so many problems, was solved. Insulation of domestic industry could proceed (reflected in the decision not to join the GATT) and domestic distributional questions would be settled by giving everyone something. Foreign consumers of energy, in both the North and South, would finance this dramatic increase in Mexican autonomy. The currency was allowed to become overvalued, structural change became something to be achieved by tying non-petroleum exports to petroleum exports, corruption reached new heights, and electoral reform seemed less pressing in a booming economy. Mexican sovereignty and autonomy seemed assured and the country attained a status of respected spokesperson for the South in the eyes of the North.

But this second attempt in the 1970s to safeguard national autonomy created a dangerous contradiction. For the first time in half a century, economic growth came to depend upon two international markets over which Mexico had no control: energy and finance. When the USA decided in 1979 to assert its national autonomy and provoke a domestic recession, the world economy plunged into crisis and the energy and financial markets collapsed within three years. Mexico's increased vulnerability became evident as the interest payments on its foreign debt increased and the value of its petroleum exports decreased.

Lopez Portillo chose to respond to the developing economic crisis by contracting more international loans (public sector foreign debt increased by US$19.2 billion in 1981²⁶). Priority was placed on sustaining the economic largesse that would, it was hoped, increase voter turnout and the PRI's margin of victory. Those results would demonstrate that the political system had finally overcome the legitimacy crisis which had haunted it since 1968.

Mexico's political elite probably did not appreciate the magnitude of the risks of such a strategy. They now increased the vulnerability of the state's autonomy to an internal group, in addition to the two international markets and US fiscal policy. Holders of wealth in Mexico, large and small, could see the end in sight and fled from pesos into dollars, thus aggravating (not causing) the development of the crisis.

Choosing a new strategy 1982-86

With the presidential election of 1982 over, policymakers turned to confront the economic crisis. Three economic tasks presented themselves: finding a solution to the foreign debt; stabilising the crashing economy; and undertaking structural change to permit a growth free from addiction to foreign debt. On the political front, the state sought to regain its leadership through an anti-corruption campaign and a massive publicity effort (the Consulta Popular) in support of its economic recovery programme.

²⁶ Rosario Green, 'Mexico: crisis financiera y deuda externa', Comercio Exterior, February 1983, p 105.

For almost two years Mexico followed a fairly typical stabilisation path, overseen by the IMF. It did so at a time when the IMF, the US government and the transnational banks were having difficulty persuading Argentina, Colombia, Venezuela and Peru to accept similar strategies. The results were fairly predictable: severe contraction in economic activity, decreases in the public sector deficit, an increase in the trade surplus, devaluations, and a plan to liberalise trade.

Mexico's choice of this route resulted from the conjunction of three major factors. First, the US government intervened quickly and with enough money to give Mexico time to reach an agreement with the IMF and its creditors and to demonstrate the benefits of playing by the rules. Second, domestic opposition to stabilisation was muted. Most people's attention was diverted elsewhere: the bank nationalisation of 1982 evoked a nationalistic euphoria, the exposure of corruption under Lopez Portillo diverted anger from the system to individuals, and individuals found direct ways to minimise the costs of stabilisation as an informal economic sector mushroomed, illegal migration to the USA increased, and capital flight continued. Finally, President de la Madrid surrounded himself with a cabinet which was largely united on economic policy. Not only did they agree that stabilisation was necessary but they also believed that it forced the kinds of structural changes that were difficult to make in normal times. It was a group which believed acceptance of interdependence was the only viable route. Consequently, Mexico would need to negotiate advantages in the international political economy and, for this, a more efficient economy was a necessary precondition.

However, structural change demands long-term policies and political decisions on the accommodation of winners and losers (including direct foreign investment and transnational banks) in the change. The political calendar in Mexico took precedence once again as important elections approached in 1985. Economic policy increasingly emphasised spurring growth and avoiding the hard political choices involved in structural change. The economy recovered in 1984 (GDP growth of 4 per cent²⁷) but at significant cost to both short-run stabilisation and structural change. The public sector deficit increased, the trade surplus deteriorated, inflation resumed and liberalisation of trade was significantly slowed.²⁸

²⁷ Latin America Regional Reports, Mexico and Central America Report, 21 March 1986, p. 7.

If Mexico had abandoned the stabilisation route because it believed it had found another which could provide sustainable growth, it would have been following Brazil's path. But the changes were undertaken without a long-run vision, and responded to changes in the domestic political situation which looked threatening to the PRI and beneficial to the opposition parties. Mexicans had reluctantly accepted recession because they expected things to improve. The corruption scandal threatened to go beyond individuals to an indictment of the system. The USA was also not being very helpful: advocates of immigration reform were stimulated by the increased flow of Mexicans to the USA and the Congress, the Press and Ambassador John Gavin became open advocates of cleaner elections in Mexico. Moreover, the transnational banks were not anxious to finance recovery beyond mere debt payments.

The Mexican government paid a high political and economic price for the PRI's electoral victories in 1985 and 1986. In political terms, the US Press was on hand to record electoral fraud, supporters of the rightist party, PAN, rioted, and parties of the right and left formed an anti-PRI publicity campaign.²⁹ Economic costs were also high. The economy began slipping back into recession once the government addressed the economic consequences of promoting renewed growth without changing the structural elements which made growth dependent upon fiscal deficits or foreign debt. In July 1985 austerity was renewed, the peso's rate of devaluation accelerated (in June 1985 it had reached its highest real value in two decades), trade liberalisation was speeded up (partly in response to acceptance of GATT membership), the public payroll was reduced by 30,000, and promises to sell more state firms were repeated.³⁰

Before the new stabilisation effort could make much of an impact Mexico was hit by two events over which it had no control. One was a devastating earthquake which killed and injured thousands and left many more homeless and without employment. The other was the renewal of the dramatic decline in oil prices, which began in 1985 and cost Mexico US$6–7 billion in 1986.³¹ The government was forced to make major borrowings from domestic savings, including 100 per cent of bank deposits in December 1985, in order to finance its own budget deficits. The private sector responded to the renewed squeeze on credit with sporadic and unorganised repayment strikes on their government loans, stimulation of a parallel private financial market, and threats to support the PAN opposition.³²

²⁸ ibid., 12 July 1985, p 2; the Government's description and explanation, which leaves out politics, can be founded in Secretaria de Hacienda y Credito Publico, 'Carta de Intencion al FMI', Comercio Exterior 36(8) p 730.

²⁹ Latin America Regional Reports, Mexico and Central America Report, 25 September 1986, p 2.

³⁰ ibid., 16 July 1985, p 2 and 25 September 1986, p 2; Gobierno de Mexico, 'La politica de comercio exterior', Comercio Exterior, 36(8) pp 735-41.

The government seemed at a loss for a response to the worsening situation in early 1986. A fissure began to appear in the strong consensus on taking the orthodox route to recovery, when Finance Minister, Jesus Silva Herzog, who had negotiated the previous packages with the IMF and transnational banks, began to advocate a harder line toward international creditors. The likelihood that the only Latin American showcase for orthodox stabilisation was on the verge of defecting (Argentina, Brazil, Venezuela, Colombia and Peru had all rejected IMF guidance while Chile's military government was an embarrassment to the USA) probably forced the US government's hand. The Federal Reserve Board chairman, Paul Volker, paid a secret visit to Mexico and promised to help Mexico to obtain a better deal from the international banks.³³

De la Madrid was now faced with a new choice. The decision had to be based not only on support for long-run change, but also on growth in 1987, when the presidential succession campaign would begin. He dismissed Silva Herzog and joined forces with Volker. In the process, he may also have gained politically, for Silva Herzog was believed to be such a strong candidate for the presidency that he would soon be threatening the President's prerogative to nominate his successor.³⁴

After months of strenuous negotiations, Mexico formed a new agreement with the IMF and the transnational banks. It is a remarkable agreement and clearly demonstrates that Mexico's negotiating power was made significant by its threatened collapse and defection. Nearly one-half of the public external debt was rescheduled, with a seven-year grace period and a twenty-year maturity. The spread of 0.8125 per cent Libor given to Mexico was the lowest of any debtor. The package of US$12 billion is to be increased by $1.7 billion if the price of oil falls

³¹ Examen de las situacion economica de Mexico, 62(729) August 1986, pp 362–3.

³² Latin America Regional Reports, Mexico and Central America Report, 14 February 1986, p 1; 21 March 1986, p 7; and 2 May pp 2–3.

³³ ibid., 17 July 1986, p 8.

³⁴ ibid.

below US$9 per barrel or if the economy fails to grow by 3–4 per cent in 1987! The World Bank agreed to co-finance and guarantee part of these contingency funds. Finally, the IMF agreed to remove the impact of inflation on interest payments on internal debt in its calculations of Mexico's budget deficit. This accounting could shave 2 per cent of GDP off the figures.³⁵

This package is the envy of debtors; Brazil is already demanding similar terms.³⁶ But the question is, what can Mexico do with it? Mexico had problems before the current decline in petroleum revenues; its problems are structural and require structural answers. Those answers require difficult political choices, whether they are attempted under the auspices of the liberal international financial system or on its margins.

In 1987 there are two groups within the PRI vying for the right to make the necessary choices. Some observers see this split as an indication of the seriousness of the Mexican situation.³⁷ But that is a misreading of Mexican politics. In an election year, this is the time for different currents within the PRI, especially those which felt excluded from the outgoing administration, to surface, to mobilise their constituents and to try to have an impact on the policies of the successor, whoever it may be. This was true in 1958, 1964 and 1970, and while the severity of the political crises in 1976 muted disagreements, they surfaced again in 1982. This is democracy à la mexicana.

The 'Movimiento de Renovacion Democratica' represents the national populist coalition and is thus heir to the 'Shared Development' strategy which failed in the early 1970s. Its public leader, Porfirio Munoz Ledo, was Minister of Labour during that period. (Echeverria himself is rumoured to be behind this group.) Other prominent leaders include Carlos Tello, best known for leading the nationalisation of the banks in 1982, and Cuauhtemoc Cardenas, the son of the most radical of Mexican presidents, Lazaro Cardenas. For this group, national autonomy is achieved by seizing it and forcing outsiders to adjust. Its economic strategy consists in insulating industry and agriculture until it can compete on favourable terms in the international market. Its political programme is one of distribution in favour of labour, peasants and those national capitalists who follow the lead of the state; foreign capital is to be residual and tightly regulated. Its solution for the foreign debt problem consists in tying it to the country's capacity to pay without recession.³⁸ But its programme still faces the constraints encountered by Echeverría before Mexico had a debt crisis: how can Mexico finance import substitution in the capital goods sector and distribute wealth to those at the bottom of society? The answer is to have foreigners pay (by lending at unprofitable rates, investing in unprofitable enterprises, and importing high-cost, low-quality goods) while refusing them a say in how the funds are spent. This strategy, while defending national autonomy, does not appear very viable.

³⁵ Wall Street Journal, 9 January 1987, p 24.

³⁶ ibid.

³⁷ For example, Latin American Research Reports, Mexico and Central America Report, 30 October 1986, p 2.

However, the plans of the other group do not seem to offer a way out of the recurrent cycle of stabilisation, unstable growth, stabilisation. The de la Madrid faction in PRI (in fact, in the state bureaucracy), believes that autonomy is achieved by adjusting to outside forces. This demands restructuring and making the economy efficient in intermediate level manufactures (e.g. motor vehicle and electrical parts) and using direct foreign investment to gain technology and international markets. The state will attempt to do less in the economy, but still guide it. By maintaining this management role the state will be able to negotiate for better terms in its acceptance of interdependence. Labour, peasants and national capital have to make sacrifices now in order to gain later. This strategy also faces serious problems. The foreign sector does not appear to be committed to financing growth during a long period of adjustment, and this group will be incapable of making labour, peasants and national capital pay during election years.

Conclusion

The Mexican political system has demonstrated a capacity to survive, although it increasingly appears dependent for its success on ad hoc infusions of foreign funds. Ironically, however, this path to national sovereignty undermines national autonomy in the short run and threatens to question sovereignty itself. At this point, sovereignty and autonomy require taking the hard political decisions to alienate some domestic and international supporters, in order to embark on a path of sustained economic recovery and distribution of wealth. If this strategy is successful, the alienation of those supporters will prove to be temporary as they return to participate in the wealth. If unsuccessful, because the path chosen was the wrong one, or the political elite shied away from alienating its supporters, the support gained will be short-lived, as those who extended it seek answers elsewhere.

³⁸ ibid., and extrapolation from other pronouncements by members of this tendency.

The consolidation of Alan García's Government in Peru

When Alan García Pérez received the presidential sash from Fernando Belaúnde on 28 July 1985, most observers thought that the 'honeymoon' period of the new government would not last for long. Despite the size of the Alianza Popular Revolucionaria Americana (APRA) victory in the 1985 elections, the problems faced by the new president were formidable. There were problems with debt repayments to foreign creditors, many of whom had not received interest let alone principal during the last year of the Belaúnde government. There were also problems in fulfilling election promises to reactivate the economy and to reverse the sharp fall in living standards experienced over the previous ten years. García also faced a growing guerrilla presence in the highlands, a movement which appeared to be spreading to the cities. In addition, there was the problem of how to handle the military, which historically had shown strong anti-Aprista sentiments.

A year and a half after his inauguration, García had not only shown the capacity to survive and to deal with some of these problems, but had also done much to build up a powerful political machine with himself firmly in control. The opinion polls continued to show García enjoying strong popularity, more so than his political rivals to the left or to the right of APRA. The November 1986 municipal elections saw APRA gaining control of nearly all the municipalities in the country. The election was a further endorsement of the President and his Administration. Indeed, such was García's public profile that his opposition critics declared that his ambition was to turn Peru from a republic into a kingdom. The jibe was given added force when in November 1986, just after the elections, a proposal was floated in Congress which, if passed, would have changed the Constitution to permit García a second consecutive term in office, assuming that APRA won the 1990 elections.

Rather than reviewing individual policies and their success or failure, the central purpose of this article is to identify the ways in which García and his associates have attempted to build on this popularity so as to strengthen the position of the ruling party within the framework of Peruvian politics. In particular it examines the ways in which the party leadership has set about expanding the party's political base (largely at the expense of the Left) into areas where it had previously enjoyed little support. The article then looks at how García has been able to forge links with Peru's business community, again an area where APRA had traditionally enjoyed little support. Finally we observe how APRA under García has sought to achieve a modus vivendi with the military.

King of the castle

An important element of García's popularity is the charismatic figure of the President himself. Young, tall, good-looking with a flair for oratory and communication with the public, García has adopted a strident populist style. From the outset, he sought to project his image through direct contact with the people. Typical were his balconazos, fiery speeches from the palace balcony, relayed throughout the country by the largely supportive press and television. The image he conveyed was one of drive and authority. He made it clear that he, not his ministers or fellow party leaders, was the man in charge. Like Víctor Raúl Haya de la Torre, APRA's founding father and García's political mentor, he is fully aware of the political value of personalism.

But the secret of García's public profile goes beyond charisma and the cult of personality. During its first eighteen months his government, through various aspects of policy, successfully articulated nationalist sentiment. Nowhere was this more clear than in regard to APRA's policy on debt. In saying that Peru would limit debt payments to '10 per cent of exports', and would no longer accept International Monetary Fund (IMF) control over economic policy-making, he was responding to the popular mood of a country which had striven since 1977 to comply with stabilisation policies irrespective of their inflationary and recessionary impact. Indeed, in doing so, he upstaged the Marxist United Left (Izquierda Unida—IU) coalition, which had emerged as the country's second largest political force in the 1985 elections. The nationalist stance was further developed in 1986 when the government's refusal to pay its arrears to the IMF led to Peru being declared 'ineligible' for further Fund support. Similarly García mobilised nationalist sentiments by ousting one of the foreign oil companies (Belco) for tax avoidance. He also made a big issue of 'forcing' Peru's biggest foreign oil contractor (Occidental) to sign a new contract, though many believe the new contract to be less favourable to Peru than the old. Oil contracts have traditionally been a highly sensitive issue in Peruvian politics. Also in its foreign policy, Peru's support for the Non-Aligned Movement and its criticism of US policy in Central America have reinforced its nationalist credentials.

García's popularity was further enhanced by his ability to claim major successes in his government's handling of the economy. In 1986 the Peruvian economy grew by 9 per cent, the fastest single year's growth for twenty-five years. Manufacturing industry, undermined by domestic recession since 1982, chalked up a spectacular 16.9 per cent growth rate. Peru's average rate of growth in 1986 was the fastest in Latin America, outpacing even Brazil, which like Peru had refused to accept orthodox IMF stabilisation policies. At the same time, the García government had not only managed to bring inflation down from 11 per cent a month in the last period of the Belaúnde government to around 4 per cent, but to keep it around 4 per cent a month for over a year. The official inflation rate of 63 per cent in 1986 compared with 158 per cent in 1985 and 111 per cent in 1984. Not only did Peru under García 'cock a snook' at the international banking community, and remain relatively unscathed, it actually appeared to benefit from doing so.

But before beginning an analysis of how García has tried to build on his popularity and gain support from business and the military, it is important briefly to outline some of the main features which characterise the party, which had waited since the 1930s to win office.

Reviving APRA's fortunes: García's leadership, 1982-85

In 1982 at the age of thirty-four, Alan García became General Secretary of what is formally known as the Peruvian Aprista Party (PAP). He inherited a party which was dispirited and demoralised. From 1978, when APRA had won the largest number of seats in the Constituent Assembly and Haya de la Torre had become the Assembly's president, the party's fortunes had declined. First, Haya de la Torre died of cancer in 1979. Then APRA, which had been widely tipped to win the 1980 general elections, did badly. Fernando Belaúnde won 46 per cent of valid votes (see Table of election results) while APRA's Armando Villanueva picked up only 27 per cent. In the wake of this rebuff APRA suffered a significant split, resulting in a prominent leader from the right of the party, Andrés Townsend, setting up his own political grouping and claiming to represent the true legacy of Haya de la Torre. It was therefore up to García, a relatively inexperienced political figure, to impose his authority over the different factions within the party, and to

ALAN GARCÍA'S GOVERNMENT

Peru: election results 1980-86

	As % of all votes cast (including null & void)¹
	1980 (presid)	1980 (munic)	1983 (munic)	1985 (presid)	1986 (munic)
APRA	21.3	19.3	27.2	45.7	40.7
Acción Popular	35.2	30.7	14.4	6.8	NP
Izquierda Unida	11.0 ²	19.3	23.8	21.1	26.4
Partido Popular Cristiano	7.4	9.6	11.4	10.2 ³	12.6
Others/Independents	2.7	6.3	5.6	2.6	5.6

¹ Until 1985 it was most usual for election percentages to be expressed as a proportion of valid votes cast, thus excluding votes that were null or void.

² Combined votes of PRT, FOCEP, UNIR, UI and UDP.

³ In alliance with Aprista splinter group (MBH) under the name of Convergencia Democrática.

Note: Non-participant. As in the 1978 Constituent Assembly elections Acción Popular did not participate in the 1986 municipal elections.

Source: Jurado Nacional de Elecciones (JNE).

attempt to widen its geographical and social appeal in time for the 1985 elections. He proved to be extremely successful.

One of his priorities during this period was to consolidate the party's links with the armed forces.¹ Back in 1932, Haya de la Torre and other Aprista dirigentes, angered by what they considered to be the electoral fraud perpetrated against the party in the 1931 election, became involved in an armed insurrection in the city of Trujillo, the centre of APRA's power base. The military of the day brutally quelled the uprising, responding in a similar way to other revolts in the early 1930s. In 1933 APRA was outlawed. From Trujillo onwards, the military imposed a veto on APRA's coming to power. The party suffered lengthy periods of repression, clandestinity and exile. The only exception was the partial lifting of the veto in the period 1945 to 1948 when the party did participate in government, holding several important ministries. It also supported the conservative Prado Administration during the period from 1956 to 1962. It is not clear exactly when this veto was finally lifted. According to APRA's elder statesman and first Vice-President under

¹ Interview with the author, June 1983.

García, Luis Alberto Sánchez,² the rapprochement took place in 1976, a year after a more conservative military government had replaced the reformist Revolutionary Government of the Armed Forces of General Juan Velasco. Between the years 1975 and 1980, under the government of General Francisco Morales Bermúdez, the relationship between the Apristas and the military authorities improved significantly, to the extent that many observers believed that the military would use its weight to tip the political balance in APRA's favour. By the time García became General Secretary in 1982, APRA had gone some way towards establishing a more secure relationship with the military.

One of the immediate difficulties faced by García was how to assert the authority of his leadership over the party. His rise to pre-eminence had been at the expense of many of the previous generation of leading party members, Haya's putative successors. García held two important cards. The first was that he had been shown particular favour by Haya himself, who apparently recognised his political talents at an early age. He became almost a political protégé. Secondly, García was careful to maintain close relations with Luis Alberto Sánchez, a key member of the party's old guard. Though on the conservative wing, Sánchez did not follow the Townsend faction, and remained within the party after the split. García's ability to consolidate personal control and to make himself unassailable to his rivals owes much to his energy and political flair. However, he was aided by his inheritance of the leadership of a party with a long history of vertical, authoritarian control and a strong sense of hierarchy.

During his long political life, Haya de la Torre exercised almost absolute control over the party apparatus. He stood head and shoulders above his fellow party leaders, and would not tolerate the questioning of his authority. Indeed, APRA was a highly authoritarian structure in which the chain of command descended from the leader through a hierarchy of national, departmental, provincial and local committees. It was not a party structure which favoured internal pluralism. Many Apristas who disagreed with Haya or his group had little alternative but to leave the party. However, for those who offered unswerving loyalty, it was a system which could provide quick and rapid preferment, and a way of mobility out of provincial life.

The party's vertical structure owed much to the legacy of repression which lasted intermittently until the mid-1950s. Closely linked to authoritarian control was the cult of leadership fostered by Haya de la Torre, who in party literature was made out to be a man of prophetic, almost God-like stature.³ It was partly for this reason that Haya's death was such a blow to the party which he had created and fostered. This was a lesson which was not lost on García.

² Sanchez cites the occasion when APRA and the military each agreed to forego the ritualised demonstration in Trujillo in commemoration of the uprising of 1932. Interview with author. January 1986.

García realised, though, that the party needed to be brought up to date and to be made more attractive to a broader spectrum of Peruvian voters. The party's initial ideological stand was radical and reformist, involving both nationalisation of foreign companies and land reform. By the 1950s the party's ideology had become more conservative and stridently anti-communist. In fact, the Velasco government pushed through many of the reforms first put forward by APRA. But this time APRA's links with popular organisations were being rapidly whittled away with the growth of mass-based political parties on the Left. Nowhere was this encroachment clearer than among the trade unions where the once powerful Aprista Confederación de Trabajadores del Perú (CTP) was almost totally eclipsed by the growth of the communist-led Confederación General de Trabajadores del Perú (CGTP) and independent union federations further to the Left. The loss of links with popular organisations and of prominent members of the party was due to APRA's alliances with conservatives, in particular with Prado (1956-62) and the former dictator, Manuel Odría (1963-67).

APRA has always styled itself as a multi-class party, appealing to a spectrum of class interests which could rally around a nationalistic anti-oligarchic ideology. This aspiration has in turn reflected an ideological and programmatic vagueness. APRA has always tended to shy away from a narrowly class-based interpretation which would preclude alliances with certain classes. Indeed, it has tended to stress how all Peruvians, rich or poor, are ultimately brothers. The accent on redistribution of wealth which influenced its early thinking was gradually superseded by an insistence on the part of Haya de la Torre that it was not for the party to take wealth from those who have it, but to generate wealth for those who do not.

Finally, García saw the need to create a party presence and organisation among sectors where Aprismo was weak, and to widen the party's geographical ambit. Traditionally, the focus of Aprista support had been in the coastal area in the northern half of the country. APRA had grown up as an alliance between urban middle-class groups and organised labour in the departments of La Libertad and Lambayeque. APRA's performance since the 1930s in those elections in which it has been free to participate demonstrates this regional bias. As a consequence the party has found it difficult to build up a substantial vote in Lima and in the south, where the last fifteen years have seen a notable growth in Left-wing parties. In order to extend the party base, García, like Haya de la Torre and Belaúnde in his younger days, has spent considerable time and effort since 1982 on the road, from community to community, making himself known.

³ See Imelda Vega Centeno's recent book Aprismo Popular: Mito, Cultura e Historia, Lima: Tarea, 1984. Also her Ideología y Cultura en el Aprismo Popular, Lima, 1986.

Building the party: the pyramid and the trapezium

Alan García's notable election victory in 1985 with 52 per cent of the vote (excluding null and void votes) was not attributable to any well-oiled national political machine working for APRA. The only part of Peru where APRA's organisational strength was solid was on the northern coast, in La Libertad and surrounding departments. As we have seen, APRA's election victory had much more to do with the way in which García's image and the promise of change was perceived by people tired of seeing their government conniving in the erosion of their living standards.

The attainment of office gave the party new opportunities to create and organise support in areas and among social sectors where APRA's popularity had traditionally been weak. García went out of his way in the election campaign to present himself as the candidate 'for all Peruvians', in order to appeal to as wide an audience as possible. Given García's upfront populist style, the presidency has become the crucial vehicle for extending the radius of APRA support. As this fact has become increasingly evident within the party, García's own position has become increasingly impregnable.

Taking advantage of government to help build party structures is nothing new in Peruvian politics, nor for that matter elsewhere in Latin America. President Belaúnde's creation and promotion of Cooperación Popular in the 1960s went hand in hand with mobilising support for his party, Acción Popular. Through rural development schemes, usually community-based, Acción Popular built an important part of its constituency, in the highland and the jungle rim, or ceja de selva, areas. The same occurred during the Velasco years when the military government set up Sinamos to help build and strengthen popular support for the regime. When Belaúnde returned in 1980, so did Cooperación Popular.

Whereas Belaúnde's long-held obsession for developing the jungle and the ceja de selva led Cooperación Popular to concentrate much of its energies in this part of Peru, the accent shifted notably under García. APRA's targetted priority groups include the urban shanty-town (or pueblo joven) population, and the highland peasantry in what has become known as the 'Andean trapezium', encompassing the southern departments of Puno, Cuzco, Apurímac, Ayacucho and Huancavelica.

In many of his speeches, García has been at pains to stress his party's commitment to the poorest sectors of Peruvian society. In doing so he has typified Peruvian society as a pyramid divided into sectors: a relatively small 'formal', 'modern', 'privileged' Peru which includes the urban elite, the middle class and (significantly) unionised workers in relatively stable employment; and a numerically large 'informal', 'traditional' and 'underprivileged' Peru composed of the unemployed and underemployed of the pueblos jóvenes and the majority of rural peasant workers concentrated in the Andes.⁴

During his first eighteen months in office, García has taken a number of steps to demonstrate his interest in addressing himself to the latter part of the pyramid. In doing so, his government has been spurred on by the challenge posed by Sendero Luminoso, the Maoist-inspired rural guerrilla movement which has spread since 1980 over a wide swathe of southern Peru.⁵ Despite a massive counter-insurgency operation spearheaded by the military since 1982, Sendero has succeeded in spreading the radius of its support and operations both in the highlands and among the pueblos jóvenes of Lima. Belaúnde's response to insurgency in the highlands had been to turn the problem over to the military, his government making little attempt to win back support by pumping new resources into the area. García, however, has moved some way to recognising the long-term imperative of economic and political approaches to insurgency problems, if Sendero or other movements like it are ever to be quelled.

Mobilisation in these sectors was also seen to be important not only in building an APRA presence but in undermining the popularity of the left-wing parties of the Izquierda Unida. Since the days of Velasco and Sinamos, the Left has had few rivals in its ability to organise the peasant communities and the urban pueblos jóvenes. The vote for the Izquierda Unida in the November 1983 municipal elections (when the IU won control of Lima as well as other provincial cities) was an indication of the Left's popularity. In rural areas too, the Left has had a strong foothold among peasant communities and in agricultural cooperatives, through its control of the two main confederations: the Confederación Nacional Agraria (CNA) and the Confederación Campesina del Perú (CCP). Despite the ideological difference between them, both confederations are closely linked to the Izquierda Unida.

⁴ First developed in his inaugural speech on 28 July 1985. For an English translation, see The Andean Report (Lima) August 1985.

⁵ See Lewis Taylor's pamphlet, Maoism in the Andes, University of Liverpool Working Paper, 1983, for the development of Sendero Luminoso. Sendero has also built up a notable presence in La Libertad and the Huallaga Valley in the north, in parts of Junín and Pasco in the centre, as well as in Lima.

The main instrument for mobilisation in the pueblos jóvenes has been the Programa de Apoya al Ingreso Temporal (PAIT), a scheme under which the central government gives unemployed workers temporary, short-term contracts to participate in community improvement projects. The scheme is administered by Cooperación Popular, which—despite the change in government—retains the old name given it by Acción Popular.

First announced in October 1985, the PAIT scheme has been expanded rapidly in the pueblos jóvenes around Lima, and in the pueblos jóvenes in other provincial cities. Within the first three months of operation alone, it was providing employment for 45,000 workers. Not surprisingly PAIT has been much criticised by the Left, which perceives it as a direct threat to its political hegemony in many of the pueblos jóvenes. There is a strong evidence to suggest that PAIT programmes, usually run by APRA militants, became a key tool in APRA's strategy to build local organisation in poor urban areas. Little attempt was made to hide PAIT's partisan nature during the municipal election campaign when the numbers involved virtually doubled before polling day. At the time of the election, for instance, PAIT workers in Chimbote and Huaraz complained bitterly about their being cursorily and prematurely laid off within a week after polling day.⁶ Indeed, the whole programme was suspended a month later, in December 1986. In providing work in areas of high unemployment and under-employment (especially among women), PAIT naturally responded to a pressing social need.

Mayors belonging to the Izquierda Unida pointed out the way in which the PAIT scheme had undermined the municipalities and their role.⁷ Municipalities in the pueblos jóvenes are chronically underfunded due to the lack of local resources and the lack of help from central government. Unable to finance the sort of projects undertaken by PAIT which would normally fall within their jurisdiction, the municipalities found that PAIT further erodes their credibility, while creating new patronage structures. PAIT also helped to undermine Left-wing and Church-based neighbourhood projects which had hitherto relied on non-paid labour.

⁶ La Voz (Lima) 2 December and 3 December 1986.

⁷ Interview with Michel Azcueta, mayor of Villa El Salvador, January 1986.

A second but less important scheme is the Programa de Apoyo Directo (PAD), which also helps to boost APRA's presence in the pueblos jóvenes. First set up under Belaúnde but expanded under APRA, PAD works through community organisations such as mothers' clubs, and provides direct assistance such as distributing cookers and sewing machines. Additionally, the government has set up the Instituto de Desarrollo del Sector Informal (IDESI) which channels credit to, and finances, businesses in the 'informal' sector—so-called 'créditos chicha'.

In rural areas the APRA government has given new priority to the development of links with peasant communities, and has established a variety of new aid programmes including Direct Assistance to Communities, the Microregional Development Fund, new subsidies to agricultural producers and a greatly increased volume of loans at concessional rates through the Banco Agrario. At a national level, the office coordinating the rural strategy is the Instituto Nacional de Planificación (INP),⁸ while at regional level the mechanism for disbursing funds is usually through the regional development corporations (CORDES), normally closely controlled by Apristas or APRA sympathisers. In the distribution of funds for capital investment, the 'Andean trapezium' has been earmarked for a much bigger proportion of spending than was the case previously. Though the annual budget is not necessarily an accurate guide as to how much is spent and where, the 1987 budget assigned 20 per cent of agricultural capital spending to the 'Andean trapezium', with over half of that going to Ayacucho and Puno.⁹ The government has, however, encountered considerable difficulty in locating projects in the 'trapezium' through which to channel the funds.

Also working through the INP and its head, Javier Tantaleán, García organised a series of 'mass dialogues' (known as 'rimanacuy') with the leaders of peasant communities in different parts of the country. Five rimanacuys took place during 1986; at Piura in the north; at Huancayo in the central highlands; at Puno in the south; at Cuzco also in the south; and finally at Pucallpa in the jungle.¹⁰ In theory, these were meetings at which presidents of communities discussed rural problems with the President of the Republic, with other ministers in attendance. In fact, García tended to arrive for the concluding speech. Significantly, in appealing directly to community presidents, the rimanacuys by-passed the peasant federations and confederations run by the Left. Indeed the rimanacuys were intended to be the basis of an organisational drive competing with that of the Left in rural areas. At the first of these events in Piura, leaders of the ccp were deliberately excluded, even though one of the ccp's leading personalities, the Leftist senator Andrés Luna Vargas, is himself from Piura. Only by remonstrating personally with García were ccp leaders admitted to this and the Huancayo rimanacuy.

⁸ See Que Hacer (Lima) (39) February–March 1986, an article by the head of INP, Javier Tantaleán.

⁹ Caretas (Lima) 15 December 1986.

The rimanacuys were not so much designed as APRA rallies, but more as events to relay the image of Alan García among rural communities. In terms of the numbers of communities represented at each rally, they were very successful. But only in the Puno rimanacuy was the local federation of peasants (affiliated to the ccp) officially present. They were carefully stage-managed by the INP to promote García, who would typically make a dramatic arrival by helicopter, and then skilfully appeal to an often sceptical audience through humour, strident oratory and promises of what his government would do.

These attempts to mobilise opinion in both the urban and rural settings were of course assisted by the government's success in reactivating the economy in 1986. An increase in real incomes in all sectors, especially in the pueblos jóvenes, generated strong demand for agricultural produce, so growth in the urban sector had a spill-over effect into the rural sector, especially those parts of it producing most for the market.¹¹ A detailed evaluation of the political effects of all these developments in both the pueblos jóvenes and rural areas awaits proper study at the local level. However, in comparison with the 1983 municipal elections, the 1986 poll saw the consolidation of the APRA vote in the south and in Lima where Aprista loyalties had never been traditionally strong, though in comparison with the 1985 presidential elections, the APRA vote was lower in percentage terms and the Izquierda Unida vote higher. (See Table.) As well as winning control of many districts of Lima previously run by the Left, APRA won control of departments with a strongly Left-wing tradition, such as Puno and Cuzco.¹² While in 1983, the Izquierda Unida won in eight departmental capitals, in 1986 it won in only two. Aprista local organisation in traditionally non-APRA areas is only incipient. In many areas, it seems that APRA victories have had most to do with the image of García. Votes have also stemmed from disillusionment with the often unexceptional record of Izquierda Unida in those municipalities which it previously controlled, and from financial and other stimuli to voters provided by PAIT and IDESI (in urban areas) and cheap credit and cash handouts (in rural communities). This suggests that APRA support in such places stemmed more from pragmatic than ideological considerations.

¹⁰ On the Huancayo Rimanacuy, see Que Hacer (41) June-July 1986; and on the Pucallpa Rimanacuy, see Que Hacer (43) October-November 1986.

¹¹ The Andean Report, January 1987.

Relations with the private sector

The rimanacuys became both the means of making contact with a range of social groups and a vehicle for projecting García's personality. The government also looked for ways of building links, albeit in a slightly different style, with the business community. As a party APRA has never enjoyed a close relationship with the Peruvian business community, even though its early ideology was based on an alliance encompassing the middle classes and local business interests. The party was for a long time the bête noire of the Peruvian oligarchy, and this tended to taint its relations with the private sector. In more recent years it has been the Partido Popular Cristiano (PPC)—an offshoot from Christian Democracy in the 1960s—that has been the political mouthpiece of the local business elite. Politicians from the PPC have enjoyed a particularly close working relationship with the businessmen's pressure group, the Sociedad de Industrias (SI).

Since taking office, García has been able to create a close working relationship with the private sector, even though this is far from being one of the disadvantaged sectors of the social pyramid. In part he was able to take advantage of dissatisfaction among businessmen, especially manufacturers, with the PPC's close association with the experiment in economic liberalism under the Belaúnde government. Peruvian factory owners were particularly hard hit by the lowering of protective tariffs in 1981, and the PPC, which held the Industry Ministry from 1980–84, was seen to be guilty by association. APRA, by contrast, along with the

¹² For an electoral map of Lima, see Caretas, 12 January 1987.

United Left, had opposed this liberalism, arguing in favour of the maintenance of tariffs as a guard against an influx of cheap foreign imported goods.

The business community soon came to realise that, rhetoric apart, García needed their support. The tone of his inauguration speech extolled the importance of the state in economic management and planning, but did not appear to seek confrontation with private interests. The logic of García's strong nationalist stand against international banks and multinational lending agencies was that Peruvian private enterprise would have an important role to play in domestic capital accumulation if the desired 'reactivation' of the economy was to be attained. From the businessmen's point of view, the disastrous results of the Right in the 1985 elections (19 per cent of the vote including both the PPC and Accion Popular, giving them 14 per cent of the seats in Congress) left little alternative but to deal politically with the new APRA government. The first major public encounter between the government and private representatives was the annual conference of executives (CADE), held at Ica in November 1985. Though they went with a view to debating the new rules of the game with the new APRA government and obtaining concessions on such long-standing issues as job security, most businessmen were impressed by García's performance—even when he criticised them for wanting more guarantees and protection 'than a bank in Miami'.¹³

The role to be played by the private sector in the government's reactivation strategy was made clearer by a package of economic measures decreed in February 1986. The mixture of tax and financial incentives which were aimed to boost production included a reduction of sales tax (not to be passed on to the consumers), a cut in interest rates, a reduction in the industrial tariffs charged for electricity, and a series of measures to restrict imports which competed with locally produced products. These measures coincided with a strong surge in domestic demand. The motor for recovery was the increase in purchasing power that followed the drastic reduction in inflation, combined with periodic wage rises. The effects of reactivation in the manufacturing sector became increasingly clear in the second quarter. Shortages of certain manufactured goods began to appear as factories experienced expansion bottlenecks, though for many, it was mainly a question of utilising excess capacity which had been idle since the onset of recession in 1982-83. In the case of manufacturers, sales of basic consumer goods, such as shoes and clothing, increased significantly. Though companies found themselves paying their workers higher real wages, their profitability tended to increase by a greater margin.

¹³ See Que Hacer (38) December 1985–January 1986.

It was therefore with a new sense of confidence that the government approached industrialists, anxious to find ways in which profits would be reinvested in what García called 'socially profitable' ventures, and not simply converted into dollars and transferred to bank accounts abroad. The strategy was to talk directly to the major economic groups first, not to the sectoral pressure groups. The hope was that smaller companies would be swept along by the response of the larger ones. In July and early August 1986, top government and APRA party officials set in motion a series of meetings with Peru's leading private sector groups.¹⁴ Heading the list was the Romero-Raffo group which had been supportive towards the APRA government from the beginning. As well as owning the country's biggest bank, the Banco de Crédito del Perú, the group has interests in textiles, agribusiness, real estate, insurance and construction. Then came the Brescia group (textiles, property, mining, hotels and insurance); the Nicolinis (milling, animal feeds); La Fabril (milling, textiles, distribution), the Bentins (brewing), the Lanattas (brewing, milling), the Wiese group (banking and financial services), the Cogorno and Isola groups (commercial and industrial) and, subsequently, the Hochschild and Benavides groups (mining). The general idea was to persuade these industrialists that if they failed to invest in the government's growth strategy (from which they were all benefiting) it would have little hope of success. The main items for negotiation were subsidies, the availability of cheap credit, fiscal incentives and exchange rate policy.

With the 'captains of industry' supporting the government's strategy to varying degrees, it was hardly surprising that the atmosphere which prevailed at the November 1986 CADE meeting held in Huaraz was of a positive nature. Gone was the scepticism of Ica concerning the government's promises and intentions. The tone was decidedly bullish.¹⁵ Juan Francisco Raffo, for the Romero group, argued forcefully that the self-interest of business coincided with an interest in supporting the government. To consolidate the gains achieved at the November 1986 CADE meeting, the Finance Ministry proceeded to set up a National Investment Board. In February 1987, the Finance Ministry issued a list of the names of people invited to participate in the establishment of the board. The list included key representatives from mining, food, textile, construction, banking and exporting interest groups. The purpose was to take the main investors beyond the 'letter of intent' stage.¹⁶ It remains to be seen however, to what extent industrial optimism, spurred on by increasing growth in sectors such as manufacturing and construction, can be translated into sustained investment.

¹⁴ See The Andean Report, October 1986.

¹⁵ Que Hacer (44) December 1986-January 1987.

The corollary, however, of a government rapprochement with industrialists in the private-sector, was the government's increasingly unsympathetic attitude towards organised labour, which in García's social pyramid was relegated unequivocally to the 'privileged' modern sector. During the first year and a half of office, government policy aimed at increasing real wages. This tended to calm labour unrest. Indeed, partly as a result of five years of increasing unemployment and falling real wages during the Belaúnde administration, the militancy of Peru's highly politicised labour unions had diminished. However, at the beginning of 1987, there were signs that this was changing. First, the relationship between government and unions was soured by moves to diminish job security. There was the further threat that the Ministry of Labour would try to curb demand by encouraging firms not to succumb to union pressure for wage increases. The scene appeared set for increased union conflict, with little doubt as to which side the government was most committed to.

APRA and the military

Peru's generals returned to the barracks in 1980 after twelve years of power, having extracted certain conditions from their civilian successors under Belaúnde. They were anxious that reprisals would not be taken against those who had held office, and that military budgets and appointments would not become subject to civilian control. The military's position was that they should retain a say in matters which they considered to be of 'strategic' importance (ie development in the jungle) and that they would not be constrained by the civil authorities when it came to dealing with internal 'subversion'. Thrown out of the palace in 1968 none too decorously, Belaúnde was not the man to question such conditions. Though government policy clashed with that of the military on specific issues, (for example, the liberal oil code affecting concessions in the jungle of the Minister of Mines and Energy, Pedro Pablo Kuczynski), Belaúnde avoided trouble. The main area of difficulty in civilian-military relations turned out to be the role played by the army and the marines in the struggle against Sendero from 1982 onwards. Though instances of human rights violation (murders, 'disappearances', torture) became frequent, Belaúnde was careful not to criticise the military too openly, irrespective of the image of his government at home and abroad. Indeed, Belaúnde underlined his disdain for human rights violation charges when he commented on how Amnesty International reports he received were invariably thrown into the waste paper basket.

¹⁶ The Peru Report (Lima) No. 2, February 1987.

Many of APRA's leaders (including the party's unsuccessful candidate in 1980, Armando Villanueva) had spoken out on the human rights issue. The party's human rights spokesman, Javier Valle Riestra, stood out as a particularly vociferous critic both in parliament and outside. In his inaugural speech, Alan García reasserted his commitment to the observance of human rights and to ensuring that the military recognised its responsibilities to a civilian president. He promised that 'the law will be applied with severity on those who violate human rights through killings', extra-judicial executions, torture and the abuse of power: 'To struggle against barbarity, [it was] not right to fall oneself into barbarity'. He also promised to investigate cases of those who were detained who were not members of Sendero Luminoso, and to establish a Peace Commission to 'seek dialogue to persuade those who are mistaken to return to democracy'. He went on to say that 'when the conditions are right', it might be possible to consider an amnesty for terrorists so as to promote 'understanding between Peruvians'. In saying this García appeared to be responding to the climate of international opinion against Belaúnde's handling of the problem.

It is difficult to judge the true tenor of relations between military and government, since only on rare occasions are differences aired in public. It is a relationship which gives rise to a plethora of sometimes knowledgeable, sometimes less-informed political speculation. But the tone of García's speech was not likely to have kindled enthusiasm among the military hierarchy. It was García's concern with his image abroad, especially within the Socialist International and in the Non-Aligned Movement, which partly explains his initial emphasis on conciliation rather than repression.

The first major crisis arose in September 1985, when news filtered out of a massacre perpetrated by troops at the Ayacuchan village of Accomarca. Sixty-nine villagers were killed. The outcry in Lima, especially in parliament, stung García into responding. As well as making a strongly-worded speech in which he accused his predecessor of deliberately covering up atrocities committed by the military, he demanded the resignation of three key generals: the military commander in Ayacucho, the commander of the second military region based in Lima, and the President of the Armed Forces Joint Command.

Though the details are obscure, García's stand appears to have caused a strong response among the military. Indicative of this was the fact that the killings which took place shortly afterwards at two other villages (Bellavista and Umaru) were dealt with in a very different manner. No attempts were made to identify those responsible or to punish them.¹⁷ Attempts in parliament to investigate the issue further were blocked by the APRA majority. At the same time, members of the Peace Commission (formed in early September 1986), found that their attempts to get the Commission moving were frustrated by a lack of finance and by obstruction from the government and the military establishment. The newspapers which had dealt with the Accomarca massacre in detail, suddenly reduced their coverage of Ayacucho to a minimum. According to one government aide at the time, this was on orders from the palace. The obvious implication of this abrupt change in policy was that García had been given a stern warning by the military hierarchy.

A new crisis broke in June 1986. Following a mutiny by Sendero prisoners in three Lima jails, troops stormed them along with Republican Guard police, killing more than 300 people. Many of the victims at one jail, Lurigancho, were executed one by one after they had surrendered. No one knows for sure how many were killed when marines attacked another, the island jail of El Frontón, with bombs and bazookas, completely destroying the prison buildings. The embarrassment of the government was heightened by the way these events coincided with García's hosting a meeting of the Socialist International. Many of the delegates were horrified by what they saw taking place at such close quarters. Amid widespread rumours of an imminent coup d'état, García admitted that he had issued the order for military involvement to quell the mutinies. He blamed the military and police for excessive violence, promising that those responsible would be punished. Members of the Republican Guard who are normally responsible for guarding the jails, were temporarily interned. However, the army and marine troops involved, including General Jorge Rabanal who led the attack on Lurigancho, were not disciplined. There has been no serious investigation into what happened at El Frontón.¹⁸ According to one security official the events in the jails produced 'the elimination of a major focus of tension and subversive conspiracy'.¹⁹

¹⁷ Human Rights in Peru: Special Update (London) PSG, July 1986.

Another sensitive moment followed in December 1986. This time, news emerged of another indiscriminate killing in Ayacucho, at the village of Parcco. The incident was announced in a routinely worded communiqué which talked of a 'clash with subversive delinquents'. Witnesses spoke of how among the victims was an eighty-two-year-old man, and his seventy-year-old wife and their grandchildren of ten and eleven. The revelation sparked a new outcry in parliament, and resulted in the decision to send another delegation to investigate what had happened. Following talks between García and military leaders, a new statement was released which announced that 'unfortunately acts had been committed which were contrary to the regulations which guide operations by the forces of order'. The statement said that those responsible would be tried in military courts, pre-empting demands from human rights organisations that trials be conducted in open civilian courts. The Aprista leader of the House of Deputies, León de Rivero, did his best to stop the investigating commission going to Ayacucho;²⁰ and when it finally did, it was stopped by the military from visiting the village concerned.²¹

While acutely conscious of promoting its democratic reputation abroad, the García government has resisted pressures from the Left and from human rights organisations to allow for more public monitoring of counter-insurgency strategies or for military personnel to be held criminally responsible for their actions in civilian courts. Meanwhile, at the beginning of 1987, state of emergency regulations were in force in the capital, while twenty provinces in four departments in south-central Peru were still under tight military control. In this so-called Emergency Zone, the peering eye of congressional commissions, human rights delegations and members of the press were still no more welcome than they had been under the Belaúnde regime.

In March 1987 a conflict between the Government and the military of Amnesty International Report (London) February 1987.

The Peru Report, No. 2, February 1987.

Caretas, 9 December 1986.

Caretas, 19 January 1987.

a slightly different nature developed. Taking up an old idea, shelved at various points in the past, García announced his intention to unify the three military ministries—War, Navy and Aviation (each with a minister in the cabinet)—into a single defence ministry. Arguing that a single command would, amongst other things help end counter-insurgency, García's initiative ran into a barrage of protest. Those against the idea were those most likely to lose political weight, particularly in the Navy and the Air Force. Some senior members of the Army were also opposed, though military protest was largely articulated through retired generals and admirals. Irrespective of these protests, an extraordinary session of Congress approved the President's legislative proposals, leaving considerable leeway for the executive to regulate the law as it saw fit.

The Government's objective, it seems, was to take advantage of its popularity to take a step towards greater political control over the military. Its intention, at least, was that the new minister should be a civilian, if not an Aprista. The government was keen to have more direct control over promotions, control over military expenditure and an increased capacity to punish corruption within the armed forces. The reaction of the majority of the military establishment was muted, at least in public. The only senior officer to go beyond verbal opposition was Airforce General Luis Abram Cavallerino who ordered pilots to buzz the presidential palace. Abram Cavallerino was summarily dismissed immediately afterwards. Following closely on the disputes over human rights, the Ministry of Defence row created new levels of tension. The central issue in all these disputes was the question of institutional autonomy of the armed forces, one of the key conditions accepted by Belaúnde in 1980. In military circles there was the fear that the government would push ahead with the 'Apristización' of the military establishment. At the same time, however, García's trump card—his political standing—made it difficult for adversaries of the Ministry of Defence proposal at this point to take further steps to pursue their case.

Conclusion

Important advances were made by the APRA government during its first eighteen months in office to consolidate its political hold. In line with APRA's traditional polyclassist approach, the party attempted to draw new sectors into a pro-government political alliance, varying from the business élite to the poor in the urban slums and rural communities, cemented by a strong nationalist ideology.

Such was the government's apparent success that opposition leaders, both on the Right and on the Left, became increasingly concerned at the extent to which their own political spheres of influence were being eroded. Some saw APRA preparing the ground for a term of office, extending well beyond 1990 when García's five-year term expires. They saw APRA successfully dominating the middle ground of politics, adopting an increasingly authoritarian and presidentialist style of government, and moving towards the establishment of a Peruvian version of the Mexican Partido Revolucionario Institucional (PRI). These fears, however, tend to exaggerate the degree of Aprista hegemony. Though the results of the local elections of November 1986 confirmed the party's electoral popularity, it remains to be seen how 'committed' or 'loyal' this vote will be, given that the party's presence in many areas of the country is at most thin on the ground.

The main 'joker in the pack' for the government as it entered 1987 was whether the impressive economic results for 1986 could be sustained. There can be little doubt that economic growth, coupled with an increase in employment and in real incomes is an important element in sustaining the government's popularity. But while nothing breeds success like success, the reverse may also turn out to be true if things begin to go badly.

In early 1987, there were ominous warning signs beginning to appear. On the external front, Peru's trade balance turned negative in the second half of 1986, as growth attracted more imports and as exports stagnated both in terms of volume and value. With international reserves falling by over a third between October 1986 and January 1987, many observers predicted a severe balance-of-payments crisis, even though debt payments were being kept to a minimum. At the same time, on the domestic front the renewal of devaluation, the progressive unfreezing of prices, and a surge in government spending (notably in its credit to the public sector) all heralded the revival of new inflationary pressures. Also, it was by no means clear that industrialists would honour their word and invest in expanding capacity. Without investment, growth would peter out and supply shortages would further fuel inflation.

In these circumstances, the government's commitment to increase real incomes in 1987 by between 6 and 7 per cent seemed extremely optimistic. But if the 1986 heady boom turns into stagnation (or worse) in 1987, then the government's popularity may prove hard to sustain, while opposition groups may begin to take advantage of the opportunity to regain the political initiative.

A further danger lay in the resentment in the armed forces at the way in which the García government threatened the cherished institutional autonomy of the military. The social base for a successful coup was hard to detect, at least in the first part of 1987. But a deteriorating economy would mean that it would be harder to maintain García's 'populist' alliance. In this context, then, military resentment could still spell trouble for García, and put to the test the degree of political consolidation achieved since 1985 by APRA.

The Status: a day in the life of a contemporary Iranian writer*

In the Bejewelled Land¹ of (traditionally Shahanshahi) Persia, a good writer is a dead writer. So, being a contemporary novelist, alive and kicking on the literary scene of the (Ayatollahi) Islamic Republic of Iran, in the grip of a seven-year, holy, throttling, life-shrinking war, is not all that it's cracked up to be. Thomas Wolfe once wrote of his land as 'a place where miracles not only happen, but they happen every day, on the sidewalks'.² He must have spent a light-year weekend in Kermanshah.

Here, however, the myth miracle is the amalgamation of organised confusion vs confused organisation, which not only happens, but happens every second in the gutters of Six Thousand Years of Glorious History.

Here is a second:

I

The Contemporary Iranian Writer on the Literary Scene wakes up at 4.30am and jogs in the Avenue of the Oppressed Martyr Ayatollah Doktor Seyed Mohammad Beheshti, for fifteen minutes. A lonely runner, a dark avenue.

After a quiet bath (in the candle-light, due to the energy-rationing power-cuts) the Contemporary Writer puts the kettle on, and sharpens all six of his pencils. He has to go over the thirty-seven miscellaneous pages of his type-set, but not yet published, novel. It has been delayed for seven months pending approval by the Ministry of Irshad-e-Islami (the Islamic Guidance). He has had to rephrase, or omit, or think about certain passages, sentences, or words that may contain 'ambiguous remarks' or 'conflict' with the Islamic Republic.

Before sitting down, he takes a look into the boy's room. The boy is resting, seemingly comfortably, under the intravenous medication of his two-hour, twice-a-day injective medicine for leukopaenia. (They can't get the imported medicine easily now in Tehran, due to wartime budget regulations. So they have to decrease the dose—when they can get the stuff.) His thinning, harried wife is resting on some bedding on the floor, with the battery-operated flashlight at hand in case of a midnight air-raid blackout, when they would have to shelter in the basement. The apartment is still quiet, and it is the hour of the wolf as the Contemporary Writer sits with his coffee at a corner of the dining table to work.

* This study was written in response to an invitation by the Third World Quarterly to 'contribute an article on the status of the writer in contemporary Iran . . .' The writer illustrated is of course fictitious.

The Contemporary Writer is affected, among other factors, by American culture and literature, like a generation of writers before him in the early Pahlavi era, some of whom were influenced by French and other European cultures and literature. When the Contemporary Writer was eighteen and just finishing high school there came the coup d'état of 28th of Mordad 1332 (17 August 1952), the fall of Dr Mossadeq's nationalist government, the return of the Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi from a brief escape to Italy, and the entrance of the Eisenhower Administration, leading America into the history of the Bejewelled Land for the first time, to influence it for the next quarter of a century, until the Islamic Revolution. He was charmed with the adventures and voices of the New World and he went to America for his higher education, got degrees and learned how to write and how to appreciate Shakespeare and Faulkner, and he learned looking back with pain, and he learned loving and experienced tragedy.

The Contemporary Iranian Writer now has a lump on his vocal cords, clogging his voice. It is benign and he is scheduled to have it removed in eleven months and eight days' time, 8 o'clock sharp. Otherwise, he is fine, at forty-nine with an athletic body and an athletic heart. He is thin but not gaunt, with only slightly undernourished-looking, shallow wrinkles on his lower cheeks and his neck. His hair and his razor-shaven cheeks are the colour of ashes. His hands are fine and soft and unlined, perhaps because he has never worked with them except with pencils and chalk and dusters.

He sweats over the alterations for an hour and a half on the first leg of the day. The objective: keep the tone and the theme of the novel intact, while removing and/or changing the blatantly offensive words, phrases and images—to allow it to pass through the censorship Brothers, and get the book out. Words such as 'dissatisfaction', 'torture' and 'execution' must be rephrased. Phrases like 'a martyr-breeding nation' must be deleted. Images of a 'destroyed land', or visions of 'a holy, green-robed mullah on a white horse galloping across the war-fronts' must come out. Men and women must not touch. He swears, deep in his cerebral cortex. The Contemporary Writer is very good at swearing in his cerebral cortex. This is not revising or rewriting; this is metamorphosing and whoring. He adds a slug of C_2H_5OH 96 per cent to his coffee and takes his first Cordarone and two aspirins with it.

II

At 6.30am the Contemporary Writer goes for the milk because it's Wednesday. It's the alternative day for their neighbourhood's milk. He takes the two empty bottles and the Baseej (Mobilisation of the Meek) Ration Booklet. His wife could buy the milk on the 'free bazaar', but that's not pasteurised. You never know what you're getting even if you boil. Once, the boy broke out in an infectious rash. It's also their day to receive the monthly ration of meat. Next week, the monthly cheese, inshallah, God willing. There won't be any monthly butter, because in the Islamic Republic at War, butter has been declared a luxury. When he comes up the alley, it is still so early that the garbage thieves are still at their work, rummaging selectively among the plastic trash bags outside the doors: paper scraps to be made into confectionery boxes, plastic containers for refilling, dry bread to be re-made into flour, and other garbage to feed sheep in south Tehran.

The Contemporary Writer contemplates the long queue in front of the butcher's, which won't be opening until after nine. It is no easy task, to reserve a place in the mid-morning meat-queue for your wife and get the early milk yourself. But a Contemporary Writer in the Islamic Republic is a Trained Artist on the Hard Ration Trapeze.

He manages a little arrangement with an elderly, gentle Armenian lady in Islamic hejab, and a haggard, retired army officer in worn-out jeans. No one knows his name. No one knows anybody's name in the queues. The Contemporary Writer and his family have recently moved into their rented apartment in this upper-Tehran neighbourhood, in order to be close to the hospital. He could have taken the boy abroad for a cure, were it not for the 'Catch 15-19'. They won't give you an exit permit now because you are fifteen and male and have to wait until you are nineteen and conscripted, and you can't be officially medically exempted from service until you are nineteen.

Coming back down the alley, he arranges his day's work in his mind: his university class, Nasser Khan's shop, Irshad, lunch with Fereydoon, see Hamid, on to see Aqa-Reza, and his evening English class at the National Iranian Oil Company. He recalls the bad dream he had (again) just before he awoke. He was in that room again. It was pitch black. Or he was blind. Or both. He was carrying a load of paper on his back and was looking for the door. There was no door. Within the walls, there was a fight, there was mockery, there was pushing, there was thieving, and there was hunger. Without, was sweet life blowing at the walls. The confusion, the uncertainty and the agony of the pressure was so much that his brain had thrust him awake almost screaming, and certainly with another onset of Premature Ventricular Contractions.

III

He takes a rented agence taxi to the College of Persian Literature and Foreign Languages, where he has just finished two advanced English writing courses, (supposedly on an hourly-based contract). Driving up the Parkway Autobahn, now Martyr Chamran, in the cold but sunny Tehran morning, he observes people sitting along the hard shoulder with empty gas cylinders waiting hopefully for the gas truck, or Godot, to come. The place is about ten miles away, in Sa'adatabad (Fortuneville) on the north-western outskirts of Tehran, at the foot of the Alborz mountains. He likes the place, and the classes, and especially the students. They are part of his life-long contact with the roots of the land. And he could use the money (if it came!). It has not come so far, due to, ahem, 'Budget problems'. He does not rebel against the petty things. What he does not like at all is Brother Dr Birjandian, in charge of the department.

Holding the envelopes containing the final exams and final grades, he cuts across the long footpaths of the Persian-style garden in front of the rather pleasant, sprawling, five-storeyed building. The garden, like everything else, is unkempt. The school used to be one of the private colleges, in the Shahanshahi regime—the old College of Translation, set up by the late Dr Abbas Aryanpour, the distinguished linguist. After the Islamic so-called Cultural Revolution take-over, the School was brought with umpteen other private colleges of that era under a single administrative umbrella. The new complex (very complex) was named the University of Allameh Tabataba'ii, after the late Ayatollah Seyyed Mohammad Tabataba'ii, a reclusive and learned mullah.

He stops to catch a breath by the white-and-turquoise modernistic pond, with its under-water lighting systems and the central pedestal with the huge white bird. It is almost empty save for an inch of muddy slime at the bottom, with bits of paper and plastic bags and other trash, including the fallen leaves of the past few seasons, embedded in it. The Contemporary Writer can hear the bones of both the distinguished linguist and the poor Ayatollah rattling in their graves.

He passes the Lower Hall, the University Jihad rooms, the namaz hall with a half-dozen soiled slippers on its threshold, and climbs the five flights of stairs up to the Language Department. He passes the deserted Persian Literature floor along the way. None of the (mostly contracted) teachers know him—they have full-time jobs elsewhere—and then again, he knows none of them either. It's mostly a come-and-zap-and-go joint. He's alone there and he's been in a dog-day mood since he had that hassle with Brother Dr Birjanidian. The Contemporary Writer has not been used to being lied to and swindled by Heads of College Departments.

He collects an end-of-term record sheet from the Administration Room and, since he has no private cubby-hole, he goes and sits in an empty classroom to fill in the grades. He will hand in the grades and clear off. The classroom is well-lit and airy, with a peaceful view of the Alborz mountains, the only jarring note being the Jang jang, ta Piroozi (War, War, Until Victory) slogan on the wall next to the green blackboard. Above the board are the ever-present portraits of Ayatollah Khomeini and Ayatollah Montazeri flanking a framed motif bearing the inscription 'Kalamatollah' ('the Word of Allah'). There are other notices too. A graphic illustration shows how and where the boys and girls should sit in the classroom, on opposite sides. Also on the wall, there are two prayers inscribed; one for 'starting the lesson' and one for 'ending the lesson'. He remembers the day he was almost kicked out because he had given his essay-writing class an essay on the poetess Forough Farrokhzad. Birjandian had come in search of him like a mad dog and caught him in the corridor, practically dragging him to his office, and scolding him for discussing a woman, a poetess, in class. Some stool-pigeon *Hezbollahi Khahar*³ (Sister) student (an âbji-ôllahi,⁴ he called them) had reported the incident! Oh, Glorious Days in the Corridors of Contemporary Persian Literature!

The Contemporary Writers fills the grade sheets in with meticulous care, rapidly, to get out as fast as possible. One part of his mind is at home, where the boy is alone while his mother goes to the meat queue. The other part is in the Financial Affairs Room, wondering if there is a pay cheque ready for him at last. He recalls the first time he had come to see Brother Dr Birjandian. They had discussed his classes and the assistance he could give. ('We shall be proud and honoured to have a tiger like you in our faculty.') They had discussed the terms. Since the official rate of pay was terribly low and since he had to come a long way by agence taxi every time, Dr Birjandian would arrange a 60 per cent bonus in the contract, to compensate. ('Just between you and me! I'll cheat the Republic for you.') The contract would be written out and signed later. . . There had been no reason to misunderstand or to disbelieve what he said, for was he not the Head of the Language Department, with an American PhD, and had been introduced by a gentleman friend, a trustworthy person. The Contemporary Writer had started the classes but the second time they met to sign the contract, three weeks into the course, Dr Birjandian did not remember any such conversation.

The good doctor had just come out of the toilet and was wiping his wet hands with a couple of precious sheets of writing paper from his desk. He had no time. In fact, he had nothing but nerves, today. He was cross, too, and kept fidgeting and fussing under the portraits of Khomeini and Montazari flanking the Kalamatollah. Even his fuzzy beard, shaven around the edges, Cazanova style, seemed bristling and annoyed. His pants, which he had perpetual difficulty in maintaining in a stationary position on the dome of his pot-belly, and zipped up, seemed even more recalcitrant and mobile. He had raised his voice at his associate professor (because his secretary was listening) and had scolded him. 'You think of taking money from the Treasury of the Moslem Ummat?' ('I'll cheat anybody for the Republic.') The Contemporary Writer had got up, shaken the man's hand in farewell, and left, never to set foot in that office again. He had, however, stayed on to finish the classes he had undertaken. The students did not have to suffer. No Fortunevillë for the Contemporary Writer, though; not around the College of Literature and Languages, of the University of Ayatollah Allameh Tabatabaïi.

Just before leaving the campus, he checks at the dingy room labelled 'Financial Affairs Manager'. 'No cheques ready yet,' a little Sister tells him. That only means, perhaps, some Brother has not pulled up his pants to manage to process the payments. Or to allocate the budget. 'Keep in touch.' Yes, all right. 'They'll be ready tomorrow, inshallah.' Or TOMORROW! But this is not nearly half as bad as it could have been. A few months back, he had taught an intensive report-writing course for a group of specialists in the Ministry of Planning and Budget's Training Department. When he received his pay-cheque, payable from the Central Bank of the Islamic Republic, it bounced! Somebody in the Master Accounts Division had not even bothered to check whether there was any money in that Job Account Number.

IV

The Contemporary Writer walks alone, down into the windy, open highway to take a town taxi eastwards on the Martyr Chamran Autobahn, another south on the Ayatollah Modares Autobahn and then another one east on Jomhoori Avenue, because Tehran taxis now go in a straight path, taking five passengers at a time. The taxis are still designed after the old British Hillman cars and the two passengers squeezing up front next to the driver have to sit on each other's laps. The fifteen-odd miles from Sa'adatabad to Baharestan Square, deep in central-south Tehran, takes him about an hour and a half to cover, on to the Ministry of Irshad. This is not the most pleasant of his daily chores.

The southern and central sections of Tehran's alleys are sprinkled with hejlehs,⁵ here and there, mourning a soldier, or a volunteer Baseeji, 'martyred' at the fronts in the 'War of Righteousness against Blasphemy'. An alley or a street is named (renamed) after each, because in miraculous Persia, for the good of society, we must re-write, wipe out and toss into the 'garbage-can of History', any remaining effects of the previous regime(s) not conforming to our own ideology. Today, we are even more magnificently miraculous—we are re-writing our geography. The day before, there was an air-raid massacre of the city of Bakhtaran (previously Kermanshah for centuries) 'martyring' hundreds of men, women and children in their houses.

Coming down the long way to Irshad, the Contemporary Writer's thoughts wander ahead, painfully, vexatiously. He does not, however, ask why the hell do it at all? He simply tries to recount how many times he has already made this trip to the Ministry: seven months for this novel (so far), twenty-three months for the collection of short stories (so far), and eight months for the other novel which (miraculously) came out. How many trips, how many days, how many hours, ~~how~~ many minutes—waiting? Time here means waiting. A day is a day is a month is a year is a century is a minute. So what is thirty-eight months? What one could do with thirty-six million minutes of time and energy! How many minutes does it take you to kill a man by keeping him waiting in a dark room? Does he want this? But for the Contemporary Writer, writing is not an act of will, or a need, or a pleasure. It's a painful instinct, an obsession, a response to visions of a beaten, bruised and broken angel—an ache, a deep-rooted stimulus. He stops for a rest and a stekan of tea and a chat at the bookshop belonging to his friend Nasser Khan. There will be no tea for him at the Irshad.

The smile on Nasser Khan's lean face, and the fine tea, brighten up the Contemporary Writer's day a little and open up his mitral valves a touch. Good old, stone-faced Nasser Khan, always smiling, even now that the establishment has practically come to a dead stop, and he is trying to sell the large place and move into a smaller office. He pours the tea from a teapot on the little Aladdin kerosene heater. 'How's the paper situation?' the Contemporary Writer asks. 'Still in the throes of agony', Nasser Khan answers. 'How much is it today?' '2,400 tomans a (500-sheet) ream!'

Like almost every other vital commodity, paper has been slipping further and further away from the printers and the publishers—ever since the government took over the production and distribution. Three years ago, paper was sold to printers for around 280 tomans a ream. After it, too, was rationed out meagrely to the printshops and publishers, not necessarily owing to war time regulations, paper quickly moved into the 'free bazaar', and the price gradually rose by over 900 per cent—if you could get it. And since the book prices were fixed and controlled by the Ministry of Guidance, there ensued the 'Catch 280–2400': you could not get government paper for 280 a ream because it was sold for 2,400 a ream in the 'free bazaar', and you could not sell your book at a price based on 2,400 a ream because the government fixed the prices on the basis of a 280 rate. Some considered it a ploy to dry up the independent publishers of books 'they' didn't like, even if they had no pretext for stopping them. Nasser Khan once said that taking away paper from a publisher was like pulling out the Dextrose 6 per cent intravenous from a comatose patient. The remark had touched deep, reminding the Contemporary Writer of his boy.

But the remark was only partly true. Fortunately, not all publishers were drained of their life-line; many had, in fact been fattened by the paper extravaganza. The publishers belonging to Anjoman Islami Nasherin (Islamic Society of Publishers) had all the paper they needed to bulk-print the fundamentalist and/or propaganda genre. Hòzeh-e-Andisheh va Honar Islami (the Domain of Islamic Thoughts and Arts) had wider and richer resources, and covered books, TV programmes and feature films to appraise, advertise, promulgate and publish 'Islamic Ideas'. Sazeman Tabliqat Islami (Islamic Propaganda Organisation) had a more penetrating and world-reaching policy: at one time, during the past three or four years, they had published over three thousand titles in the Arabic, Urdu, and English languages to be distributed throughout the world. These were the major newly-founded organisations. Among the largest of the old organisations confiscated and taken over by the Government were the huge Entesharat Amir Kabir (Amir Kabir Publications) with its seven bookshops and the huge Sepehr printshop. Amir Kabir was not used exclusively for Islamic propaganda now; it published selected titles in history and science, as well as dictionaries, and works of fiction, but its main objective was the production of basic Islamic books; the Holy Qoran, the Nahj ol Baleqeh, the Word of Imam (in twenty-seven volumes) etc. etc. . . The novel Fajr (Dawn) of Islam, by MA Fajr, starting a century before the birth of the prophet Mohammad, had had an 11,000 print-run. Another old organisation among those confiscated was the Kanun Parvaresh-e-Fekri Kudakan (Centre of Children's Mind Development), which brought out tens of thousands of copies of children's books, in accordance with its own thematic objectives. They had paper to print and to sell for profit at the 'free bazaar'. One manager from the Entesharat Ba'that (Ba'that Publishers) had been put in prison for, among other charges, mis-using rationed government paper.

Today, Nasser Khan is only apologetic that he cannot do anything for the Contemporary Writer. For months now, Nasser Khan has not been able even to reprint any of their best-selling titles—including a novel by the Contemporary Writer, the first edition of which had sold out within the space of a few months. The establishment had just been selling, without any replenishment of stocks. They had sold many of their good rare books in bulk to make ends meet. The four Hamedani brothers were among the most reputable of scholar/publisher/printers of the past fifty years. One brother is now suffering from cardiac ailments. Another brother has been breaking down with mental illness and kidney disease, tinged with bad bouts of insomnia. Their production had fallen even lower than the 80 per cent decrease, cited as a national figure by Ettela'at daily. This is not one of their best years.

Theirs is not, however, the only such case. Nor the worst. They still exist, whereas 21 per cent of Tehran's publishers have gone out of business altogether, with only a few government foundations, such as Bonyad Shaheed (Martyrs' Foundation) surviving. The largest publishing house to have disappeared was, of course, Amir Kabir Publications, with its founder and owner put into prison. After eleven months, he was, fortunately, acquitted of any charges against the country or Islam. He was set free—but he was 'asked' to sign a compromise to the effect that his establishment was to be canonically confiscated.

After the tea and sympathy, the Contemporary Writer now has the energy to face the Brothers at Irshad. When he has said good-bye and is on the threshold of the shop entrance, the 'Red Alert' comes on Nasser Khan's little transistor radio. 'Red Alert' at 10am in Tehran now means the Iraqis are either bombarding the Tehran Refinery, or the industrial sites in not-too-far-away Arak, or the residential areas in Kermanshah, Isfahan, Tabriz, massacring children in schools, workers in factories, and women at home—a daily, blessed chore in a bloody war of mad drunken dogs. Like most Tehrani citizens, the Contemporary Writer is only pathetically alarmed by the 'Red Alert'. He turns and looks at Nasser Khan. He is also grinning pathetically and shaking his head. Another economic, 'industrial and military' site cast into flames. And another 10 per cent on the price of paper. 'Farewell.' 'When you come out, let me know what happens in there.' 'And if I don't come out?' 'I'll come to Evin prison and bring you some cigarettes.'

When he is outside, he catches sight of the snapshot affixed in one corner of Nasser Khan's shop window—one glaring sight depicting the predicament of the book business in Tehran: it is a front view of the spacious Rastegar Bookshop on the old Shah Abbas Avenue—now renamed Qaem Maqam Farahani. The establishment still bears the big, neon-lit sign on top, in both Farsi and English. But inside, behind the huge glass windows, they are selling fruits and vegetables.

V

There is a narrow half-door entrance for men, and the Contemporary Writer goes through, or tries to. He gets a visitor's slip and a body check, and goes on to the end of the long, cage-like path that leads to the courtyard and its surrounding buildings. What's missing is the trainer with the chain and the whip. But the body check consists of nothing more than a little bearded boy in paramilitary uniform and the everlasting brown slippers putting his hands on your breast and your hips and then saying 'befarmaid' ('You may enter'). To the Contemporary Writer, he says 'Befarmaid, Haj Aqa.' Not because the visitor is a mullah, or even bearded, but because he is wearing an elegant suit and has gentle eyes, and they have seen him many times before—without a bomb.

He knows how to find the publications section on the first floor only too well, and soon climbs to the corner where they have their three rooms for Book Investigations.

One room is marked 'No Entry'. Visitors are instructed by means of arrows, to go to the room on the right. There is usually nobody in the room on the right. There is nothing but four or five hard chairs and two humble desks, with a picture portrait of Khomeini on one. The little portrait is pasted on a simple piece of cardboard, folded to stand upright. At the side of the picture, it says, in an elegant Nasta'liq script: 'Without the Love of Khomeini, One Can Not be in Love with Mahdi.'⁶

The Contemporary Writer sits waiting on a hard chair. He knows the Brothers don't like to be called and disturbed in the forbidden room; once he had caught them unawares having a mid-morning breakfast of bread and roasted liver. But the Contemporary Writer likes them because they're boys of the lower sections and back-alleys of the little towns. All but one—an older and grimmer fellow, who looks and interrogates like a SAVAK⁷ torturer, and probably was one, once. The rest are naive, dusty, earthy, and hungry—like the land itself. During the Shah's rule, when the Contemporary Writer was called in for an 11 o'clock interview, he would be led in by a mini-skirted secretary to a spacious office (in the then Ministry of Culture and Arts) to face clean-shaven, cologned, tailored, flannel-suited Jenab Aqâye Zandpur in his Christian Dior silk tie. They would discuss words or phrases that would sound 'offensive' or 'in conflict with' the monarchy. The official would be corrupt or perhaps a SAVAKI, or both, and just back from a snoop around his private second-hand automobile salesroom. The Brothers here have perhaps never heard of Christian Dior. They are humble, religious, Qoran-quoting nobodies, having barely qualified for high school diplomas, who are commissioned (among other things) to investigate novels, and to irshad the novelist. But they are and were doing the same thing in the same ministry: shutting up or scaring off their fighting enemies, and haggling, red-taping, and slowly punishing and torturing their non-aggressive critics.

One of the boys slips in. He takes a half-look at the Contemporary Writer, as if he already knew he was in here. He goes on to busy himself behind the desk bearing the 'Love of Khomeini' charm. They all know him. He is the only major one who keeps drifting back in. A silent drifter, a stubborn drifter. But he does not know whether they like him, hate him, fear him, admire him, or just keep piling evidence on him. He likes one of them, though, the Bahmanzad boy. He has a boyish smile, and talks with him, and treats him with respect, and his salaam and smile make the place slightly more tolerable. The Brother behind the desk is quiet. He raises his head, and looks at the Contemporary Writer. 'You want to see who? Brother Foroughi?' 'Yes, Aqaye Foroughi,' says the Contemporary Writer answering the superfluous question. The Brother leaves the room, though he can call anyone on his phone. The Contemporary Writer is left alone, waiting, again. Another visitor drifts silently in and perches on a hard chair. He holds a copy of Key To Solving Physics and Algebra Problems for high school graduate students who study to take the National University Entrance Exams—and wants a print permit. Another visitor wanders in and perches on a hard chair. He has a new design for the packing cases for his confectioner's shop. Boy, is he in the wrong section!

Foroughi edges slowly in past the half-open door. He is in his perpetual black slippers, his long black rosary dangling from his right hand, signifying that he can't shake hands with you. They get down to business quickly. The Contemporary Writer submits the alterations. 'All right, yes.' 'Will that be all?' 'We will examine them.' 'When will you have the final answer?' 'Inshallah, God willing, soon.' 'When?' All the official work is done. 'When,' the Contemporary Writer wants to know. 'Call us, later.' 'Next Saturday?' 'Yes, next Saturday, inshallah . . . ' The Contemporary Writer feels he is dangling from a thin thread, in a vacuum. Next Saturday will not be the next Saturday. Nor will it necessarily be the following one. In a land blessed with the prospects of inshallah, time is a loosely buoyant and slightly dormant commodity. A Saturday is a Thursday is a Shmursday. And even if one blooming Saturday or Thursday he is allowed to come in, there will be a few more 'just minor' problems again, for him to consider. Then, even if, with the Blessed Powers of Allah, they do say okay, where in Allah's name is the paper to print it? The okay, incidentally, will be an oral one. There won't be any official permit. Nothing on paper. Nobody is censoring anybody to give a permit. Go ahead and print it in n-thousand copies and then bring in five copies for price-setting and the final authorisation for distribution. Heh, heh. Go ahead.

VI

Under the bright late-morning Tehran skies—the Iraqi air-raid ‘Red Alert’ is over—the Contemporary Writer takes another taxi to Lower Shah Abbas Avenue and the Ararat Restaurant. He has a lunch date with Fereydoon, his high school pal, life-long friend, and favourite poet—and this is his favourite joint. The Armenian place is clean, but cold and dead and empty. Outside, on the corner of the sidewalk, the weather-beaten street-cleaner and the raw-skinned fruit pedlar, are warming their hands at a large tin-can in which bits of wood from broken boxes are burning.

While waiting, the Contemporary Writer takes his noon medicine, with a glass of water, and calls home, where his wife’s sister (a university graduate accountant, now laid off) is looking after the boy while the boy’s mother is out in the queues. He then sits back in the lonely corner, sighs, and begins to read a fan’s letter sent c/o Nasser Khan’s bookshop. A reader of his latest novel, herself an unpublished poetess, writes: ‘. . . My depth-finding friend, I want to congratulate you for this, and I hope, and I see how Iranian writers (today) with their restricted possibilities, spread blissful, blissful life.’ That’s good for two Cordarones and one Nitrolingual, and opens the mitral valves a little more.

He lights a cigarette, crosses his legs, and sits back, facing the door, waiting. His lonely eyes are not blissful eyes; in fact they are now painful eyes—a lonely front, a silent anger, a hurt, wound-licking bobcat, crept into a cosy hole. Except for a friend or two, all these years, he has really been able to associate himself with few of the intellectuals and literary clan. His people are the real people, with real pains. He is not a political writer or even a revolutionary writer. He is a natural back-alley story-monger with a pain in his heart and a lump in his throat. It has never entered his wildest dreams (or nightmares) to send in an application for membership of the Society of Iranian Artists and Writers. He likes the Gospel according to Fereydoon, that says the Artists and Intellectuals of Iran are the Rare Birds of Iran. They can sing only at a certain fixed temperature, given certain fixed foods and drinks. Otherwise they fly west. The Contemporary Writer of Iran is the Lonely Wild Bird of Iran and the lonely wild bird flies within the storm for evermore.

Fereydoon should be coming through the half-door soon, his tall, lean body wobbling, and his weather-beaten face—ouch! For the last few years, he has always looked as though he has just banged his head hard against the frame, coming through the narrow door. He has been a poet, a university teacher and an essayist, and he wrote two good books immediately after the Revolution. He is also a socialist. That's why he looks mostly ouch! He's got other personal pains, too. A year ago his daughter was ranked sixth in her University Entrance Exams (the Councours!). This was in the academic test results, out of 700,000 participants, nationwide. Her field was language and literature. She was rejected because some Brother in the Selective Investigation Unit marked her 'unfit' to enter the University of the Islamic Republic. Once the academic aptitude tests are over, the Selection Brothers go literally spying on the 'character or moral fitness' of the top students. (They actually snoop around the neighbourhood asking questions here and there. Does she go to Friday Prayers? Does she observe hejab? Do they play music, out loud?) The girl is now mentally ill and has been hospitalised several times, with symptoms of acute schizophrenia.

Fereydoon comes in right on time, that is almost half an hour late. They shake hands, sit down, order food and ask each other the usual life-line questions: the family, the ailing boy, the suffering girl. Which is less horrific?—to bleed-dry with leukaemia or to agonise sapless with schizophrenia? Fereydoon extends his small box with its meagre stock of Benzedrine-cocaine balls which his neurosurgeon nephew brings regularly from Frankfurt as cerebrilia-tranquillisers. This is some tonic! Before the fish-kebab comes, they down a wee bit. The Contemporary Writer and the Contemporary Poet of Iran have a ball, each.

They don't stop to ask one another, or themselves why the hell they bother at all because they know. You don't stop to ask and determine your next cardiac catheterisation. When you're a death-baby freak of personal expression and Iran is your womb and your grave, you've had it. Like Iran itself, the Contemporary Writer, or Poet, ~~woos~~ woos and loves, and pains, and hurts himself and people drawn to him, ~~to be~~ recognised as a source; to understand and be understood, to love and be loved—no matter what world he is in, and even if it takes Six Bloody Thousand Years of stumbling and falling and rising again and breaking down again, and not thinking, and moaning, and being torn and raped and robbed. Like Iran itself, he does not want a new world, or a thinking world; he wants a world of imagination and tradition where he can return to a for-ever-more womb. Fereydoon's eyes are sadder than his.

They can now get down to talk about the enterprising subjects of their social lives, such as the War, paper, and censorship. They both have two or three books in the Irshad, but on skewers. They both have two or three books ready for reprint, but no paper. They both have one or two books in the hands of a small chiselling publisher who sneak-prints the material and lies in their faces. They have both lost heavily in the abominable war—the Imposed War. Fereydoon has lost more: he taught in a college in the southern city of Ahvaz for twenty years before he was 'retired'. His house and his household in Kian-Pars were destroyed during the early Iraqi bombing and shelling. During the process of his retirement, when they calculated his pension, it was something in the vicinity of 14,000 a month, based on his own salary savings, and his own monthly payments to the Retirement Pension Fund. A few days after his retirement, however, the Islamic Republic at War had quickly passed a Bill through the Islamic Council (Majles) which put a ceiling on the retirement pension of 8.6 thousand, and hence chopped some 40 per cent of his life's earnings per month. He vows that he will sue the Islamic Republic Majles on the Resurrection Day, if there is one.

They both had at times considered leaving Iran to live quietly somewhere, but they could not, even if they definitely decided to. Both had 'Exit forbidden' problems, handicapped children and moral obligations to their teaching jobs. To live in a Kensington High Street flat in London, or in a Passy pièce in Paris, or a stucco mansion in Beverly Hills, Los Angeles, was less strain—and you didn't have to commute to any Irshad. Many had left. Mohammad Ali-Jamalzadeh lived in Geneva. Bozorg Alavi lived in Germany. Sadegh Chubak lived in California. Ebrahim Golestan lived in England. Mahshid Amirshahi lived in Paris. Nader Naderpur lived in Paris. Even Dr Gholam Hossein Sa'edi had fled to and died in Paris. But they were the older and the wiser ones. Those who had stayed with the storm, or could not go, or would not want to go, were the hard-skins—even Khanom Simin Daneshvar who had the tenderest touch and loveliest, hushed voice. Some the Irshad Ministry had branded as socialist, and hushed. Ahmad Mahmood's novel, Hamsâyeha (The Neighbours) was banned and even his Zamin-e-sukhteh (The Burned Land) which came out after the War, was being withheld for re-checking, before reprint permission was granted. Mahmood Dowlatbady's 900-page reprint of his Majmu-e-Dastanha (Collected Works), which came out before the revolution, was to be pulped. So was Esmail Fassih's Sharab-e-Kham (Raw Wine). So also was the new edition of Ali Mohammad Afgani's Shohar Ahu Khanom (Ahu Khanum's Husband). Some who were downright hard-boiled Cherique-e-Fadaii (Self-Sacrifice Fighters), like Poet Sa'eed Soltanpur, were labelled as Munafeqin-e- (Seditious Hypocrites of) Khalq, and were arrested on their wedding day ceremonies, and shot. Many with other sensitivities had given up with the Irshad boys. Reza Barahani refused to submit his 1,200 page saga, The Secrets Of My Land for 'investigation', although it is already type-set and ready for print. Others still, had stopped altogether, gone home, slammed the door, pulled the curtain and stoned themselves into oblivion, waiting for the storm to pass, waiting for the sun to rise, waiting for the fanfare to sound—or the Comrade Chairman to enter.

The late Dr Gholam Hossein Sa'edi once told a personal joke in Paris that has ramifications. A peculiar thing had happened when he was fleeing Iran across the Turkish border, north of Bazargan. A smuggler, dressing and acting as an Azarbayejani shepherd, had given him a sheep-skin to wear and told him to crawl among a herd of a thousand sheep. The man had warned: 'When we are on Turkish soil, I'll yell: "Get up, and run!", and you just get up and run.' After some hours of crawling and baa-ing, when the man had yelled 'Get up and run,' there was a miracle: a thousand-and-one sheep were on their two feet—running.

VII

After lunch, the Contemporary Writer takes another taxi to the office of his friend and lawyer, Hamid, and their 3 o'clock appointment. A fine, moving and subtle poet, known for his manzoomehs before the Revolution, Hamid is now making a living as an attorney at law, working (and also teaching all morning) and running his office in the afternoons, until 8pm. The Collected Volume of his manzoomehs, revised and ready for reprinting, is now gathering dust on the shelves of Nashr-e-Now Publications—no paper. (For him, that is.)

The Contemporary Writer is out of breath when he reaches Hamid's office, having climbed four storeys up the narrow, zig-zagging, airless staircase. They exchange greetings and shake hands. 'Did you run all the way up?' 'I've been running, period.' 'Sit down and take a breath, runner.' 'Merci.' Good runners are the course runners. I'd just as soon sit and stretch my bloody legs. And then the course runners are the eternal runners.

The combination of his fine language, his soft, fine eyes, bushy, frosted moustache, and his soothing, throaty voice are a relief post in the course of the dog-day marathon. He is a poet of subtle imageries and symbols, admired everywhere. The Contemporary Writer likes his famous manzoomeh of love and social unrest where he says: 'If you sit still/If I sit still/Who, then, will rise?' So did thousands and thousands, before the Revolution. But this kind of 'ambiguous remark' is now, of course, taboo.

After the greeting and the small talk, Hamid tells him of his latest strategy for their impending hearing. He has been helping the Contemporary Writer, in a formal law suit, to salvage the rights to a book of his which has been exploited for years by a small publisher. The publishers, Raz the Vine (or Razl, the Vile, as Hamid calls him), has been filching reprint jobs of the Contemporary Writer's first novel, in the shady, slimy print-shops in south Tehran, for sixteen years, still claiming that the first edition has not completely sold out yet, and that he has the copyright reserved, permanently. When, as an unknown youth, the Contemporary Writer was looking for a publisher for his novel, the Vile owner had taken some money from him and the rights for any possible future reprints, in exchange for publishing the work, in an obscure but shrewdly phrased little 'agreement'. He did not remember now how many copies were printed, or where, although at least four or five different reprints had crept out, according to experts. The book is now selling at five times above its original price sixteen years ago. All the law suit is aimed at, however, is clarifying the printing history of the novel. He and Hamid have not been successful so far. The Vile owner ignored the first subpoena, and then dodged the elementary hearing by feigning kidney illness because of the beatings he had been given by SAVAK torturers in prison, seventeen years ago. Another hearing had gone by fruitlessly, with the judge giving the sides six months to settle the issue out of court. The Vile owner had disappeared again. He had been a fruit dealer from Gilan, and he knew the market tricks. He had switched to the book business during the oppression of SAVAK, when the underground publication of books on the communist movement and religious doctrine were the thing. But then, that was in the Shah's time. Public courts in Iran have not exactly been the soul of speed and meticulousness in the annals of human justice. (Once, the judge had interrupted the hearing four times to answer long personal phone calls, while picking his nose.) In this case, the court has re-scheduled a re-hearing for another date, on the 17th of Doomsday, 10 o'clock sharp.

The afternoon sky is growing gloomier and gloomier as their talk deteriorates into the 'that's-how-it-is' status. Hamid's face, behind the piles of files on his desk is sad and apathetic. He could be doing another manzoomeh right now, were it not for abominable files to catch the swindlers. But then, on the other hand, if you did write the manzoomeh, who would get it past the Irshad boys? And then on the other hand, if it weren't for the abominable files, who could pay for the rent and the water and the electricity and the cheese, etc, etc, on the 'free bazaar'? A sick society can swindle, just as a sick fruit dealer can swindle, just as a sick Sultan can swindle. There is pain in the poet's eyes, and 'though in the seawine' of those eyes, 'nothing is dead and nothing dies', the Contemporary Writer can see, in the agony within them, Ferdowsi running from Toos to Qaznein, to present the manuscript of his Shahnameh (Book of Kings), in 60,000 verses, to Sultan Mahmoud in the tenth century. The Sultan swindles Ferdowsi by offering a drachma, and not the promised dinar, for every verse. So the legend says.

VIII

Seeing his editor at the Nashr-e-Emrooz (Today Publications) House, is next on the Contemporary Writer's agenda. The place is actually a rented apartment on the second floor of a small house in one of the alleys near Zardosht Avenue. So, after checking at two more pharmacies for the hard-to-find medicines, he will take another taxi down the crossroad of Vali-e-Asr (the Imam of Time) Street, formerly Pahlavi Street, and Zardosht Avenue. He has five books with Nashr-e-Emrooz; two novels ready for reprinting (one a best-seller), no paper; two held up in Irshad, the fifth a best-selling translation, ready for reprint; again, no paper. All very clear-cut. The last royalty cheque was eight months ago and even that was less than a monthly payment for his part-time English teaching classes.

He likes Aqa Reza, though, the chief editor and production manager at the house. He's rather young, but then they don't come that gifted and masterful by the dozen. At thirty-seven, with a degree in Literature and Language, he has had only thirty years of experience in the book business. What else can you do when you are the only son of a man who thinks, eats, lives, prints, makes an Empire out of, is toppled by, and imprisoned on account of books?

The street door is ajar, and the Contemporary Writer slips in quietly, with no one in sight. He crosses the tiny, shabby yard and climbs up to the three-room establishment on top of a basement stockroom. He squeezes through the very narrow hallway, made even more cramped by piles of hundreds of dusty, defective books. Nobody knows what to do with them. You don't dare throw away anything that contains paper; even unsold and unwanted newspaper is sold to pulp-makers (at 25 toman per kilo) to make grocery bags, etc. (This is the blessed land where the gross annual consumption per capita of paper for books and stationery is all of nine grammes per day; 150 million kg for a population of a meagre 48 millions.)

The room belonging (supposedly) to the Managing Director, Ali Aqa, is deserted save for piles of unfinished proofs, untouched printshop packages and unedited manuscripts, all dusty and forlorn. Little Ali Aqa himself is perhaps out there in the swamps of Tehran bazaar, negotiating with the Paper Sharks Brothers, Inc. For the past year or so, in Nashr-e-Emrooz, as in most other independent publishing houses, little and large, paper has been the paralysing, cancerous tumour. During its five-year history, Nashr-e-Emrooz has published nearly ninety titles of the best standard quality covering social, scientific and political studies, in addition to languages, history, and fiction—of course from both Persian and world literature. In the first year of business, Nashr-e-Emrooz published ten books, and its profit was more than in its second year with twenty new titles, because this was (miracles, miracles) the year of the glorious appearance of Irshad, to exercise 'Guidance' over publications. A number of the already printed books were marked 'unfit' for distribution, which was, of course, a formal go-ahead for the book to be turned into pulp. In the third year, the House published forty titles, with several reprints marked 'unfit' and made even less profit than in the first year, due to the prevailing atmosphere and pressures. In the current year, with only five titles out, miracles continued to multiply. Irshad Brothers had decided to deliver the Printed Treasures of Iran, by taking charge of importing paper (no thanks to Saddam for repeatedly bombing the defenceless Pars Paper Factories, among other industrial plants) and distributing it (ie selling it at a profit) among printshops, publishers and authors. This was also done through the Islamic Economic Organisation—a non-profit body. So far, there were a 'number of consignments placed on order and shipped', but none had as yet been delivered. Who knows how long those funny Merchant Cargo Sea-Turtles were going to continue their strike against poor Lloyds of London?

The Contemporary Writer enters his editor-publisher's room to find Aqa Reza busy at a large table which is slightly bigger than a dining table for six. (Some of the furniture came with the house when it was rented.)

On the table, not in the tidiest of arrangements, there is just about everything connected with books, including material unavailable in the Ketabkhaneh Melli (National Library). One wall is covered with cover samples of all Nashr-e-Emrooz publications from its very inception, grinding to a halt with its last publications some time ago, signifying the death of enthusiasm. The wall does not exactly depict disaster; only seized progress.

Aqa Reza rises to greet him, his lean, fragile body bending slightly, his delicate, graceful mannerisms lighting up the shabby, chaotic room. He never looks tired, he does not look tired today, only beaten. At twenty-nine, in the last year that he was running the production department of Amir Kabir, that house put out 480 new titles with 8 million copies in print.

They sit wearily down, to discuss things—knowing all too well the answer to almost every question: 'Nothing yet.' The Contemporary Writer confirms that nothing definite has come from the Irshad boys. The Contemporary Editor-Publisher assures him that all is dead quiet on the paper front. Today, paper in the 'free bazaar' is over ninety times its official value—if you can find it. None whatsoever is allocated to independent publishers or authors. Down-payments have been taken as a deposit, but so far nothing delivered (Damn Sea-Turtles again). There was some good news, though. The Government was seriously considering selling its scrap paper (from its printshops) to honourable independent publishers and authors at thirty toman a kilo, only a fraction higher than the official market value of the waste paper which pulp-makers buy for grocery-bags.

As the afternoon turns to dusk, their futile meeting falls into long moments of silence . . . a painful experience for both of them, especially for Aqa Reza who is younger, and has a more energetic and productive mind. He is not a dreamer, but a doer, an intuitive, constructive, edificatory, establisher. So he is shrivelling more, if not as consciously. The Contemporary Writer can visualise his late last night's dream. He had been smoking his last TIR (Bullet) cigarette when the door-bell rang. There was a beat-up little Mazda pick-up delivery truck by a gate, bringing, allelujah, their ration of seventy-three reams of straw papyrus from Biafra. From down the alley, too, came a little beggar girl of about ten, in loose hejab, holding her baby to her stomach, chanting 'Marg bar Amrika. Marg bar Amrika . . .' (Death to America). It was the National Night of Very Funny Things.

IX

Coming out of the Nashr-e-Emrooz House, with the twilight falling, the Contemporary Writer stops at the corner of the placid Zardosht Avenue and sooty, muggy Vali-e-Asr Street, to catch his breath, and a taxi. He now has to go to the National Iranian Oil Company Training Centre, where he has been teaching English classes for the Company's on-the-job trainees. It isn't exactly his idea of the perfect end to so creative a day. At this hour, it's back-breaking. But they pay. Standing under the Zardosht Avenue sign, he watches the dough-maker of the nearby bakery quitting at the end of a long day's work, and getting on his bike to go home. Lucky. The Contemporary Writer will be going home too, but not before two English commercial correspondence classes have been sat through. At the Oil Company's Training Centre, the electricity will probably be cut off during his classes on the Seventh Floor (the emergency generator has no gasoline) and he will have to correct individual papers in the dim light of the leaky, portable cellular gas burner. He will have to climb down the dark staircase, hanging on to the railing, occasionally striking a match, if he can find one. By the time he'll be going Home, Sweet Home, after buying rice, butter, Bizacodine, and Acetaminophens, it will be around eight. After a quiet supper, he hopes, in the candle-light, he will be writing some letters and jotting down notes on things as they are. It will all be really simple.

EPILOGUE

If he could have made this day into a Persianic scroll, it would have had the whole story. At 4.30am, a few centuries before the Achaemenian era, Zoroaster would be taking his brisk walk from Khorasmia into the land of Vishtaspa only to find no rest there because he is born to be the prophet of Ahura in the Ancient Persia. He would be in that hall to tell the Parsees to think and to distinguish between the Asha (Truth) and the Druq (Lies), to read the Gathas, and love, because Love is Light, and to cease hostile action and live in peace and pastoral calm, but no one will be listening to him because the men would be in the streets baseejing, yelling and chanting in Arabic and chest-beating, and the women would be in the meat queue in the cold drizzle of Tehran, with their Mobilisation of the Meek Baseej Booklets in their hands, worried to death because there is a Red Alert on, with Iraqi Tupolovs above. Zoroaster would not be asking himself why in all Duzakh does he have to do this, because he knows he is the Prophet of the Wise Lord Ahura Mazda.

Ferdowsi, a Toos poet, would be in the garden, later, to jot down the Shahnameh in a thirty-five year blink of an eye, to be rebuked by the Sultan, and Sa'adi would soon be coming back from his wanderings in Baghdad, via Cairo and Hejaz to Shiraz to write the Boustan and Golestan, and Mir-Zadeh Eshqi would be commuting back and forth between Istanbul and Tehran to write revolutionary and nationalistic poems and plays and finally to be assassinated by the secret police, and Sadeq Hedayat would be translating Pahlavi scripts on location in Bombay and Tehran before he turns the gas on in his Paris rooms to stop his impulsive, creative ache, because this is the way things are in the Bejewelled Land.

On line, in lower and more basic cosmic altitudes, the Contemporary Iranian Writer in the Islamic Republic will get up again tomorrow in the wee small hours of the morning to jog in the Avenue of the Oppressed Martyr, Ayatollah Dr Beheshti. He will sharpen all six of his pencils to have his novel slip past the Brothers in the Irshad room. Salaam-o-Alaikum, Aqaye Foroughi. Next week, inshallah. He will make a last depressing trip to the College of Persian Literature and Foreign Languages to hand in the grades. With the Blessed Powers of Allah, Aqaye Dr Birjandian, if you want tigers, you must throw meat. If you throw peanuts, you'll get monkeys. He will lunch with sad socialist poet, Fereydoon, whose genius daughter should be proud she's getting schizophrenia and not a BA-mania from the University Jihad. Who will jot down her story? Nasser Khan will be having his last stekan before closing the fifty-eight-year bookshop. Fine poet Hamid, turned thief-catcher, will desperately try to rescue a book on which he has been swindled for sixteen years. There will be an exasperating session with a young genius of a born publisher whose talents and struggles are going down the drain for lack of paper and Irshad disapproval of him, because his father was once a great publisher. Who will tell their story? He will teach commercial English classes in the late hours of the evening because there is no such phenomenon as a Professional Writer in the Bejewelled Land with illiteracy figures as high as 43 per cent in the late Twentieth Century AD.

His eye falls upon the shop-sign of a haberdashery named 'Zardosht'. The long sign has a small likeness of Zoroaster in one corner. Ashu Zardosht himself, the Lord and the Soul of Persian Mythology: the stone face, the Far-va-har lower body, the works. He is not looking at the Contemporary Writer, though, only vaguely in his direction. It could be the gloomy twilight, or the malignant traffic, or the throttling gasoil fumes, or the blast of azan from the nearby mosque, or it could be the late kick from Fereydoon's Benzedrine-cocaine balls, or a crazy amalgamation of them all. The Contemporary Writer's lips are trembling. He could swear now that it is the real Him and he could swear he saw Him this morning in the Irshad corridors. The face, too, seems to be turning this way a little, as if sick of the status of things.

'Oh, God. Why do I have to go through this now?' Then it is the responding voice of Zoroaster all right: 'Because you are the Contemporary Writer, stupid. That's why.'

Notes

¹ A reference to the Iranian National Anthem of the mid-Pahlavi era: 'Oh, Iran, oh the Bejewelled Land/Thy Soil (is) the Fountainhead of Arts. Away from you the Contemplation of Evil/Stay Lasting and be Eternal . . .' The song expresses thoughts and language of the Zoroastrian Faith.

² Thomas Wolfe (1900-1938), American novelist.

³ Hezbollah: Party of God; Hezbollahi: one who belongs to this clan.

⁴ abji: colloquial word for 'sister'.

⁵ hejleh: a booth made up with crystals and lights in commemoration of a Martyr, with his picture framed inside.

⁶ Mahdi: The last Shi'ite Imam, believed to have disappeared in the 3rd century, Hijri.

⁷ SAVAK: Secret State Police during the last twenty-five years of Shah Mohamad Reza Pahlavi's reign.

Women in South Asian politics*

Two contradictory images come to mind whenever one thinks of women in politics in South Asia. One image is that of powerful women leaders (Indira Gandhi, Sirimavo Bandaranaike, Benazir Bhutto, Hasina Wazed, Khaleda Zia), swathed in beautiful traditional dresses, surrounded by party leaders who are mostly male, addressing huge public rallies, enthusiastically attended—again, mainly by men. Another image is that of female masses, poor, illiterate, often veiled, huddled in groups in separate ‘women only’ polling booths or ration lines, or in labour lines seeking casual jobs.

To an outsider, the two images are seen as indicative of the contradictions of South Asian society; some Western observers even argue that sharp class or caste differences make it easier for South Asian women of a certain class and family background to achieve positions of political leadership. Whether or not it is easier for women in South Asia to attain the highest political offices is debatable; nonetheless, the frequent emergence of powerful women leaders, both in government and in opposition, in all the major South Asian countries, gives rise to a number of questions: how and why have these women succeeded in assuming political leadership, particularly in societies still dominated by the values of gender segregation and purdah? Is family connection the crucial factor? How representative are these women? What impact does their emergence have on women’s participation in mainstream politics? Finally, does so-called mainstream politics hold any future for women or does an alternative exist?

While women’s participation in politics may be analysed in many ways, this article will concentrate on three major issues: women in leadership, women in mainstream politics, and the new women’s movement as an alternative to the mainstream. Data and examples are drawn primarily from the four South Asian countries where women have achieved leadership positions in the last few decades: India, Bangladesh, Pakistan and Sri Lanka.

* The opinions expressed in this article are those of the author, and do not represent the views of any organisation.

Data on women's participation in politics is sparse. Most political studies, particularly those on voting behaviour, legislative bodies, and political institutions, do not disaggregate data by gender. No systematic study or data set exists that makes it possible to evaluate the development of women's participation in politics over time in any single South Asian country. While the UN Decade for Women (1975-85) has generated some studies and data on women's economic contributions, comparable data on women's political contributions is lacking. This article is, therefore, based on the limited information available in studies and reports.¹ It raises many more questions than can be answered, in part in the hope of provoking analysis and research on a number of issues that have not yet been adequately addressed; in part because the lack of information precludes giving definitive answers. Some of the leaders—Benazir Bhutto, Hasina Wazed and Khaleda Zia—have appeared only in the last few years on the main political stage; it would be premature to compare them with leaders such as Indira Gandhi or Sirimavo Bandaranaike who held the reins of governmental power for decades. The new women's movement is also in the process of evolution. This article, therefore, notes some trends and identifies some possibilities for the future, without attempting to draw firm conclusions. It is hoped that some of the hypotheses advanced in this article may lead to debate and lay foundations for further research on the topic of women's participation in politics. Nonetheless, analysis and understanding of women's role in the polity must precede a realistic assessment of the potential for future action to improve women's status in society.

Women in leadership

In South Asia there are two types of women leaders: those who are recognised as women's leaders (eg leaders of women's organisations or heads of the women's sections of mass political organisations) and those who are recognised as populist leaders (eg heads of government or of mass political organisations). This section is devoted to the latter category, the few women who have achieved the highest leadership roles, either in government (Mrs Gandhi, Mrs Bandaranaike) or in political opposition (Miss Bhutto, Mrs Wazed, Mrs Zia).

¹ Surveys of women's political status are to be found in the Government of India report, Towards Equality, Committee on the Status of Women in India, 1975; Status of Women in Sri Lanka, University of Colombo, 1979; Status of Women in Bangladesh, Women for Women, 1979; 'Women's participation in politics', Centre for Women and Development Studies, India, mimeo, 1985; Ruth L. Sivard, Women: A World Survey, 1985; UN, Selected indicators on the situation of women, 1985. Other specific studies include: Robert N. Kearney, 'Women in politics in Sri Lanka', Asian Survey 21(7) July 1981; Rounaq Jahan, 'Purdah and participation: women in the politics of Bangladesh', in H. Papanek and G. Minault (eds) Separate Worlds, Delhi: Chanakya Publications, 1982; Vina Mazumdar, 'Women's participation in political life in India', paper presented at the meeting of Experts on the Participation of Women in Political Life and the Means for Increasing the Participation, mimeo, Lisbon 1983; Gail Omvedt, Women in Popular Movements: India and Thailand during the Decade of Women, UNRISD, 1986; ISIS, Women's struggle and strategies: Third World Perspective, 1986; On the Women's Movement, special issue Lokayan Bulletin, India, 1987.

These women are remarkable not only for their rare achievement in gaining the highest political office, but more importantly for their tenacity in remaining in power. Other regions of the world, notably the Scandinavian countries, have also witnessed the recent emergence of a large number of women political leaders, but only in South Asia have individual women succeeded in dominating national politics for decades. Indira Gandhi governed India for nearly twenty years. With the exception of two years as leader of the opposition, she was Prime Minister of the country from 1966 to 1984. Similarly in Sri Lanka, Sirimavo Bandaranaike was Prime Minister from 1960 to 1965, and from 1970 to 1977, while remaining leader of the opposition from 1965 to 1970. The emerging leaders of the 1980s—Benazir Bhutto, Hasina Wazed, and Khaleda Zia—have headed the political opposition in Pakistan and Bangladesh for more than five years.

It is difficult to compare these five women leaders. The political careers of three of them—Miss Bhutto, Mrs Wazed and Mrs Zia—are only beginning and it is too early to make an assessment. There are both similarities and differences in their backgrounds. While Indira Gandhi, Sirimavo Bandaranaike and Benazir Bhutto were born into rich, aristocratic families and were educated in the West, the two leaders of Bangladesh, Hasina Wazed and Khaleda Zia, have more middle-class, less Westernised family backgrounds. However, there is a common factor: they were all politicised within their family environment, and gained entry into leadership through family connections. They all fall into the category of leaders whose assumption of power was 'mediated' by a male relative, as opposed to those whose careers were shaped from the beginning by their own choices, attributes and efforts, grounded in a strong sense of their own political efficacy.²

The fact that all the women leaders of South Asia were related to powerful heads of government, either as daughters (Mrs Gandhi, Miss ² For an elaboration of these two categories of 'mediated' vs 'political efficacy' see Rita Mae Kelly and Mary Boutilier, The Making of Political Women: A Study of Socialisation and Role Conflict. Chicago: Nelson Hall, 1978.

Bhutto, Mrs Wazed) or as wives (Mrs Bandaranaike, Mrs Zia), naturally raises two related questions: first, why were they chosen to inherit the political mantle of their fathers and husbands? Second, why is it difficult for women to gain entry into political leadership without the support of family connections?

In considering the choice of these women to succeed their male relatives, it is worth remembering that they were initially chosen by male party leaders to fill the vacuum created when a charismatic leader was suddenly removed before having had time to groom a well-defined political successor. In all cases, the inability of the party bosses to reconcile their own differences and select a leader from amongst their number, made it politically expedient for a member of the dead leader's family to be persuaded to take up the political inheritance. It is also interesting to note that these women were chosen because of their relative political inexperience. Before succeeding their husbands, Mrs Bandaranaike and Mrs Zia had held no political positions within the party. Miss Bhutto and Mrs Wazed had only limited experience in student politics. Though Mrs Gandhi was the President of the Congress Party for one term, she spent more time before 1964 as her father's political hostess than as a participant in party politics. However, the absence of a well-known political past became an advantage for these women. Party bosses thought that on the one hand they would be easier to control, and that on the other hand they would have no adverse political record to defend. As wives and daughters of fallen leaders they would, moreover, be able to draw the people's sympathy and support.

But why choose a woman and not a man in the family? In the cases of Indira Gandhi and Hasina Wazed, of course, there was no choice; but why Benazir Bhutto and not her brothers? Why Khaleda Zia or Sirimavo Bandaranaike and not male relatives of the assassinated leaders? One possible explanation could be that these women proved more willing than other male relatives to take the risks of assuming the political mantle. Leading political opposition against military regimes, as in Pakistan and Bangladesh, is a dangerous proposition.

But why did the masses in these countries accept these leaders? How did these women become the guardians of the dead leaders' political legacies? Perhaps to the ordinary citizens, they appeared credible because their loyalties to the memories of the dead leaders were unquestionable. They were able to project themselves as being personally honest, above petty squabbles in the party, and uncompromising in the pursuit of certain fundamental objectives. As political newcomers, they brought a fresh clean image which was in sharp contrast to other established leaders whose political images were often tainted with broken promises and corruption. In an environment of amoral politics, these women seemed to be standing for certain principles; people could trust them personally and believed that they would not willingly or easily sell out the goals they propounded. (This element of personal trust and popularity can be found in the cases of other women leaders, most notably, President Corazon Aquino of the Philippines.) The point that needs to be underscored, when one talks about women leaders, is not so much how they were chosen, but how they succeeded in establishing themselves as people's leaders. The changes they underwent from the status of relative political novices to mature politicians were truly remarkable, and form a process which has not yet been fully analysed.

The question of the difficulty experienced by women in gaining access to leadership without the support of family connections also needs further exploration. The obstacles women generally face in participating and advancing to higher political and decisionmaking levels have been identified.³ To participate, and more importantly to succeed in politics one needs money, time, skill, experience, patronage, contacts and information. Politics, particularly electoral politics, is expensive. It involves exposure to a wide network of information. The patronage of senior leaders is often crucial in pushing young aspirants into leadership roles, particularly within organisations. However, women are at a disadvantage with regard to all the above-mentioned factors promoting success in politics, and it is only through their family connections that women can sometimes counteract these obstacles.

Women generally lack the money to run for public offices. It is true that many women (like men) belong to wealthy families, but the wealth is usually that of the family, rather than individual wealth. Few women have control over family wealth, and few are permitted to use family wealth for political purposes. Women may be isolated at home, cut off from networks of information, and lacking in the confidence to seek elective or appointive positions. Even women who work outside the home, both middle-class and poor, often remain isolated from workplace organisations such as trade unions, which are dominated by their male colleagues. When women do join such organisations, more frequently than not they are kept out of the informal network of power and decisionmaking.

³ See ILO, 'Obstacles to poor women's participation through organisation', draft ILO paper, mimeo, 1982.

The dichotomy between the domestic and public spheres is present in most cultures, and assigning women the domestic sphere has limited women's participation in the public sphere of politics.⁴ However, in South Asia, purdah, which is an extreme manifestation of the domestic/public dichotomy, creates particular problems for women. Though purdah in its strictest form is practised more amongst Muslims than Hindus, and more by the middle class than the working class, the norms of purdah—gender separation and limiting women's physical mobility—are widely prevalent amongst all communities and classes in South Asia, making it difficult for women to seek two critical routes to leadership.

For example, one route—entering into a protégé/patron relationship with a successful politician—is more difficult for a woman than a man. While a young man can easily establish a protégé/patron relationship with a senior leader and be pushed up the organisational hierarchy, for a young woman the choice is much more complicated; there are not many senior women leaders who can be influential patrons; and entering into a protégé/patron relationship with a senior male leader can be misconstrued as a sexual relationship which may hinder rather than promote a woman's upward mobility, and jeopardise her support. There is, therefore, more of a compulsion on women to seek patrons from within the family circle. While Nehru, Mujib, and Bhutto could seek patrons (Gandhi, Suhrawardy and Ayub) from outside the family, for Indira Gandhi, Hasina Wazed and Benazir Bhutto the choices were limited to fathers and close political associates of fathers. Similarly, women tended to depend more on kinship networks for advice and support. It is debatable whether Nehru, Bandaranaike, Mujib, Bhutto and Zia ever seriously considered Indira, Sirimavo, Hasina, Benazir and Khaleda as their respective political successors, or gave any recognition to these women as their political advisers and confidantes. They recruited close associates from a wider circle and background. In contrast, Indira Gandhi projected her sons and Sirimavo Bandaranaike, her nephew, as close political advisers and successors.

The second route to leadership—that of courting imprisonment and accumulating political 'sacrifices'—is also more difficult for a woman. A young male politician can achieve charisma and leadership by facing police brutalities and undergoing imprisonment for a political cause; for a young woman, however, courting arrest and facing police brutalities is more problematic. If a woman is imprisoned and beaten up by the police she could count these as political 'sacrifices' to promote her political career; but if a woman political activist is raped in the process of courting imprisonment she cannot use this fact as an asset. If a woman is raped and killed by the police she might achieve martyrdom and a political movement might be launched in her memory, but for a woman who is raped and living it is nearly impossible to attain the halo of martyrdom. Again, for a woman, a well-known family background works as a relative safeguard against sexual harassment during imprisonment. It is worth remembering that the vast majority of women political activists who achieved national fame, from Sarojini Naidu, Kamala Devi Chattopadhyay, Aruna Asaf Ali to Moshina Kidwai, came from rich, established families. It is also worth noting that many of the well-publicised police and landlord rape cases in India involve women from working-class backgrounds.⁵

⁴ Michelle Z Rosaldo, 'Women, culture and society: a theoretical overview', in Michelle Z Rosaldo and Louise Lamphere (eds), Women, Culture and Society, Stanford: Stanford University Press, 1974.

The family is, of course, important in politics all over the world, both for men and women. Political dynasties are not uncommon in the West. In other parts of the world, too, women have succeeded their dead husbands, eg Corazon Aquino in the Philippines and Eva Peron in Argentina. But South Asia stands out because of the greater number of women in top political positions, all of whom gained entry into politics through their families. The absence of a single instance where a woman has gained the highest political office on her merits alone naturally underscores this point.

A frequent explanation is that weak institutionalisation facilitates the frequent rise of political dynasties in South Asia. Though all four South Asian countries discussed in this article inherited modern institutions such as political parties, bureaucracies and armed forces from their colonial masters, all the charismatic leaders (with the notable exception of Jawaharlal Nehru) operated their systems more as forms of personal rule bypassing institutional relationships. This trend towards 'privatisation' of government weakened the institutional process of political succession and facilitated the inheritance of leadership by members of the former leaders' families.⁶

⁵ For detailed discussion and analysis of these rape cases, see Omvedt, Women in Popular Movements . . . op. cit. and Lokayan Bulletin, op. cit.

In addition to the question of family connections, two other issues have repeatedly been raised in relation to these women: their leadership style and their attitude towards the women's cause in their countries.

The women proved themselves to be tough and uncompromising in their pursuit of power. Though initially selected by party elders, they soon emerged as leaders in their own right, outmanoeuvring the old party leadership and recruiting their own group of supporters. Mrs Gandhi, Miss Bhutto and Mrs Wazed all replaced their fathers' friends and advisers and created their own small circle of confidantes. They also proved to be politically shrewd, often without any well-defined ideological stance. Unlike the martyred leaders who propagated a certain ideology, they were more concerned about retrieving or maintaining political power. The absence of ideological goals gave them flexibility and a certain room to manoeuvre, but on the other hand it also left them (with the exception of Mrs Gandhi and Mrs Bandaranaike) without a well-defined political platform. While Mujib, Bhutto and Zia anticipated certain emerging political issues and successfully built a majority coalition around them, Hasina Wazed, Benazir Bhutto, and Khaleda Zia have not yet demonstrated this capacity to create a new political platform to match the people's mood and their needs, and sustain a popular movement. With her Gharibi Hatao (Eliminate Poverty) programme, Mrs Gandhi did succeed in creating a platform and a majority coalition that lasted for a number of years, but the other women leaders have not yet been able to provide a credible political programme of social transformation.

Why did these leaders choose to ignore women's liberation as a major plank of their political programme? Why has it been far easier for a Rajiv Gandhi or a Ziaur Rahman to talk about women's subordination than for Indira Gandhi or Khaleda Zia? It is difficult to judge as to why these women did not single out women's issues or identify themselves with the women's movement. Did they deliberately try to set themselves apart from others who were perceived as women's leaders addressing only women's issues (and hence not on a par with top leadership)? Or did they find it politically expedient not to raise an issue that would challenge deep-seated religious, cultural values which could backfire and undermine even their own political status? It is particularly intriguing that when feminist groups in Pakistan and Bangladesh are now actively protesting against the effects of the backlash or resurgent Islamic fundamentalism on women's status, Benazir Bhutto, Hasina Wazed and Khaleda Zia are silent about it. It is also interesting to note that the women leaders in Bangladesh and Pakistan take precautions in their public appearance so as not to offend the religious/cultural sentiments of the majority Muslim masses. For example, while addressing public meetings, they invariably cover their head, though in private life they would not necessarily follow this custom of veiling. In the last forty years urban educated women in Pakistan and Bangladesh have progressively been able to shed burquah and veiling of the head in educational institutions and workplaces, but women political leaders from the 1950s to the 1980s have not dared to appear unveiled in mass public rallies.

⁶ For an elaboration of this point see Rounaq Jahan, 'Political dimensions of independence: Asian leaders and the liberal democratic model of government and politics', in Rounaq Jahan, Bangladesh Politics: Problems and Issues, Dacca: University Press Ltd, 1980.

Not only have women leaders failed to champion feminist issues or challenge the existing religious cultural norms about the place of women in society, but they have also found it difficult to promote younger women actively into leadership. For example, in Sri Lanka, during her two terms as Prime Minister (1960-65 and 1970-77), Mrs Bandaranaike appointed only one woman (Siva Obeyesekere) as Minister of Health in 1976. But to be fair to Mrs Bandaranaike, it must also be pointed out that during 1947-56, 1959-60, and 1965-70, no woman served in the Sri Lankan Cabinet.⁷

In some situations more than one woman in leadership positions became one woman too many. A case in point is the recent election of the Party Presidium of the Awami League in Bangladesh, where the fact that both the President and the General Secretary of the party were women became an issue. That for so many decades only men held the positions of party President and General Secretary was apparently a non-issue. However, it is worth noting that in spite of the surrounding debate, both incumbent women succeeded in retaining their positions; in addition, women were elected as Secretaries of Agriculture and Labour, apart from the usual position of Secretary of Women's Affairs.

To summarise the major arguments of this section: since the 1960s. South Asia has witnessed an unusually large number of women leading either government or political opposition. All of them, however, achieved entry into politics through their family connections. It was this factor that enabled them to overcome the obstacles women generally face in politics all over the world (eg lack of money, time, skill, experience, patronage, contacts, and information) and more particularly in South Asia (eg purdah constraints on women's mobility and gender segregation). Yet the point that needs to be emphasised is that after achieving leadership, these women emerged in their own right, and demonstrated considerable skill and resources in staying in power. They were tough and quick in decisionmaking and handled power with ease. They did not consciously make women's liberation an issue, nor did they in any way project themselves as facing any particular obstacle, or having a special perspective on issues, because of their gender. However, in spite of their success in breaking down gender-stereotyping and certain barriers against women in leadership, these women had only a marginal impact on the political roles and opportunities of women in general in their countries.

⁷ For details, see Kearney, 'Women in politics . . .'

Women in mainstream politics

This section will look at women's participation in what is often called 'mainstream' politics. Here, 'mainstream' will refer to the various forms of political participation significant in the context of South Asia, ranging from voting in elections to attendance at public meetings and rallies, membership of elective bodies and political and mass organisations, and participation in political struggles and movements. Since macro-level data is often not disaggregated by gender, this section will depend on a few micro-studies.

As voters, women's rate of participation is high, almost equalling that of men. In Sri Lanka it reaches nearly 80 per cent.⁸ In India and Bangladesh the voting rate is lower than in Sri Lanka (approximately 50 per cent) but compares favourably with that in many Western democracies. The differences between male and female rates of voting has steadily declined over the years.⁹ However, the mere act of voting cannot be regarded as a measure of political consciousness or participation. In many instances poor rural and urban women are mobilised to vote by the political parties. In such situations women vote in high numbers but do not participate in any other political activity. Studies of electoral participation indicate that women tend to be less informed and less interested in campaign issues, feeling politically less efficacious, and participating less in public rallies, meetings, and organisations.

⁸ ibid.

⁹ Centre for Women and Development Studies, India, 'Women's participation . . .'

For example, survey data from Bangladesh shows that rates of women's participation in different types of activities (eg attendance of public rallies, membership of social and political organisations, campaign work for the election of candidates, donation of funds to parties) are significantly lower than those of men.¹⁰ Only a minuscule number of women are members of organisations: 35 per cent of men and only 3 per cent of women from the sample were members of social organisations, and 10 per cent of men and 2 per cent of women were members of political organisations. Similarly, campaign rallies drew 39 per cent of men and only 4 per cent of women, and 13 per cent of men and 3 per cent of women were active political workers in the election campaign. A study on Sri Lanka finds similar differences in the rates of male-female participation.¹¹

Data from Bangladesh also indicates that not only are the rates of women's participation lower, but more significantly, the patterns of women's participation are different from those of men.¹² The standard socio-economic model that explains differences in participatory behaviour in the Western democracies is also applicable in the case of men in Bangladesh—higher socio-economic status does lead to greater political interest and knowledge which in turn leads to a greater sense of political efficacy and higher political participation.¹³ But the socio-economic model is only partially applicable for women: with higher socio-economic status, women's political interest and knowledge increases and they do feel a greater sense of political efficacy, but unlike men these factors do not lead women to greater participation in public rallies or membership of social and political organisations. Cultural factors such as the purdah norms limiting women's physical mobility obviously counter the socio-economic model, and set a different pattern for women's participation.

Available data on women's participation in elective bodies also suggests only marginal changes over the last few decades. In the two countries which held regular, free elections—India and Sri Lanka—women always constituted less than 10 per cent of members in the

¹⁰ Jahan, 'Purdah and participation . . .'

¹¹ Kearny, 'Women in politics . . .'

¹² Jahan, 'Purdah and participation . . .'

¹³ For an elaboration of the socio-economic model explaining participatory behaviour, see Sidney Verba and Norman H Nie, Participation in America: Political Democracy and Social Equality. New York: Harper and Row, 1972.

parliament. For example, during 1980–84 in India there were 514 male and 28 female members of parliament. The corresponding figures for Sri Lanka are 147 male and 7 female.¹⁴ Though small, this figure is comparable to the world average. A global survey in 1984 showed that women held 10 per cent of seats in national legislatures and 7 per cent in executive cabinets.¹⁵ The survey also indicated that the exception is the Nordic area. Four countries—Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden—have 25–30 per cent women in their national legislatures and 18–25 per cent in their cabinets. Major communist countries have good records on the number of women in their assemblies but give them relatively little or no representation in the executive branch.

In Pakistan and Bangladesh, countries with a history of irregular elections and political movements, women have a separate quota in parliament which ensures at least some female presence. However, the mechanism of their selection also raises several critical questions about the women parliamentarians' constituency and representativeness: what is the constituency of these women parliamentarians—the members of parliament (mostly men) who 'select' them or the female masses in whose name they are allotted their special seats? Whose political views do they represent—those of the party or regime in power or those of the divergent women's groups and organisations in the country? What kinds of women are selected by male politicians to be their colleagues in parliament? Do they select women who share similar political experiences of organisational and grassroots politics, or do they prefer educated middle-class women who excel more in volunteer social work than in organisational activities in the party?

Comparative data on male/female parliamentarians is limited; but at least one study in Bangladesh indicates significant differences in the class background and political socialisation of male and female parliamentarians.¹⁶ When compared with their male counterparts, female parliamentarians were younger in age and better educated; their socialisation process and political background were also different. The majority of male parliamentarians were born in villages in illiterate or near-illiterate peasant families, and went to school in rural areas, coming to the city only when they were in college. They settled down in middle-sized towns either as lawyers or businessmen but maintained close contact with their village land, kinship network, and local party factions. They were recruited into national politics through their involvement in student politics or small town bar association politics. In contrast, the majority of women politicians were born into urban, middle-class families whose fathers were graduates and in salaried employment. They went to urban schools and colleges, married, and settled down in cities. They were generally a generation removed from their rural base and had little contact with their constituency. They were recruited into politics through their involvement in social work and women's organisations. Data from Sri Lanka also indicates that as compared to men, women parliamentarians come from more affluent, educated and urban family backgrounds.¹⁷ They have little experience in grassroots politics.

¹⁴ UN, Selected Indicators on the Situation of Women, 1985.

¹⁵ Ruth M Sivard, Women: A World Survey.

¹⁶ Rounaq Jahan, 'Members of Parliament in Bangladesh', Legislative Studies Quarterly 1(3) 1976.

Data from Sri Lanka as well as from other countries of the region also suggests 'that prospects for service in local government bodies, particularly in rural areas, are limited for women almost to the point of non-existence'.¹⁸ Few women serve in village or town councils or are elected as presiding officers of these bodies. In Bangladesh, to ensure women's presence, two women are nominated to these bodies, but those nominated are generally politically uninformed and inactive. In Council meetings their role is often limited to making paan (betel leaf) for their male colleagues! In Sri Lanka, women constitute only 1-2 per cent of members in local bodies. For example, only one woman served in the chair of the village council in 1966 (total number of chairmen 208) and in 1970 (total number of chairmen 203). Not a single woman was vice-chairman. In urban councils women constituted 2 per cent of members in 1966 and 1970. Only in municipal councils did women's membership increase from 1 per cent of members in 1966 to 3 per cent in 1970.¹⁹

The paucity of women in local government bodies, particularly in rural areas, implies significant differences between women and men in the path of recruitment to national political office. Chairmanships of village and town councils are common springboards for parliamentary candidacy by male politicians. In the parliamentary election of 1973 in Bangladesh, 60 per cent of elected men (but not one woman) had previous experience of membership in such councils.²⁰ In Sri Lanka 40 per cent of men elected to parliament in 1965, 1970 and 1977 had been

¹⁷ Kearney, 'Women in politics . . .'

¹⁸ ibid., p 743.

¹⁹ ibid.

²⁰ Jahan, 'Members of Parliament . . .'

members of a local body, whereas only one woman parliamentarian had ever served on a local council.²¹

The differences in the backgrounds of male and female political leaders indicate that while it is possible for a man born and brought up in a village, and with little education, to move up to the stature of a national leader through his involvement in local bodies and party organisation, it is nearly impossible for a woman with a similar background to achieve this in one generation. It is much more difficult for a woman with a working-class background to achieve the status of a national leader. In a society where a man is valued for what he achieves and a woman for what she is born with, it is an uphill task for a woman to counter-balance the disadvantages of her class background with her work record.

In national legislative bodies, women members generally concern themselves with the so-called 'women's issues', such as education, health, child care, population, women's welfare, food and prices. They participate less vigorously in debates related to such issues as defence, foreign policy and macro-economic policy. Their participation in public affairs is thus perceived as an extension of women's domestic roles.

If women's presence in elective bodies is insignificant, what of other institutions: political parties, trade unions, and mass organisations that dominate mainstream politics? Again, available information indicates that women participate more as ordinary members than at the centre of power or at the highest decisionmaking levels. For example, the report of the National Committee of the Status of Women in India shows that only one-seventh of the members of the Congress Party's Working Committee were women; the Communist Party of India (CPI) had only four women out of a total membership of 110 in the National Council, though it claimed that 5 per cent of its ordinary members were women. The CPI(M) had only one woman out of thirty-one members in the Central Committee.²²

In the South Asian countries political parties were formed to spearhead popular mobilisation against colonial rule or against particular regimes. In such situations, the mobilisation of women was an integral and necessary strategy and women's sections of political parties were formed specifically to mobilise women. However, once such parties came to governmental power, women's mass movements were often allotted only non-political functions or supportive roles. Very few women achieved positions of leadership in the overall party or trade union structure.

²¹ Kearney, 'Women in politics' . . .

²² ICSSR, Status of Women in India: A Synopsis of the Report of the National Committee on the Status of Women, 1975.

In addition to the obstacles discussed earlier, women face a particular disadvantage in organisational politics. Building support in South Asia often requires not only mobilisation but also muscle-power; goondas (armed henchmen) are a necessary element of organisation politics. Again, it is much more difficult for women to keep retinues of goondas to help in factional fights with their rivals.

Women are also notably absent from the civil bureaucracy and the armed forces, the two key decisionmaking institutions in South Asia. In India, despite recent increases in women's numbers, the vast majority of senior administrators are men. In Pakistan during 1947-71, women were allowed to serve only in the audits and accounts and taxation services. They were barred from the civil, police and foreign services, which fact again implies the virtual absence of women from the ranks of senior officials in both Pakistan and Bangladesh. In the armed forces women are even scarcer, yet in Bangladesh and Pakistan they are the main political activists. Women are also not represented in the major power groups, amongst rich farmers, industrialists and businessmen.

Their absence from leadership roles in political organisations and major power groups, however, does not mean that women do not participate in politics. Indeed, women do participate and in great numbers but their pattern of participation is different from that of men, and has generally been intermittent. They participate in great numbers and often assume leadership during crisis periods (Bangladesh and Pakistan) but the rate and level of their participation often falls during normal times. For example, in Pakistan during the 1964 election campaign against Ayub Khan, political opposition parties selected a woman (Miss Jinnah, sister of Pakistan's father of the nation, Mohammed Ali Jinnah) as the opposition's candidate for the presidency, who provided courageous leadership at a critical period. In 1966, when all the leaders of the Awami League party were arrested after the launching of the party's radical autonomy demand, or the 'Six Points Movement', Mrs Amena Begum led and held the party together at a crisis period. In more recent times in Pakistan and Bangladesh, Nusrat Bhutto, Benazir Bhutto, Hasina Wazed, and Khaleda Zia have led the Pakistan People's Party, Awami League, and Bangladesh National Party during periods of crisis.

What is generally noticeable, not only in South Asia but all over the world, is that women are often in the front ranks when a political struggle is in its ideological phase but they become invisible when the struggle enters the phase of distributing the fruits of power. Women are mobilised on an ad hoc basis to support specific causes and issues, but once the cause is achieved and the movement turns into a routine power game, women tend to lose out, either being pushed back by men to their 'normal' duties at home, or themselves losing interest in overt power struggles. Women participate more in informal than in formal structures, and more in what is known as supportive roles; they vote, they help in campaigning, and in mobilising electoral support—especially women's support—but they rarely stand for election themselves. They are active in peasant struggles and trade union movements but more as unrecognised foot-soldiers than as leaders.

The differential pattern of women's participation has raised another critical issue: can women's participation improve without a change in the nature of mainstream politics? Conversely, can mainstream politics change without women's participation? The goals, objectives, and methods of current politics in South Asia ignore the problems, hopes and aspirations of the vast majority of the population who are poor—and women constitute the majority of the poor. The ruling elites of the region, politicians as well as civil and military bureaucrats, always promise the alleviation of poverty, social transformation, and the creation of a just social order in their public speeches and election manifestos, but the sad reality is that the conditions of large sections of the masses have actually worsened in the last few decades. As one study points out

In the two decades of the sixties and seventies, in no country has there been a dramatic breakthrough in the reduction of poverty . . . Agrarian structures remain highly unequal, and movements in real wages and changes in rural employment opportunities give little indication that there has been any widespread improvement in the condition of the rural poor in spite of the rapid spread of new technology and significant improvement in agricultural productivity in some countries . . . Inequality in rural incomes and land distribution have accentuated poverty.²³

Instead of mobilising the poor, and heightening their consciousness, the political institutions and leaders have largely depended on major power groups—rich and middle farmers, industrialists, businessmen, organised labour—for support. Party leaders often co-opted 'local influentials' without socialising them into the ideology of the party.

²³ ILO, ARTEP, Fighting Poverty: Asia's Major Challenge, 1986, pp 3–4.

Since women rarely fall into the category of local influentials, that is, local council chairmen, Bar Association presidents, leaders of student unions, trade unions, or peasant associations, they are left out of the mainstream process of organisation building. Women tend to be active in social reform movements, in community organisations and non-governmental organisations (NGOs), but in political organisations and social reform movements have generally kept apart. Only in periods when the two are linked (eg the Indian nationalist movement under Mahatma Gandhi's leadership) do women participate in large numbers in the mainstream.

To summarise this section, women generally participate in high numbers in one single political activity, that is, voting, but in other activities such as attendance at public rallies and membership of social and political organisations, their participation is very low. Women's representation in national and local legislative bodies is marginal. The few women who succeed in being elected generally come from affluent, urban, educated family backgrounds and have very little contact with rural and small-town politics. Women's presence at decisionmaking levels in mass organisations such as political parties and trade unions, is also nominal. But the absence of women in positions of leadership in the established political structures and institutions does not mean that women do not participate in politics. They participate in large numbers in political struggles and in crisis periods, they are more involved when social reform is an integrated part of a political movement. Women seem to lose interest or be excluded however, when politics becomes a simple game of distributing power.

New women's movement as an alternative to mainstream politics

The differential pattern of women's participation has led to the hypothesis that women's visions, priorities, and modes of organisation are different from those of men. The new women's movement demonstrates the potential for changing mainstream politics by bringing in new issues and groups which have been marginalised by the processes of mainstream politics, yet which concern the majority of the population.

The Women's Decade witnessed the emergence of a powerful new women's movement in South Asia. Though initial doubts were raised that the movement would be a pale replica of Western 'women's liberation', by the end of the Decade, the movement had found its roots, identified indigenous feminist issues, and brought forward new leadership, new organisations and new modes of organisational behaviour. The movement demonstrated the potential for mobilising and organising women in an alternative and more effective way.

The issues emphasised by the new women's movement were more consciously feminist in trend, posing a fundamental challenge to many of the basic ideological and cultural values regarding the family and society. The new women's movement linked, at both theoretical and practical levels, the issues of production/reproduction and economy/kinship. It mobilised women around issues that could for the first time establish a coalition between a section of young, educated, middle-class women and the poor urban and rural working-class women. Issues of physical violence (rape, assault, dowry deaths), cultural violence (traffic in women, negative images of women in the media), economic exploitation (discriminatory wages, retrenchment, lay-offs, bans on unionisation), economic rights (land rights, rights to forest, access to credit) and political rights (democratic participation, rights to organise) were emphasised.

In India, large-scale mobilisation took place around a number of notorious rape cases.²⁴ The police and landlord rape cases on the one hand raised women's consciousness about the link between economic exploitation and sexual violence and oppression, and on the other demonstrated to women activists the weakness of their own movement. While sympathy was aroused about rape victims, there were no grassroots-level organisations to assist these women. Mobilisation also took place in India and Bangladesh around dowry deaths and bride-burning,²⁵ but again, effective action on dowries could be taken only in situations where, as in the case of Grameen Bank in Bangladesh, women were organised at the neighbourhood and village levels in a cooperative and supportive way.

Women's access to means of production (land, forest, credit) became a major issue during the Decade. In India, land struggles by both tribal and non-tribal women attracted public attention. Women have joined earlier land struggles in Bengal and Telengana;²⁶ but what was remarkable about the new land struggles in Bodh Gaya in Bihar and Dhule district in Maharashtra, was the women's demands to have land rights in their own names.²⁷ Simultaneously with these land struggles, several NGOs, both in India (Centre for Women's Development Studies) and Bangladesh (Grameen Bank, Bangladesh Rural Advancement Committee), initiated employment programmes for women which gave women's groups rights and access to land for production. Access to forests and forest produce was established as a major women's issue by the Chipko movement in India,²⁸ and women's need for credit to promote employment and income was demonstrated by both government-sponsored programmes and development-oriented NGOs.

²⁴ Omvedt, Women in Popular Movements . . .

²⁵ ibid.

²⁶ See S Sunil Sen, 'The working women in West Bengal: a study in popular movement and women's organisations' in S Muntamba (ed), Rural Development and Women: Lessons from the Field, Geneva: ILO, 1985, Vol. II.

In India, Sri Lanka and Bangladesh the new women's movement emphasised economic rights. In Pakistan, the introduction of sharia laws and the consequent limitations on women's legal rights, necessarily made legal and political rights the focus of the new women's movement. The legal changes carried out under the recent Islamisation policy in Pakistan include changes in the law of evidence which states that in financial matters a woman's witness is worth half that of a man's, and the Haddood Ordinance which does not differentiate between adultery and rape.²⁹ The Decade witnessed the large-scale mobilisation of women in Pakistan for the restoration of democratic rights, as well as in protest against the imposition of sharia laws and courts.³⁰

The Decade also saw the emergence of non-partisan, grassroots women's organisations. By adopting a strategy of combining developmental work with consciousness-raising and organisation-building, these organisations achieved remarkable successes. Thousands of previously unorganised (and reputedly unorganisable) women—hawkers, street vendors, fisherwomen, piece-rate workers, agricultural labourers—were effectively organised by new types of grassroots organisations, such as the Self-Employed Women's Association (SEWA) and the Working Women's Forum (WWF) in India, and Nijera Kori and BRAC in Bangladesh. The formation of these grassroots organisations, particularly women's organisations in rural areas, marked a qualitative step forward in the women's movement. These organisations stressed the autonomy of the women's movement and organisation, and questioned some of the traditional ²⁷ Omvedt, Women in Popular Movements . . .

²⁸ Kumud Sharma, Balaji Panday and Kusum Nantiyal, 'The Chipko Movement in the Uttar Khand Region, Uttar Pradesh, India' in Muntemba (ed) Rural Development and Women . . .

²⁹ J. Henry Korson and Michelle Maskiell, 'Islamisation and social policy in Pakistan', Asian Survey 25(6) June 1985, and Nighat Said Khan and Simorgh Women's Resource and Publication Centre, 'Women in Pakistan', in ISIS, Women, Struggles and Strategies . . .

³⁰ Khan et al., 'Women in Pakistan'.

bureaucratised modes of organisation. They emphasised more democratic practices and more egalitarian male/female roles within organisations.

The emergence of these new rural women's grassroots organisations rekindled the old debate about separate vs integrated methods: whether women should be organised separately, or whether such separate organisations would threaten working-class solidarity. The debate centred mostly on New Left groups. Some within these groups argued that their movement was all-encompassing and espoused women's issues sufficiently to dispel the need for separate organisations. On the other hand, the feminists championing the autonomy of the women's movement argued that women could more easily be made self-conscious and more self-reliant and confident in separate women's organisations; that in most mixed organisations the existence of the specific oppression of women within as well as across classes is disputed or submerged without much debate.³¹

The new women's movement also gave rise to a new breed of women leaders. Though they themselves came from urban middle-class backgrounds, these women spent time organising poor peasant and agricultural women labourers or working-class women in urban slums. The experience of working with militant working-class women transformed the consciousness of many of them, leading them to identify closely with issues that are of primary importance to working-class women. For example, leaders such as Ela Bhatt (SEWA), Jaya Arunachalam (WWF) or Chetna (Chatra Yuva Sangharsh Vahini) in India, and Khushi Kabir (Nijera Kori) in Bangladesh, are themselves from middle-class family backgrounds, but have highlighted the problems of employment, working conditions, and the organisation of rural and urban poor women, making these problems part of a national debate. Yet in spite of close interaction and the formation of effective coalitions, no woman from a poor, rural, working-class background has yet effectively assumed a position of leadership on a par with the urban middle-class women in these organisations.

What is the future of the new women's movement in South Asia? Will it be able to undertake the large-scale mobilisation of women at the grassroots level, make women's issues more central to people's consciousness and train a new cadre of women leaders who can play a more effective role in mainstream politics? Will it create a new coalition of marginals—landless farmers, informal sector workers, untouchables, tribals—who can some day aspire to be a majority political coalition?

³¹ Omvedt, Women in Popular Movements . . . and Lokayan Bulletin, op. cit.

It is too early to discern the ultimate direction of the new women's movement. There have, however, been some encouraging trends in recent years. As a result of the women's movement, political parties have become more aware of women's issues. In India, joint alliances of women's organisations—both political and non-political—have demanded more effective government action in the suppression of crimes against women and in promoting employment and educational opportunities. Recognising women as a potential source of political support, political parties and leaders throughout South Asia are now ready to adopt pro-women stands in public statements and election manifestos. The growing women's movement has also had an impact on legislation and on a section of the judiciary. In Bangladesh and India some legislative reforms have taken place in family law, labour laws and in criminal laws for the protection of women.

In future, the women's movement needs to pay more attention to major trends in the economy, society and polity. A significant trend in the economy is one of increasing poverty and growing differences between the rich and the poor. More and more women are pushed into the labour market, and the number of female-headed households is increasing. The norms of secluding women, of keeping them in the private domain, are bound to break down under strong economic pressures, as has already happened in Bangladesh. On the other hand, in all countries of the region there is a resurgent fundamentalism that is seeking to revalidate the traditional norms of the sexual division of labour, female seclusion and gender segregation. For example, in Pakistan and Bangladesh, Islamic fundamentalists are pressing for the veiling of women (to different degrees) in public places, or in public appearances (eg television), and prohibiting women from participating in games or marches in public arenas. Violence against women is also increasing.³² There is also more violence in the country as a whole, and women are the special victims of the rising ethnic, communal violence in the region.

While violence limits women's physical mobility in general, it inhibits middle-class women much more than working-class women. For the latter, violence may be said to be part of their daily lives and struggles. The middle-class women, who are leading the new women's movement, will have to come to terms with this increasing violence and work out a strategy to consolidate the movement, rather than dividing it along ethnic/communal/sectarian lines.

³² Khan et al., 'Women in Pakistan'.

Finally, the movement will have to identify and work with external allies. The support from groups outside the movement is particularly necessary in the women's struggle against resurgent fundamentalism. The initial decision by the grassroots women's organisations to remain autonomous and non-partisan, and concentrate on raising the consciousness and organisational level of women around women's issues was a step forward in the right direction. With increasing strength and visibility, however, they need to establish their stand vis-à-vis other issues, and their relationships with other grassroots organisations and popular movements. This, however, should be carefully debated and negotiated to ensure that women's issues and groups do not get relegated to a secondary position in a general coalition.

In summary, the new women's movement in South Asia has succeeded in making a number of new issues that concern women (ie physical violence, cultural violence, economic exploitation, economic rights, social and political rights) part of a national debate and agenda. The movement has highlighted the problems of poor working-class women—urban as well as rural—brought forward a new leadership which has forged close links between middle-class and poor working-class women, and has given rise to new types of autonomous grassroots women's organisations that emphasise democratic participatory organisational behaviour. The movement is, however, still evolving its objectives and strategies, and its future potential and impact will depend on its capacity to make alliances with other popular movements without submerging the visions and priorities of women.

Conclusion

In South Asia, as in most other parts of the world, the agenda and priorities of women have hitherto been set by others. Increased political participation should involve not only greater numbers of women in politics but, more importantly, a qualitative change in political goals and processes; the goals should be set by women's perspectives and priorities, and processes should be such that women will feel more at ease in participating.

The developments of the last decade in South Asia indicate some small steps forward in this direction. The grassroots organisation of rural women, emphasis on working-women's concerns, and the coalition of middle-class and working-class rural women are all positive developments; however, the movement is still small and scattered. It has evolved from 'specific' women's issues (such as rape, dowry, maintenance, wife-beating) to an overall approach of tackling 'general' issues (such as drought, housing, social forestry, energy policies, health, right to work, redistribution of land) from a woman's perspective. This indicates the need to develop an overall political perspective in cooperation with other forces such as unions, parties, people's movement on ecology, people's science, human rights groups and the voluntary sector.³³

Apart from dealing with social, economic and political issues, the movement will also have to understand and come to terms with people's spiritual and psychological needs. For an overwhelming number of human beings, these needs are partly or largely met by religion. But religious scriptures and teachings are open to many interpretations; the fundamentalists and obscurantists are interpreting them to spread communalism or restrict women's opportunities. The women's movement cannot respond to them by ignoring or under-estimating the role of religion in society. It has to respond creatively to fundamentalists on their own ground. In Pakistan and Bangladesh women's movements need to work out their own interpretation of Islam that will ensure women's equality, opportunities, and physical mobility, and to build mass support around that interpretation. In India, raising the emotional appeal of non-communist forces provides the movement with a challenging opportunity to build a mass base for action founded on the perspective of women.

³³ Gabriele Dietrich, 'Can the Women's Movement become an anti-communist force', in Lokayan Bulletin, op. cit., p 55.

Somalia impasse: state power and dissent politics*

... Wandering between two worlds, one [seems] dead, the other [seems] powerless to be born.
Matthew Arnold

Like a great many African countries, Somalia has now reached an impasse: the prevailing order which came into place in 1969, with the coming to power of Siyaad Barre, is infirm and has lost meaning, and no credible alternatives are discernible on the horizon.¹

In addition to the constrictions of the legendary vagaries of the Somali climate and the enveloping global market, I propose that some of the most immediate and primary reasons for this impasse are: a total failure of the process of national accumulation—ie, the development of productive forces—and a decay of the system of governance on the part of the state; and the lack of a theoretically informed and grass roots-based challenge from oppositionist forces. Both the current state structure and the dissident groups are divorced from the popular masses, fatally undermining their respective claims to hegemony and thwarting national development.

To sustain this thesis, I shall first summarise some of the literature on Somalia in the crucial decade of the 1970s; secondly, review the political economy of the country in the 1980s; thirdly, examine the appearance of dissent and insurgent politics; and finally, I shall offer a few personal and concluding remarks on the state and its relationship to the imperative of development in Africa.

* This paper has benefited from the editorial assistance of Marlene Guzman and Patricia Alden.

¹ For a sample of the numerous writings on this African condition, see René Dumont and Marie-France Mottin, Stranglehold on Africa, London: André Deutsch, 1983; Richard Sandbrook with Judith Barker, The Politics of Africa's Economic Stagnation, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985; Timothy M Shaw, Towards a Political Economy for Africa, New York: St Martin's Press, 1985. In the historical specificity of the Somali case, see A I Samatar, 'Underdevelopment in Somalia: dictatorship without hegemony', Africa Today 32(3) 1985, pp 23–40 and A I Samatar and Abdi Samatar, 'The state, agrarian change and crisis of hegemony in Somalia', paper presented at the Third International Congress of Somali Studies, University of Rome, 26–31 May 1986.

The legacy of the 1970s

Previous studies have not fully examined the consequences of military-cum-revolutionary rule in Somalia in the 1970s. However, there is a small cluster of research undertaken during the first half of the decade, almost all of it by non-Somalis. While this literature is positive and confirmatory in the first four to five years, most observers fall into two broad categories when the entire decade is taken into account.² First, there is a line of investigation which has clung to those momentous early years and continues, therefore, to defend the endeavours: and second, a less enthusiastic and more sceptical trend. Charles Gesheker's brief study typifies the first type of analysis.³ He concludes that the Somali 'Revolution', until the time of his writing (early 1979), could claim the following notable achievements:⁴

- 1) The discordance and 'cleavage' between the countryside and the city had been diffused;
- 2) Relations between the managers of the bureaucracy and the rest of society had been improved;
- 3) A sense of professionalism had returned to the civil service as official responsibilities began to be respected;
- 4) Significant strides had been taken to create opportunities for women;
- 5) On the whole, 'Somalia's socio-economic priorities [were] sound, its developmental strategies rooted in local realities . . .'

While Gesheker's conclusions are approving, other analysts are not as sanguine. David Laitin, in a judicious article, suggests five criteria for assessing the Somali experience:⁵ public control of the means of production; equity and promotion of egalitarianism; development of the productive forces; loosening of world capitalist linkages; and 'ideological refinement'. Laitin feels that some progress has been made in forestalling oppressive social stratification and in promoting sexual equality. He also acknowledges the value of establishing an

² I M Lewis, 'Somalia's leaders go forward with confidence', New Middle East (51) December 1972, p 9; Basil Davidson, 'Somalia's lessons for Africa', New Statesman, 16 May 1975, pp 648-98. 'Somalia: towards socialism', Race and Class 17(1) July 1975, pp 19-38; also, Luigi Pestalozza, The Somalian Revolution, translated by Peter Glendening, Bari: Dedalo Libri, 1974.

³ Charles Gesheker, 'Socio-economic developments in Somalia', Horn of Africa 2(2) April-June 1979, pp 24-36.

⁴ ibid., pp 35-6.

⁵ David D Laitin, 'Somalia's military government and scientific socialism', in Socialism in Sub-Saharan Africa: A New Assessment, edited by Carl G Rosberg Jr and Thomas M Callaghy, Institute of International Studies Research Series, No 38, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1979, p 177.

orthography for the Somali language, and of other hesitant steps taken towards 'creating a social base for democracy'.⁶ On the negative side, he observes that the regime's economic guidelines were neither anchored in 'scientific analysis', nor informed by socialist thinking. Further, he argues that the economy had stagnated, military dependence on the Soviet Union had been created, and persecution of critical 'socialist thinkers' was a feature of the state's domestic policy.⁷ In short, according to Laitin, 'The record suggests that a non-socialist but vigorous, development-conscious military in control of the Somali government would have acted much the same way as the present socialist regime.'⁸

I M Lewis is also, at best, ironic about the outcome.⁹ He points to the success of the establishment of the Somali language, the subsequent literacy projects, the competent handling of the great 1974-5 drought, various crash development programmes, and an enhancement of Somalia's international and regional reputation. On the debit side, he lists glorification of Siyaad Barre's personality, 'monolithic militarism', corruption, a continuation of clanism, and economic stagnation.¹⁰

My assessment of the regime's performance for the first couple of years corroborates the positive notes expressed by all these writers. However, by the end of the 1970s the evidence pointed in a different direction. The regime's record proved to be very poor and fell short of the goals enunciated in the beginning.¹¹ On crucial issues affecting economic transformation, the performance was most disappointing. The rural sector, the largest part of the economy, was utterly neglected, with the pastoral sub-sector left to the whims of small but dominant trading families and the dilaals (middle men) who linked them to the pastoral producers. In his evaluation, Lewis suggests that it was only this segment of the economy which prospered, ostensibly because of the absence of state ownership. I disagree. First, the positive growth of

⁶ idem, 'The political economy of military rule in Somalia', Journal of Modern African Studies 17(1) March 1979, pp 95-116.

⁷ idem, 'Somalia's Military . . . ' p 197.

⁸ ibid., p 198.

⁹ I M Lewis, 'Kim-Il-Sung in Somalia: the end of tribalism', in Politics and Leadership in Eastern Africa, edited by William A Shack and Percy S Cohen, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1979, pp 14-43.

¹⁰ ibid., pp 39-42.

¹¹ For an intriguing theoretical proposition for why this is so among 'radical' regimes in Africa, see Kenneth Jowitt, 'Scientific socialist regimes in Africa: political differentiation, avoidance, and unawareness', in Socialism in Sub-Saharan Africa: A New Assessment, edited by Carl G Rosberg Jr and Thomas M Callaghy, Institute of International Studies Research Series, No 38, Berkeley: University of California Press, 1979 pp 133-74.

livestock production (2.5 per cent) hardly kept up with population growth. Moreover, Lewis does not pay attention to the contentious fact that, despite the high return for pastoral products, that windfall could have been harvested primarily by the export traders and, to a lesser extent, by the state.¹² Finally, conspicuous ecological deterioration underlined the extent to which this sub-sector was disregarded. Agriculture fared even worse. I have documented elsewhere how the production of almost all the major food crops declined, culminating in the need to beg for food aid and to borrow large sums of money to pay for food imports.¹³ In addition, state allocation or credit extension for both sub-sectors was meagre. Finally, fisheries, the third largest component of the rural economy, remained very peripheral to the Somali economy and state planning.

In the modern sector, state enterprises expanded but production was negative. While it is true that employment in those public establishments engaged in manufacturing increased from 4,482 to 9,735 (an average growth of 17 per cent per year), growth in terms of value added per employee declined at an average of 12.5 per cent per year. Further, these industries were shackled by a lack of skilled personnel, low capacity utilisation, a high tax burden (over 80 per cent at net profit), and rising prices of imported inputs. In contrast to these areas of production, however, the government services sector grew by 8.5 per cent per annum.

In politics and human rights, the overall results were not encouraging and were at variance with the imperatives of the regime's goal of self-reliance (Hantiwadaag). For example, despite the nationalisation of some important segments of the Somali economy—especially the modern sector—there was very little evidence of genuine democratisation of the work-place. One of the first edicts of the military government was the abolition of strikes and the use of the death penalty against offenders. Participation in politics and the encouragement of local initiatives were also inhibited. For the first seven years, despite speeches enjoining democracy, free political activity was the least conspicuous characteristic of Somali life. From the beginning, there was ¹² While researchers on the Somali political economy have not yet undertaken a thorough accounting of this, many writers suggest the dominance of traders. For example, see Dan Aronson, 'Kinsmen and comrades: towards a class analysis of the pastoral sector', Nomadic Peoples (7) November 1980, pp 14–23. See also, John Holtzman, 'The economics of improving animal health and livestock marketing in Somalia', USAID paper, Mogadishu, 1982; and Vali Jamal, 'Nomads and farmers: income and poverty in rural Somalia', in D Chai and S Radwan (eds), Agrarian Policies and Rural Poverty in Africa, Geneva: ILO, 1983.

¹³ A I Samatar, 'Underdevelopment in Somalia . . .' p 35.

ORDER FORM

Please indicate in each box no. of copies required.
Allow 28 days for delivery.

☐ Annual Membership: includes one year subscription to Third World Quarterly, Third World Affairs 1987, and generous discounts on other Foundation books.
£40.00/US$60.00

☐ Third World Affairs 1987
UK £20.00/US & Europe US$35.00/
All other countries US$39.00

☐ Regional Integration:
The Latin American Experience
£12.00/US$16.00 (h/b) Members
£16.00/US$21.00 (h/b) Non-Members

☐ Living Within Our Means
£ 5.95/US$ 7.50 (p/b) Members
£ 7.50/US$10.00 (p/b) Non-Members

☐ Jamaica: Struggle in the Periphery
£ 2.95/US$ 6.00 (p/b) Members
£ 3.95/US$ 7.95 (p/b) Non-Members

☐ £ 6.00/US$12.00 (h/b) Members
£ 7.95/US$15.95 (h/b) Non-Members

☐ The Rich and the Poor
£ 3.30/US$ 5.25 (p/b) Members
£ 4.50/US$ 7.00 (p/b) Non-Members

☐ Shared Horizon
£ 9.00/US$11.00 (h/b) Members
£12.00/US$15.00 (h/b) Non-Members

☐ Urdu Literature
£ 3.50/US$ 5.50 (p/b) Members
£ 4.50/US$ 7.00 (p/b) Non-Members

☐ Linking the South
£15.00/US$23.00 (h/b) Members
£19.95/US$29.95 (h/b) Non-Members

☐ Decolonisation and After
£15.00/US$23.00 (h/b) Members
£19.95/US$29.95 (h/b) Non-Members

Name

Organisation

Address

- ☐ I enclose cheque for £/US$ (Made payable to the Third World Foundation)
☐ I would like to pay by credit card

Name of card

Expiry date

Name of cardholder

Signature

Card Account No.

When completed please return this order form with your payment to:

Circulation Dept, Third World Foundation, New Zealand House (13th Floor)
80 Haymarket, London SW1Y 4TS, ENGLAND

Registered in England No. 275246

TWR 767

Third World Foundation

a clear centralisation of power at the district, regional, and national levels. All the decisionmakers in local and regional areas were directly appointed by the centre.

I found only superficial and discontinuous steps in the devolution of authority and the encouragement of local participation. Moreover, there were no constitutional limitations on the powers of the central government and, in particular, on President Siyaad Barre. Even after the Somali Revolutionary Socialist Party (SRSP) was established in 1976, General Barre monopolised the five most powerful offices in the country: Head of State, Chairman of the Defence Committee, Chairman of the High Judicial Council, Chairman of the Council of Ministers, and the newly-created Secretary-General of the SRSP—effectively making him responsible for making, carrying out and adjudicating on all laws.

In light of all this, I disagree with Laitin's conclusion that 'a social base was created for democracy'. On the contrary, the above evidence underlines one inescapable and fundamental reality: the withering away of 'traditional' democracy and the failure to create a viable replacement.¹⁴ Obviously, such an ambience is not only detrimental to authentic self-reliance, but is also a breeding ground for deformed politics and malignant rule. In Montesquieu's instructive warning,

When the legislative and executive powers are united in the same person or body, there can be no liberty, because apprehensions may arise lest the same monarch or senate should act tyrannically . . . Where the power of judging is joined with the legislature, the life and liberty of the subject would be exposed to the arbitrary control, for the judge would then be the legislator. Were it joined to the executive power, the judge might behave with all the violence of an oppressor.¹⁵

An enduring bequest of the decade was the Somali–Ethiopian war of 1977–78. This catastrophic conflagration which pulled in the two superpowers cost the Somalis, and the region, dearly. It is estimated that more than 25,000 Somalis were killed.¹⁶ Over half a million destitute refugees crossed the border from the disputed Ogaden into Somalia, putting more pressure on an already precarious ecology and economy.¹⁷ The process of extending military control over society and the bureaucracy was accelerated. With the war lost and the economy in dire straits, the 1970s came to a close with the state's legitimacy at perhaps its lowest point since the heady days of national independence in 1960.

¹⁴ David D Laitin, 'Political crisis in Somalia', Horn of Africa 5(2) April–June 1982, pp 60–4. I M Lewis, 'Somalia: nationalism turned inside out', Middle East Research Information Project Reports, No 106, June 1982, pp 6–21. For a masterly exposition of traditional Somali democracy, see I M Lewis's classic, A Pastoral Democracy: A Study of Pastoralism and Politics Among the Northern Somali of the Horn of Africa, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1961.

¹⁵ Charles Louis de Secondat, Baron Montesquieu, De L'esprit des Loix (1748) Book XI, Chapter 6, quoted in Harold J Laski, A Grammar of Politics, London: Allen & Unwin, 1928, p 297.

¹⁶ Ruth Leger Sivard, World Military and Social Expenditures, 1979, Leesburg: World Priorities, 1982, p 15.

The political economy in the 1980s

The economy

Perhaps the best way to enter a discussion of this topic is to survey briefly the main points of the National Five Year Development Plan, 1982-86.¹⁸ Three fundamental objectives can be culled, which seem to be the logical focus for any actions in the economy:¹⁹

- 1) To raise the wealth of Somalia and the standard of living of the general population;
- 2) To create a society based on social justice, individual freedom, and popular participation in development—ie, self-reliance;
- 3) To protect the environment.

In themselves, these general principles are laudable; nonetheless, their application to the realities of Somali life should be examined. By looking at two of the main sectors of the economy: the rural and the modern sectors.

Most of the evidence in the pastoral sub-sector illustrates that not only has the stagnation of the 1970s continued, but the condition of the supporting rangeland has also deteriorated.²⁰ Obviously, the development of the productive forces—including livestock—depends, to a great extent, on what happens to the surplus a society generates. In Somalia, of all the loans and advances made by the Somali banking system in 1985, only a meagre 12.8 per cent went to livestock, while a pitiful 1.1 per cent and 2.8 per cent went to agriculture and industry respectively. In contrast, trade was allocated 70 per cent.²¹ Moreover,

¹⁷ Kevin M Cahill, 'Somalia: a tragedy beyond Cambodia', Horn of Africa 2(4) October-December 1979 pp 8-9; and 'Somalia: one in three is a refugee', Horn of Africa 4(1) January-March 1981, pp 46-51.

¹⁸ Somalia, Ministry of National Planning, Five Year Development Plan, 1982-1986 (1982). Over 85 per cent of the total Plan investment was expected to come from outside sources.

¹⁹ ibid., pp 1-19.

²⁰ World Bank, Somalia: Towards Economic Recovery and Growth, Report No 5584-SO. Restricted Document, 20 August 1986, p 42.

²¹ Somalia, Central Bank of Somalia, Bulletin, No 56, Mogadishu, 1986, p 8.

given the domination of pastoralism by merchant capital, with the connivance of the state, very little of the wealth which pastoral producers had generated, whether in terms of fair prices to producers or windfalls by traders, had returned to the sub-sector.²² The consequences have been lower off-takes of livestock, with crippling repercussions for exports. For instance, the total livestock unit of exports in 1983 had declined by 30 per cent from those of 1971–72. No improvements in the marketing of pastoral produce have been introduced and the vulnerability that comes with concentration on a single market was rudely brought home when, for health reasons, the Saudis banned the import of Somali cattle in 1983.²³ In short, both at the level of production and export, livestock—the most important sub-sector in the economy—is still unable, droughts notwithstanding, to make its proper contribution.

A high priority of the Development Plan has been agriculture, the other sub-sector of the rural economy. Allocated about 30 per cent of total investments, the central objective of the Plan was to work towards self-sufficiency in food grains; and secondarily, to increase the production of export crops. With the exception of 1981–82, when agricultural production increased (partly as a result of more attractive prices for farmers and exceptional rains) the crop output of Somalia has remained largely stagnant, with one of the lowest yields in Africa.²⁴ While complete data is not available, a measure of this condition can be gleaned from the huge food imports and aid that were delivered to Somalia in the years 1984–85. In 1984, 70,000 tons of food were bought, and 230,000 tons were given as aid; in 1985, the import figure was 92,000 tons with another 270,000 tons in aid.²⁵ Table 1 throws some light on both the inertness of domestic production, and the continuing dependence on imports of food grains, especially in the face of an alarming population growth rate of almost 3.1 per cent per year.

To add insult to injury, most of the emergency food delivered to Somalia—primarily from the USA—is reported to have failed to reach the most needy of the population. A recent investigation by the General Accounting Office of the US government found that 58 per cent of US

²² The Development Plan allocated a mere 15 per cent to this sub-sector.

²³ Africa Economic Digest 6(9) 1–7 March 1985, p 4. Despite Somalia's appeal to Arab brotherhood, and the swift implementation of an intensive Arabic language programme as a means of gaining favour, the Saudis refused to lift the ban.

²⁴ Somalia's average index of food production per capita has dropped from a bench-mark of 100 in 1969–71 to only about 60 in the mid 1980s. World Bank, World Development Report 1984, New York: Oxford University Press for the World Bank, 1984, p 228.

²⁵ Anthony Shaw, 'Barre's balancing act', Africa Report, November–December 1985, p 29.

THIRD WORLD QUARTERLY

Table 1: Somalia: domestic production and imports as a percentage of total grain availability (1979-83)

Year	Domestic Production (000 tons)	Imports (000 tons)	Imports as % of marketed grain supply
1979	262	150	37
1980	268	241	47
1981	383	271	41
1982	405	155	28
1983	358	168	32

Source: World Bank, Somalia: Towards Economic Recovery and Growth, Report No 5584-SO, Restricted Document (20 August 1985), p 43.

food aid has not been distributed at all, while about 30 per cent has been diverted to other groups (the army, government bureaucrats, and cronies).²⁶

How does one explain this chronic weakness in Somali agriculture? Evidence both from micro-studies and macro-analyses strongly suggests the absence of any significant peasant participation in rural development schemes;²⁷ further, there is a paucity of some of the most crucial technical ingredients for any successful campaign: inputs, extension and support services, adaptive research, and irrigation and water management.²⁸

Yet, if rural production has remained disappointing, Somali industrial performance in the mid-1980s has been even more regrettable. For example, despite about 15 per cent of the resources of the Plan allocated for investment by the 1982-86 Plan, real output per capita has been unchanged since the late 1970s. Moreover, most industrial enterprises—almost all of them owned by the state—have failed to cover even depreciation costs, let alone to generate healthy accumulation. These serious problems are illustrated by the deplorably low capacity of utilisation that prevails in most major plants, as illustrated in Table 2. There are many reasons for this gloomy picture, but the most critical is the failure in rural development, especially in agriculture and fisheries. This failure means that the most basic sector

²⁶ 'GAO raps Somalia program', African News 26(12) 16 June 1986, pp 1-4.

²⁷ For a clear exposition of one such case study where the state has become a catastrophic liability, see Abdi Samatar, 'The state, peasants, and pastoralists', (PhD dissertation, University of California, Berkeley, 1985), especially Chapter Five.

²⁸ Both the Somali Ministry of Agriculture and the World Bank acknowledge all of these technical problems and much more. For example, irrigation efficiency is estimated to be around only 20 per cent.

SOMALIA: IMPASSE

Table 2: Somalia: capacity utilisation in a sample of major industries (actual utilisation as a percentage of capacity)

Enterprise	1978	1982	1983
Somaltex (Textiles, Balcad)	75	51	33
SNAI Sugar Mills (Jowhar)	...	30	7
Milk Plant (Mogadishu)	46	14	6
Meat Factory (Kismayo)	0	3	2
Edible Oil Mill (Mogadishu)	...	2	1
Cigarette and Match Factory (Mogadishu)	...	57	33
Aluminium Utensils (Mogadishu)	...	45	21
Foundry and Machinery Workshop	...	60	22

Source: Somalia, Ministry of Industry, quoted in World Bank, Somalia: Towards Economic Recovery and Growth, Report No 5584-SO, Restricted Document (20 August 1985), p 55.

of the economy is unable to produce the necessary raw material inputs; hence Somali industrial activity is sorely handicapped. In addition, shortfalls in rural export production and growth hamper the capacity of the state to import technology inputs and spare parts. But this is not the whole story. Technical and managerial difficulties also bedevil industry. These factors range from a scarcity of management expertise and technical cadres, to an erosion in public sector salaries and wages that has depressed morale—particularly when managers and workers cannot draw on genuine non-material incentives.²⁹

Despite these lean, almost bankrupt times, the regime continues to pour a large part of the meagre national resources into the most unproductive spheres of defence and general administration. For instance, as the latest World Bank confidential study shows, Somalia is spending only 20 per cent of its recurrent expenditure on economic and social activities as compared to the 40 per cent allocated by all other ²⁹ The regime has taken some hesitant initiatives ostensibly to address this issue, in the form of a new Employment Law (1984). This act stipulates that wages will be tied to productivity rather than fixed by the state.

THIRD WORLD QUARTERLY

Table 3: Somalia: selected items as a percentage of ordinary state expenditures (1981-84)

Item	1981-2	1983	1984
General Public Services	51.2	47.3	45.2
Defence and Security ^a	30.5	32.6	36.3
Social Services	11.7	11.7	10.5
Economic Services	6.7	8.3	8.0

Source: World Bank, Somalia: Towards Economic Recovery and Growth, Report No 5584-SO, Restricted Document (20 August 1985), p 85.

^a These expenditures do not include military aid.

low-income African countries.³⁰ Table 3 captures this misuse and impoverishment of economic and social resources.

The contraction of production has combined with excessive—sometimes extremely unwise—spending, and acute deficiencies in implementation and management, to create a harrowing economic bind for the Somali people.³¹ For example, in 1985 alone, the Somali shilling has been devalued by more than 70 per cent through IMF intervention, and inflation is hovering around 100 per cent. In addition, as the cost of imports has reached seven times the revenue from exports, Somalia's balance of payments has been worsening, as shown by Table 4.

Table 4: Somalia: balance of payments in the 1980s
(millions of US dollars)

Item	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984
Exports	133	144	137	100	58
Imports	-461	-422	-484	-450	-408
Trade Balance	-328	-308	-347	-350	-350

Source: World Bank, Somalia: Towards Economic Recovery and Growth, Report No 5584-SO, Restricted Document (20 August 1985), p 17.

With these severe structural problems and economic imbalances, the Somali regime continues to borrow more from the international system, ³⁰ World Bank, Somalia: Towards Economy Recovery, p 28. This figure is lower than the mid 1970s allocations.

³¹ Africa Economic Digest 6(2) 11-17 January 1985, p 7. Some observers report that the prices of essential commodities in rural areas such as the Northwest have doubled or trebled in less than four years. For more details on this, see Samatar, 'The state, peasants, and pastoralists', p 220.

consequently sinking deeper into debt.³² Despite the government's continuing success in attracting one of the highest per capita aid flows in Africa—estimated at over 30 per cent of the Gross National Product—Somalia's outstanding debt stood at an estimated $1.4 billion in early 1985. The service alone, on this debilitating financial burden, is already claiming over 80 per cent of export earnings; and service arrears jumped from $28 million in 1980 to well over $120 million at the end of 1985.³³ Compounding this unenviable situation, is the absence of any sign of relief in the near future. Most observers believe that even if the economy improves—and that will take some doing, especially given the projected doubling of the population (to about 11 million) in the next twenty years—Somalia will have to face still heavier debt obligations during the remainder of this century.

Politics

The nature of power in Somalia in the mid 1980s, and the conduct of its international affairs, can perhaps best be characterised as a further descent into internal imperiousness and militarism, and external dependency.

Domestically, this decade began with increasing military domination and the lack of effective popular participation. For example, in January 1981, eighty-five new district and regional Party secretaries were appointed, all but seven of them from the military.³⁴ Moreover, when the regime's unilateral and, in the eyes of many Somalis, unwise extension of Somali port and land facilities to the US armed forces triggered disapproval and unease, the leadership responded by declaring a state of national emergency. The same act revived the old Supreme Revolutionary Council (SRC), the original military body that took power in 1969. In the process, the Somali Revolutionary Socialist Party was superseded, exposing the lack of constitutional guarantees of existence. These imperious tactics and the critical situation of the economy did not sit well with everyone in the ruling faction of the ³² On the culprits and consequences of this uniform trend in Africa, see the blunt and penetrating insights of Dumont and Mottin, Stranglehold on Africa; also, Henry Jackson, 'The African crisis: drought and debt', Foreign Affairs (63) Summer 1985, pp 1081–94. These Somali economic traits also fit into what the Executive Secretary of the Economic Commission for Africa has lamented as 'tendencies towards regression rather than progress'. For more on this, see Adebayo Adedeji, The Evolution of the Monrovia Strategy and the Lagos Plan of Action: A Regional Approach to Economic Decolonization, Addis Ababa: Economic Commission for Africa, 1983; and Shaw, Towards a Political Economy for Africa.

³³ World Bank, Somalia: Towards Economic Recovery, p 11.

³⁴ 'The Horn: rumblings in every camp', Africa Confidential 22(6) 11 March 1981, p 6.

Somali petite bourgeoisie. In fact, those who had believed in the general virtue and efficacy of Siyaad Barre's leadership, and in the original direction of the Somali development strategy, began to raise uncomfortable and downright heretical questions. These doubts clustered around the widening gulf between the unrelenting rhetoric of the regime and the increasingly contradictory reality. The showdown came in June 1982, when seven members of the Central Committee of the SRSP, who were challenging the unbridled growth of personal rule and the tendency towards socio-economic retrogression, were summarily arrested. The most prominent of this new band of dissidents were: General Ismail C Abokor, Third Vice-President of the Republic and President of the National Assembly; Cumer Carteh Qalib, a distinguished former Foreign Minister; Colonel Usman M Jelle, a senior member of the original SRC; General Umar Xaji Moxammad, a close relative of Siyaad Barre and one-time Minister of Defence; and Dr Moxammad Aden, one of the two ideologues of the regime and, on different occasions, Minister of Information and National Guidance, and Minister of Higher Education.³⁵ All seven were accused of treason and placed in detention without prospect of an early trial.

President Barre took to the road, in order to muster support and for the first time in a number of years, he travelled to the northern towns of Hargeysa and Boroma. Accompanied by three senior colonels from the North, where government forces were coming under serious attacks by insurgents, the President tried to explain his case and thus diffuse the growing hostility of Northerners to his regime. According to most commentators and witnesses to the occasion, few Northerners were won over. Consequently, Siyaad Barre cut short his visit and returned to Mogadishu. In the few years since then, new 'elections' for the National Assembly and the Presidency were held in December 1984 and November 1986, respectively. As many expected, and in line with the perversion of democratic participation already mentioned, all candidates of the ruling SRSP, including Siyaad Barre as the sole Presidential contender, received more than 99.8 per cent of the total vote. State repression has become more pronounced in most regions and many religious and many religious leaders in different parts of the country have been arrested, ostensibly for seditious preaching. For example, Amnesty International has listed the names of eighteen sheiks, particularly from Hargeysa and Mogadishu, who were detained between April and May of 1986, with the possibility that some were killed as a result of torture. Amnesty International also acknowledges the imprisonment of many other belonging to different 'Islamic organisations'.³⁶ The state of health of the septuagenarian President is doubtful after the severe injuries he sustained from a car accident on 23 May 1986.³⁷ According to Africa Confidential and a number of reliable local sources, this accident has exposed the precariousness of state leadership. Logically, the First Vice-President, Lieutenant-General Ali Samatar, is in line to succeed President Barre, but in practice the President's relatives and clan (Mareexan) are reported to have had an emergency meeting in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, where Barre was being treated.³⁸ Apparently, this ethnic convocation was an attempt to keep leadership in the family, a testimony to the weakness of state constitutionality and its juridical basis. In the end, General Samatar, partly as a result of brave and crucial military moves, prevailed; and it is now reported that President Barre, who is officially back as head of government, has appointed General Samatar as the First Minister of a 'new' Council of Ministers.³⁹

³⁵ Africa Economic Digest 3(21) 23 June-1 July 1982, p 11; and 'Somalia: Barre hangs on', Africa Confidential 24(5) 2 March 1983 p 5.

On regional and international policy, two things stand out: first, hostilities in the Horn—with Ethiopia in particular—have not improved, despite recent presidential and other high-level meetings.⁴⁰ Somalia's status as an appendage and an outpost of superpower dominance has also been enhanced. By mid-1982, the USA began airlifting military equipment and advisers and has since taken hold of the major, strategic port of Berbera, where new installations are about to be completed:⁴¹ radar systems, a new quay, and a doubling of other facilities necessary for roll-on, roll-off ships used by the US Rapid Deployment Forces, a modern imperial gendarmerie. Somali integration into the American

³⁶ Amnesty International Index: AFR 52/15/86 (30 June 1986), p 1.

³⁷ 'Somalia: after Barre', Africa Confidential 27(12) 4 June 1986, pp 1-2.

³⁸ ibid., p 1. This is also corroborated by conversations with some senior state and military officials who are privy to the intentions and activities of Colonel (now General) Masleh Siyaad Barre, one of two sons of the President. These sources have asked not to be identified. (Field notes, June-July 1986).

³⁹ 'Injured Somali president resumes duties', Africa News 27(1) 21 July 1986, p 7; 'Shirkii Aan Caadiga Ahayn . . .', Xiddiga Oktoobar, Monday, 2 February 1987, p 1.

⁴⁰ For the first time since the war of 1977-8, General Siyaad Barre and Colonel Mengistu H Miriam met in Djibouti in January 1986, primarily as participants in a conference convened to address regional ecological problems. There is very little evidence, to date, that this event has had any positive impact on lessening the tension between the two countries. A major and continuing consequence of the hostilities is the plight of refugees from the Ogaden, nearly 500,000 camped in various settlements in Somalia. 'Somalia, Ethiopia seek accord', Africa News 26(11) 2 June 1986, p 12; and for a more enthusiastic interpretation, see Heegan, No 466, 29 August 1986, p 1.

⁴¹ Africa Research Bulletin: Political, Social, and Cultural Series 20(6) 15 November 1983, p 6695.

global military network was consummated in 1985 by joint military exercises in 'Operation Bright Star'.⁴² The rewards for Somali collaboration with the American state and its allies have not been very great, but they have been enough to keep the regime compliant. In fact, US security assistance to Somalia was $50 million in 1985, and $75 million in 1986, mostly used to purchase US-made military equipment.⁴³ These disbursements make Somalia a member of the small group of exclusively pro-American sub-Saharan African states.⁴⁴

Other states have also contributed to the effort to realign Somalia towards the West. Italy, for example, has given around 500 million lira in economic aid and is the single largest donor of the $600 million that has been earmarked for the 'grand' Bardhere dam on the Juba river, the biggest development scheme in Somali history.⁴⁵ Even if all these foreign policy activities are still within the boundaries of traditional diplomacy, the regime's alleged connection with the pariah state of South Africa will, if it is proved, dispose of any lingering claim to a progressive ideology.⁴⁶ Undoubtedly, these mounting economic problems, a highly circumscribed and arid political life, and unsavoury external relations, are bound to deepen and entrench Somali underdevelopment. As Guy Arnold writes, no other region of the African continent has so clearly suffered such a total return to neo-colonialism and big power competition as the Horn of Africa since 1977.⁴⁷

In summary, Somalia of the 1980s seems far from the 'socialist' and 'non-aligned' society that is still so much a part of the rhetoric of President Siyaad Barre and his military cohorts. On the contrary, the country has become a permanent member of the economic 'basket-cases' and political autocracies in Africa, with debilitating social consequences.

⁴² James Kanu, 'US-Somali military exercises', South (London) September 1985, p. 35.

⁴³ Shaw, 'Barre's balancing act', p. 28.

⁴⁴ 'Bits and pieces', Africa News 25(9) 4 November 1985, p. 16.

⁴⁵ Shaw, 'Barre' balancing act', p. 28.

⁴⁶ Shaw writes that the regime has agreed to allow South African Airways to use Somali airspace, and has given landing rights to Air Comores—piloted by South Africans—for a small fee. This report adds, however, that there is little basis, thus far, for the allegation by Somali National Movement spokesmen that the regime has been negotiating a $20 million loan for the purchase of arms from South Africa. Also, there is no evidence known to this author that the USA '... will pay Somalia some $600 million in aid programs in exchange for a 50-year lease on about 500 square miles of land to be used to bury highly radioactive nuclear waste'. See, 'Key dates 1985—East Africa, the Horn, and the Indian Ocean', Africa News 26(1-2) 27 January 1986, p. 3.

⁴⁷ Africa Research Bulletin: Political, Social and Cultural Series 20(10) 15 November 1983, p. 7031

Dissidence and insurgency

Despite the aforementioned crises of economy and polity, there is little evidence to suggest any discernible, active dissidence inside Somalia. This can be explained by the success of President Barre's regime in nipping in the bud any political discontent and, more importantly, by the lack of any consciousness of the power of organised struggle among the broad spectrum of the Somali people. Opposition and resistance to the current order has continued to come from two externally based groups—the Somali Salvation Democratic Front (SSDF) and the Somali National Movement (SNM).⁴⁸

The first major military foray by the SSDF, with strong Ethiopian support, was undertaken in early 1982. This particular operation resulted in the capture of Balambale and Goldogob, eighteen miles inside Somalia proper.⁴⁹ While the SSDF has claimed credit for the incursion, and the occupation of the area, the Somali government has argued vociferously that the operation was purely an Ethiopian invasion, with the aid of a few Somali traitors.⁵⁰ More attacks and engagements by both the SSDF and the SNM forces, sometimes collaboratively, were mounted in 1983, some of them rather spectacular raids on government strongholds.⁵¹ Despite these bold but sporadic actions, both movements have experienced serious internal squabbles and relapses, and are far from advancing towards amalgamation of unity.

The SSDF is reported to have convened its long awaited Congress in January 1983. However, members of the two smaller partners in the coalition (the Somali Workers Party and the Somali Democratic Liberation Front) boycotted the meetings. They argued that the agenda had already been surreptitiously decided and that the Chairman, Colonel Cabdillahi Yusuf, originally Chief of the Somali Salvation Front (SSF), had assured his position against those who wanted a new leadership. Colonel Yusuf, manifesting similar undemocratic proclivities and poor stewardship to those which characterise President

⁴⁸ For the origins and beginnings of these organisations, see A I Samatar, 'Self-reliance in theory and practice: a critique of Somali praxis', (PhD dissertation, University of Denver, 1984), especially Chapters Seven and Eight.

⁴⁹ 'Somalia: of Barre's making', Africa Confidential 23(18) 8 September 1982, pp 1-4.

⁵⁰ For the Somali Government's official line of this, see Somalia, Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Ethiopia's Invasion of Somalia, 1982-83 Mogadishu, (1984).

⁵¹ 'Somalia: Barre hangs on', p 5. It is significant to note that, thus far, both of these two organisations have focused their activities on areas that are primarily inhabited by their respective lineage segments.

Barre, ordered the immediate arrest of thirty leading adversaries, including senior members of the executive. With most of the 'disagreeable' elements out of the way, the Congress proceeded to re-appoint Yusuf as chairman and he subsequently filled the new executive with his loyal clansmen, the Majerteen.⁵² Not surprisingly, the frustration and fury of the general membership was so great that, soon after, as many as two hundred members are reported to have returned to Somalia to take advantage of an amnesty offered by President Barre. Yet this did not end SSDF internal strife. In May 1984, new mutinies broke out and bloody fighting is said to have taken place in many camps, causing more guerrillas to cross the border to Somalia.⁵³ Moreover, during these divisive times, two prominent members of the SSDF's Central Committee, who had represented the most progressive faction, were assassinated at SSDF offices in Dire Dawa.⁵⁴ Despite recent reports of the forceful removal of Colonel Yusuf from the chairmanship, reorganisation under a new leadership, and even some guerrilla activity in 1985, the SSDF is badly damaged and at the nadir of any popularity it enjoyed earlier. Its resurrection as a credible organisation, even among dissident Somalis, will be difficult.

The Somali National Movement has also run into domestic quarrels and discord. On 10 November 1983, in a crucial Central Committee meeting held in Jigjiga, the entire civilian component of the leadership was ousted, leaving the military solely in charge.⁵⁵ The reasons expressed to justify this 'coup' were many and diverse: organisational weakness; a leadership coming mostly from the Habar Awal clan, while the guerrillas were mostly from the Habar Yunis clan; a civilian leadership resistant to unification with the SSDF; and the close ties of the civilian executives with Saudi Arabia and the USA.

But the dominance of the military faction did not endure, and without any great acrimony or bloodshed, SNM again changed its leadership. A new civilian group was installed in the 1984 Congress.⁵⁶ The Chairman is Axmed Moxammad 'Silanyo', a senior minister in the Barre government until his defection in 1982. More recently, the SNM has ⁵² It is estimated that 16 of the 20 members of the executive body were from Colonel Yusuf's own clan. 'Somalia: towards Samatar's sword', Africa Confidential 24(15) 20 July 1983, p 5.

⁵³ Africa Confidential 25(24) 28 November 1984, pp 7-8.

⁵⁴ These two members were: Cabduraxman Cydeed, one of the more theoretically informed members of the dissident community and Ikar Haji Moxammad Xusein. Both Cydeed and Xusein are reported to have been shot, on the order of Colonel Yusuf, for their unyielding commitment to authentic democratic practices and progressive ideology.

⁵⁵ 'Somalia: dissidents decline', Africa Confidential 24(24) 30 November 1983, pp 6-7.

⁵⁶ ibid.

announced the opening of a second front of military activity in the Bakol and Hiran regions of southern Somalia.⁵⁷ It has also stated that representative offices have been opened in over eleven countries in Africa, Asia, Europe, and North America, all evidence for its claim to the mantle of leadership in this incipient struggle for change in Somalia.⁵⁸

While the inception of any organised and change-oriented dissent politics is certainly very welcome and is more valuable than acquiescence or vacuity, both movements possess severe handicaps which have constrained their viability and impact. Foremost among these are widely differing and contradictory ideas among their respective memberships about the nature of the problems and their solutions. In both the SSDF and the SNM camps, a number of elements coexist: individualistic and petty capitalist ideology, Islamic fundamentalism, clanism, and impulses of social democracy. Secondly, both movements have yet to pass any convincing test of credibility regarding their adherence to democratic practices and their competence to lead an effort of reconstruction. Thirdly, and most significantly, the SSDF and the SNM are still limited to urban petite bourgeoisie followers, and no significant steps have been taken to involve the masses of the Somali people. These serious weaknesses are due partly to the naive belief that the demise of President Siyaad Barre's rule will automatically usher in a buoyant and productive economy, and democratic politics; and partly to an inability to see beyond the most immediate fragmentation and alienating circumstances, that is, the lack of a coherent theory of mobilisation and reconstruction. Unquestionably, as the historical record amply suggests, a successful effort to break out of apathy and mobilise national participation in the making of a different history will demand more creative thinking from those who have chosen to lead. In the words of Christopher Hampton:

[One] cannot hope to bring into being any of the unrealized conditions for a free and full life for [anyone] unless [one is] first of all capable of imagining them, and communicating [one's] vision . . . with sufficient intensity to prevail upon others to conceive them as potentialities and to believe that the prospects

⁵⁷ Somali National Movement, Political Program (1985), p. 2.

⁵⁸ ibid., p. 3. Late 1984, the appearance of two other new organisations was reported: 'Somali First', and 'Somali Patriotic Front'. The former, made up of 'loosely connected groups of intellectuals', is said to have started in London, while the latter is said to be based in Aden. Very little else is known about either except that they share this: an abhorrence of the present Somali regime and disapproval of the 'clanist' tactics of the SSDF and the SNM. Shaw, 'Barre's balancing act', p. 27.

it offers will be worth the effort and determination and courage required to bring [it] into existence.⁵⁹

Hampton's admonition points to the vital necessity of winning the respect and active consent of the masses in civil society long before the final assault is made on the state, and before the creation of a set of ideas and organisations that organically bind together a new historic bloc.

Conclusion

In another article, I theorised that a main reason for state and societal crisis in Somalia, and much of Africa, was the inability of the ruling state classes to chisel out of the admittedly rough, but available, economic, political and cultural material a genuine 'national-popular will'.⁶⁰ This overwhelming failure to include the real interests of the African masses in the narrow agenda of the elite has led to anaemic and feeble states incapable of becoming motive forces for national accumulation, the development of productive forces, and the initiation of popular participation.

Somali and African progressives (ie, those who are minimally melioristic, maximally revolutionary) and future leaders will do well to think seriously upon the role of the state and its place in any agenda for development. While the contradictions between a less conspicuous 'world-system' and the working masses of Africa remain as deadly as ever, the immediate danger to African self-reliance and empowerment is from the regressive petite bourgeoisie social forces which, with the tacit support of their imperialist patrons, have barricaded themselves in the most nodal point of national power, that is, the state.

Does this mean that the state, per se, is inimical to development, as the current 'state-bashing' carnival suggests, and that the time for hollowing it out and returning to the 'free market' has come? Of course not. For we now know that, contrary to laissez-faire ideology, there never was such a thing as a totally 'free market'. In fact, the opposite is historically more accurate—the private and public sectors have always played their respective roles in concert. The central theoretical question, then, is not the absence or the presence of the state in development, but rather its proper role. Our response is that, as a historical rule, undeveloped societies have invariably assigned the state a prominent place in the making of a modern political economy. As Malcolm Caldwell writes,

⁵⁹ Christopher Hampton, Socialism in a Crippled World, Harmondsworth: Penguin Books, 1981, p 314. This is a splendid, learned and evocative book. While it is primarily written for the citizens of industrial societies (both East and West), the images and messages are equally relevant to Third World situations.

⁶⁰ A I Samatar, 'Underdevelopment in Somalia . . .' especially pp 23–6.

... the more backward a nation, the greater the role the state has had to play in order to mobilize and make effective its human, technical, political, and diplomatic resources and potential. In the absence of active state initiatives and intervention, opportunities are pre-empted by nationals and agents of powers already more developed, or simply lie dormant.⁶¹

Caldwell's proposition becomes even more resonant and instructive in contemporary Africa (and Third World) societies in which lack of development is not only highly pronounced, but in which an effective collective shield against the worst abuses of imperialism (for example underdevelopment) is desperately needed.

We conclude, then, by postulating that a progressive Somali/African state will, at least, have the following main characteristics. It must represent the vast majority, with power and coercive apparatuses that have unbreachable constitutional limits and popular accountability. In other words, a clear distinction must be made here between a predatory, Leviathan state and collective authority structures assigned to manage macro-economic and political activities. An uncompromising corollary to such a central authority is genuine local autonomy. National development policy must focus on the rehabilitation of the ecosystem, and the creation of a food system designed to maintain concern for the environment while at the same time ending hunger. This will require the immediate shifting of priorities from militarism to food production, making food available to the entire population, particularly the poorest. Moreover, a real commitment must be made to ensure national food self-sufficiency, to avoid 'outside manipulation through food aid or exports'.⁶² The progressive state must seek to join Third World nations in demanding a serious moratorium on debt payments, while setting aside no more than 10 to 15 per cent of export earnings to pay off the national debt. Delinking any military relations from imperial powers and superpowers is indispensable. There is little doubt now that accepting a role in an imperial power's or superpower's global security design is a sure road to neocolonialism and a new serfdom. For all of the above to have any chance of success, collective self-reliance must become the alpha and omega of regional politics, particularly among progressive states. Such a strategy helps to facilitate not only economic and cultural cooperation, but could induce new conceptions of security which will gradually enable Africans to become masters of their own lives and continent.

⁶¹ Malcolm Caldwell, The Wealth of Some Nations, London: Zed Books, 1977, pp 76-7.

⁶² On this, see the writings of Susan George, especially Ill Fares the Land: Essays on Food, Hunger, and Power, Washington DC: Institute for Policy Studies, 1984.

Post-Numeiri Sudan: one year on

The parliamentary elections held in April 1986 heralded the return of formal democracy to the Sudan after the sixteen-year hiatus of Jafaar Numeiri's rule. One year later, it is becoming increasingly clear that democracy has not proved a panacea for the multitude of problems afflicting the country. In fact, democracy may ironically have added problems of its own producing a weak government, torn between the conflicting demands of disparate constituencies.

One year after the fall of Numeiri, the Sudan is sunk into the morass of a stagnating economy, staggering external debt, civil war, and a serious conflict concerning the place of Islam in the country's legal system. The government of Sadiq al-Mahdi is indecisive to the point of paralysis because of the enormity of the problems it faces, the fragility of the coalition which supports it, and the conflicting international pressures to which the Sudan is exposed. The paralysis cannot be attributed primarily to Sadiq's personal shortcomings, but to the nature of the government coalition and the fact that the solutions to the various problems may well be inherently contradictory and mutually exclusive. The steps needed to move toward a negotiated solution of the civil war would undermine the government coalition. Attempts to revive the economy would hinge on finding a new source of external support, while any external support is bound to have political overtones which would threaten the delicate balance of power achieved after the elections.

The April 1986 elections were formally a success, at least in the areas where they could be held. Although they were stretched over a long period of time (1-12 April 1986) there were few allegations of cheating. However, the war made it impossible to hold elections in thirty-seven out of sixty-eight districts in the south, in effect disenfranchising much of that region. Thus, democracy did nothing to change the existing character of the central government as, in reality, a northern one with token southern representation. It did even less to dispel southern fears of northern domination.

The election results showed the continuing strength of the Umma

Party and the Democratic Unionist Party (DUP), the two organisations with Islamic affiliations which have dominated the political scene in the Sudan in all periods of democratic rule since independence.¹ The Umma Party won ninety-nine of the 264 seats for which elections were held and the DUP sixty-four.² A third party, the National Islamic Front (NIF), formerly known as the Muslim Brotherhood, made a very strong showing with fifty-one seats. The rest of the vote was dispersed among the smaller parties of the north and the southern parties, leaving an assembly where four-fifths of the seats were controlled by organisations with an unmistakable Islamic character.

The Umma Party is affiliated to the Ansar, the religious organisation formed by the followers of Mohammed Ahmed al-Mahdi, whose Islamic fundamentalist movement temporarily defeated British rule at the end of the nineteenth century. Sadiq al-Mahdi, the leader of the Umma Party and now Prime Minister of the Sudan, is the Mahdi's great-grandson and the effective political and spiritual leader of the Ansar. As Prime Minister from July 1966 to May 1967, furthermore, Sadiq was personally at the forefront of an effort to adopt a permanent Constitution with an Islamic orientation.

The DUP has historically been affiliated to the Khatmiyyah, the major Sufi order in the Sudan. The party leader belongs to the Mirghani family, which is as closely tied to the Khatmiyyah as the Mahdi family is to the Ansar. The National Islamic Front, led by Hassan El Turabi, is the most militantly Islamic of the three parties. Its membership is somewhat different from that of the other two parties. While many Sudanese are simply born into the Khatmiyyah or the Ansar, and thus are automatically associated with the DUP or the Umma Party, the members of the National Islamic Front have chosen their affiliation. The NIF has achieved its success through a major organisational and recruiting effort. The Muslim Brotherhood has been particularly active for a long time among university and even high school students, thus gaining an urban and highly visible following. In the months preceding the election the NIF mounted a major campaign to reach potential voters, canvassing actively in urban areas.

Their common Islamic orientation does not unite the three organisations. While the DUP has joined the Umma Party in the government coalition, the relationship between the two is tense. They disagree on a number of issues, including policy towards Egypt—the DUP had historically advocated very close relations while the Umma has been more suspicious of Egyptian intentions. Open conflict between the two parties has been avoided only because the government has made no major decisions. Finally, the two parties are separated by personality conflicts and a historical rivalry. The NIF has refused to join the government coalition, accusing the other two parties of being lukewarm towards Islam, and has called unequivocally for the application of the religious laws to the entire country—during the electoral campaign it even threatened to launch a jihad if an attempt was made to repeal the Islamic laws of 1983.³

¹ The Democratic Unionist Party is a coalition of two organisations, the National Union Party and the People's Democratic Party. The two have cyclically united and split again ever since independence. Most recently, they merged in January 1986 in preparation for the elections.

² The Assembly has, formally, 301 seats. However, elections were not held in 37 districts, all of them in the south, and consequently the present assembly has only 264 members.

The three parties which dominate the Sudanese assembly thus do not speak with the same voice, but all three speak with an Islamic voice. In fact, the competition among them makes it virtually impossible for any of the leaders to risk taking a position implying support for a secular state, because such a move would provide a clear advantage to his rivals. This is a major problem since the place of Islam in the political system and of Islamic law (sharia) in the country's codes play a major part in the conflict between north and south. John Garang, the leader of the main southern opposition movement, the Sudanese People's Liberation Movement (SPLM), has stated repeatedly that there will be no negotiations, and no participation of the SPLM in a constitutional conference, until sharia is repealed.⁴ This statement puts Sadiq al-Mahdi and the Umma–DUP coalition which supports him in an untenable position. They are being asked to take a step which would decrease the importance of Islam in the political system, while Sadiq is the leader of the Ansar, and the Umma and DUP are affiliated with religious movements. Meanwhile, making matters worse, the NIF stands on the sidelines ready to transform any attempt to repeal or modify the Islamic laws into its own political capital.

Paradoxically, Numeiri's September 1983 laws, based on sharia, are not particularly popular and were not welcomed by any of the religious organisations when they were enacted.⁵ In the south, where the overwhelming majority of the population is not Muslim but Christian, or follows a traditional religion, the imposition of Islamic laws was greeted with dismay, and contributed to heightening the feeling that the government in Khartoum represented not the entire country but only the Arab and Muslim population, and that it ruled the south as a colony without rights. In the north, too, sharia provoked a great deal of resentment. The most controversial aspect of the laws was the imposition of mandatory amputations of hands or feet as punishment for certain crimes. The banning of alcohol angered the drinkers, but more seriously created real economic hardship for the women who made a living brewing and selling beer in the slums. More insidiously, the religious movements did not like the September laws because by enacting them Numeiri had stolen their thunder, instead, they all advocated their replacement with the real sharia. Prime Minister al-Mahdi, too, has talked of abolishing the September laws and replacing them with the 'real sharia'.

³ For details on the laws, see Jean François Rycx, 'L'Islamisation du Droit Comme Enjeu Politique au Sudan', in Peter Woodward (ed), The Sudan Since Numeiri, University of London: Centre of Near and Middle Eastern Studies, 1986.

⁴ See letter addressed by John Garang to the leaders of the transitional government, published in Sudanow, January 1986.

⁵ The so-called 'September laws' included a number of reforms of the judiciary systems, enacted between August 1983 and February 1984. The most controversial part of the legislation was the adoption of an Islamic penal code. See Rycx, op. cit., p 2.

It is not clear what the difference between the 'real sharia' and the present laws would be, above all in view of the fact that some of the most unpopular aspects of the September laws, such as sentencing to amputation, are beyond any doubt an integral part of the Islamic penal law. In an absolute sense, the statement is thus meaningless. Politically, it is revelatory of the quandary in which all northern movements find themselves; that in a country as saturated with religious movements as the Sudan nobody can afford to appear lukewarm towards Islam or, worse still, opposed to it. Repealing sharia is a very dangerous political move, but maintaining it, in any form, ensures the continuation of war in the south.

The war is raging on without a military solution in sight. The Sudan is a huge, under-populated African country where no government can possibly defeat an organised opposition movement and establish effective control by military means alone, because the resources required to do so are immense. The war in the south can only come to an end through a political compromise, but the prospects for such a compromise are dimmer now than at any time since Numeiri was deposed.

The problem of the relation between north and south is an old one, predating the independence of the Sudan. The differences between the largely Arab Muslim north and the largely African non-Muslim south are accentuated by the imbalance in the level of development of the two regions. It is not that the north is highly developed, but that whatever little development exists is concentrated there, and above all in the capital.⁶ The attempt to run the country in a centralised fashion following independence floundered, a fact recognised by Numeiri after sixteen years of civil war, when he signed the 1972 Addis Ababa agreement which gave the south its own regional government. The agreement did not create a federal system, in that only the south, rather than all parts of the country, had a regional government. Furthermore, the central government remained dominated by northern politicians. As time went by, southern politicians became increasingly convinced that their region was still a neglected area, and that the Addis Ababa agreements did not provide a long-term answer to the problem. Chevron's discovery of oil at Bentiu in the southern region in the late 1970s made the problem worse. A proposal to establish a refinery at Kosti in the north, rather than at Bentiu, angered southern politicians who saw this as another example of how the central government syphoned all wealth from the area for the benefit of the north. Chevron's contention that it was economically unfeasible to set up a refinery at Bentiu, far from the main market, failed to convince anybody in the south, and the solution finally adopted—to build a pipeline to the coast rather than a refinery—did nothing to assuage resentment. The construction of the Jonglei Canal, a waterway designed to speed up the flow of the Nile water through the marshes of the Sudd, reducing evaporation and thus making more water available to Egypt and northern Sudan, also reinforced the conviction that the central government saw the south as an area expected to feed resources to the north, rather than to be developed in itself.

The final straw in the tense relations between north and south was a decision taken by Numeiri in 1981 to disband the southern region as a whole and to replace it with three separate smaller regions, each with its own government. The ethnic diversity of the population in the south, and the tension which existed between Dinka and non-Dinka politicians, provided the basis for this policy. For this reason, Numeiri initially had some support from southern politicians, above all Vice-President Joseph Lagu. But the move was also seen by many as abrogation of the Addis Ababa agreement by the central government, and as a sign that it was bent on dividing the southern region in order to weaken it.

⁶ The western part of the country, too, has been neglected in terms of economic development. However, while there have been periodical rumblings of discontent, the problem has not acquired the same dimensions as in the south, in part because of the absence of a sharp ethnic and cultural cleavage.

By early 1983, armed opposition had resumed in the south, and the Anya Nya movement, which had spearheaded the first civil war, was rumoured to have been revived as Anya Nya II. Fearing that the southern troops stationed in the south would join the opposition, Numeiri ordered them out of the area and their replacement by northern troops.⁷ Some garrisons, including the one at Bor, refused to obey the orders. John Garang, an officer of southern origin who had fought in the Anya Nya movement and later had pursued a successful career in the Sudanese army, was sent to Bor to negotiate with the mutineers, but defected instead and helped to found a new organisation, the Sudanese People's Liberation Movement (SPLM), and its military wing, the Sudanese People's Liberation Army (SPLA).⁸

A manifesto issued by the SPLM in July 1983 established a vaguely socialist orientation for the movement and also made it very clear that its goal was not secession, but equal rights for north and south in a united Sudan.⁹ The promulgation of Numeiri's September laws, which were to be applied to all parts of the country and to Muslims and non-Muslims alike, added a new, central goal for the SPLM: the abrogation of sharia.

The birth of the SPLM greatly complicated the political dynamics of the Sudan. Anya Nya II, with a predominantly Nuer constituency, found itself competing with the predominantly Dinka new movement. Anya Nya II had been formed earlier, but the SPLM was soon much better organised. Cooperation between the two movements proved impossible, and by 1984 fear of Dinka domination led Anya Nya II to accept military equipment from the government, becoming a pro-government force fighting against the SPLM.

While Numeiri was in power, there was no possibility of negotiations between the government and SPLM. However, Garang was in touch with opposition groups in the north and was considered by all of them as one of the individuals with a major part to play in devising a solution to the problems of a post-Numeiri Sudan. Immediately after the coup, Garang clarified his negotiating position to the new government. First, he issued an ultimatum to the military committee, threatening to resume war unless there was an immediate return to civilian rule. On 11 April 1985, the SPLM issued a ten-point memorandum, further specifying its position. It reaffirmed its commitment to national unity and set forth a list of demands for the transition period. These included the application of the 1956 Constitution; the reunification of the south into a single region as provided by the Addis Ababa agreement and the formation of a transitional southern government; the immediate repeal of the September laws; adequate representation for southerners in all government institutions; careful screening of army officers to serve in the south, selecting only those animated by a spirit of reconciliation; the release of political prisoners and the restoration of civil rights and liberties; and finally, direct contacts between the government and the SPLM to reach a peaceful settlement.¹⁰

⁷ Under the terms of the Addis Ababa agreement, Anya Nya guerrillas were integrated into the army, if they chose to pursue a military career. As a result, there were many former Anya Nya members in the Sudanese army.

⁸ In 1983, when the movement was formed, the SPLM and the SPLA were distinct organisations with separate leadership. The SPLA was under the command of John Garang and was considered strictly military in scope. The SPLM, under the leadership of Joseph Oduho, was considered the political arm of the movement and it issued its early political manifesto. The distinction between the two wings of the movement has become increasingly less significant as Garang has emerged as both the political and the military leader.

⁹ See 'Statement by the Sudan People's Liberation Movement', in Africa Contemporary Record (17) 1984-85, pp C32-C38.

By this time, the SPLM had become a well-established movement. Militarily, it operated over a wide area, and it had succeeded in halting work on the oil pipeline from Bentiu to Kosti and on the Jonglei Canal. Politically, it had established itself as one of the parties that had to be consulted in the reconstruction of the Sudan after the Numeiri era. At this time the SPLM also enjoyed the support of Ethiopia, Libya and less importantly, South Yemen. Libya could provide military aid, but Ethiopia played a crucial part, because it gave the SPLM safe rear bases outside the Sudan. Neither Ethiopia nor Libya, however, could be counted upon to remain firm allies of the SPLM, since it was ultimately a matter of indifference to them as to who ruled the southern Sudan. For Qaddafi, support for the SPLM was simply a means of getting even with Numeiri, who had angered him by spurning early Libyan attempts at unification with the Sudan and by establishing instead a close relationship with Egypt. For Ethiopia, support for the SPLM was above all a bargaining asset, to be traded, as Emperor Haile Selassie had done in 1972, against Sudanese support for the Eritrean liberation movements.

The coup d'état against Numeiri led to a sudden change in the position of Libya. Qaddafi saw the crisis as a chance to decrease the influence of Egypt in the Sudan and magnify his own. He thus terminated support for the SPLM and made overtures to Khartoum. The transitional government was receptive, in part because Libya could provide both oil and weapons, commodities the bankrupt and besieged Sudanese government badly needed, and partly because Libya was seen as a possible counter-balance to Egypt, whose influence had grown considerably under Numeiri, creating a fear of domination among many Sudanese. Qaddafi personally visited the Sudan on 18 May 1985, the first foreign leader to go there since the coup.

¹⁰ ibid., p B75.

This initial visit was followed by several concrete measures, such as some free oil shipments, the signing in July 1985 of a military aid pact involving logistical support and training, and the issuing of visas to Sudanese seeking jobs in Libya at a time workers of other nationalities were being expelled.¹¹ There was also a significant increase in the number of Libyans stationed in the Sudan, including a number of what the US Embassy defined as 'known terrorists'.¹² Less threatening to American personnel in Khartoum, but politically more significant, was the fact that Libyan troops started entering western Sudan, and even remaining there for long periods, ostensibly as part of their operations in Chad.

In March 1986, Libya further helped the Sudan by loaning two Tupolev-22 bombers for an attack on the SPLM-held town of Rumbeck, and by providing 2.2 million barrels of oil in time to alleviate the shortages around the time of the election.¹³ In a very short time, Libya thus established itself as a very useful ally for the transitional government and later for Sadiq.

Libya's turnaround from backing the SPLM to backing the government did not lead to any change in the war situation. The SPLM was well entrenched, did not appear short of supplies to continue fighting, and still received the backing of Ethiopia. And while Libyan help could secure the government's victory on specific occasions, such as the battle over Rumbeck, it did not even remotely make it possible for the Sudanese army to defeat the SPLM completely.

The transitional government thus initiated the search for a political solution, but it met with no success, because it was paralysed by its own ¹¹ The military pact with Libya was signed in Tripoli on 8 July 1985, with Libya pledging to provide logistical support and training. See Africa News, 15 July 1985. In the same period, Libya also started issuing more work permits for Sudanese workers, despite the fact that the overall number of foreign workers was being cut back drastically. See Los Angeles Times, 19 March 1986.

¹² Since the overthrow of Numeiri, Libyan troops have undoubtedly been stationed in the Sudan, although their number is not clear. The SPLM has accused Libya of stationing as many as 13,000 troops in the southern Sudan. This is almost certainly not correct. Libyan troops are stationed along the Chadian border to serve Libyan policy there, rather than the policies of the central Sudanese government in the southern Sudan. See Christian Science Monitor, 14 August 1986, and 19 August 1986; Africa Confidential, 4 June 1986.

¹³ Africa News, 21 April 1986.

temporary nature, the delicate political balance which existed in the country and the lack of a clear policy. While it recognised the importance of opening a dialogue with the SPLM and in theory accepted the idea that the southern movement had a legitimate role to play in post-Numeiri Sudan, the transitional government never acted. However, it allowed an unofficial, non-government group, the National Alliance for the Salvation of the Country, to hold talks with the SPLM.

A meeting between the SPLM and the National Alliance was held at the Koka Dam resort in Ethiopia on 19–24 March 1986 (just before the elections) to explore the conditions under which official talks might be held. The Alliance was a coalition of labour leaders, politicians and professionals which had been formed at the time of the coup against Numeiri. The Koka Dam meeting did not obtain any decisive result, but it was considered encouraging by the participants. The major points discussed were the repeal of the sharia, the abrogation of all foreign military pacts—the SPLM feared the mutual defence pact with Egypt might be used to justify Egyptian intervention—and the holding of a constitutional conference. Many details were left unanswered, including who should participate in the constitutional conference, but an agreement was reached to hold a further meeting on 7 May 1986.

The elections halted this process. The new government, anxious to take charge, refused to give a role to an unofficial organisation, but it was too disorganised and uncertain of its policies to take the initiative itself. On 31 July 1986, however, John Garang and Sadiq al-Mahdi had a meeting in Addis Ababa, where the Prime Minister had been attending a summit conference of the Organisation of African Unity (OAU). The two met again on 11 August 1986 but at this point the dialogue broke down over Garang's request that the government repeal the September laws immediately and without replacing them with any other kind of Islamic legislation. As we have already shown, Sadiq could not comply with such a request without undermining his own position. By this time, the majority of parties in the assembly had already demonstrated clearly that they opposed the repeal of the September laws: when the so-called 'African bloc' of southern members repeatedly threatened to resign during July 1986 and even staged a walk-out over the issue, other parties refused to make concessions.

The already slim hope of reaching an agreement between the government and the SPLM was definitively dashed by the downing of a Sudan Air plane near Malakal on 17 August 1986. The incident occurred shortly after the SPLM announced that it would shoot down all planes flying over 'its' territory, including those carrying food aid. Since the incident, the government and the SPLM have not held any direct talks, and even contacts between the SPLM and the National Alliance have produced no results. Garang remains adamant about the repeal of the sharia. For his part, Sadiq al-Mahdi no longer accords any legitimacy to the SPLM. In an interview with a Jordanian newspaper in late November 1986, he argued that under Numeiri the opposition by the SPLM had internal causes and in addition received the support of Libya, South Yemen and Ethiopia. After the coup, the internal causes had ceased to exist, while Libya and South Yemen had withdrawn their aid. 'Therefore,' he concluded, 'the present rebel movement is a foreign Ethiopian aggression against the Sudan . . . This movement has now become exposed as a subservient foreign movement.'¹⁴ In the same vein, Radio Omdurman launched a campaign to discredit the SPLM, portraying Garang as a Soviet stooge and a 'tribalist'. 'The Russians promised him that he would be a great member of the Kremlin . . . As for Garang's attitude toward the other tribes of the-South, he declares a tribal jihad against the other tribes.'¹⁵ The government also tried to spread rumours of Garang's death in November 1986, apparently hoping to cause a division within the movement.

The third major problem area the government has to confront is the economy, and there, too, the prospects are dim. The country is saddled with a very large foreign debt, estimated at $13 billion in late 1986.¹⁶ It is $300 million in arrear on its debt to the IMF, and $100 million in arrear on repayments to the Arab Monetary Fund. Total debt servicing obligations amount to $930 million a year, but total government revenue was estimated at only $538.2 million in 1985-86 and was expected to rise to $1.1 billion in 1986.¹⁷

The inflation rate was estimated at 40-50 per cent, and industrial production had dwindled to about 20 per cent of capacity.¹⁸ Total revenue from agriculture decreased 33 per cent between 1984 and 1985, while sugar production was down 28 per cent. While lack of rain was largely responsible for the sharp drop in 1985, and agriculture was beginning to recover in 1986, the market for cotton, a major export,

¹⁴ Foreign Broadcast Information Service (FBIS) 5(227) 25 November 1986.

¹⁵ FBIS 5(220) 14 November 1986.

¹⁶ FBIS 5(227) 25 November 1986. Figures were provided by Sadiq al-Mahdi in an interview. Most sources put the Sudanese debt at $10 billion.

¹⁷ Middle East Economic Digest (MEED) 30 August-3 September 1986 and 27 September-3 October 1986.

¹⁸ MEED 25-31 October 1986.

remained sluggish. The Sudan was forced to sell at a discount, or to barter, much of the cotton produced in 1985, and the situation appeared similar in 1986, with only 10 per cent of the new crop sold by the middle of the year.¹⁹

The new government's response to the collapse of the economy was inaction. The budget was not announced until September 1986, with a three month delay. A recovery programme had not yet been put in place at the end of 1986, despite numerous contacts with, and much pressure from, the IMF, the World Bank and various Arab funds. The major problem did not appear to be any disagreements about policy between these organisations and the Sudanese government. Rather, the government of Sadiq al-Mahdi appeared unable to tackle the economic problems in any guise.

Inaction sums up the condition of the Sudan under its first democratic government in seventeen years. The government has not acted on the sharia, it has not made any progress towards negotiating with the SPLM or otherwise devising a solution to the problem of the south, and it has not taken any effective steps concerning the economy.

The only area where Sadiq al-Mahdi has been very active since becoming Prime Minister has been diplomacy. This may partly be an attempt on his part to escape the difficult problems of the country by pursuing the easier path of a high visibility foreign policy. However, it is also a recognition of the fact that the Sudan cannot solve its problems alone, either because their cause is not purely domestic or because the solutions require outside intervention or have foreign policy implications.

The economic problems of the Sudan, for example, are to a large extent the result of mismanagement by the Numeiri regime, particularly in its final years. It launched grandiose development schemes, squandered money, and allowed private individuals to influence economic policies for private gain.²⁰ But this is not the entire story. The oil-producing Arab states of the Gulf also contributed to the economic collapse by promoting, and then abandoning, an ambitious development programme for the Sudan in the mid-1980s. The 'breadbasket' scheme called for a $6,000 million investment in massive agricultural development projects expected to provide food for the entire Arab world. The discovery that such investments were not particularly profitable in the short run, coupled with political disagreement over Numeiri's decision to accept the signing of the peace treaty between Egypt and Israel, led the sponsors of the projects to lose interest. This left the Sudan deeply in debt over half-finished projects. Furthermore, whatever its causes, the present economic crisis cannot be overcome without an infusion of aid.

¹⁹ MEED 5-11 July 1986.

²⁰ The extent of economic mismanagement under Numeiri is documented in Mansour Khalid, Numeiri and the Revolution of Dis-May, London: Kegan Paul International, 1985.

The other problems have a foreign component, too. While the war in the south was not provoked by Ethiopia and Libya, but by the continuing imbalance between the northern and southern regions, its outcome has become entangled in the Sudan's relations with its neighbours. Ethiopia in particular can make it easier or more difficult for the SPLM to operate. The loss of Ethiopian support would create serious difficulties for the SPLM, just as the loss of Sudanese support would create problems for the Eritrean movements. The 1972 Addis Ababa agreement which put an end to the first civil war was underpinned by an understanding between Emperor Haile Selassie and President Numeiri that they would cease to help each other's opposition movements. The issue of the repeal of the sharia also has foreign policy implications. Islamic laws were not introduced by Numeiri because of foreign pressure. Rather, he responded to the increased militancy of the Muslim Brotherhood and very probably to his own psychological need, as a sick and ageing man, to turn to religion. But the sharia is now part of the Sudan's image held by its neighbours and its repeal would be interpreted as a political statement by other countries in the region.

Complicating the situation, the three issues are interrelated. Thus, if the Sudan turned to the oil-producing Arab countries for economic aid, such a move would be perceived by the SPLM as an affirmation of the country's Arab and Islamic identity, and this would become a further obstacle to negotiations. An attempt to obtain more aid from the West, on the other hand, would be perceived by the most extremist Islamic groups as a return to Numeiri's policies, and it would heighten their opposition. Repealing the sharia and negotiating peace with the SPLM, on the other hand, could easily lead to accusations that the government is becoming more radical and opening the door, wittingly or unwittingly, to the Soviet Union, which is deemed to support the SPLM through Ethiopia.

The foreign policy of Sadiq al-Mahdi reflects the dilemmas involved in finding acceptable sources of support. He has tried to diversify the country's relations, moving away from the USA and Egypt, which had bolstered Numeiri's position. Increasingly, however, the absence of real alternatives seems to be pushing him back in the same direction as his predecessor.

Under the Numeiri regime, the Sudan attracted considerable amounts of aid from Egypt, the USA and, somewhat less reliably, the oil-producing countries. Egypt provided aid because of its eternal fear that a hostile government in the Sudan might some day reduce the flow of Nile water to Egypt, strangling it economically. Having found Numeiri to be a cooperative neighbour, Anwar Sadat and later, Hosni Mubarak, were interested in keeping him in power. Egyptian aid was thus mostly military, with economic cooperation limited to projects, such as the Jonglei Canal, of great importance to Egypt itself. The signing of a mutual defence pact in 1976 and of an Integration Charter in 1982 formalised the relations between the two countries.

The USA, too, found Numeiri reliable in his foreign policy. From the American point of view, the Sudan was on the right side of three different issues. In the general Middle East conflict, it accepted the peace treaty between Israel and Egypt. In the East-West global confrontation, it was the only consistently pro-Western government in the Horn of Africa, and thus a bulwark against the possibility of an expansion of Soviet influence from neighbouring Ethiopia. Finally, the Sudan was firmly anti-Libyan, particularly after Qaddafi supported an almost successful Ansar attempt to overthrow Numeiri in July 1976. American aid to the Sudan thus increased steadily, reaching about $200 million a year by 1985. This aid was suspended at the beginning of that year, shortly after the Sudan also lost its IMF drawing rights, in an attempt to force the country to carry out some economic reforms. While $67 million was released as a gesture of goodwill during Numeiri's visit to the USA a short time later, the rest remained frozen following the coup.

The transitional government changed the foreign policy of the country enough to differentiate itself from Numeiri but not sufficiently to create a clear new pattern. It accepted aid from Libya, and became cooler towards Egypt, but it abrogated neither the mutual defence treaty of 1976 nor the Integration Charter of 1982. Similarly, it tried to establish some distance from the USA, while continuing to seek its economic and even military aid. In reality, in 1985-86 emergency food aid to drought victims brought American assistance to the Sudan to the unprecedented level of over $400 million.

Sadiq's foreign policy has been very active, but no clearer in its orientation. He has travelled widely, announced a policy of maintaining good relations with all countries, and cast a wide net in trying to gain supporters, even attempting to establish close relations with Iran, a country that has never played any role in the Sudan. While he has become somewhat more cautious towards Qaddafi, he has signed new trade agreements with Libya, including one in August 1986 providing for the bartering of $30 million worth of Sudanese camels and meat for oil, chemicals and cement. At the same time he has accepted renewed shipments of Egyptian military aid, though relations between the two countries are still not cordial. He talks of non-alignment and has invited Soviet technicians back to rehabilitate pre-1971 projects, but he is not seeking a close alliance with the Soviet Union. In the meantime, he is discussing with the World Bank and the IMF measures to relaunch the economy and he is trying to attract more US aid.

None of these steps has brought the Sudan closer to solving its problems. Egypt can provide some military aid, but it is economically bankrupt itself. The Gulf countries can provide some funds, but they are no longer as cash-rich and free-spending as they were in the mid-1970s. They no longer dream of $6 billion investments in the Sudan. American aid is decreasing sharply and is likely to continue doing so, even if relations improve, because of US domestic budget constraints. Of an aid request by the US administration of $223 million for the fiscal year 1987, already well below previous levels, only $69 million was allocated. Food aid accounts for $40 million of this total and development aid for only $22 million. The IMF and the World Bank have been involved in protracted discussions with the Sudan, but there has been no agreement on debt rescheduling or new loans. Sadiq's active foreign policy, in other words, has produced few concrete results.

It is not easy to find reasons for optimism about the Sudan a year after the return to democracy. The major domestic problems cannot be solved without external help, but there is no sign that sufficient external help is available from any source. And no matter where the Sudan turns to for aid, this is going to lead to domestic complications. It is not necessarily that the problems of the Sudan cannot be solved in an absolute sense. It is conceivable that negotiations could put an end to the war in the south, and that a compromise could be reached on the sharia, perhaps not by repealing it but by applying it only to certain regions or exclusively to the Muslim population. The debt can be, and is bound to be, rescheduled, because there is no possible way the government can make the payments expected of it now. The economy can revive, for the potential resources of the Sudan have not vanished.

It has become increasingly clear since the April 1986 elections that the government of Sadiq al-Mahdi is unlikely to accomplish any of this. It is handicapped by the clearly Islamic nature of the groups that support it, which is likely to prevent it from tackling the issue of the sharia and thus from negotiating with Garang. Furthermore, it is inhibited in all its actions by the fragility of the government coalition, making decisions of any type dangerous. There is an air of déjà vu about the present situation. The very real desire for democracy by the country's intelligentsia, and the determination to make it work, have been defeated before by the hard reality of the socio-political make-up of the Sudan. Democratic elections tend to ensure a central role for the religious organisations while risking the creation of governments too weak and divided to tackle the country's problems.

The politics of AIDS in Kenya*

AIDS in the African context

Let us at once state the necessary and the dramatic. There may at present be 10 million people in the world who have been infected by the AIDS (Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome) virus. By 1990, according to the World Health Organisation (WHO), there may be as many as 100 million. Over 100 countries have reported AIDS victims, including thirty African nations. But half of those estimated to be infected world-wide live in the eleven countries that comprise Central Africa, and it is there that 50,000 to several hundred thousand lives may already have been lost.¹

The African AIDS connection was first recognised in 1983 by physicians in Europe who reported AIDS-like illnesses among their African patients.² These incidences prompted clinical studies by Western researchers in Rwanda and Zaire where people with similar illnesses and immunological problems were found.³ With the subsequent isolation of the human T-lymphotropic virus type III (HTLV-III/LAV), now referred to as the human immuno-deficiency virus (HIV), and the development of screening procedures to detect antibodies against HIV (the ELISA and the Western blot technique), further studies confirmed that African patients were suffering from the ill-effects caused by the same virus.⁴

Estimates of the extent of those infected abound in the scientific and popular press even if they are at times difficult to prove with certainty. Yet despite the latitude that we may give to a sensationalist press and its exaggerations, the message is appallingly clear: if what is predicted does happen, then countries in the hardest-hit region, those touching the

* The author wishes to thank the American Council of Learned Societies, the Social Science Research Council, and the University of Hawaii for their support.

¹ Newsweek, 11 November 1986; Time, 16 February 1987.

² N Clumeck et al., 'Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome in black Africans', The Lancet (I) 1983, p 642; N Clumeck et al., 'Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome in African patients', New England Journal of Medicine (310) 1984, pp 492-7.

³ P Perre et al., 'Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome in Rwanda', The Lancet (II) 1984, pp 62-5; P Piot et al., 'Acquired Immunodeficiency syndrome in a heterosexual population in Zaire', The Lancet (II) 1984, pp 65-9.

⁴ J Biggar, 'The AIDS Problem in Africa', The Lancet 1 1986, pp 79-82.

Great Rift Valley—Zambia, Uganda, Rwanda, Zaire, Burundi, Tanzania—face a serious challenge that may, in some cases, threaten their already fragile political and economic stability. In Lusaka, for example, 15 per cent of the adult population, and 30 per cent of all its men may be infected.⁵ Serological testing of healthy adults in Kigali, Rwanda has shown 18 per cent are positive to HIV.⁶ In Bujumbura, the capital of Burundi, it is estimated that one out of every ten adults carries the AIDS virus; and in the Rakai area of southwest Uganda, one of the most heavily AIDS-stricken areas in the world, an incredible 30 per cent of the population are estimated to be infected.⁷ For Central and East Africa, deadly AIDS statistics seem all too easily available and they seem to be getting worse all the time.

Kenya, while not untouched by the virus, has, according to most accounts, been relatively spared. Although high rates of infection among prostitutes have been reported, the overall prevalence of the disease in Kenya has been considerably lower than in neighbouring countries.⁸ But AIDS is in Kenya. And although Kenya is the country in the region best equipped to mount an effective prevention programme, it has failed in many respects to do so. Despite its comparatively well-developed medical infrastructure and working coterie of Western scientists, its efforts have fallen short of even the minimum requirements suggested by its statistics.

Reporting AIDS in Kenya

In January 1985, under the headlines 'Killer disease in Kenya' and 'Horror sex disease in Kakamenga', the Kenyan press made public its first serious interest in the AIDS problem.⁹ In these stories, the press reported that in the Kakamenga District of Kenya four cases of AIDS had been diagnosed and that the patients had subsequently died. Later accounts contradicted the story, quoting a hostile district medical officer who claimed that the deaths were not due to AIDS but were simply extreme cases of skin cancer. Despite the confusion and the obvious need for clarification, relative silence followed until the Autumn of 1985

⁵ Time, 16 February 1987.

⁶ P Van de Perre et al., 'HTLV-III/LAV infection in central Africa'. Presented at the International Symposium on African AIDS, Brussels 1985.

⁷ Newsweek, 24 November 1986.

⁸ For study on transmission, see J K Kreiss et al., 'AIDS virus infection in Nairobi prostitutes, Spread of the epidemic to East Africa', New England Journal of Medicine (314) 1985, pp 414-18.

⁹ Standard (Nairobi) 15 and 18 January 1985.

when Western press accounts began to focus sharply on the somewhat frightening implications of AIDS research in Central Africa. Realising the importance of these studies, the respected Kenyan magazine, The Weekly Review (Nairobi), took up the cause of informing the public. It issued a carefully worded summary of some of the material printed in the West, citing the numbers of AIDS victims reported in Zaire, Rwanda, Uganda and Kenya. In September 1985, under the growing public pressure caused by these reports, the Kenyan Ministry of Health unofficially let it be known that only twenty victims with AIDS had actually been diagnosed in Kenya since May 1985.¹⁰ Officially, however, the government continued to deny to foreign reporters the presence of AIDS within its borders, until the now famous study of Kenyan prostitutes broke in the international press. In this study of ninety prostitutes in Nairobi, over half were reportedly infected with the HIV virus and three-quarters of these women showed signs of significant illness.¹¹ Kenyan leaders who had up to this point steadfastly avoided the health care implications of AIDS in the country, now became incensed by these disclosures and by others, which they conceived to be part of a Western racist campaign to exaggerate the prevalence of AIDS in Africa. Yet the immediate effect of this unwanted publicity was to wake up a somewhat lethargic Kenyan health officialdom, which until then (and still now) had tended to play down the AIDS threat.

In October 1985, Kenyan government leaders, concerned about jeopardising the local tourist industry (which generated 600,000 visitors in 1986) protested through the national press that the reports about AIDS in Kenya were alarmist and untrue. Americans and others in the West were being given the impression that AIDS was sweeping across Africa even though the virus had been documented in only 'a handful of countries: Zaire, Rwanda, Burundi, and Uganda'. Even the President of Kenya, Daniel arap Moi, was prompted to remark that the foreign press was conducting a 'hate campaign' and urged wananchi (Kenyan citizens) to 'turn a deaf ear to our enemies'.¹² This kind of reaction gained support in Kenya as Central Africa came increasingly under the scrutiny of an inquisitive Western scientific community, eager to answer critical epidemiological and clinical questions about the HIV virus. The international media, heady with the potential importance of the AIDS story, also began invading Central Africa in search of answers to questions of its own, questions that would invariably embarrass and call to account African health officials.

¹⁰ Weekly Review (Nairobi) 13 September 1985.

¹¹ International Herald Tribune (IHT), 9/10 November 1985.

¹² Weekly Review, 11 October 1985.

In November 1985, the New York Times quoted leading American scientists, Robert Gallo of the National Cancer Institute and William Haseltine of Harvard University, as arguing strongly, on the basis of early epidemiological studies, that the AIDS epidemic probably began in Africa. Kenyan officials were outraged and reacted swiftly to minimise the impact of these reports by confiscating the entire shipment of the 9 November 1985 issue of the International Herald Tribune in which reports began of Lawrence Altman's New York Times series on African AIDS research and its implications.¹³ The African offensive in Kenya to combat the Western 'African origin' theory of AIDS then began in earnest. An editorial in Medicus, the official publication of the Kenya Medical Association, suggested the possibility that tourists from around the world had introduced AIDS into Africa, and complained of the West's apparent need for an African connection for every disease.¹⁴ One columnist of a major Kenyan daily went so far as to claim that infected foreigners were deliberately being sent to Africa as part of a global conspiracy of multinational drug companies to produce African 'guinea pigs' for Western AIDS research.¹⁵

The hostility of African governments including that of Kenya was also witnessed in the low attendance of African scientists and physicians at a major European conference, ostensibly about AIDS in Africa, which was held at about the same time. At this conference where 700 AIDS experts gathered from around the world to discuss the issues involved, only fifty delegates from African countries were present. These delegates, however, made the African position very clear in a joint statement challenging the contention that AIDS originated in Africa. They feared that 'a blanket identification of Africans with AIDS could lead to large-scale discrimination against nationals of the continent elsewhere in the world'. Indeed, later press accounts cited the case of two Zairean brothers who were expelled from a school in Brussels when it was reported to the authorities by their family doctor that they were carrying the AIDS virus. The tests were subsequently found to be incorrect.¹⁶ More recent reports of discussions over possible restrictions on world travel for citizens of infected areas have given a prophetic ring to these

¹³ IHT, 24/25 December 1985.

¹⁴ Weekly Review, 29 November 1985.

¹⁵ See Robin McKie's 'Panic: the story of AIDS', New York: Thorsons Publishing Group, 1986, p. 84.

¹⁶ Weekly Review, 29 November 1985.

original fears.¹⁷ Yet, in addition to these legitimate concerns, it later became obvious that African governments were exerting significant pressure on both African and Western scholars and researchers not to participate in the sharing of AIDS information on Africa. These pressures included a number of increasingly restrictive government conditions concerning the conduct and publication of research on AIDS in African countries.¹⁸

The image of AIDS held by the West was not easily digestible by Africans. Yet, the African defence against the 'African origin' theory, and the consequent hostility to the West, went deeper than the fear of being stigmatised. It questioned the scientific and methodological grounds of the studies being undertaken, as well as the projections of AIDS casualties highlighted by the media. Gheorghiu Grigorieff argued against the theory in his book, No to AIDS (Non au SIDA), saying in part that non-African researchers did not take into consideration physiological differences between black Africans and their non-African counterparts, and that carrying the AIDS virus may possibly be part of Africans' normal haematological make-up.¹⁹ Furthermore, later scientific reviews of the early AIDS epidemiological surveys also confirmed African suspicions that the extent of seropositivity among the population may have been greatly overestimated.²⁰

More importantly, however, the African response was in defence of an Africa that, as the local press was wont to say, was an easy target to shoot at. Countries such as Kenya which have little money to conduct their own studies, are consequently dependent on the West for information and research. Health budgets are stretched to their limits in fighting malaria, diarrhoea, cholera, malnutrition and other maladies more frequent in Africa. African politicians are also shrewd enough to know that Western science itself often comes to Africa with dirty hands. According to one Kenyan journalist,

The competition between research institutions for a share of research financing may also lead unscrupulous scientists to put forward half-baked theories in hopes of attracting funds. Quacks can easily thrive in Africa where they are far from more respectable researchers likely to cross-check their findings and methodology.²¹

¹⁷ See A J Zuckerman, 'Would screening prevent the international spread of AIDS?', The Lancet (II) 1986, pp 1208-9; and Associated Press account of WHO meeting on international travel, 'Experts against check of travelers for AIDS', 5 March 1987.

¹⁸ McKie, 'Panic . . .', p 79.

¹⁹ New African (London) September 1986, p 32.

²⁰ Biggar, 'The AIDS Problem . . .', p 80.

²¹ Weekly Review, 29 November 1985.

Yet, in spite of these initial denials, Kenya started to 'open up' officially. In November 1985, in response to a question from a member of the Kenyan Parliament, the Minister of Health, Peter Nyakiano revealed that there had been eight persons conclusively diagnosed as suffering from AIDS in Kenya and fourteen others suspected as having the disease. Of the twenty-two patients only ten were Kenyan. Seven of the eight diagnosed patients had already died. The local press hailed this frankness as a welcome sign that the government had finally admitted that AIDS existed in Kenya and was possibly preparing to doing something about it. But the admission also drew some criticism. While Western newspaper articles may have been exaggerated or even racist in their implications, one Kenyan journalist complained that 'African governments are to blame for creating an information vacuum by placing a lid on the AIDS problem.'²²

Since the public explosion in the Autumn of 1985, the government has pursued a deliberate, although not necessarily vigorous, AIDS reporting and prevention policy. It agreed in late 1985 to report the incidences of AIDS to the World Health Organisation and has since held regular press conferences to up-date the information being given to the Kenyan public. An authoritative statement given when I was in Kenya came from the Director of Medical Services, Dr Karuga Koinange, on 12 August 1986. He reported that a total of 109 persons with AIDS had so far been diagnosed in Kenya. He explained that Kenya was diagnosing about four AIDS victims each month. Of the victims, 65 per cent were in the western part of Kenya (Nyanza and western provinces), 30 per cent were in central Kenya, and 5 per cent were spread among the Rift Valley, and eastern and coastal provinces. Victims were equally distributed according to sex, about 30 per cent were non-Kenyans, and only two were homosexuals.²³

But these numbers, it must be remembered, must be approached in the full knowledge of our ignorance of the hidden battles that have taken place, the silences imposed, and the sectional interest reflected in their construction and eventual public consumption. The problem with numbers is not just a technical one, exacerbated by the conditions of the African context. Numbers also reflect ideological, and political problems as well. In Africa, the numbers that constitute an important part of the 'language of AIDS' are severely compromised by massive problems of appropriate diagnosis and diagnostic protocol, of basic and accurate record-keeping, of local cultural and political sensitivities, of the manipulations that are part of Western 'grantsmanship', and, finally, of irresponsible and deliberate manipulation by official power-brokers.

²² Weekly Review, 29 November 1985.

²³ Kenya Times (Nairobi) 12 August 1986.

Certainly the government in Kenya can be criticised for being slow to take the AIDS epidemic seriously enough. The Ministry of Health still does not see AIDS prevention efforts as a national priority, although it claims to be monitoring the situation closely.²⁴ But an important question remains in this AIDS numbers game beyond the problems inherent in diagnosis, record-keeping, and interpretation: Is the government, even given these limitations, reporting the incidence of AIDS and other relevant information honestly and thoroughly? Or to put it another way: Is the Kenyan Ministry of Health deliberately under-reporting the incidence of AIDS in Kenya?

There is some cause to suspect that this may be the case. In the announcement of August 1986 by the Ministry of Health referred to above, Dr Koinange reported that there had been a total of 109 diagnosed persons with AIDS since 1985 averaging about four cases per month for the last twelve months. The reporting in all three national newspapers, The Nation (Nairobi) The Standard (Nairobi), and the Kenya Times (Nairobi) was essentially the same, all carrying the statement without seriously questioning how those figures were formulated. No attempt was made to estimate the numbers of people who may be infected with the virus, although a central province dermatologist, Dr Irungu Mwangi, announced that there were '300 confirmed carriers' of AIDS in Kenya.²⁵ In my own direct conversations with researchers of the Kenya Medical Research institute (KMRI) in Nairobi over 340 patients with clinical symptoms common to AIDS had tested as positive for AIDS antibodies in the first six months of 1986 alone. Add to this fact, probable government tampering with AIDS statistics and major gaps in the AIDS reporting system itself, and any numbers officially deriving from Kenya become highly suspect.²⁶ In fairness to Kenyan officials, they are not alone in their hesitation to report on the incidence of AIDS. Jonathan Mann, head of the WHO's AIDS prevention efforts, suspects a 'huge' under-reporting of AIDS by countries in general.²⁷

²⁴ Weekly Review, 14 February 1986 and Kenya Times, 12 August 1986.

²⁵ New African, p 31.

²⁶ Author's visit to Kenya, August 1986.

²⁷ United Press International, 15 February 1987.

AIDS IN KENYA

The lack of local press interest in problems of AIDS detection and prevention is remarkable, given the fairly open access of reporters to KMRI. When it comes to AIDS, however, the truth seems to be that the Kenyan press has all but abdicated its role as public watchdog, and is under the control of government censors. There is no critical press in Kenya and any serious political opposition is clandestine or a mere product of the extensive rumour mill that forms part of any expression of discontent with the government. The press simply records and reports official statements. Typically, it does not analyse or evaluate the government's performance. This is not the case with the foreign press, however, who continue to keep the AIDS issue alive much to the consternation of public officials. Following President Moi's uncomfortable trip to the USA last March where he was haunted by press questions on human rights abuses in his suppression of the Mwakenya movement as well as on AIDS in Kenya, KANU National Secretary, Laban Kitele, threatened to censor all Nairobi-based foreign correspondents. He criticised all of these reports as an 'orchestrated move by certain foreign powers and self-exiled Kenyan dissidents'.²⁸

Some of the problems in press and government reporting are related to the absence of what may be called a politically active AIDS constituency. Unlike the USA with its highly organised, efficient and widespread 'Gay Movement', there is no comparable group with the potential to galvanise, articulate and document AIDS activities in Kenya and other African states. These countries, to their detriment, have no similar catalyst to stimulate and keep objective their AIDS efforts. This gap is partly due to the contrasting constellation of AIDS victims in Africa as compared with the West. AIDS in the West primarily affects the homosexual population (70 per cent of victims) unlike Africa, where the virus takes an equal toll of men and women. These factors to some extent explain the acceptance of the rather impoverished official response and corresponding lack of commitment in the face of this serious medical problem. This criticism does not necessarily entail a lack of sympathy for the massive problems that these agencies already face. The health issues they are confronting are enormous; cholera, malaria, accidents, poor medical care and facilities, and chronic shortages of essential supplies are all too frequent and demanding. Certainly, in the face of these problems, the difficulties in the way of obtaining the resources needed for an adequate AIDS campaign must seem overwhelming.

²⁸ New York Times, 31 March 1987.

AIDS prevention efforts in Kenya

The Autumn of 1985 also witnessed the formation of the Kenya National AIDS Committee to assist the Ministry of Health in its prevention campaign. This committee which only meets every two months is made up of physicians and researchers. They began working in January 1986 on AIDS guidelines for health care professionals and the public. The announcement of the formation of this committee came in the wake of a report that medical staff in a leading private hospital in Nairobi had refused to handle a diagnosed AIDS patient. Doctors from KMRI were called in to take the patient to Kenyatta National Hospital where most AIDS patients receive treatment. These guidelines were issued at the end of January 1986 to senior doctors in Nairobi and to those in provincial hospitals. A series of workshops for those physicians was also conducted by KMRI staff on the management of AIDS patients. A central unit for blood testing and patient profile make-up was established, and a cost analysis of screening the nation's blood supply was begun. In these guidelines, confidentiality was stressed. However, keeping information confidential is jeopardised by an over-elaborate and loose system of reporting. Information on a confirmed AIDS diagnosis goes first to the director of the hospital involved, then the doctor, then presumably the patient. The guidelines also called for hospitals to set up AIDS registers as well as to establish hospital committees to oversee discharges of AIDS patients.²⁹

The government's public education campaign consists of periodic statements placed in the national media (both in Swahili and English) offering information about the conditions of transmission, and prevention measures. The Ministry has also distributed pamphlets and posters. They are not, however, easily accessible or available, and their distribution is often more discussed than seen. Posters have been reported to have been widely distributed in those areas reporting the highest incidence of AIDS victims, although I did not see any in Nairobi or Mombasa. The nature of the information has ranged between the over-technical and clinical to the vague and misleading, such as those by the Director of Medical Services, to refrain from 'grazing in other pastures'. The material bounces between confusing explanations of medical terminology to blatantly sexist references as to the unfortunate implications of AIDS for manly sexual practices. Yet, there is important information being distributed also. However, it was only in August 1986 that any serious attempt was made to mention condoms in the prevention literature. That delay is somewhat understandable given their high cost and low availability, and the problem of their acceptance by men. These are major problems that still receive little attention in Kenya.

²⁹ Weekly Review, 31 January 1986.

It is clear that there is much public concern about AIDS in Kenya. Letters to daily newspapers frequently request educational materials on AIDS. A public lecture on sexually transmitted diseases, held at Kerugoya Catholic Church in the central province attracted thousands of eager listeners. And the readiness of the press to report any 'approved' detail of the epidemic reflects the commodity value of AIDS talk. But expressions of public sentiment in interviews and public comments have also included the negative, such as calls for the government to screen all foreigners for AIDS or to round up AIDS victims and put them in a 'secret place'. Then there is also the charge by Kenya's rising right-wing evangelicals that AIDS is 'a clear sign of divine judgement in connection with homosexuality and drug abuse'.³⁰ The fact that these divine assessments fail to fit the reality of the African AIDS predicament appears to be of little consequence.

One troubling silence in the public discourse on AIDS in Kenya involves the pressing problem of blood supply for transfusion. Not surprisingly, the blood supply in Kenya is not adequately protected. Infections through contaminated blood may account for as many as 10 per cent of all AIDS victims in Africa.³¹ It has been reported that screening the blood supply for AIDS patients is occurring in Nairobi and Mombasa, and that by March 1987 Kenya will, according to Dr Koinange, become the first African nation to screen all blood for the AIDS virus.³² There are, however, many good reasons to be sceptical of this proclamation. There is, for example, a widespread lack of testing kits, complicated by a fast-moving blood supply, chronic blood shortages, and the absence of adequate blood reserves and storage facilities. These problems also prevent the storage of blood by those who themselves need to use it for forthcoming elective surgery.³³ In addition, the tendency in African medical practice to transfuse blood more frequently, raises even higher the risk of the spread of infection. All of these problems plus the cost of such active screening are certainly

³⁰ Weekly Review, 22 August 1986.

³¹ J M Mann, 'Epidemiology of LAV/HTLV-III in Africa'. Paper presented at the Second International Conference on AIDS, Paris 1986.

³² New York Times, 24 February 1987.

³³ Personal discussions with various Nairobi physicians.

demoralising, and have contributed to a feeble government response to this aspect of the AIDS crisis.

An additional problem is the transmission of the virus by the use of contaminated needles. Studies have already linked seropositivity with the number of injections received by patients.³⁴ Infection via this route is a major problem both in legitimate medical facilities in Kenya and on the street. Sterilisation or re-usable (and even what are meant to be disposable) needles and syringes is poor, owing to shortages of supplies and equipment, inadequate staff education, non-existent monitoring procedures, and the high number of patients. Even more troublesome is the danger of infection due to injections given by a wide variety of local healers (and charlatans) living in the shanties and in the bush. The cultural preference given to the injection as a mode of treatment has spawned a host of profiteers at the grass-root level. If one considers that an estimated 75 per cent of the population use folk-healers as the first line of health defence, the possible magnitude of the problem becomes apparent.³⁵

But while the problems of AIDS prevention may receive little attention in the press, those of regulation are reported in great detail. It is now common knowledge that Kenyans who fail to report to the authorities that they may have AIDS are liable for arrest. Recently a man at the provincial hospital in Nyeri who was suspected of having AIDS, and transferred to Kenyatta National Hospital in Nairobi, left the hospital on his own before his diagnosis was completed. The police and medical officers arrested the man in his home and took him back to the hospital where he was eventually given a 'conditional discharge'. Another man in Nairobi was suspected of having AIDS and admitted to Kenyatta National Hospital. His relatives were not allowed to enter his room and after his subsequent death his coffin was sealed and police and medical officers prohibited the public viewing of his body.³⁶ In a similar incident, public health officials in Mombasa refused permission to transport the body of a man who had died and was suspected of having AIDS. The man had to be buried in Mombasa and not his home town. His family was instructed to have no more than eight people at his funeral.³⁷

In a more recent display of medical policing, 275 women were picked up by the police in two separate sweeps in Eldama and in Kisumu

³⁴ Mann, 'Epidemiology . . .'; D A Feldman, 'Anthropology, AIDS and Africa', Medical Anthropological Quarterly (17) 1986, pp 38-40.

³⁵ Standard, 10 August 1986.

³⁶ New African, p 32-3.

³⁷ Weekly Review, 11 July 1986.

Kenya. They were all tested for sexually-transmitted diseases including AIDS.³⁸ These women faced criminal charges if they were tested positive on any STD. One should note that no similar sweeps were done on the men that frequented the bars where these women were picked up. The authorities claim the right to authorise these police hunts under the Kenyan Public Health Act, Section 17.

Observations

Recent press accounts have noted an increasing openness by African officials in discussions of the AIDS epidemic in their countries, and the WHO has become more aggressive in its efforts to engage African governments in AIDS reporting and prevention efforts.³⁹ But Kenya's political leaders have continued to react fiercely to any direct or implied criticism of their dealing with AIDS. When it was reported in the London press that Prince Charles would be carrying his own blood supply during his visits to Kenya, Malawi, and Swaziland, the President and several of his ministers condemned the 'malicious propaganda emanating from outside the country'.⁴⁰ This defensiveness has practical consequences for AIDS efforts in Kenya. The language governing these AIDS efforts is characterised by a number of major absences and silences. These gaps in the AIDS discourse in Kenya are conditioned by the environment of struggle found throughout Africa, which exerts a strong negative impact on attempts to combat AIDS on the continent. Contagion and prevention are cultural, social and political phenomena. Since AIDS preventive efforts fall mostly within the area of behavioural education, these gaps are all the more important since they blind us to a more thorough understanding of the social meaning of AIDS in Africa and the complex set of human processes which contribute to its spread.

I think it is safe to say that the language of AIDS in Kenya and in many other parts of Africa suffers from a lack of critical reflection and dialogue. At the local level, as I have indicated, frank, open, and honest discussion is smothered by the absence of a free press, the economic pressures exerted by tourism, and the politics of the Western scientific invasion of the area. These forces also operate at the regional and international levels but are further complicated by the politics of neo-colonialism and the struggles of the Third World against the cultural and political penetration of the West. AIDS talk in this atmosphere becomes very complicated indeed, and is infused with political agendas which have little to do with the immediate goals of AIDS prevention.

³⁸ Standard, 25 August 1985.

³⁹ New York Times, 17 November 1986.

⁴⁰ New York Times, 24 February 1987.

But there are other silences that must be addressed, in the voices that make up the AIDS language itself. Sacrificed in the African discourse on AIDS, for example, is the voice of the victim. There is no literature, no popular media, no major group articulating this voice. There is, in other words, no visible response from those who suffer from this malady, no dialogue with those who can most directly communicate the meaning of this pain. What is the social and cultural experience of the illness for Africans? How can preventive measures reflect and adapt to this experience? Where is the communication and learning between the fields of medicine, culture and AIDS? How will compassion and understanding be created in the absence of this voice? There are indications that most Africans know very little about AIDS and its prevention.⁴¹ This is not just the result of the lack of AIDS brochures. It is the product of the historical, cultural and political gap between the First and Third Worlds. One can gain a small measure of appreciation of the issues here by considering the difficulties experienced even by AIDS activists in the USA in finding an effective bridge between the language of AIDS prevention and that of homosexuality and intimacy. With this silence is lost the potentially positive impact on preventive efforts that comes when AIDS victims speak out.

There are, in addition, other victims silenced or ignored in the AIDS language of Kenya. Current AIDS talk reinforces heavy discrimination against women in Kenya and in other African countries. Given the male-oriented bias of the medical community, as well as the lack of an active AIDS constituency, AIDS talk becomes part of an arsenal of reasons to harass, abuse, and exploit the victims of the booming sex trade, namely, poor and disadvantaged women. The medical policing of these women proceeds with almost total disregard for due legal process and basic civil liberties. The weight of science and medicine now contributes to an already poor human rights record for women, and the AIDS language does nothing to reflect the suffering of these victims.

Finally, the African AIDS situation is further complicated not only by the political struggles but by the cultural ones as well. The language of AIDS in Africa is one derived from the West. It is a transplanted language that is dependent on the West for its meaning and continued development. It speaks in Western symbols and with a voice that was born from that cultural cosmology. It is not indigenous to Africa and thus is blind to the African world of meaning. For example, there are cultural practices, traditional rituals including a host of communal eating and drinking practices, that seem to be coming under what may be called the negative influence of AIDS preventive efforts. These practices are coming increasingly under review by anthropologists and social scientists who are moved by their concern over the potential for transmission of HIV.⁴² Where these practices are intact, they are fundamental to community bonding and the meaning of social life. Yet, they are all falling victim, justifiably or not, to both the negative impact of Western inspection, and the public's fear of contracting the AIDS virus. This fear is in part generated by the media, and other sources of information which rely on Western reports. A prevention language insensitive to this potential runs the real risk of contributing significantly to the deterioration of the everyday symbols of communality specific to those areas of Africa involved.

⁴¹ D A Feldman et al., 'Public Awareness of AIDS in Rwanda', Social Science and Medicine 24(2) 1987, pp 97-100.

AIDS IN KENYA

Given the richness of the cultural diversity of the African continent, the language of AIDS should be a polyphony of voices aware of the many dimensions and problems that this epidemic presents. Yet, at root, the basic preventive strategy should be one that addresses the voices from below, that is, from those who suffer. This singularly important hermeneutic point cannot be neglected. It alone poses the critical question, namely, what would an AIDS prevention programme look like from the social, political and cultural world-view of those most directly affected? This kind of strategy cannot be adequately represented in the current monopoly of AIDS research by Western medicine. While certainly indispensable for efforts to stop the spread of AIDS, this monopoly precludes an analysis sympathetic to different cultural symbols of meaning, and often fails to recognise its own conventional origins and limited perspectives. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that the silence of voices from below, for whatever reasons, presents a major obstacle to the effectiveness of AIDS prevention efforts in Africa.

⁴² See Feldman 1986 above for example; A Moore and R LeBaron, 'The Case for a Haitian Origin of the AIDS epidemic' in The Social Dimensions of AIDS: Method and Theory, A Feldman and T Johnson (ed), New York: Praeger 1986, pp 77-94.

SHARED HORIZON

Does the world share a common view on how best to work for peace and development?

Through a series of interviews conducted by Altaf Gauhar with seventeen internationally renowned and widely respected political leaders, economists and senior members of multilateral organisations, Shared Horizon addresses such issues as nuclear proliferation, growing authoritarianism and military rule, the debt crisis, recession and protectionism and the future of the North-South Dialogue.

By attempting to elucidate the issues that lie behind the most pressing political economic and social problems of our time Shared Horizon provides its readers with the unique opportunity of assessing how leaders of thought from both the North and South view the chances of achieving a global society more closely aligned to the needs of the vast majority of the people.

Shared Horizon is the sequel to Talking About Development also published by the Third World Foundation.

£ 9.00/US$11.00 (h/b) Members

£12.00/US$15.00 (h/b) Non-Members

To order please complete the special form in this issue.

Please allow 28 days for delivery

Edited by Altaf Gauhar

THE RICH AND THE POOR

Development, Negotiations and Cooperation -
An Assessment. Edited by Altaf Gauhar

In an effort to address the serious need to identify obstacles to cooperation with the North and to critically review the South's own record, the contributors to this volume consider the Third World's balance sheet of development, negotiations and cooperation. They discuss the issues and strategies involved in development, assess the current North-South relationship and detail cooperative efforts among Third World countries towards development.

Contents: Introduction

Part 1: Strategies of Development

Part 2: North-South Negotiations

Part 3: South-South Cooperation

pp272, appendices, notes, index
ISBN No. 0 907962 24 6/1983

£ 3.30/US$ 5.25 (p/b) Members

£ 4.50/US$ 7.00 (p/b) Non-Members

To order please complete the special form in this issue.

Please allow 28 days for delivery

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Selected themes in West Indian literature: an annotated bibliography

David Dabydeen and Nana Wilson-Tagoe

Despite the divisions created by geographic distances and the existence of independent West Indian states, it is still possible to talk in general terms of a West Indian literature of English expression. A common history of colonisation, displacement, slavery, indenture, emancipation and nationalism has shaped most West Indian environments, creating a unity of experience that can be identified as particularly West Indian. West Indian literature is, in the main, a product of this experience. Its beginnings in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, its explosion in the 1930s and 1950s and its assumption of new dimensions in the late twentieth century reflect the progress of a West Indian engagement with history, with political and social adjustments and with problems of definition, identity and aesthetics.

Such an engagement has evolved through more than a century of West Indian literary activity in poetry, prose fiction and drama. The movement from the derivative and imitative poetry of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, from the often unconscious rejection of the West Indian experience in the early prose fiction, towards the social awareness and cultural consciousness of the mid-twentieth century is an indication of a literary trend steeped in the historical development of the West Indies itself. In the early stages of the region's literature, the people in the forefront of literary activity were the white creoles, a minority group with the training and economic power to create a 'creole' literary tradition but often weakened by their cultural allegiance to the metropolis and by an ambivalence towards the islands. An example of the paucity of their literary output and the narrowness of its perspective can be traced in the deteriorating vision of a fine writer like De Lisser who moved from the social vision of a novel such as Jane's Career to the exotic romance of The White Witch of Rosehall.

The poetry of the period fared even worse in terms of its social awareness and responsibility towards a tradition. The problem was not just of an imitative and derivative poetry drawing its inspiration and forms from a metropolitan tradition; it was one of an absence of vision and direction. Poets such as James Grainger (1723-65)¹ and M J Chapman (1833)² wrote with little of a West Indian context, perspective or tradition. Only the black poet, Francis Williams,³ perhaps moved by his own inner tensions, seems to have seen poetry as a means of voicing personal conflicts and social dilemmas. The emergence of a politically aware and socially conscious literary tradition had, it seemed, to await improvements in West Indian popular education and the rise of nationalism. Accordingly, the years between 1937, when widespread rioting and strikes broke out on the islands leading to labour unrests and demands for self-determination, and 1962, when the West Indies Federation broke up, constitute the most active and vigorous in the literary history of the islands. They were years of activity and debate marking the rise of political consciousness in the West Indies and popular anti-colonial agitation which heralded demands for social and political change. The emergence of the 'Beacon Group',⁴ a political, radical and creative set active in the labour movement and identified with the independence struggle, gave a new perspective and urgency to literary activity in the West Indies. For these activists were also novelists, poets, short story writers and historians who saw their writing as part of the anti-colonial struggle and of the new sensitivity to economic and social relations. Alfred Mendes's Pitch Lake (1934) and Black Fauns (1935), and C L R James's Minty Alley (1936) widened West Indian perspectives by raising questions about colonial society and giving new depths to the social realism which had informed earlier novels such as De Lisser's Jane's Career. Pitch Lake, for instance, flayed the hollow, spiritually impoverished world of the middle-class Portuguese in Trinidad, and Minty Alley confronted its educated hero with the lowly, pinched world of the yard.

¹ James Grainger, Sugar Cane, London: Whittingham, 1764.

² M J Chapman, Barbados, London, 1833.

³ Francis Williams, 'Ode to George Haldane' in Edward Long, History of Jamaica, London: Lowndes, 1774.

In poetry, increased self-consciousness and social awareness were reflected in new dimensions, especially in the poetry of Una Marson⁵ and A J Seymour,⁶ where for the first time the clichés of the pastoral tradition were giving way to personal exploration and political statement. This vigorous literary activity took place in the atmosphere of a new critical interest in canons and standards. The nature and character of the emerging literature were being debated and defined in the new literary journals of the time, and continuing interest in the creole language, the traditions of the folk and West Indian historiography,⁷ was helping to widen the scope of the debate.

It was from this political and literary context that V S Reid's New Day (1949) emerged, and it is not surprising that it should have recreated the historical past

⁴ These were mostly literary people and political activists associated with the Jamaican monthly publication, The Beacon, namely, Albert Gomes, Alfred Mendes and C L R James. The literary output of The Beacon, was complemented by other publications: Focus edited by Edna Manley, Kyk-ove-a! (1945-61) edited in Guyana by A J Seymour and BIM edited in Barbados by Frank A Collymore.

⁵ Una Marson, Tropic Reveries, Kingston, Jamaica: Gleaner, 1930.

⁶ A J Seymour, Verse, Georgetown, Guyana: Author, 1937.

⁷ See, J J Thomas, The Theory and Practice of Creole Grammar (1869).

(b) Martha Bekwith, Jamaica Anansi Stories; Jamaica Proverbs.

(c) C L R James, The Black Jacobins (1938), London: Allison & Busby 1980.

(d) Eric Williams, Capitalism And Slavery (1944), London: André Deutsch, 1964; The Negro In The Caribbean (1942); Education In The British West Indies.

(e) Elna Goveia, A Study On The Historiography of The British West Indies.

in order to present a continuity in West Indian experience. This historical perspective was part of the mood of the times, part of the growing sense of a separate West Indian entity and experience. The sense of separateness was not really new in West Indian thought. Jamaican settlers and planters had persistently asserted the distinctiveness of their society and its institutions as far back as the eighteenth century. They had often jealously guarded the autonomy and integrity of their Legislative Assembly and even conceived of an internal autonomous Jamaica within the wider framework of Empire. But this sense of 'identity' was frequently obscured by ambiguities and dichotomies. Often, their natural wish for autonomy conflicted with their contempt for the vulgarities of a slave and colonial society. The impact of colonisation complicated the situation by generating a divisive loyalty to the metropolitan culture, and slavery further inhibited their attitudes to the whole idea of freedom, creating a neurotic fear of an enfranchised slave population, and ultimately stifling their aspirations for national independence. Freedom for 'settlers' could not include freedom for slaves. For the slave was not seen then as a historical force, being neither a maker nor a creator of history. Reid's perspective thus formed both the continuation of a trend and a widening of its implications. For the first time an imaginative writer had placed West Indian blacks in the context of West Indian 'history'. He had rescued them from anonymity and made their experience and inner reality part of the West Indian aspiration for national freedom. Admittedly, the West Indian scholar, J J Thomas, had argued the validity of 'negro' history in the West Indies long before in Fraudacity (1889), and Mittelholzer had dramatised in almost epic proportions the evolution of Guyanese colonial and slave society in the Kaywana trilogy.⁸ But Reid's novel was a development on these works, especially in the way it created a particular West Indian sensibility shaped by the peasant environment and the way of life of the emancipated slave. Yet, in a sense, Reid's novel was also ironically a reflection of the ambivalence of the nationalist thinking of the time, of its self-consciousness and self-assertion on one hand and, on the other, its dependence upon the guidance and goodwill of the metropolis.

The literature of the 1950s and 1960s constituted a more rigorous examination of the colonial experience, combining an anti-colonial perspective with a search for new definitions and values. In Guyana, Martin Carter's Poems of Resistance (1954) established a strident anti-colonial voice as part of political statement and protest while his later poetry⁹ examined the nature of colonial society and the colonial psyche. This was the general direction towards which the literature was moving. The past was again being recreated but in fictional, more imaginative terms that gave writers the leeway to explore the complex consequences of the region's history. For the creative writer of this period the apprehension of history was particularly problematic, since the past as manifested in the present seemed both negative and uncreative. West Indian history conceived in terms of progress and development seemed short, uncreative, fragmentary and dependent on values implicit in the language and culture of a colonial power. The imaginative writer's engagement with such a past demanded new and radical approaches to history and for a writer such as Lamming, 'history' came to signify more than the history books' definition; it came to mean not a succession of episodes with causal connections but something more active: 'the creation of a situation offering antagonistic opposition and a challenge of survival that had to be met by all involved'.¹⁰ The past, in other words, was to be confronted and explored, but with an eye to the future, and for Lamming the future was that of the Community of people: their self-knowledge, their identity and the re-integration of their personalities. The imaginative medium, rather than conventional history or anthropology, could grapple with such an exploration, and Lamming's novels became ways of investigating and projecting the inner experience of West Indian people, ways of charting the West Indian memory as far as it could go. From In The Castle Of My Skin through The Emigrants, Of Age And Innocence, Season of Adventure and Water With Berries to The Pleasures of Exile, Lamming explored colonial relations and probed the nature of colonial dependence and rebellion. In somewhat similar terms other novelists revealed the reality of the West Indian in ways that no conventional history could have managed. V S Reid, who had earlier charted the progress of the West Indian experience and sensibility by exploring real history, now examined the emotional and spiritual tensions of colonial relations through a less restricting and inhibiting medium in The Leopard. In Jamaica, John Hearne reacted in a similar way to the consequences of history, exposing the precariousness and vulnerability of middle-class values in novels such as Strangers At The Gate, The Faces of Love and Voices Under The Window, while in Trinidad, V S Naipaul and Samuel Selvon assessed the costs and gains of the 'creolisation' of the East Indian in A House For Mr Biswas and A Brighter Sun respectively. In both novels, explorations centred on the nature and quality of the East Indian's adjustment in the colonial society. Indian characters moved from enclosed peasant worlds into the wider colonial world, and the movement was in both novels one of exploring and growing in awareness and sensibility, though (for Naipaul more than for Selvon) possibilities for wholeness, fulfilment and achievement were lessened by the very circumstances of the colonial experience.

⁸ See Edgar Mittelholzer, Children of Kaywana (1952); The Harrowing of Hubertus (1954); Kaywana Blood (1958), London: Secker & Warburg.

⁹ See Martin Carter, Poems Of Succession, London: New Beacon Books, 1977; Poems Of Affinity, Bridgetown: Guyana Release Publishers, 1980.

The concern with transition and social evolution was not just directed towards progress and growth; it was also an attempt to capture the very meaning and significance of a West Indian world, and this attempt was part of the inspiration behind the proliferation of novels of childhood during this time.

¹⁰ George Lamming, The Pleasures of Exile (1960), London: Allison & Busby, 1984.

Lamming's In The Castle of My Skin, Michael Anthony's The Year in San Fernando, Drayton's Christopher, Ian McDonald's The Humming Bird Tree, Merle Hodge's Crick Crack Monkey and Jean Rhys's Wide Sargasso Sea were all, in part, attempts at capturing and savouring something of the essence of West Indian life through the developing consciousness of the child. Somehow the identity of this world, and its discovery, seemed more truthful when revealed through the impressions of the growing child.

In the 1960s a similar pre-occupation with meaning and significance underlay Wilson Harris's intense explorations of the impact of history on the West Indian personality. His novels, particularly *The Guiana Quarter*¹¹ recreated the various aberrations of history in the consciousness of both the oppressor and his victim, enacting not just the linear drama of conquest and defeat but also the dualities and paradoxes of the confrontation, as well as the possibilities for re-birth, reconciliation and the creation of a new community.

During this vigorous period of West Indian literary activity, the social world—even in its negative manifestation in the slum—was an object of exploration. Roger Mais's The Hills Were Joyful Together (1953) and Brother Man (1954) limited themselves to the conditions of the slum, evoking its deprivations, poverty, frustration and waste as evidence of rural dispossession and urbanisation. These worlds were not the changing and developing worlds of Naipaul, Selvon and Lamming; they were the static enclaves of the urban castaways, those whom industrialisation had flushed out and abandoned. Mais sought to highlight the social neglect of the slums while at the same time revealing the indomitable will of the people and the healing, unifying power of the communal spirit. In the early 1960s Orlando Patterson was to evoke the same background in the Children of Sisyphus (1964), demonstrating the same social concern but revealing frustration and escapism as the ultimate absurdity of the West Indian condition.

The concern with the consequences of history, with the social world and its impact on West Indian sensibility, led almost naturally to another major theme in the 1950s and 1960s: that of emigration. The concern was a response both to a historical phenomenon and a psychological colonial problem. In the 1950s and 1960s West Indians were actually emigrating from the islands to the metropolis, in search of what they called a 'better break', though in some sense they were also manifesting a colonial syndrome, a belief in a shared heritage with the mother country and the Western world. Novel after novel, poem after poem explored the pleasures and perils of exile and their effects on the sensibilities of West Indians. Lamming's The Emigrants, Water With Berries and The Pleasures of Exile; Selvon's Ways of Sunlight, The Lonely Londoners, Moses Migrating Moses Ascending, Brathwaite's Rights of Passage and recently the novels of Austin Clarke¹² have all revealed the enlarged consciousness of the emigrant side by side with his peculiar disorientation in an alien world. Increasingly, however, the idea of migration has become almost a global phenomenon and a new extension of West Indian consciousness and vision has already begun to emerge in England and North America:

¹¹ See Wilson Harris, Palace of The Peacock (1960); The Far Journey of Oudin (1962); The Whole Armour (1962); The Secret Ladder (1963), London: Faber & Faber.

This exciting progress of theme, vision and form in the West Indian novel has not always been matched in the region's poetry. In the 1940s and 1950s West Indian poets and dramatists clearly lagged behind the novelists. Still groping for distinctive voices, they had not acquired the depth of theme or authority of vision that the novelists had achieved. Claude McKay's¹³ experiments with dialect and folk forms in the 1920s and his articulation of the divided Afro-Caribbean consciousness in poems such as 'Outcast' had offered significant pointers, but it was not until the 1960s and the poetry of Louise Bennett, Eric Roach, Derek Walcott and Edward Brathwaite, that these forms and themes began to be handled with maturity and complexity. The Calypsonian Sparrow¹⁴ and the poet Louise Bennett¹⁵ explored various dimensions of the tradition of folk poetry, including the orality of the form, and enhanced the performance quality of poetry and song. In the written medium Walcott was grappling with themes of displacement and spiritual impoverishment in The Castaway and looking for ways in which the artist could transcend these themes in his effort to be creative. For all his cynicism and despair, however, he did manage to retain a sense of the possibilities of the poetic experience and to progress through The Gulf and Another Life towards a view of the artist as capable of freeing his people by returning them to themselves through the very act of naming them, capturing their lives, their landscape and their language. Accordingly, his experiments in the Trinidad workshop with dialect, folk forms and folk mythologies in plays such as The Sea At Dauphin, Ti-Jean And His Brothers and Dream On Monkey Mountain helped to establish a most vibrant tradition in West Indian drama, realising his hopes of making 'heraldic men' out of 'foresters and fishermen'.¹⁶

Brathwaite, the other major poet of the 1960s, responded to the apparent void in the region by exploring the creolising process itself and seeing in the adjustments and adaptations to slavery and colonisation, creative possibilities that could provide a context of history and a source for a tradition of poetry. His trilogy: Rights of Passage, Masks and Islands recreated and appraised the New World experience, revealing its manifestations in the variety of Caribbean

¹² See Austin Clarke, The Meeting Point, London: Heinemann, 1967; The Bigger Light, Boston and Toronto: Little Brown, 1975.

¹³ Claude McKay, Songs of Jamaica, Kingston, Jamaica: Gardner 1912; Constab Ballads, London: Watts, 1912; Selected Poems, New York: Bookman Associates, 1953.

¹⁴ The Mighty Sparrow (Slinger Francisco), acknowledged champion of Calypso.

¹⁵ Louise Bennett, Dialect Verse, Kingston, Jamaica: Herald, 1942; Jamaican Dialect Poems, (1948); Jamaica Labrish (1966).

¹⁶ First known as The Basement Theatre Workshop, it was founded by Derek Walcott in 1959.

musical structures and in the very language of the creolised folk with its distinctive core of perception and sensibility. These explorations of the 1960s, the personal dialogues, the experiments with song, dialect, sermon and ritual, established a tradition of orality in written poetry, creating an authority to which poets of the 1970s and 1980s could refer in their search for forms based on indigenous models. Thus, far from striving to establish a tradition which would rely, for instance, on external (often metropolitan) models, West Indian poets of the 1970s wrote with a sense of an already existing tradition. Wayne Brown's On The Coast, though principally an appraisal of the new national order, assumed some of the perceptual models of the older Walcott in the 'Castaway' poems, and several of the younger poets of the 1970s saw in Brathwaite's oral models a fresh and exhilarating medium for their own use.

In general, the poetry of the early 1970s wavered between appreciation of the revolutionary and radical imagination forged by the Black Power movement, and an awareness of its level of rhetoric and self-delusion. The spirit and sensibility of the age were often captured by the ambivalence of the works of poets such as Roger McTear, Victor Questel, Wayne Browne, Anthony McNeill and Dennis Scott. Their poetry relates to the poetry of the younger generation in the way in which the West Indian experience continues to be recreated and appraised in the 1980s.

In the 1980s the metropolitan experience has for historical reasons become a notable influence on West Indian poetry and literature. British West Indians have either provided dimensions of their experiences or re-appraised the colonial experience with imaginations nurtured by wider perceptions of colonial relations. But the greatest single influence on contemporary West Indian poetry has been, without doubt, the complementary relationship between oral and written traditions. It is really the recognition and exploitation of the ordinary speaking voice as an expression of feeling and perception that has given West Indian poetry a distinctiveness and authority capable of preserving the uniqueness of the West Indian experience.

Anti-imperialism and nationalism

In West Indian literature the themes of anti-imperialism and nationalism reflected the political movement for independence and formed part of the cultural nationalism which was its manifestation. The consciousness of a West Indian people with a character, history and aspirations separate from those of the metropolis was an underlying ideology of the nationalist movement and found many reflections in the literature of the mid-twentieth century. There was on one hand, the overtly anti-colonial literature, mostly poetry, which reflected a single-minded belief in the socio-political function of poetry, where the poem was less an imaginative evocation than an expression of outrage at colonial repression. This tradition of anti-colonial protest poetry, begun by McKay, continued by George Campbell and exploited to the full by Martin Carter in Poems of Resistance, was the most straightforward form of early anti-imperialist literature. Anti-imperialist and nationalist aspirations were expressed in subtler, less direct ways on other literary levels; in the novel a new interest in history, in the historical process and in the continuity of historical experience, marked a new West Indian awareness which challenged nineteenth-century assumptions about the region's absence of history. Victor Reid's New Day, Samuel Selvon's A Brighter Sun and Roger Mais's The Hills Were Joyful Together attempted to recreate the distinctive experience and character of the region's history. In the late 1950s and early 1960s, however, anti-imperialist themes acquired greater variation and depth. Novelists and poets set themselves the more rigorous task of analysing colonial society, assessing the rebellion of the colonial and exploring his psyche. Although these were not straightforwardly nationalistic themes, pitting coloniser against colonised as in some of the earlier protest poetry, their nationalist affirmations derived from the ways in which they sought to clarify and define the West Indian experience. Each novelist seems to have sought to understand his relationship to the colonial experience and to have found his vision from this exploration and analysis. Lamming's concern with the nature of true freedom in Of Age And Innocence and Season of Adventure was in part an attempt to come to terms with a colonial status and to transcend the conditions it imposed. For him, true freedom was dependent on the quality of protest and rebellion, which were in turn related to the people's sense of history and their link with the rural organic world of the peasant. For Naipaul, true freedom—the link with landscape and the sense of community as envisaged by Lamming—seemed an impossibility. The very wrongness, he felt, of the colonial adventure, the irrevocable disability it engendered, created barriers between the colonial and true freedom. In both A House For Mr Biswas and The Mimic Men, his characters struggled against these barriers, achieving either limited and fragile personal niches in the general chaos or a more cathartic and personal understanding of their situation.

The concern with the colonial experience and the colonial psyche led inevitably to other variations in the anti-colonial theme: the Prospero-Caliban relationship. It was an interesting and revolutionary variation, notably in the way it challenged the usual historical assumptions about the colonised as an object rather than a subject of history. A great deal of Walcott's concern in The Castaway was, for instance, directed towards subverting and challenging these very assumptions. His skilful manipulation of symbolism and language, especially in the 'Crusoe' poems, revealed dimensions of colonial relations that challenged the dominant myth of Crusoe as the heroic European settler struggling against odds to maintain supremacy and provide light and guidance in a colonial society. His explorations transcended the usual images of master/slave/servant and highlighted ways in which the colonial sometimes manipulated the relationship to his advantage and often achieved a unique personal development in the process. In these poems the colonised became not merely the converted cannibal moulded to the coloniser's faith, but the very human 'Friday' whose personal and separate development actively highlighted contradictions and failures in the new faith itself. This rounded view of 'Friday' as human, self-aware and perceptive, not only endowed him with a subjectivity and an identity but also revealed an added level of subtlety in his relationship with Crusoe.

Lamming undertook similar explorations in The Pleasures of Exile, Water With Berries and Natives Of My Person, projecting the colonial 'Caliban' as possessing a unique insight into the coloniser's consciousness and motivation. His reading of Shakespeare's The Tempest in The Pleasure of Exile was in a major sense a metaphorical view of West Indian colonisation and of the psychology of colonial relations. Ultimately, it was also an attempt to create a future from the past, a way of pushing colonial relations beyond that legacy of domination and subordination which 'history' ordinarily imposes. For Lamming this future involved a transformation of past relations and this was possible only when the past, endowed with different meanings, generated new soils for new beginnings: 'The mystery of the colonial is this: where he remains alive, his instinct, always and forever creative, must choose a way to change the meaning and perspective of this ancient tyranny.' The entire range of Lamming's work as a novelist springs from this perspective. His novels concern themselves with analysis and exploration on both personal and public levels, their drama comprising a struggle to escape the cage of personal (and public) history. In Water With Berries, Lamming's most complex and intense drama of colonial relations, the colonial does finally survive and is able to choose and act. Like a crab among rocks, Lamming's Teeton emerges slowly from the furnace of the coloniser's (the Dowager's) grave to answer the political call of 'the Gathering', representing his messianic future. The experience is altogether a spiritual and hugely symbolic one, and the catharsis merges into an apocalyptic vision of revolution and promise. In most of Lamming's anti-colonial novels the burden of re-orientation and change is normally the burden of the colonised. But choice and change usher in a future which also involves a dialogue and an understanding with the coloniser, and the changed relationship between coloniser and colonised, between Prospero and Caliban, becomes Lamming's major emphasis in Natives of My Person. The personal drama is principally the coloniser's drama and is necessitated by Caliban's assertion of freedom, by his new vision of himself as a 'possibility of spirit which might fertilise and extend the resources of any human vision'. To accept this vision of Caliban in a new relationship, Prospero has to evaluate his own place in a changed world and re-examine those values which once sanctioned his acts as a coloniser. Natives Of My Person is the drama of this revaluation and is Lamming's attempt at transcending the 'history book' story of colonisation.

Interestingly, the themes of anti-imperialism and nationalism have continued to engage West Indian writers since their genesis in the 1950s and 1960s. Each generation seems to be engaged by particular dimensions of the same fundamental ideas. Wayne Brown's On The Coast, a product of the 1980s, might for instance appear to be treading the old ground of Walcott and Brathwaite in the 1960s, but the poet's bitter attack on the continuing colonial syndrome of dependence and self-rejection has an edge of anger and bitterness which lends it a special emphasis. On the other hand, Dabydeen's Slave Song, published in the 1980s, explores the colonial experience through the imaginative reconstruction of the private world of slave and indentured labourer: an inner world of anger, pain, frustration, brutality and fantasy; an imaginative fusion of present and 'past' which, as Lamming has argued, neither 'history' nor 'anthropology' could evoke.

These variations of the anti-imperialist and nationalist themes indicate the extent to which, from the very beginning, the act of writing in the West Indies had been part of the new national consciousness and self-awareness. The very proliferation of these themes and their continual re-appraisal reveal the colonial experience as the single most important determinant in the making of the West Indian people.

MAJOR TEXTS

V S Reid, New Day, New York: Knopf, 1949; London: Heinemann Caribbean Writers Series, 1973.

The novel sees Jamaica's constitutional freedom of 1944 as an inevitable sequel to the Morant Bay rebellion of 1865. Reid uses the Campbells, a fictional family of mixed African and European ancestry as the cultural and political link in this historical progress, and his novel charts the movement from a fiery but ineffectual radicalism towards a responsible political leadership in which a combined force of workers and the educated class achieves political realisation through reasoned argument.

George Lamming, Of Age And Innocence, London: Michael Joseph, 1958; Allison and Busby, 1981.

Lamming's third novel explores the pitfalls and failures of nationalist aspirations in the West Indies. Carefully plotted to reflect the multi-racial complexity of the region, it dramatises the historical disabilities which West Indians must overcome in order to achieve true unity and freedom.

George Lamming, Natives of My Person, New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1972.

Lamming describes this novel as a way of going forward by making a complete return to the beginnings. In it, he attempts to understand the colonial experience and colonial relations by examining the very roots of West Indian colonisation, concentrating on the drama of the coloniser's voyage (from Europe to the slave coast and to the West Indies), his motivation, his psyche and the eventual brutalisation of his personality.

WEST INDIAN LITERATURE

Samuel Selvon, Turn Again Tiger, London: MacGibbon and Kee, 1958; Longman, 1972.

Written six years after A Brighter Sun and featuring the same creolised Indian peasant, this novel recreates the environment and social context of the colonial plantation, complete with its hierarchy of white supervisor, overseer, timekeeper and labourers. The protagonist's confrontation with this situation and its moral and psychological reflections becomes an examination of his own relationship to the colonial experience. The mere process of creolisation, Selvon implies, is finally not the whole answer to the quest for freedom and realisation.

V S Naipaul, The Mimic Men, London: André Deutsch, 1967.

Naipaul's novel examines the relationship between the colonial experience and nationalist assertion in the West Indies, showing how freedom itself is limited and impaired by the permanent disabilities of the colonial experience. Its world is a grim one in which the dismantling of the external colonial order leaves only chaos because the fragmented ex-slave society of displaced people has no centre to hold the society together. Nationalism in such a context, Naipaul implies, is ultimately ineffective, appealing only to race and colour and offering only drama and violence.

Martin Carter, Poems of Resistance, London: Lawrence and Wishart, 1954; Poems of Succession, London: New Beacon Books, 1977.

Carter's poems, written in the ferment of political resistance to colonialism, are perhaps the most vocal and tormented anti-imperialist assertions of the period. Composed almost as dialogues between the poet and the conditions of his existence, between the poet and the Caribbean Man, and between the poet and the coloniser, they argue the historical necessity for revolution and transformation, projecting a vision of freedom and liberation in a future that is also (ironically) apprehended as vulnerable.

Derek Walcott, The Castaway And Other Poems, London: Jonathan Cape, 1965.

In this collection of poems Walcott's persona, the artist figure, responds to the colonial experience as revealed in the physical and human landscape of the Caribbean. Here, the historical experience of people and landscape is as relevant as the artist's isolation and estrangement, and the poet assumes the burden of creating meaning and drawing out significances.

Wayne Brown, On The Coast, London: André Deutsch, 1972.

Brown's collection is essentially an evaluation of the colonial experience almost in the tradition of Walcott's early poetry. The evocations span three phases of the historical experience, manifesting the harshly anti-colonial moods of Walcott's early poetry. In 'Conquistador', 'Red Hill' and 'Drought', he recreates the wasteland of Empire, the self-contempt generated by racial inferiority and the persisting colonial psychology.

David Dabydeen, Slave Song, Copenhagen and London: Dangaroo Press, 1984.

The poems in Slave Song bring to life the ordinary humdrum existence of slave and Indian colonial peasant, depicting it as shaped both by the rigour and brutality of plantation life and by those rare moments of order, compassion and tenderness which are also, ironically, part of his sensibility. Those instances in which his sexual fantasies about the white woman become conscious acts of subversion and liberation manifest a human presence in spite of a colonial self-abasement.

Edward Brathwaite, Islands, London: Oxford University Press, 1969; The Arrivants: A New World Trilogy, London: Oxford University Press, 1973.

Brathwaite's poetry in Islands challenges the usual colonial view of the Caribbean as an uncreative product of the imperial order. His sensitivity to the creative areas of West Indian experience in the Caribbean and his recognition of a spiritual, numinous quality in the peasant's sensibility inspire his hopes of redemption and restoration. The poems reflect this, alternating between visions of sterility in which all memory is lost, and visions of hope in which the poet himself becomes a priest, attempting a recovery of the word.

The treatment of race

Race has always been a crucial issue in colonial relations, and has surfaced as a fundamental aspect of the colonial experience in various dimensions of the literature of the West Indies. The simplicity of colonial society, Naipaul observed in The Loss of Eldorado, was the very simplicity of its values of money and race. In the colour-structured society, unified only by its general acceptance of the inferiority of 'negro-ness', race was an appalling arbiter of value. It surfaced not only in relations between European white master and black slave, but also between the various gradations of the colour hierarchy. Such consistent debasement of 'negro-ness' had two major psychological repercussions: it instilled in the black slave an overwhelming awe of everything white and at the same time bred a sense of inferiority and self-abasement in his innermost consciousness. The emancipation of slaves and the exhilaration of freedom which accompanied it hardly changed the general thinking on race; rather, the importation of indentured labour from India into a number of West Indian islands introduced a new racial element, complicating the white/black dichotomy. White, coloured, African, East Indian affected fundamentally separate racial identities, fearful, suspicious and often contemptuous of each other. Colonial society, reflecting most of these tensions, remained fragmented and unsettled, a prey to racially-inspired conflict and violence. In West Indian literature, the racial theme has generally been associated with the theme of history. The best of West Indian writing on the subject has seen the ramifications of race as a historical legacy, and has explored possibilities of transcending its negative effects. As part of the new nationalist self-awareness and re-definition, writers explored the psychology of race and colour in the consciousness of black West Indians almost as an exorcism of a deep-seated racial inferiority. V S Reid provided an interesting exploration of the theme in

The Leopard (1958), an imaginative evocation against the background of the 'Mau Mau' rebellion in Kenya, of relations between white and black and between 'mulatto' and black; aspects which he had suggested but left unexplored in New Day. Like Reid, Walcott and Lamming explored similar confrontations in Dream on Monkey Mountain, Ti-Jean And His Brothers and Water With Berries, and in all these works the underlying idea was the decapitation of the dominant 'white master' image, whether it was manifested in the white goddess as in Dream, the Devil as in Ti-Jean, or the benevolent Dowager as in Water With Berries. In all three situations the black colonial had to annihilate the dominant racial image in order to be free, for as Walcott has said, getting rid of his overwhelming awe of everything white is the first step every colonial must take.

On another level, the racial theme explored the West Indian's confrontation with Africa as a racial and cultural symbol. It was in a sense a confrontation with self, a coming to terms with origin and a purging of fear and shame. The black West Indian had grown to accept the racial and cultural inferiority of Africa, and for him this was a crucial confrontation. In Reid's The Leopard it took the form of the tortuous relationship between the 'mulatto' Toto and his black father Nebu; in Lamming's Season of Adventure it was dramatised in the relationship between the middle-class Fola and the voodoo ceremony of souls; in Other Leopards it formed the entire drama of Lionel Froad's ambivalent response to the African past; in Brathwaite's Masks it consisted in a positive evocation of an African world and culture which the poet could not possess but to which he felt related. These levels of confrontation were in a sense acts of purgation that led to black West Indians' revaluation of themselves and of their place in the world. Other aspects of the theme were explored in a different sense by Wilson Harris in novels such as Palace of The Peacock, the Secret Ladder and Heartland. Here the confrontation was not so much between ancestor and a particular racial group as between Amerindian/African ancestor and the entire Caribbean consciousness. For Harris not only believed in the unity of all peoples but also in the possibility of capturing the subtle discontinuities in the region's history as a means of illuminating the Caribbean psyche and extending its sensibility.

Among writers of East Indian descent the need to exorcise fear and shame, was, for obvious historical reasons, not so urgent a theme. Thus, in the works of writers such as Naipaul racial themes surfaced mostly as an awareness of the loss of racial and cultural homogeneity or as a recognition of the barriers which ethnicity and the plural society placed on the political and social prospects of West Indian societies. A House For Mr Biswas is, in one sense, a re-definition of 'Indian-ness' in the context of a disordered colonial and multi-racial society, while The Mimic Men is a drama of the historical and racial barriers against true freedom and nationhood. Naipaul saw these barriers and disabilities as generated by history, by the very wrongness of the artificial societies of the West Indies. For him, these were permanent disabilities over which there could be no transcendence; but for writers such as Selvon, Mittelholzer and Lamming who also explored the racial theme, possibilities for transcendence existed in people's understanding, in their capacity to re-order their societies.

MAJOR TEXTS

V S Reid, The Leopard, London: Heinemann, 1958; Heinemann Caribbean Writers Series, 1980.

Set against the background of the racial conflicts and hatreds of Kenya's 'Mau Mau' struggle, the novel explores the consciousness of race and racial identity as part of the process of resistance against white oppression. On another level, it is a drama of the tortuous relationship between the 'mulatto' (Western black) and his African origins. A greater part of the action in the forest concentrates on the 'mulatto' and the dying African. The drama is projected as the 'mulatto's' inward journey towards knowledge, understanding and acceptance of his origins.

George Lamming, Season of Adventure, London: Michael Joseph, 1960.

The novel which enacts what Lamming has called 'the backward glance', is the drama of his middle-class heroine's dialogue with her forgotten racial self and of the political and social repercussions of this adventure. The tonelle, the ceremony of souls and the forest reserve represent areas of African/folk experience which the heroine has always rejected out of fear and shame. Her confrontation with the ceremony begins a process that leads her to self awareness, understanding and consequently to a major political action on behalf of her society.

Edward Brathwaite, Masks, London: Oxford University Press, 1968; published as part of The Arrivants by Oxford University Press, 1973.

Brathwaite's long poem is an enactment of the modern West Indian's return to Africa, an experience which Brathwaite broadens with a simultaneous evocation of the circumstances of the Middle Passage and of Africa's own historical progress and development until that time. These three areas of experience to which the poet persona responds through his borrowed masks present a comprehensive Affcan world which the poet cannot possess but to which he feels himself related. This awareness and acknowledgement of kinship not only purges his fear and shame about the past but also leads to an understanding of the sources of his West Indian identity.

Denis Williams, Other Leopards, London: Hutchinson, 1963; Heinemann Caribbean Writers Series, 1983.

Williams's novel charts the difficulties and dilemmas of the West Indian's quest for origins. The novel's central character, Lionel Froad, is caught between two visions of himself, the cultivated European image which he possesses and the ancestral image which he thinks he ought to acquire. His divided consciousness is a disability that leaves him feeling empty and insubstantial, and determined to find himself in Africa. But identity is not something we merely pick up and wear, and Williams's hero, caught between a genuine desire for a racial identity and an honest alienation from tradition and politics in Africa, ends up defeated and disoriented.

Derek Walcott, Dream On Monkey Mountain, New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 1977.

Walcott's play identifies fantasies about whiteness and ancestral connections with Africa as the major fantasies which preoccupy, confuse and shape the psyche of West Indian man. His central character is caught between the two fantasies. His vision of himself as a descendant of African kings and as a revolutionary saviour of his African tribe is ironically inspired by a white blonde goddess, symbol of the antithesis of his ordinary perception of himself as black, ugly and undesirable. Are the fantasies about African origins inspired by fantasies about whiteness? The acting out of such fantasies is a process of understanding and self-knowledge, but the ultimate self-knowledge, Walcott implies, is the eventual ability to liberate oneself from them, acknowledging only the green beginnings of the West Indies as one's true origin.

Wilson Harris, The Secret Ladder, London: Faber and Faber, 1963.

The novel explores racial identity and the quest for origins in terms of a need to understand and transform Caribbean beginnings. Its action involves a confrontation between the middle-class cultivated surveyor, his racially-mixed crew and the community of Africans, descendants of runaway slaves. The confrontation explores what Harris feels should be the Caribbean relationship with the ancestor.

Edgar Mittleholzer, A Morning At The Office, London: Hogarth Press, 1950; Heinemann Caribbean Writers Series, 1974.

The action of Mittleholzer's novel about Trinidad is compressed into the duration of one particular morning but it succeeds in dramatising the workings of a stratified, colour-based, colonial society. The characters reflect the class and racial situations of Trinidad society, and their relationships are conditioned by their various historical experiences. The author's delineation points to the need for compassion between people and for the integration of the different peoples and cultures of Trinidad.

V S Naipaul, The Suffrage of Elvira, London: André Deutsch, 1958.

The novel is a comic evocation of the racial, religious and cultural confusion which is the historical legacy of Trinidadian society. Although the campaign for the elections demonstrates an easy interaction between racial and religious groups, the novel's action points to the failure of true unity and democracy. Under pressure, Trinidadians cluster into their respective racial groups. The election, for all its underlying comedy, proves a serious point about the simplicity of colonial society and the simple value it attaches to race and money.

George Lamming, Of Age And Innocence, London: Michael Joseph, 1958; Allison and Busby, 1980.

The racial theme in Lamming's novel resides in the prospects and fortunes of the political alliance between the three racial groups, and on the progress of the friendship between four young boys, representatives of the four racial groups in San Cristóbal. The novel balances and contrasts the two sets of relationships, measuring the forces at work in each situation. Among the older politicians the ideals of freedom and unity struggle against the prejudices and attitudes engendered by history, ultimately crumbling in the face of colonial opposition and intrigue. In contrast, the young boys appear free from fixed perceptions and prejudices. Their vision represents an entirely new way of seeing, and it is in their strengths that Lamming locates the racial ideal and the future.

Samuel Selvon, A Brighter Sun, London: Allan Wingate, 1958.

The novel is essentially a novel about growth, and part of this growth consists in the East Indian hero's perception of himself as part of a multi-racial creole society. The very idea of a new cosmopolitan town as the location for the action and the complementary presence of an Afro-Trinidadian couple not only suggests Selvon's special pleading but also a movement forward from enclosed racial entities.

The theme of childhood

The theme of childhood and the accompanying idea of growth from innocence to maturity has been a recurrent theme in West Indian literature. Its popularity seems to stem from the very notion of development which it entails. The idea of capturing environment and experience from childhood right through to maturity is for the West Indian writer almost like a re-living of a West Indian experience, a savouring of its essential character. In most of the novels about childhood the child protagonists are engaged in recording their impressions of a particular environment or experience. Michael Anthony's two novels, The Year In San Fernando (1965) and Green Days By The River both concern a child's progress through a particular world. The Year In San Fernando records the consciousness of a rural boy as he responds and adjusts to the city and its peculiar ethos. As readers we are drawn into the fresh, unbiased responses of the child as he reacts to landscape and people, and as he develops in knowledge, understanding and judgment. Sometimes, as in Green Days, we witness in the child's growth the loss of childhood spontaneity and the beginnings of adult choice with its necessary calculation and compromise. Anthony's novels are in the main entirely steeped in the child's experience. The reader is led to view the world as the child views it and is thus limited to his uncomplicated perceptions and awarenesses.

In other novels about childhood the child's experiences become part of the novel's social and political vision and are often controlled and shaped by the overall point of view of the writer. In Merle Hodge's Crick Crack Monkey the young heroine's experiences are crucial both for her personal development and as an illustration of the novel's theme of cultural confusion and insecurity. Thus, while the overall point of view is the heroine's (as in Anthony's novels), Hodge controls and manipulates it to suggest crucial ironies of which she is unaware, ironies which are part of the novelist's deliberate control of viewpoint in the interests of a social vision. In Drayton's Christopher the situation is made a little easier by the novelist's omniscient standpoint. The boy hero, like Jean Rhys's white creole heroine, grows up in the era of the decline of white influence in Barbados, and his personality and perceptions are influenced by class tensions between the white creoles themselves and by racial tensions between whites and blacks on the island. Unlike Rhys's heroine, who is crushed by her feelings of alienation and disconnection, the boy Christopher grows up turning inwards, developing his relations with the land, nurturing his artistic sensibilities and also, through his warm relations with his nurse, developing an understanding of the black world around him.

WEST INDIAN LITERATURE

In Lamming, the world of childhood becomes part of the colonial ethos and of the general disintegration evoked and dramatised in In The Castle of My Skin. The children's responses to their environment, their interpretations of adult standards and their confusions about history and race reflect both the confusions and fantasies of childhood and the sensibilities of a colonial upbringing. The very tensions between them, the eventual separations that send each child on a distinct course, are all part of the social forces that divide colonial society. Although Lamming uses the children's lives to suggest a typical West Indian childhood, his emphasis is eventually on the maturing consciousness of his child narrator and hero. Thus boy 'G', whose personal and political growth are finally charted and linked to the frustrations and the disintegration of the old order, becomes Lamming's portrait of the sensitive and alienated artist.

The theme of childhood is not always explored as a progress towards physical and emotional maturity. Sometimes entire areas of a child's perception are illuminated simply through the increasing quality of his impressions of people around him. The boy narrator in Naipaul's Miguel Street presents such a vision of childhood. His evocation and presentation of the dramas around him reveal both the environment that has shaped him and the way in which his perceptions of it mature.

MAJOR TEXTS

Michael Anthony, The Year In San Fernando, London: André Deutsch, 1967; Heinemann Caribbean Writers Series, 1970.

The novel deals principally with a crucial year of adjustment in the life of a child. A young rural boy is constrained by his own family's poor circumstances to move in with a better-off family in the city. The novel charts his responses, perceptions and personal growth in the course of a year.

Michael Anthony, Green Days By The River, London: André Deutsch, 1967; Heinemann Caribbean Writers Series, 1973.

An evocation of a Trinidad childhood, concentrating on a young boy's responses to the landscape and the world around him. It is also the story of a boy's gradual social and sexual awakening.

Geoffrey Drayton, Christopher, London: Collins, 1959.

Drayton's novel depicts the childhood of a young white creole boy, growing up in the West Indies at a time when the economic power of the old planter class had been usurped by the new merchant class of white upstarts. The tensions and resentments between the two classes of white people dramatise themselves in the estrangement between the boy's parents and in the boy's own brooding loneliness throughout the novel. His growth into maturity is, however, presented as a complex and interesting process of self-discovery and social awareness.

Jean Rhys, Wide Sargasso Sea, London: Hutchinson, 1966; Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1968.

The novel recreates the changed circumstances and the psychological terror of Jamaican white creoles on finding themselves swamped after emancipation by a free and hostile black population. Rhys's heroine lives under the psychological strain of these times, and the novel dramatises her sense of menace and insecurity and the gradual alienation which contribute to the disorientation and madness in her adult life.

Ian McDonald, The Humming Bird Tree, London: Heinemann, 1969; Heinemann Caribbean Writers Series, 1974.

McDonald evokes with regret and nostalgia the spontaneity and romance of a Trinidadian childhood. The romance between his white creole hero and the East Indian girl cuts across the racial and class barriers solidly built by the island's historical legacy. But this illusion of possibility is shown as part of the innocence of childhood itself. In his maturity, the hero confronts the reality of his situation as a member of the white oligarchy and is unable to break out of the prison of history.

George Lamming, In The Castle of My Skin, London: Michael Joseph, 1953; Longman, 1970.

Lamming recreates a typical Barbadian childhood as part of the social world he presents in this novel. The group of young boys whose feelings, responses and fantasies occupy several chapters, present a picture of what it was like to be a growing child in the 1930s.

Merle Hodge, Crick Crack Monkey, London: André Deutsch, 1970; Heinemann Caribbean Writers Series, 1981.

Hodge's heroine grows up amidst the class and cultural confusions of Trinidad in the mid-twentieth century. Intelligent and sensitive, she nevertheless suffers from insecurity and self-rejection when moved from a raw but humane lower-class world into a pretentious and artificial one. Although the novel's ironies show up the confusions of the social world, the heroine's own personal trauma and her dilemmas about race and culture are never really resolved.

V S Naipaul, Miguel Street, London: André Deutsch, 1959; Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1971.

The stories in Miguel Street present us with a child's view of the world around him. Though not necessarily primarily concerned with the child's progress towards physical and emotional maturity, the stories reveal this progress in the changing quality of perception with which the boy presents, comments upon and judges the various experiences he recounts.

Derek Walcott, Another Life, London: Jonathan Cape, 1973.

In this autobiographical poem, Walcott charts the landmarks in the childhood and growth of a young St Lucian boy. It is in a sense Walcott's portrait of the artist as a growing child and it recreates the various social, cultural and spiritual influences that shaped his personality and his artistic sensibilities.

The treatment of women/women characters

While West Indian women were historically considered to be the repositories of folk wisdom and the oral tradition, they have only recently attempted or been able to project themselves in the written language of the region. Thus, the images of women which appeared in the early literature were mainly images created by men, preoccupied with the appraisal and definition of the West Indian man. The images of women tended, therefore, to be focused on their historical role in the evolution of West Indian man. Historically, woman was central to the continuation of the slave system as an essential part of the plantation system, her essential value resting on her ability to produce the labour force. This utilitarian and commercial view was only the planter's view, however. In reality the slave woman was a mother in an almost spiritual sense. For her, the bond between mother and child was as sacred as the bond between the earth and creativity; and it was generally in her role as creator, protector and matriarch that early West Indian writers saw their spiritual survival. In the existing political ferment and self-assessments of the 1940s, George Campbell portrayed Caribbean women in poetry as 'history makers', as 'women stone-breakers', as 'hammers and rocks' and as builders whose strength had provided not just the sustenance for survival but also the power to create a way of life and a sensibility.

The projection of the West Indian woman in literature has progressed from this image to various others, mostly in accordance with historical and social changes in the region. It is possible for instance, to trace in Lamming's work alone an interesting, complex and historical progression of woman through West Indian history. There is first the image of the rural woman as appears in In The Castle, the poor, hardy, often abandoned, mother, lovingly committed to her child and to the land, uncritically optimistic and unquestioning of the status quo, but possessing a strength and a meaning derived from her sense of community and from the shared confidences and bonds between her and the people around her. This image is later concretised and broadened in the image of Ma Shephard (in Of Age And Innocence) who becomes both a symbol of the earth and tradition and a conservative stumbling block in the way of radical transformation. Lamming's young boys in their commitment to freedom and resistance must ultimately reject her vision, and in Season of Adventure her spirit as embodied in the heroine has to be combined with her radical political vision. It is perhaps with a similar sense of the value and inadequacy of the rural woman's vision that Brathwaite evokes her consciousness in Rights only as part of a general progress towards a revolutionary will in Islands.

In other West Indian writers and even in Lamming himself, the image of the woman extends beyond the image of the earth mother. The very disintegration of rural life and the separations brought about by migrations and urban settlements created new priorities and ambitions and therefore new images of woman. The picture of the rural woman in the urban world, bewildered and confused but doggedly set on making her way either as worker or prostitute, is a common image in West Indian urban novels. In De Lisser, Roger Mais and Orlando Patterson, the image is deepened by a vision of her as doubly deprived and oppressed by society and by her menfolk. In Patterson, the aggressively ambitious urban prostitute, determined to move out of the dreary dunghill into a better life, is part of the novelist's general expression of the cycle of futility in which all slum-dwellers are trapped. In Mais, however, the degraded woman of the slum, for all her poverty and constriction, often possesses a generosity of spirit which is part of that communal spirit explored as a positive aspect of the slum world.

Ironically, very few West Indian women have specifically explored the social and psychological problems of women. In the 1940s the Jamaican poet, Louise Bennett, saw herself mainly as an oral performer and social commentator. Her commentary, on women's view of marriage, women's racial attitudes and women's strength and vulnerability in Jamaican society, was presented through the consciousness of her rural women, but mostly as part of a general social commentary, not exclusively concerned with the situation of women. It is really only in writers such as Merle Hodge, Jean Rhys, Erna Brodber and, recently Grace Nichols, that a particularised consciousness of the West Indian woman begins to emerge. For in all these writers the social world is evoked mostly through the consciousness of the women characters. In Hodge, the process of a child's growth from childhood to maturity may well reflect a generalised preoccupation with West Indian problems of cultural confusion and identity but the heroine's dilemmas about colour, prettiness and self-worth are also part of the tensions and confusions of a maturing female sensibility. In a similar sense, Jean Rhys's Wide Sargasso Sea dramatises the 'ravaged status and emotional alienation of the white creole woman from her West Indian background, at the same time revealing the dependence and vulnerability characteristic of all Rhys's female characters.

In Brodber and Nichols the emphasis is more directly on the female experience. Nichols's evocation of the West Indian woman's evolution from slave to person is a celebration of the woman's struggles, fears, weaknesses and triumphs. I Is A Long Memored Woman evokes for the first time a total vision of woman's progress, a vision which is removed from the 'earth mother' image, particularly in its very ambivalence towards the role of motherhood and its radical revolutionary tone. In Brodber, the contemporary woman's search for a personality and individuality, amidst the various imprisoning roles imposed by small cramped societies, is chiefly highlighted. But, on the whole, the voice of the contemporary West Indian woman is yet to be established in the literature of the region. Very few women indeed write for a living in the West Indies, and the paucity of professional writers is perhaps a good explanation for the absence of a tradition of women's writing in the sense in which it exists, for instance, in Black American literature.

MAJOR TEXTS

H G De Lisser, Jane's Career, London: Methuen, 1914; Heinemann Caribbean Writers Series, 1972.

The novel contrasts the life of women in rural and urban environments in Jamaica, concentrating on the young woman's vulnerability in the new grasping and exploitative environment of Kingston. The heroine finds a form of success in the city, acquiring a husband, a house and, ironically, a servant.

George Lamming, In The Castle of My Skin, London: Michael Joseph, 1953; Longman, 1970.

The women of Creighton Village, Barbados, are part of a pattern of existence and a vision of life which Lamming associates with an old order, with adjustments and sensibilities created in response to slavery, the colonial experience, and peasant life.

Edward Brathwaite, 'The Dust' in Rights of Passage, London: Oxford University Press, 1967.

In the voices of the folk women in 'The Dust', Brathwaite evokes the minds and sensibilities of the rural women showing their apprehension of their environment and society, demonstrating their stoicism and resilience and identifying their cosmic understanding of time.

Merle Hodge, Crick Crack Monkey, London: André Deutsch, 1970; Heinemann Caribbean Writers Series, 1981.

The heroine's divided consciousness and its accompanying insecurities are shown as a reflection of the racial and cultural conflicts in a young girl's upbringing.

Jean Rhys, Wide Sargasso Sea, London: Hutchinson, 1966; Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1968.

The gradual dissociation between the heroine and the landscape, between her and the people she had always known, provokes a crisis of identity. Her inability to cope with this crisis, as well as with enstrangement from her husband, demonstrates her vulnerability, a trait which always marks out Rhys's heroines as victims.

Grace Nichols, I Is A Long Memored Woman, London: Caribbean Cultural International, 1983.

These poems celebrate the black woman's progress and evolution in the new world. They are the poet's imaginative rendering of the consciousness of the black woman as she has responded and adjusted to life in the West Indies.

Erna Brodber, Jane And Louisa Will Soon Come Home, London: New Beacon, 1980.

The novel deals with the contemporary woman's search for personality and self amidst the various imprisoning roles imposed on women in small societies.

Olive Senior, Summer Lightning and Other Stories, London: Longman, 1986.

In this compelling collection of short stories, Olive Senior vividly depicts the aspirations, hardships and fears of a rural Jamaican community in which family life is splintered by the constant barriers of class and colour. Her sensitive perceptions of childhood convey a private world of confusion and alienation, but also reveal a universal humanity observed with affection, poignancy and wit.

Zee Edgell, Beka Lamb, London: Heinemann, 1982.

The action of the novel only spans a short period in the life of the heroine, but Edgell manages to suggest all those influences of church, home, school and the wider political world which help to shape the mind and outlook of a growing girl in Belize in the mid-twentieth century.

The Theme of Migration

The treatment of migration in West Indian literature has been a response both to an actual historical phenomenon and to a psychological problem created by colonial relations. At the turn of the century the decline of the sugar industry and of the importance of the West Indies heightened the constriction, poverty and isolation of the islands. Most West Indians felt genuinely hemmed in by the poverty and deprivations of their worlds and looked elsewhere for greener pastures—the 'better break' envisaged by most emigrants. In the early stages West Indians drifted into Panama where the building of the canal afforded opportunities for work and enrichment. Most migrants to Panama returned home, however, often with money, a sharpened social awareness and a new, flamboyant culture, to find reflection in West Indian literature. Lamming's old man Pa (In The Castle) recalls his own Panama days, and the author Eric Walrond recreates the exile's life in Latin America with compassion and depth in Tropic Death (1926).

West Indian migration of the 1940s and 1950s was, however, mostly migration into England—a search for a break complicated by the assumption of a shared heritage with the mother country. It was really the shattering of this illusion, of centuries of expectations fostered by colonial dependency and consolidated by a colonial education, that led to the trauma and alienation so vividly recreated by novelists such as Lamming and Selvon. Lamming's The Emigrants is a sombre and serious drama of the crumbling of the emigrant's illusions and of the alienation and personal disintegration that form the major part of his experience in the metropolis. In In The Castle of My Skin, Lamming's Trumper, the returned exile, posits a positive vision of exile and of the immigrant's experience as capable of fostering a sense of community and race, and of enlarging the West Indian's vision of himself. In The Emigrant this hope is hardly realised. For if there is a sense of community on the ship that transports West Indian emigrants to England, it is generated only by a shared vulnerability and dependence. In the metropolis West Indian immigrants exist only on the periphery of mainstream British life, pushed there by a sense of exile and an irrelevance of function in a society whose past they cannot alter and whose future seems always beyond them. The eventual fragmentation and isolation of the immigrant community only enact the drama of individual dislocation and alienation which Lamming sees as the emigrant's lot. Another dimension of the theme is explored in Lamming's examination of the West Indian artist's relationship to exile. For the three artists whose lives, work and relationships Lamming scrupulously delineates, the costs and perils of exile are measured through the bankruptcy of an artistic existence without a supporting community.

In Selvon the theme of emigration is much more humourously explored. While Lamming's immigrants appear in a perpetual sombre cage, Selvon's migrants are constantly outside, often on aimless, fun-loving sprees but usually maintaining a sense of solidarity and community, a shared vocabulary and attitudes which make it possible for them to create their own 'portion' of England in spite of the wider loneliness they experience. Although the light-hearted tone often prevents a serious engagement and confrontation with the real psychological effects of dislocation and alienation, it establishes, much more so than Lamming, a sense of a warm and humane West Indian presence that often contrasts with the rigid coldness of the English neighbours. More recently, the new generation of West Indians, British children of West Indian immigrants, have added new tones, rhythms and dimensions to the theme. Where limited horizons, frustrations and a sense of unbelonging moved Lamming's characters to disintegration and set Selvon's on aimless sprees, these very pressures elicit harsh and angry rhythms from new generation poets like Lynton Kwesi Johnson and Bongo Jerry, moved partly by new conceptions of themselves not as immigrants but as deprived citizens.

The 'emigrant' experience outside the colonial metropolis presents interesting variations of theme. It would be worthwhile to compare the experience of migration and exile in novels by Claude McKay (USA), Paule Marshall (USA), and Austin Clarke (Canada), with the experience delineated by Lamming and Selvon. For there is a sense in which the emigrant's sojourn in the Americas is not complicated by the psychology of colonial relations and does not involve an intense shattering of illusions and expectations of a common heritage. Marshall's Brown Girl, Brown Stones is, for instance, more an attempt at reconciling a very strong Barbadian culture and consciousness with the demands of a different American culture, exploring as Austin Clarke also does, the conflicts and spiritual costs of this reconciliation.

MAJOR TEXTS

Eric Walrond, Tropic Death, New York: Boni and Liveright, 1926.

The stories in Walrond's collection dramatise the plight of West Indian migrants in search of work in Latin America. They evoke a grim picture of their squalid surroundings and their wretched lives. Set on the West Indian islands of the emigrants, on 'emigrant' ships and in Panama, the stories recreate a rounded picture of the 'nightmare' of migration.

George Lamming, The Emigrants, London: Michael Joseph, 1954; Allison and Busby, London, 1980.

The novel is a drama of the West Indian's journey from the islands towards 'a better break' in England. The long drawn out nature of the journey and the claustrophobic atmosphere of the ship allows Lamming to explore the physical and psychological needs that motivate the emigrants and to relate them later to the realities of their existence in the metropolis.

George Lamming, Water With Berries, London: Longman, 1971.

In this exhaustive exploration of the West Indian artist as an emigrant and immigrant, Lamming measures the cost of exile not merely in terms of personal disintegration and alienation but also in terms of the deterioration of West Indian creative talent in the absence of a supporting community.

Edward Brathwaite, 'The Emigrants' in Rights of Passage, London: Oxford University Press, 1967.

Brathwaite's poem records the loss of real roots, and explores the diminution involved in the experience of emigration. The sense of impersonality and invisibility which the emigrant experiences is for Brathwaite a bar to his full development as a person.

Samuel Selvon, The Lonely Londoners, London: Wingate, 1956; Longman, 1979.

Selvon's novel treats with humour and comedy the West Indian immigrant life in England. Against a prevailing sense of their way of life back home, Selvon explores their often comic adjustments to new lives in England, revealing the conditions of their existence outside mainstream British life.

Samuel Selvon, Moses Ascending, London: Wingate, 1975.

Selvon concentrates on the fortunes of a particular immigrant, recording his life after years of existence and struggle in England. The life story of Moses is really a reflection of the various stages in the West Indian immigrant's adjustment to life in England, a document of his social progress and personal awareness.

Linton Kwesi Johnson, Dread Beat And Blood, London: Bogle L'Ouverture, 1975.

Linton Johnson's poems convey in angry and passionate tones the experience of the urban black in England. Created in the tradition of oral poetry they draw on the vernacular for both vocabulary and rhythm.

Claude McKay, Home to Harlem, New York: Harper and Brothers, 1932.

McKay is mainly preoccupied with the black's existence and place in a predominantly white society. His Caribbean character, Ray, is the classic black intellectual tortured by a sense of alienation and feelings of unbelonging. His entire experience in the American city is a process of racial, social and political awareness.

Paule Marshall, Brown Girl, Brown Stones, New York: Avon Books, 1959.

Paule Marshall's novel about Barbadian immigrants in Brooklyn explores the community's new life, expectations and ambitions in America against the background of their Barbadian culture, attitudes and rituals. Most of the dilemmas and conflicts in the novel dramatise the relationship between a strong Barbadian identity and the cultural demands of the new society.

Austin Clarke, The Bigger Light, Boston and Toronto: Little, Brown, 1975.

In this novel about Barbadian immigrants in Canada, Clarke explores their cultural and personal alienation while at the same time depicting their experience as a process of self realisation and liberation.

The Rastafarian in West Indian literature

Rastafarianism as an ideology has held an interest and a fascination for West Indian writers at various stages in the development of the literature. Various writers have projected the Rastafarians' beliefs and rituals and featured their powerful speech rhythms in poetry and prose. In some respects this interest has been in response to the sense of self and dignity which the sect maintains through its very rejection of the imitative, bastardised version of 'British' society which most middle-class West Indians consider the norm for their own lives. It was really the strength and independence of mind behind their choice which made them attractive to a new generation of writers already dissatisfied with the mulatto self-image projected in earlier literature. Yet, interestingly, the Rastafarians themselves could not be farther away from the educated writers in terms of background and upbringing. They were originally the dispossessed products of Jamaica's urban life, for whom Garvey's message of blackness and racial pride had had a special meaning. For them, the coronation of the Emperor Selassie in Ethiopia was nothing but the fulfilment of a prophecy made by their leader concerning the redemption of the African race from its bondage to the Western world. For this belief they created a new world and religion in which the Emperor became God, and Africa his promised kingdom on earth. As a sect, Rastafarians grew steadily after the 1930s invasion of Abyssinia, becoming a mass movement that appealed mostly to the depressed of the slums and the 'dungle'. As a sect they have featured in various dimensions in West Indian literature. In Mais's The Hills Were Joyful Together and Brother Man, their humane philosophy of peace and brotherhood is explored as a positive unifying force in the pinched and deprived world of the slum. For Orlando Patterson, writing in 1964, however, the Rastafarians signified the very futility of transcending the depression and depravity of the 'dungle'. Although in The Children of Sisyphus, the fantasy about escape to Africa is obviously born of the Rastafarian's rejection of his conditions and of his struggle to transcend them, Patterson presents it as part of the general absurdity of man's condition in the West Indies. But the very passion embodied in the Rastafarian's dream of escape is motivated by an awareness of his squalid surroundings and of the deficiencies of the larger social world around him. This is the paradox that emerges in Brathwaite's portrait of him in 'Wings Of A Dove' (Rights). For behind the Rasta man's illusion of escape, behind the dreadfulness and the labyrinth in which his perceptions are finally trapped, there is a clear sense of self and a true assessment of society. These perceptions are ultimately what appeals to a poet in search of 'self' and vision, and in this respect Brathwaite sees an affinity between the Rastafarian and the groping poet. Younger poets writing a few years after Brathwaite's Rights have suggested similar and subtle affinities between themselves and the Rastafarian figure. Anthony McNeill has, for instance, explored the ambiguities of the revolutionary consciousness, while in 'Squatter's Rites' (Uncle Time) Dennis Scott has dramatised how his personal strength and dignity are reborn in his son's reggae music and celebrated in the very form of the poet's art. These perceptions and representations of the Rastafarian are not merely romantic views, they are part of the poet's recognition of the link between the Rasta man's destiny and his own, and of the extent to which his own art demonstrates its responsibility to what he represents.

MAJOR TEXTS

Roger Mais, The Hills Were Joyful Together, London: Jonathan Cape, 1953; Heinemann Caribbean Writers Series, 1981.

Mais's novel evokes the pattern of life in the Jamaican slum-yard, concentrating on its poverty, squalor and constriction, and projecting their social consequences. On another level, it explores the character of the community, revealing how the shared experience of poverty and deprivation can give rise to a sense of community and humanity and how the Rastafarian Ras, embodies some of these aspects.

Roger Mais, Brother Man, London: Jonathan Cape, 1954; Heinemann Caribbean Writers Series, 1974.

The novel considers the possibilities that Mais hints at in The Hills Were Joyful Together. In the squalor, construction and evil of the yard Mais explores the possibilities of messianic leadership as embodied in the spiritual vision of the Rastafarian, Brother Man.

Orlando Patterson, The Children of Sisyphus, London: New Authors, 1964; Longman Caribbean Writers Series, 1986.

Patterson's novel portrays Rastafarians as a social phenomenon of the Jamaican slum world and as an escape route for the deprived urban dweller anxious to overcome the conditions of his life. He presents the Rastafarian's dream of escape, particularly in relation to Africa, as a sophisticated personal and spiritual escapism which is part of the general absurdity of man's condition in Jamaica.

Edward Brathwaite, 'Wings Of A Dove' in Rights of Passage, London: Oxford University Press, 1967.

Brathwaite's poem reveals the paradoxes inherent in the illusion behind the Rastafarians' escapism, and the social perceptions that give rise to it. His portrayal uncovers the clear sense of self and the perception of middle-class rootlessness that inspire their dream of escape and rebellion.

Anthony McNeill, 'Straight Seeking', 'Saint Ras', 'Ode to Brother Joe' in Reel From 'The Life Movie', Kingston, Jamaica: Savacou, 1972.

All three poems are explorations of the Rastafarians' significance to the poet. McNeill sees the passion of their dream as the quality that helps them to escape the crippling squalor of their surroundings. Although he mocks the illusory nature of the dream he pits it against the stark details of the Rasta's world, the poet recognises their passion and faith as positive contrasts to the general insensitivity of larger Jamaican society.

Dennis Scott, 'Squatter's Rites' in Uncle Time, Pittsburgh: Pittsburgh University Press, 1973.

The poem is a celebration of the link between the Rastafarian's condition and vision and the poet's art. The Rasta's personal strength and vitality are reborn in his son's recognition and respect and in the reggae which he composes in his memory.

Post-independence critiques

In the West Indies the literature of the 1960s and 1970s was essentially one of disillusionment and despondency. The pain, sorrow, silence and withdrawal of this period have contrasted with the excitement and explosion of literary activity in the 1930s and 1940s, and with the confidence and promise of the earlier nationalism. First the break-up of the West Indies Federation in 1962 erased the wider notion of a West Indian political unit, leaving small nations for which political independence was perhaps more a gift from the metropolis than an actively and independently worked out achievement. Thus, in the West Indies the aftermath of political freedom has been sadly ambiguous and most writers have reacted deeply to the very politics of freedom.

Is independence what it is? One day in July you say you want to be that there thing, an' one day in a next July the law say all right, from now you's what you askin' for. What change that can change? Might as well call your dog a cat an' hope to hear him mew. Is only words an names what don' signify nothin.

Most West Indian writers have echoed the disenchantment and cynicism of Lamming's character in Season of Adventure, for freedom has not brought self-knowledge and fulfilment, only the death of aspirations and the entrenchment of class and social barriers. Indeed in writers such as Carter who had preached resistance and revolution in the 1950s, the despondency has been more traumatic. For Carter lived through the Guyanese racial strife of 1957 and the race war of 1962-64, and we have only to compare the fiery optimism of Poems of Resistance with the reticence and silence of Carter's later poetry to measure the extent to which the turn of politics had affected him. In 1963 when he wrote the poems in Jail Me Quickly, it seemed that he had lost the will to fight and had resigned himself to despair:

Men murder men, as men must murder men, to build their shining governments of the damned.
(from 'After One Year')

In the works of Walcott and Brathwaite a similar disenchantment with politics and the establishment was taking place. Many of the poems in the Gulf and Sea Grapes, for instance, attack the continuing (and indeed increasing) shallowness of the imitative society, and in The Star Apple Kingdom and The Fortunate Traveller the tone of Walcott's political satire becomes increasingly sombre, following a deepening cynicism about the course of politics and of political values in the region. In Brathwaite the attack on politics and society is embodied in the poet's dual apprehension of the society in general and in the dual vision of sterility and growth which informs the poet's perspective in poems such as 'Homecoming', 'Trade Winds' and 'Pebble'. Brathwaite denounces 'the desert' of the political climate, the lack of vision, the exploitation of people and the seeming repetitiveness of history in the region:

and the wheel turns and the future returns
wreathed in disguises

He balances this static fatalistic view with a sense of creative potential based on his sense of the poet's almost priest-like capacity to 'refashion futures' with a healer's hand. Even among younger poets like McNeille and Scott, the same bitter tones, the same violent denunciations of politicians persist, confirming Lamming's recognition in Season of Adventure that independence in the West Indies had been hollow and futile.

In the novel the presentation of post-independence society has conveyed similar disenchantment. Naipaul, who had already assessed West Indian potentiality in The Mimic Men, continued to examine the capacity of post-colonial independence societies to restructure themselves. In Guerrillas his Black Power revolutionaries are portrayed as part of the disorder of a chaotic and decaying society, and their revolution becomes the response which each revolutionary makes to the disorder outside. Naipaul's conclusions about West Indian society are similar to his conclusions in The Mimic Men because the vision of society is historically determined. In this society, he concludes, self-assertion and revolution will always become a pose, part of the answer to the disorder outside. This view of the political and creative potential of the West Indies has been shaped by a vision of history that sees man as chained to his past and incapable of transcendence. But other writers of the region have conceived of a more fluid relationship between man and his past and have been able to envisage more open futures in which possibilities for re-fashioning the future exist.

A novelist such as Earl Lovelace, who also explores the West Indian's potential for change and vision in The Dragon Can't Dance, appears more open in his exploration and less consumed by historical determinism and fatalism. Although Lovelace also questions the West Indian's capacity for revolution, he locates the disability not in history per se, but in that loss of ritual and energy, that dissociation between West Indian man and his cultural, spiritual traditions which has created his paralysis and emptiness. Lovelace's perspective in The Dragon, the very metaphor of his explorations, establishes the presence and potency of the rituals of carnivals which his major characters stand in danger of bastardising and perverting. His portrayal of his characters' acts of rebellion which he presents as empty drama, find a link with that loss of ritual and energy which he symbolically dramatises in the major action of the novel. It is in the spiritual and moulding possibilities of carnival and dance that Lovelace locates possibilities. That is why The Dragon Can't Dance, for all its cynicism about revolution and change in the West Indies, is ultimately a novel of possibility.

MAJOR TEXTS

Martin Carter, 'Jail Me Quickly' in Poems of Succession, London: New Beacon, 1977.

The poems appear to mark the climax of Carter's movement from the exhilaration of promise in the 1950s towards the trauma of political strife in the 1960s, and the resignation and fatalism which were his response to the failure of Guyana's political hopes. They comment on the political situation and on people and society, the poet's tone moving from mockery towards a silent tragic resignation.

George Lamming, Season of Adventure, London: Michael Joseph, 1960.

This novel is perhaps the first serious analysis of the failure of nationalism. It examines the quality of freedom and independence through its ruthless portrayal of the apparatus of power and of the shallowness and insecurity of that class that holds it. It is both an indictment of failure and an exploration of wholeness. The search for true freedom is linked with the search for identity, and both are explored in the heroine's relationship with her forgotten racial, historical and cultural self.

V S Naipaul, The Mimic Men, London: André Deutsch, 1967.

A portrait both of the society that achieves independence in the West Indies and of the people who hold political power. Naipaul relates the region's political possibilities to the society and its history and sees failure in the region's past and its present disorder.

V.S. Naipaul, Guerrillas, London: André Deutsch, 1975.

In what appears to be Naipaul's ultimate statement on the West Indies, this novel recreates the aspirations and slogans of the Black Power revolutionaries against the background of a decaying and chaotic West Indian society.

Edward Brathwaite, Islands, London: Oxford University Press, 1969.

Poems such as 'Homecoming' and 'Trade Winds' denounce the region's politicians not just for exploiting and violating the people but for depriving the entire region of a future. Brathwaite sees possibilities for 're-fashioning' futures not in the hands of politicians but in those of the poet, humble, sensitive and priest-like, yet close to the grounded folk.

Derek Walcott, Sea Grapes, London: Jonathan Cape, 1976.

Walcott surveys and articulates the political climate of the Caribbean region through an artist's sensibility. His evocation and judgment centre on the ways in which the political climate affect the ordinary people. He sees the region's politicians as plodders without imagination, administering the last rites to their people; but the entire collection is informed by a vision of promise, of a vitality that is part of the creative resilience of the people, a power that can transform historical loss into promise.

Derek Walcott, The Star-Apple Kingdom, London: Jonathan Cape, 1980; New York: Farrar Straus and Giroux, 1979.

This collection is principally a political satire on Caribbean politics. It indicts the political leaders for failing to transform the region's potential. The poems take us on a journey through the archipelago, revealing the poet's deep disillusionment with the quality of life. In the 'Schooner Flight' the details of the protagonist's historical and contemporary experience explain his disillusionment and exile. Delineated as a symbol and victim of corruption, his story becomes the story of the region's failure.

Mervyn Morris, Shadow Boxing, London and Port of Spain, Trinidad: New Beacon, 1973; 1979.

In most of the poems in this collection Morris flays the various consciousness-raising movements that became part of the social and political scene in the 1960s and 1970s: black power movements, political groups, grass roots movements. He presents these satiric themes through the consciousness of a folk character whose dialect-speaking voice reveals its own genuine natural wisdom as it uncovers the fraudulent poses of the new radical men.

Derek Walcott, The Fortunate Traveller, London: Faber & Faber, 1982.

This collection is another critical evocation in which Walcott examines the relationship between the political apparatus and the quality of people's lives. Cleverly embodied in the point of view of a narrator and a Calypsonian protagonist, it is a devastating exposure of the ineffectuality of government and of the distance, indifference and contempt with which politicians have always regarded the mass of the people in the West Indies.

Carnival

Trinidad's annual theatrical event, though mainly distinguished now for its pageantry and fun, is as old and singular as Trinidad's own history of settlement and slavery. This event, which has grown to capture the entire Trinidadian imagination and become almost symbolic of a fun-loving West Indies, ironically began as the entertainment of slave masters in eighteenth-century Trinidad. Carnival as an annual entertainment really began with the arrival in Trinidad of French-speaking planter immigrants and their African slaves. A vigorous, fun-loving people, the French immigrants soon settled down to a free and comfortable life in what was then a mainly undeveloped and neglected outpost of the Spanish American Empire. Their Carnival, lasting from Christmas to Ash Wednesday, was a major season of diversion and entertainment, a season of uninhibited gaiety, of music, dance and masquerade, during which they as planters they could even permit themselves to fantasise about the slaves they held, to assume their roles, mask their costumes and dance their bamboulas, their ghombas and their kalindas.

Originally a leveller of barriers, Carnival grew to absorb rather than exclude other planter immigrants who flooded Trinidad during this time, and newcomers from the Spanish Main and from the French and English-speaking islands easily found themselves a part of the yearly spectacle. The British conquest of Trinidad in 1797 encouraged a more stable development, though it could not stop the flow of migrants, and by the first half of the nineteenth century Trinidad's population had not only doubled but had been extended to include a diverse group of people and races. More slaves had been imported from Africa, and even after abolition, slaves captured from slaving ships were almost always resettled in Trinidad. In this slave-based society of distinct groupings, Carnival as an open entertainment was bound to be affected. The British colonial administration introduced measures bringing it into line with the society's strict colour stratifications. Slaves were excluded from entertainment; free coloureds could participate only under stringent regulations, and until emancipation, the festival was an entertainment strictly for whites and free coloureds.

After the emancipation of slaves these stringent measures could not effectively be maintained. Freed slaves literally crashed into carnival entertainment, taking their cue from plantation conditions and plantation life on the island. Planters had permitted themselves to fantasise about their slaves, masking their costumes and dancing their dances. Now freed slaves also took liberties and mocked the authority of the militia, staging mock battles and parodying the very authority which has been wielded over them. Such parodies, in addition to more traditional slave amusements at Christmas, became a frequent form of diversion at Carnival time. The 'moko jumbie' on stilts and the 'John Canoe' in semi-military costume became regular sights in carnival processions, generating a new atmosphere of pre-Carnival meetings, rehearsals and get-togethers which still survive in the feverish pre-Carnival activities in the tents. Freed slaves, it appeared, were taking over the Carnival.

The street masquerades now involved more and more scenes depicting aspects of slavery; street revellers were becoming noisier and noisier, and Carnival itself, as the white press saw it, was degenerating into a 'jamaican carnival', an underworld affair and a relic of barbarism.

In spite of several attempts, the ruling class was never able to suppress this new thrust in Carnival entertainment. Every attempt met with more heightened resistance, and even occasional rioting from the mass of revellers. The annual celebration had become more like a symbol of freedom for them and was now, as Errol Hill observes, 'no longer a European-inspired nature festival but a deeply meaningful anniversary of deliverance with a ritualistic significance rooted in the very experience of slavery'. The new thrust naturally created its own rituals, and the procession of torches with which the planters had celebrated the beginning of Carnival became a vigorous procession of drumming and singing, while the 'camboulay' originally associated with Emancipation celebrations became a part of the Carnival 'Dimanche Gras' ritual, giving a distinctive significance to the freed slaves' appropriation of the festival.

The emergence of steel band music, itself a response to the official banning of drums and shacks, provided Carnival with its special music, just as the eventual rise of the professional Calypsonian and the elaborate costumes and properties of the masquerade give dimensions of theatre, spectacle and further ritual to the entire entertainment. Thus from its beginnings as a white planter-class diversion, Carnival progressed into a white and free-coloured upper-class entertainment; it was then appropriated by ex-slaves and the common people who made it into a ritual symbolic of their freedom and their uninhibited self-expression.

It is this essentially historical meaning of Carnival that is continually in danger of being overpowered by spectacle and theatre, and West Indian writers who have used aspects of Carnival as metaphors for expressing or commenting on West Indian realities have always hinted at this danger. Walcott's 'mass man', for instance, presents a double vision of Carnival as on the one hand creative self-expression and on the other an excess of fantasy that obscures the real implications of the celebrations. His poet persona distances himself from the hedonism, fantasy and often cruel irresponsibility of Carnival revellers to project himself as the meditative poet who must stand back from the fantasy and spectacle to draw out the significance of the festival.

But I am dancing, look from an old gibbet
my bull-whipped body swings, a metronome!
Like a fruit-bat dropped in the silk cotton's shade my mania, my mania is a terrible calm.

In spite of recognising Carnival as an important folk expression, Brathwaite has expressed a similar ambivalence about people's relation to the festival. In Islands, the concluding section of his trilogy and the section particularly devoted to West Indian realities, Carnival becomes an important metaphor for the poet's examination of West Indian responses. The 'mass man' in 'Caliban' is depicted against a background of West Indian poverty and corruption and in an atmosphere of creative and political stalemate. His 'dance' in the second movement of the poem is, in this context, not a ritual celebration of the common man's freedom and self but a dance of escape, a descent into the 'limbo silence' of the self in a flight from the oppressiveness of the outer world. Carnival is thus not a medium of awareness and a spur to liberation but a deliberate blotting out of awareness and a rejection of the possibilities of regeneration. In 'Tizzic', Brathwaite's Carnival theme operates against the background of the ambiguity with which Tizzic himself is depicted. For, on the one hand, Tizzic is a folk character attuned to the soil and apparently liberated from bondage to slave master and plantation; yet on the other he is a man imprisoned in that irresponsible concept of manliness which the Calypsonian frequently celebrates in songs. His response to the ritual and music of Carnival is governed by his own personal contradictions, and the ceremony is for him both a source of contact with days of green unhurried growing

and an escapist dream of heaven that momentarily obliterates the impoverished and confusing present. Carnival is thus for him not a medium of spiritual regeneration but a temporary vision of glory which after its 'blazing apotheosis' returns Tizzic to the real world, to Lenten sorrows, Ash-Wednesday, 'ashes, darkness, death'.

It is perhaps only in the closing section of Brathwaite's Islands that Carnival becomes a metaphor of illuminations and a realistic summation and acceptance of the processes of life in the West Indies. For the poem 'Jouvert', signifying the morning of Carnival, celebrates neither the escapist prancing and 'limbo descent' of Caliban's carnival nor the borrowed glory of Tizzic's uplift. Its music and dance rather recall the losses and gains of history: the upheavals and displacements ('cries of arrows', 'lightning flashes', 'men asunder') the transformations, the compromises and the new fragile adjustments; the 'sorrows' burning to 'ashes', 'grey rocks' melting to 'pools' of lashes'

sweat and flowers

Dawn rides over 'shattered homes', and furrows over fields

and musty ghettos over men now hearing waiting watching in the Lenten morning hurts forgotten, hearts no longer bound to black and bitter ashes in the ground.

Thus, Brathwaite's final image of Carnival implicitly reiterates its historical roots as an affirmation and celebration of a people's sense of becoming.

In The Dragon Can't Dance, Earl Lovelace not only returns us to the historical roots of Carnival but also explores its meaning and significance in a twentieth-century post-war context. Carnival becomes both subject and metaphor as he portrays his slum world and delineates its attempts to become visible. Using the festival as both metaphor and form, he dramatises its potential as a ritual for regeneration and self-assertion while at the same time exploring its significance for the deprived characters of the slum. Thus, on the one hand, the whole ritual of Carnival is portrayed: the song and dance, the shout, the costume and the masquerade jump, celebrations of the self; and on the other, the novelist carefully scrutinises the nature of that self. Lovelace implies throughout that Carnival must go beyond the ritual shout, that finally each generation must interpret it in terms of its own particular social and political situation and needs. The 'mass man's' Dragon dance in the novel fails as an assertion of a meaningful self because it never moves beyond the pose of terror and menace, beyond the religion of idleness which had signified rebellion among emancipated slaves in an earlier age. Thus in spite of the faith, the memories and the effort of creativity, the 'mass man's' dragon succeeds only in drawing attention to itself. The novel's form works towards this illumination, and the 'dragon' recognises at last the limitations of his masquerade dance.

In other West Indian works, Carnival is often simply evoked as a folk festival to which characters respond either positively or negatively according to their peculiar social and psychological problems. Merle Hodge for instance, uses Carnival as part of a world and a way of life to which her protagonist responds with ambivalence. Tee's response is dramatised as part of her 'middle-class' embarrassment about the folk, but her spontaneous enjoyment of the yard scene is the author's subtle suggestion that the festival is part of her legacy.

Carnival as a folk form has evidently captured the imagination not just of the 'mass man' and 'pan man' but also of those writers working with the 'written' form. This interplay between oral and written forms is a significant and unique aspect of West Indian literature, which will eventually contribute to defining its distinctiveness.

MAJOR TEXTS

Edward Brathwaite, 'Caliban' in Islands, London: Oxford University Press, 1969.

Brathwaite's portrait of the masquerade dancer points to the dance's potential for spiritual regeneration, but Caliban prefers the dance of escape, the dance or descent into self, as a means of obliterating an oppressive present.

Edward Brathwaite, 'Tizzic' in Islands, London: Oxford University Press, 1969.

Like Caliban's 'mass', Tizzic's carnival dance is also an escape. Caliban descends into the limbo silence of the self; Tizzic ascends into an imagined and borrowed heaven. Both fail to exploit the potential of the 'mass' and the dance.

Edward Brathwaite, 'Jou'vert' in Islands, London: Oxford University Press, 1969.

In this final section of Islands, Brathwaite gives a positive vision of Carnival and points to its potential as a means of catharsis and affirmation. Here the dance is a process of understanding and illumination rather than an escape, presenting a vision of the process of history and the adjustments and transformations of the West Indies, which is both cathartic and affirmative.

Earl Lovelace, The Dragon Can't Dance, London: André Deutsch, 1979; Longman Drumbeat, 1981.

A novel that explores the meaning of Carnival to the deprived masses of the city's backyard. Lovelace examines the popular concept of warriorhood in relation to rebellion. His 'mass men' see themselves as warriors shouting their self-affirmation, but Lovelace's drama flays both the meaning and value of that self.

Merle Hodge, Crick Crack Monkey, London: André Deutsch, 1970; Heinemann Caribbean Writers Series, 1981.

A novel that dramatises a growing girl's confusion in the class and cultural chaos of twentieth-century Trinidad. Hodge's heroine walks in two worlds, one that is open, natural and unsophisticated but warm and comforting, and another that is polished but stilted and unsure. The heroine's response to Carnival becomes a mirror of her inner conflict and her divided self.

Derek Walcott, 'Mass Man' in The Gulf, London: Jonathan Cape, 1969.

A poem in which Walcott defines his relationship to Carnival and at the same time distances himself from its excesses and its degeneration. The poem depicts both the creativity and spectacle of the festival and the loveless, often cruel, abandon of the general mass of revellers. Walcott projects himself as the poet isolated by the mindless gaiety of the people and therefore able to draw out the real historical significance of the ceremony.

The Calypso

The Calypso forms part of a tradition of verbal arts and biting commentary in the West Indies, and is historically linked to the post-emancipation 'takeover' of Carnival, first by freed slaves and later by the urban folk in the city's yards. The gradual transformation of Carnival created in its wake a variety of forms and expressions which helped to shape the Calypso. Freed slaves celebrated Carnival not with ballroom dances and promenades but with songs, street dancing, drumming and stick fighting, creating a general street theatre which gave ample opportunities for free and open expression and for uninhibited criticism. Songs of comment and abuse were part of this theatre and were often directed both at rival groups of revellers and at the authority of the ruling class. Each lead singer formed his own chorus to complete the yearly street drama, and the Carnival songs normally emerged spontaneously from these street contracts and provocations. Association with the yearly Carnival led to more planning and preparation and to the composition of special songs to match the themes of the masquerade bands. Though these preparations generally reduced the possibilities for spontaneous compositions and improvisations, they created a social setting as well as a regular audience. With such regular appearances in Carnival tents, the lead singer (Calypsonian) became a performer with costume, gestures and song, and the tents themselves became platforms for an often creative interpretation by both performers and an increasingly knowledgeable and discriminating audience.

Trinidadians value verbal expertise. For them, the way a thing is said is of paramount importance, and in these performances Trinidadians judged Calypsonians not only by the melody of their song but also by their lyrics, the quality of comment and the measure of verbal manipulation they employed in delivering it. Therefore the good and popular Calypsonian always composed within the context of the audience's assumptions and vocabulary but manipulated them to make judgments and criticisms, presenting them in a lyric powerful enough to stretch their imaginations as well.

In the course of time, frequent performances by lead singer and band led to the formation of special bands which performed throughout the year, but became especially active at Carnival time when Calypsos were composed around the general theme of Carnival bands. The lead singer of the band emerged as the Calypsonian of today, and the entire tradition of song, comment and provocation became part of an urban sub-culture. The Calypso itself developed into a distinctive form, capturing and interpreting aspects of Trinidad's oral forms, mostly the 'lime', the 'old talk' and the 'picong', and evolving special canons by which its practitioners could be appreciated and judged. Certain characteristics came to be accepted as peculiar to the Calypso, so that often, beneath the veil of levity and frivolity suggested both by the music and the performance, the Calypso might contain a great deal of incisive social observation and commentary. The Calypsonian constantly monitored what was happening around him and used his songs and the platform of the tents to make social comments and expose wrongdoings and misdemeanours. His Calypso's point of view was often a combination of his own judgment and the judgment of the man in the street, and his pose was nearly always that of the bystander, the observer left to sift out a message and deliver conclusions. Very often he crystallised a general mood about a situation long before the general public had time to articulate it, and it is this special relationship between the Calypsonians and events in society that allows commentators to trace Trinidad's social and political history from a critical analysis of Calypsos composed over a period of years. Commentary in the Calypso ranges from the early jingoistic songs of the nationalist period (when Calypsonians sang in praise of a stable, happy and racially harmonious Trinidad) to the later satires and bitter presentations of the often sordid realities of politics and society on the island. The political satires often derived from two sources: from the clash between the politicians own self-image and the Calypsonian's depiction of it, and from the jarring effects of those songs of attack when couched in the form of earlier jingoistic Calypsos. Sparrow's 'Model Nation' and Sniper's 'Portrait of Trinidad', earlier Calypsos composed in this tradition, were for instance satirised in Black Stalin's 'New Portrait of Trinidad', sung in the same mode but with different images and completely opposite effects.

Generally, the Calypsonian is more of a social commentator than an outright political satirist and his Calypsos not only create a particular social viewpoint but also occasionally reflects some of society's own obsessions, contradictions and ambivalences. There is for instance, a tradition of calypso composition that specialises in the consistent bloating of a male super-ego and the embarrassment and degradation of women. The Calypsonian very often celebrates the male ego by depicting a sexually dominant male figure, often irresponsible and immoral but always strong, triumphant and ultimately 'heroic'. The female figure is almost always the butt of this type of Calypso and is often embarrassed, humiliated and finally rejected by an exultant male. Such depictions, rendered powerfully humorous by the Calypsonian's dexterity with language and rhythm, raise instant laughter, but the real Calypsonian, the man of substance, always attempts to move beyond such humour, to project himself as the commentator, poet and conscience of his society.

The Calypso features in West Indian literature as both theme and form, and there is a sense in which its special techniques as a folk and oral form have helped to give shape to a number of West Indian imaginative works. There is what may be termed a 'Calypso style', usually involving a certain way of presenting a situation and a particular way of manipulating both language and 'audience'. For as an oral folk form, the Calypso has always worked with the spoken language and with social and cultural assumptions shared by both Calypsonian and audience. Usually, as in the prose narratives of Selvon and Lovelace, the rhythms of the spoken word are captured in prose narrative; well-known images are manipulated and combined with the favourite aside, 'the lime', 'old talk' and the popular joke, giving prose narrative the flavour of a Calypso song. All the episodes in Selvon's Lonely Londoners are presented in this way and in the creole language without the intrusions of 'standard' English, so that each episode becomes a kind of 'oral delivery' in itself. In A Brighter Sun, where standard English and the creole language are combined, the 'Calypso style' is incorporated into those sections where Selvon's characters are left to 'deliver' their responses to people and situations in creole, within the framework of assumptions they share with other characters and with the readers. For Lovelace, the Calypso is interestingly both language and movement and is enacted, notably in The Dragon Can't Dance, as both music and dance. The Calypso effect is achieved chiefly through the manipulation of structure and rhythm, for Lovelace's sentences enact the actual rhythms and movements of the Calypso dance, projecting its function as purgation and catharsis:

There is dancing in the Calypso. Dance! Dance to the hurt! Dance!
If you catching hell, dance, and the government don't care, dance!
Your woman take your money and run away with another man, dance!
Dance! Dance! Dance!

As subject and theme the Calypso has functioned in West Indian literature as a depiction of an aspect of West Indian life, and Calypsos have often been evoked to illustrate and confirm the observations and judgments of the general population. In certain instances, as in Naipaul's Miguel Street, the Calypso is evoked as a means both of social commentary and caustic satire, because often the very consciousness that its observations and judgments confirm is the consciousness that Naipaul exposes as a negative manifestation of slum life. Often the levity and irresponsibility that lurk beneath the Calypso's melody reflect similar qualities in the characters themselves and the affinity explains their continual wish to be identified with those values which are affirmed in the Calypso.

Other West Indian works feature the delineation of the Calypsonian and the dramatisation of the potency and traps of his craft. A J Seymour's poem 'To A Calypso Singer' and Edward Brathwaite's poem 'Calypso' both suggest the possibilities and the dangers of the art. Seymour sees the Calypso becoming an opium for inertia, a substitute for radical thought and action; Brathwaite manipulates his poem to suggest a seriousness that extends beyond the Calypsonian's flippant and superficial view of the islands. It is perhaps only in The Dragon Can't Dance that we are given a full portrait of a Calypsonian. Lovelace's Philo is by far the most detailed study of a Calypsonian in West Indian Literature, and his career dramatises the economic necessity and the spiritual impoverishment that lead to the degeneration of the Calypsonian and his craft. Philo's predicament, rather than being his alone, is finally shown as equally that of a society which has lost track of the values of its forms and has compromised with mediocrity.

MAJOR TEXTS

V S Naipaul, Miguel Street, London: André Deutsch, 1959; Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1971.

A collection of stories in which Naipaul depicts the character, mentality and values of people in an urban backyard.

Relevant Stories

'The Thing Without a Name'

In Naipaul's Miguel Street, the values that people uphold are inimical to ambition and betterment, and Naipaul uses the Calypso's themes to illustrate these negative attitudes. The Calypso that immortalises Popo is a Calypso that sings of his jail sentence. When Popo acts responsibly he is shunned as an outsider; when he returns to the fold and becomes a criminal his 'reputation' is re-established and the street proudly affirms the Calypso that sings of his crime.

'The Coward'

A story that gives an ironical portrait of the street's 'bad John', a man for whom Carnival and street band are like ritual and religion. The Calypso is his main source of reference and he lives out its words and becomes the bully and terror of the street, though inwardly he is merely a frightened little man.

'The Pyrotechnist'

The Calypso functions here in a rather negative way. Naipaul points to its tendency to trivialise what is serious. Morgan tries all his life to be a comedian, to stir up laughter: When he finally succeeds, it is on account of something which is not at all funny.

'The Maternal Instinct'

Here the Calypso becomes a point of reference supporting Nathaniel's sadistic attitude towards women. In this story the degradation of women is merely a pose, fulfilling the street's concept of manliness. Ironically, it is Nathaniel himself who is beaten by his woman.

'Caution'

This is the only story that celebrates Calypso as a spontaneous creative act. News of the end of the war and of the coming peace provokes a Carnival, and a Calypso 'springs out of nothing'. But the song that emerges is negative, titillating and unrelated to the 'peace'.

'Until The Soldiers Come'

The story dramatises the impact of the Americans on the values of the people in Trinidad. The Calypso's observations on the American take-over are enacted.

Edward Brathwaite, 'Calypso' in Rights of Passage, London: Oxford University Press, 1967.

This poem dramatises the violence of the islands' history which the Calypsonian deflates in his flippant and superficial portrayal.

Earl Lovelace, The Dragon Can't Dance, London: André Deutsch, 1979; Longman Caribbean Writers Series, 1986.

This novel depicts the degeneration of the Calypso singer, pressed by economic necessity to cheapen and popularise an essentially serious talent.

FEATURE REVIEWS

Reagan and the world

Peter Shearman

Turning the Tide: US Intervention in Central America and the Struggle for Peace

Noam Chomsky

Boston: Pluto Press. 1985. 298pp. £5.95pb

Reagan and the World: Imperial Policy in the New Cold War

Jeff McMahan

London: Pluto Press. 1984. 214pp. £3.95pb

The Reagan Administration's Foreign Policy: Facts and Judgement of the International Tribunal

Edited by Hans Kochler

London: Third World Centre for Research and Publishing. 1985. 470pp. £19.00hb/£15.00pb

Each of these three books examines the foreign policy of the USA under the Reagan Administration. But, one may well ask, does the USA under Reagan actually have a foreign policy? Does Reagan have a clearly defined purpose, and a carefully considered strategy through which to attain it, in the conduct of his international relations? Given a series of seemingly incoherent, instinctive and impulsive foreign policies, often undertaken without a consensus among the decision-making elite, it is often difficult to observe any pattern to Reagan's strategies other than a knee-jerk reaction to what is perceived (or stated to be) a 'Soviet threat' to US vital interests. However, Noam Chomsky, Jeff McMahan and the majority of the contributors to the Hans Kochler volume all argue that indeed Reagan does have clearly defined foreign policy goals, and that these have been consistently pursued during his tenure in the White House. The major reason that this is little understood, particularly in the USA itself, is the careful and deliberate manipulation of the media, which is used as a vehicle for disseminating the Administration's lies and propaganda. This is a common thesis in both the Chomsky and McMahan studies, and both authors seek through their books to set the record straight by exposing what they see as the Great Communicator's lies and revealing the real intent and purpose of his grand designs.

So what are the aims, strategies, and consequences of Reagan's foreign policy? The three books reviewed agree that the principal aim has been to restore the USA to the position of global economic, political, military and ideological dominance it enjoyed during the Cold War period. The basic strategy employed has been a military one. This has involved the largest ever military build-up in peace-time in world history, undertaken in order to regain military superiority over the Soviet Union, whilst at the same time fuelling the arms race in order to cripple the Soviet economy. Concomitant with the military build-up has been an increase in propensity actually to use the military instrument in the Third World in order to safeguard US economic and strategic interests as in Grenada, Lebanon and Libya, or, where this has not been feasible due to domestic and international constraints, to employ surrogates to achieve the same purpose—witness the cases of Israel, the 'Contras', UNITA, Pol Pot and the Mujahedin. The consequences of such a strategy have been disastrous: thousands of innocent victims in Central America, Southern Africa, the Middle East and Asia; an increase in international tensions which has put the nuclear clock closer still to midnight; an undermining of the principles of customary and treaty international law; strains in the US alliance system (eg NATO and ANZUS); increasing indebtedness of Third World nations which does nothing for the progress of stability (or democracy). The net result of Reagan's New Globalism has been to increase the insecurity of the interstate system.

Chomsky and McMahan document and record vividly some of the atrocities committed by the death squads in Central America, perpetuated knowingly by the CIA in order to defend what Reagan terms 'democracy' against the infringements of Soviet 'totalitarian' communist power. One of the main villains in both books is the former US Ambassador to the UN, Jeane Kirkpatrick, whom Chomsky refers to as the '... chief sadist-in-residence of the Reagan Administration' (p 8). She is the one who sought to give some intellectual credibility to Reagan's strategy by making a distinction between 'traditional authoritarian' regimes and Soviet-style 'totalitarian' ones. Whilst acknowledging that the former fall somewhat short of the American democratic ideal, they are worthy of US support for, although the masses remain impoverished, the elites do not challenge the basic social and political structures which enable the population (and US multinational corporations) to enjoy some basic freedoms. Discussing Kirkpatrick's distinctions, McMahan points to the freedoms of Cuban 'totalitarianism' which favour well compared to her 'authoritarian' states: freedom to free health care, long life-expectancy, freedom from hunger, guarantee of employment, and high literacy levels. On any physical-quality-of-life index, for the bulk of the population in a Third World country, Soviet 'totalitarianism' would provide a much higher ranking than 'traditional authoritarianism'.

The threat of 'totalitarian communism' in Central America is said to come from without the region, from the Soviet Union itself, which then serves to justify Reagan's policy as the defence of freedom against external aggression.

Reagan's Central American policy is justified in these terms in order to gain support from Congress and the US public. However, according to Chomsky and McMahan these are simply official lies and the real reason for US attempts to overthrow the Sandinistas is to defend the interest of American big business. It is argued by McMahan that the Reagan Administration has a much closer link with big business than any other previous US government, with thirty millionaires among the top one hundred officials, at least twenty-two of whom are multi-millionaires. Yet to explain Reagan's military intervention in the Third World as a determination to protect the privileged positions of US corporations is surely to overstate the case. It is true that a direct link existed between the United Fruit Company and the overthrow of Arbenz in Guatemala in 1954, but the USA had no economic interests in Grenada in 1983. US oil corporations in Cabinda, Angola (defended by Cuban troops!) have no interest in supporting UNITA, and American businessmen in Libya did not react favourably when Reagan ordered them to leave before his military attack on Tripoli, and the embargo against Nicaragua has hurt the private sector and US corporations most of all. Opinion polls have shown that in the United States persons engaged in international trade have consistently supported a policy of détente with the Soviet Union. Thus, corporate business interests do not always coincide with state interests, and this is, at least to a degree, true under the Reagan Administration.

Whilst Chomsky and McMahan both refer to a basic continuity in US foreign policy over the course of several administrations, Carter's early policy on human rights is frequently contrasted favourably with Reagan's disregard for the bulk of the population in Central and Latin America. Human rights and international law under the Reagan Administration are subjects taken up in the Kochler volume, which comprises papers and proceedings of an international conference on 'Reagan's Foreign Policy' held in Brussels in September, 1984. The conference was organised by the International Progress Organisation, and the participants (politicians, Nobel laureates, and academics from First and Third World countries) are almost all highly critical of the Reagan Administration, which is judged to have seriously undermined the established principles of international law and customs of state behaviour. Most of the contributors take a partisan approach, do not provide sufficient evidence to support their claims, and make no attempt at any kind of objective analysis. This would be acceptable if the papers were well-written and stimulating—but, with only a couple of exceptions, they are not. This is certainly not a book to recommend to serious students of US foreign policy, and, given the price, I do not see a ready audience for such a book anywhere.

Taken together, these books offer a damning critique of Reagan's foreign policies. Chomsky and McMahan both provide substantial evidence and convincing arguments to support their theses regarding the dangers of Reagan's attempt to reassert American hegemony in the international system

(and, it must be said, much of the evidence cited comes from the same Western sources that they claim to be so biased). As I write this review, Reagan still has two years left in office, and his legacy for US relations with the rest of the world and for global security is still unclear. Most of the authors in these three volumes argue that for security in the second half of the twentieth century military restraint, active and intense diplomacy and disarmament are necessary requirements. During the past six years Reagan has certainly not shown much commitment to any of these goals, relying instead on the old assumption that to prevent war one must prepare for it and show the resolve to employ the military instrument in order to defend the 'national interest'. This approach is not unique to the Reagan Administration. The major fear, I believe, is that Reagan could go down in history as the American President who turned his back upon a historical arms control agreement thereby instigating the most dangerous escalation of the arms race since the development of the atom.

Jonas Savimbi

Victoria Brittain

Jonas Savimbi, A Key to Africa

Fred Bridgland

Edinburgh: Mainstream Publishing. 1986. 513pp. £14.95

Fred Bridgland's long book on the jigsaw of Southern African politics over the last decade or more is written straightforwardly from the viewpoint of a strong admiration for Jonas Savimbi and a conviction that he is the rightful leader of Angola:

I felt (10 years ago) he had been betrayed, cheated and misrepresented by a wide variety of people and by historical circumstance. I believed then—and no evidence has since been presented to persuade me to change my mind—that he would have emerged as the Angolan leader with most support if the elections promised by Portugal had ever been held.

Bridgland's book does not provide the historical context to judge this assertion. Like a man looking at a many-faceted wide panorama through a telescope, Bridgland's perspective is inevitably distorted by its simple focus on Savimbi. The UNITA leader himself, quick-witted and charismatic by other accounts as well as Bridgland's, has over the years successfully sold himself as the 'key to Africa' to the South Africans, the Saudis, the CIA, President Mobutu, King Hassan of Morocco and others of similar political persuasion.

FEATURE REVIEWS

His fortunes are inextricably linked to geopolitical policies in Southern Africa quite outside his own control—specifically to Western fears of communism in the area and a deep commitment to defend capitalism in South Africa itself against such a threat.

Bridgland knows this, and documents much of Savimbi's external backing from this clutch of conservatives. However, he chooses to depict Savimbi as a hard-pressed nationalist unashamed of his backing, rather than the well-heeled opportunist who emerges from his narrative.

Bridgland is a correspondent for the conservative paper The Scotsman. Previously he was a Reuters correspondent in Central Africa. Rather unusually for a news agency man, he apparently enjoyed licence to spend a considerable amount of time flying, often in planes made available by Lonhro, to meet Savimbi in remote parts of Angola or in the heavily guarded home provided by King Hassan of Morocco in Rabat. In the lean years when Savimbi's boasts of being 'in Luanda by Christmas' were the most the outside world knew of him, Bridgland was one of the few journalists to continue to take him seriously. Even the USA was more interested in exploring possibilities of courting the MPLA.

By beginning his book with a quotation from George Orwell on the impossibility of reporting correctly anything you have not personally witnessed, Bridgland raises high expectations of moral and intellectual rigour in this ambitious work. But the academic respectability of this huge tome is questionable.

With disarming candour Bridgland admits 'I myself am not impartial.' And he demonstrates this on nearly every page of his work, by using his chief actor as his chief witness—one fatal flaw immediately revealed in the extensive and interesting footnotes. Besides Savimbi himself, the sources quoted include a good deal of The Daily Telegraph (London), UNITA communiqués, Western intelligence sources and so on. Not surprisingly, there are small errors of fact, for example, in the family origins of such important Angolans as Lucio Lara and Luis d'Almeida, or the assertion that the then Tanzanian minister Mohamed Babu was a friend of Savimbi, or that the Chinese journalist Co Liang was 'an agent' (Time Magazine's version, although presented by Bridgland as fact). Such errors are unsettling for the reader. In addition, some of Bridgland's quotations from other journalists or writers are out of context.

There are errors of more substance. For instance Bridgland says that 'Western intelligence suggested that (President) Neto was assassinated' during an operation in the Soviet Union 'so that a more pliable man, less likely to flirt with the West, could be installed in Luanda.' Western intelligence knew more about Neto and about the Soviet relationship with Luanda to believe for a moment in such a possibility. Bridgland however prefers to rely on this kind of innuendo, relayed by The Daily Telegraph, than to consult more substantial British sources such as the former British Ambassador in Luanda (now in a senior position in the UN), Marrack Goulding, whom he openly disdains.

His one-sided perspective and use of sources lead him to overlook the well-documented collaboration with the Portuguese military before independence which is an important strand of UNITA's origins. This viewpoint also brings him to a defence of the South African/US policy of 'linkage' and even to put forward the idea that South Africa is actually under 'possible military threat from Angola'. Even the South Africans themselves do not go to these lengths to try to defend their indefensible illegal occupation of Namibia. Nor do they, like Bridgland, any longer persist in the pretence that the original South African invasion of Angola from 23 October 1975 was in response to a Cuban military presence. As has been amply documented, the Cuban combat troops came after a government decision made in Havana on 5 November 1975. The 200 to 300 Cuban instructors in the country earlier had not been hidden either by the Cuban or the Angolan governments, and they were not the army which Bridgland claims to have discovered.

The interest of this book is that Bridgland is able to provide much vivid description of Savimbi's infrastructure inside the country and out. Who would have guessed that 'beautifully laundered embroidered sheets' would be the norm for a visitor like Bridgland to a guerrilla camp deep inside Angola! His own safety in such a camp or on the long journeys he describes with his UNITA guards would of course have been guaranteed, like all Savimbi's infrastructure, by South African air cover provided from the illegal air force bases maintained by Pretoria in the Caprivi strip and northern Namibia.

It is the implication of South Africa's backing for UNITA which Bridgland seems unwilling to grasp. In this he is unlike Savimbi who knew only too well that in making that alliance in 1975 he forfeited the support of such African leaders as Julius Nyerere of Tanzania. Within weeks Savimbi's South African connection brought recognition of the MPLA government by the majority of the continent and then by the rest of the world—except, of course, the USA which to this day prefers to ignore present reality in the hope of changing it by force.

The elections Bridgland talks of, in justifying his view of Savimbi as a misunderstood African nationalist hero, were never a possibility. Angolans have instead been targets of violent attempts to dictate their political future by South Africa and the USA since well before independence. Then the Reagan Administration's policies, which meant open support for Savimbi, significantly raised the level of violence. Today the infrastructure lies broken, great areas of the country have been razed by South African bombs, and hundreds of thousands of rural people are displaced from their homes or mutilated by the terror tactics of Jonas Savimbi's UNITA with the logistical support of the white regime in South Africa. Bridgland does not succeed in making a case for Savimbi which justifies this devastation of Angola.

States, regimes and citizens in Africa

John Wiseman

Political Domination in Africa: Reflections on the Limits of Power

Edited by Patrick Chabal

Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1986. 211pp. £27.50hb/£9.95pb

Democracy and Pluralism in Africa

Edited by Dov Ronen

London: Hodder and Stoughton. 1986. 220pp. £25.00

Politics and Government in African States 1960–1985

Edited by Peter Duignan and Robert H. Jackson

London: Croom Helm. 1986. 442pp. £25.00

The academic study of politics in post-independence Africa illustrates many of the same features that have characterised the practice of politics on the continent, most notably a high degree of pluralism and an absence of consensus, tending, at times, to produce conflict of a largely unproductive kind. Thus to review three collections containing a total of thirty-eight different essays presents certain obvious problems and not just the impossibility of citing all contributions individually. In spite of this some degree of a common focus does emerge. The majority of essays are concerned in one way or another with the relationships between, on the one hand, states and their incumbent regimes and, on the other, the societies and their component populations. A general agreement that these relationships are poorly and rather tenuously structured, especially in terms of accountability, can also be discerned. As Bayart puts it in the Chabal book, there exists a 'relative externality' between the state and civil society.

Chabal's collection is by far the most sophisticated and makes an important contribution to the literature. It will be read with great profit and real intellectual pleasure by specialists in the field but by the same token may prove rather heavy going for all but the brightest and most committed undergraduates. It advocates, and by and large maintains, an approach grounded in 'universal political theory' rather than one (eg modernisation theory or dependency theory) which attempts to analyse the Third World as a segregated entity. Because of this, Staniland's brilliant essay on ethnocentrism acts as a cornerstone for the whole volume. The approach allows Callaghy, in another brilliant essay, to depict African political systems as examples of 'early modern authoritarian rule'. When he writes that 'pseudo-modern forms of rule in Africa only partially mask the solid core of a patrimonialised colonial state structure that must contend with traditional and quasi-traditional politics, powerful forms of particularism and emerging class consciousness' (p 33) it seems to me that he says more about contemporary African politics in one sentence than many entire books on the subject manage to do.

Chabal's own examination of the failure of revolutionary democracy and agrarian socialism in Guinea-Bissau is a fascinating study of a little known and little understood state. It is little understood because in the past much of the writing concerning it has been of a heavily subjective variety which was distanced from empirical reality and failed to cope with post-independence political and economic decline. I do have doubts, however, as to the extent to which Chabal is accurate in placing as much weight as he does on the tragic assassination of Amilcar Cabral in 1973 as a major explanation of subsequent failure rather than the contradictions inherent in the model of 'revolutionary democracy' adopted. There is no doubt that Amilcar Cabral was a gifted and dedicated (and, perhaps above all, realistic) African nationalist leader but Chabal's arguments sound rather akin to those which suggest that the Soviet Union would have developed in a radically different way if only Lenin had lived a few years longer and blocked Stalin's seizure of power. Such arguments are logically impossible to disprove but personally I find them unconvincing. However, as an analysis of how things have developed in Guinea-Bissau, rather than how they might have developed, Chabal's essay is intelligent and persuasive and he is certainly to be congratulated on putting together an excellent collection of articles for this volume.

The Ronen collection began life as a series of papers presented at a symposium organised by the Africa Research Programme of Harvard University's Center for International Affairs. One gets the impression that this was a lively and interesting symposium. Whether it works as well on the printed page is quite another matter. The first problem is that most of the contributions are extremely short: over two-thirds of the essays are less than ten pages and several are less than five. Thus one finds that many interesting questions are raised (which is fine for a symposium) but few essays are long enough or detailed enough to provide satisfactory answers. Olorunsola's essay on the downfall of the Second Republic in Nigeria is a good example. Although he expresses doubts as to how far the political problems of Nigeria are amenable to solution through constitutional engineering, he does raise some interesting questions on the possible relationship between certain provisions of the 1979 Constitution and the eventual collapse of the system. It is disappointing that he then does not have the space to suggest any answers to his own questions.

One theme which emerges in a number of essays relates to the ways in which regime accountability may be mediated through the indigenous smaller scale pluralist segments of the polity, in either an institutionalised or informal manner. Essays by Ayoade, Magang, Kabongo, Ronen and others (and in a different way the essay on Islam by O'Brien in the Chabal collection) raise this matter. Ayoade's conclusion that 'only small-scale governments can restore political participation and bind the society to the state by recognising the functions of both' (p 31) goes further than most but it deserves more detailed examination than is allowed for here. Great sensitivity to the distinctive features of different African societies is necessary both for those who construct contemporary African political systems and for those who wish to understand them.

The Duignan and Jackson collection has a quite different format to the other two. Rather than being organised around a set of themes it consists of chapters on individual African states, or, more commonly, groups of states, with some attempt at a common framework. Because of this it may well be more useful for students who initially know little of the details of the political developments of African states. Conversely it has less to offer the specialist reader. Perhaps only the essays by Young (on Zaire) and Clapham (on the Horn of Africa) will have much appeal for the latter. Even then Young's essay is basically a summary of his recent excellent book on Zaire (The Rise and Decline of the Zairian State) and one eagerly awaits the book on Ethiopia that Clapham is currently writing.

Several of the essays are devalued by a fairly strident ideological tone. Some contributors appear to wish to use their case studies as a vehicle for anti-Marxism. Unfortunately this leads to simplicities remarkably similar in style to those found elsewhere in writings whose authors see themselves as writing from a Marxist perspective (and are seen by some as basically pseudo-Marxist and nationalistic). It seems to me that ideologies, usually formulated to deal with circumstances quite different to those which pertain in Africa, are a singularly futile way to approach the complexities of empirical reality and that the substitution of one for another takes the debate sideways rather than forwards.

An example of this is the issue of statism. The Duignan and Jackson critique that much Marxist writing has worked to produce, or at least justify, over-intrusive state structures in many African states is basically sound. That such state structures, often incompetent, authoritarian and corrupt, have operated directly against the interests of the mass of the population, especially in the rural areas, is also unfortunately the case. However to move to an anti-statist market-dominated strategy does not seem to provide the answer. The question is not whether the state should or should not play a role in, for example, economic development, but what sort of role it should play and how abuses may best be checked. A new distribution of national resources which gives a much higher priority to the needs and the wishes of the peasant majority is needed but state action will be required if this is to take place. At the heart of this problem lies the question of accountability which has underlain this discussion of the relationships between state and society.

This book does contain much useful material and, at times, sophisticated argument but, as an admirer of Jackson's previous work on 'personal rule' (Personal Rule in Black Africa, with Carl Rosberg), I find it ultimately disappointing. I know it is boring of reviewers to point out silly mistakes, but, in case this volume is reprinted, Kaunda is not President of Zaire (p 188) and the BLS states are not Lesotho, Swaziland and Basutoland (p 334).

All these books tend to share a rough and ready consensus on the point that economic and political developments in post-independence Africa have, in the main, been far from encouraging. However, the air of gloomy pessimism and weary fatalistic determinism is not unmitigated. As Dunn (in the Chabal collection) concludes 'many of these crimes and follies are very likely to be repeated in the future . . . but not a single one of them has [his emphasis] to be repeated' (p 174). Greater responsiveness of governments to the people they govern and steady, if not very dramatic, economic development are at least possibilities for the African future.

The Mexican economy

Laurence Whitehead

Planning the Mexican Economy: Alternative Development Strategies

Jorge Buzaglo

London: Croom Helm. 1984. 310pp. £16.95

Economic Policymaking in Mexico: Factors Underlying the 1982 Crisis

Robert E Looney

Durham, North Carolina: Duke University Press. 1985. 309pp. $37.50

Mexico's Dilemma: The Political Origins of Economic Crisis

Roberto Newell and Luis Rubio

Boulder, Colorado: Westview (Distributed in UK by IPI). 1984. 319pp. £45.00

Mexico: Class Formation, Capital Accumulation, and the State

James D Cockcroft

New York: Monthly Review Press. 1983. 384pp. $25.00hb/$12.50pb

Modern Mexico: State, Economy and Social Conflict

Edited by Nora Hamilton, Timothy F Harding

London: Sage. 1986. 312pp. £16.50

In 1980, at the height of the oil boom, the Mexican government published several long-term plans for economic development. The underlying idea was to use the oil 'surplus' captured by the state-owned monopoly (PEMEX) to finance a rapid and sustained industrialisation programme aimed largely at the expansion of the home market. Special priority would be given to employment generation, and the public sector would play a leading role. Foreign investment would be carefully screened and regulated (the assumption being that multinational corporations would be very keen to gain access to the dynamic domestic market), a moderate degree of inflation would be tolerated (as a necessary side-effect of rapid growth), and profits would be allowed to grow faster than wages. The trade unions would cooperate with this project, since membership would be rising rapidly, and the end product would be a modern full employment industrial economy. If oil wealth made this vision possible, demographic realities made it essential. As the long-term plans all stressed, Mexico's high birth-rate and rapid urbanisation in the 1960s and 1970s made it inevitable that a huge investment would have to be sustained over the last twenty years of the century. Those already born would inevitably require education, housing, transport and, above all, jobs. For example, the labour force of 17 million in 1980 would more than double—on the most cautious assumptions—by the year 2000. Thus one million new jobs a year would have to be created, and this would only be possible with sustained and very rapid growth of the domestic economy.

Today such visions are the fantasies of a forgotten past, as Mexico flounders from crisis to crisis in a losing battle to service its $100 billion external debt. It is hard to believe that only seven years ago reasonably serious policy-makers were thinking in terms of export revenues from oil mounting to $50 billion per year. If this forecast had turned out even half right, the servicing of the current debt would hardly be a crippling problem. In fact, last year's oil export revenues came to only $5 billion, perhaps rising to $7 billion in 1987. Only in the area of inflation (currently running well above 100 per cent per annum) has the economy surpassed the government's expectations. There has been almost no net job creation for about five years, while real wages are down by about 40 per cent on the levels achieved in 1980. Since the debt crisis broke in August 1982 (when the Central Bank simply ran out of foreign exchange reserves) the highest ambition of the economic authorities has been simply to restore, by 1990, the level of income per head achieved in 1980. Hope is now fading for the chances of fulfilling even that modest aim.

Jorge Buzaglo's book reflects the vaunting ambition of Mexican economic policy-makers before the fall. It is tightly constructed, well-informed, and (as far as the reviewer can judge) technically ingenious. Using a multi-sectoral, dynamic input-output type model that required the estimation of 772 equations, Buzaglo simulated the likely performance of the Mexican economy between 1980 and 1990, under three alternative policy regimes. The 'basic' forecast was derived from the official 'Global Plan', which governed the development strategy supposedly in force in the early 1980s. Buzaglo considered several alternative variants of this strategy which need not detain us here. His essential findings were that, depending on the precise policy variant chosen, output would grow cumulatively by between 8 per cent and 9 per cent a year over the decade, while employment would grow at between 5 per cent and 7 per cent per year. (In round numbers the labour force rises from 15 million to about 27 million within ten years, which he considered acceptable in that unemployment would be reduced substantially, although it might not be eliminated, by 1990.) Two alternative development strategies were then considered. More public investment could be allocated to the oil industry. This (according to the model) would ensure even faster growth of output, but it would not speed up job creation and it would worsen income distribution and the non-oil balance of trade. Agriculture would be particularly hurt. Finally, therefore, Buzaglo used his model to appraise a third development strategy, one that would channel more resources into agriculture and 'basic needs', while doubling the burden of direct taxation. This 'new development strategy' emerged triumphant from econometric scrutiny: real output would grow by 10.6 per cent per annum and employment would increase by 10 per cent per year. On this hypothesis Mexico would reach full employment either in 1986, or at worst by 1989.

With hindsight it is easy to ridicule this exercise, but in the euphoria of the 'second oil shock' simulations such as these were treated with considerable solemnity. Buzaglo has done us a service by setting out so clearly the basis on which such reasoning rested. The intellectual challenge for the reader is to pretend ignorance of what was actually going to transpire, and then to identify the crucial flaws that should have been noticed from the outset. Here are two casually-mentioned properties of the model that might help: 'financial and monetary markets are not included . . . (but) an exogenously determined rate of foreign savings is.'

Robert E Looney has been studying the Mexican economy for some time. His first book, forecasting the prospects for 1990, was published in 1978. In this substantial and well-presented volume he argues that the 1982 crisis was 'a case of illiquidity rather than insolvency', and he applies optimum control theory to Mexico's recent and current stabilisation policies. For this purpose he uses a simple, basically Keynesian, macro-economic model (only forty-two equations) with, according to the author, a 'structure and estimation procedure designed for semi-developed economies (which) explicitly take into account Mexico's institutions and institutional constraints'. Nevertheless, 'government investment is assumed to be exogenous and controllable by the authorities' and 'Bank of Mexico credit to the government is assumed to be controlled by the central bank.' (Not everyone would accept these two propositions as accurate reflections of Mexican political realities.) At least, by comparison with Buzaglo, Looney's model pays some attention to monetary factors, and to the variable nature of external capital flows. Just as Buzaglo tried to improve on Mexico's official Global Plan of 1980 (Minister responsible: Miguel de la Madrid), Looney tries to improve on the 1983-85 IMF Stabilisation Plan (President responsible: Miguel de la Madrid). But unfortunately neither of these supposedly 'technocratic' documents has turned out to bear much recognisable relationship to the actual course of economic developments. Thus, Looney's simulations for 1987 range between a 'high' inflation outcome of 17.4 per cent and a 'low' of 3.8 per cent. (He discarded the 'zero inflation' option, because it would require an actual fall in the level of real government spending on consumption.) The most severe stabilisation alternative considered would have reduced GNP growth to only 2.3 per cent, quickly turning Mexico into a capital exporter. This is dismissed as 'overkill', but what language does that leave to describe the actual outcome?

In fairness to Looney, it must be stressed that he also provides a thoughtful and well-informed assessment of the main macro-economic processes that destabilised the Mexican economy in the 1970s. He sets out his assumptions very clearly, and it can therefore be seen that these were not unreasonable or out of line with informed opinion at the time; and he follows the logic of his argument unflinchingly, always seeking to quantify the results, so there can be no fudging of the implications. So again the question arises, why are these projections so flawed? Well, one critical assumption is that crude petroleum exports would 'only' rise by 6 per cent per annum in 1981-87 ('illiquidity not insolvency' is assumed, rather than demonstrated). Also, although there is some discussion of capital flight, the broader dynamics and the massive long-term repercussions are largely overlooked. Finally, the bank nationalisation of September 1982 (which shattered the confidence of the domestic bourgeoisie) receives no attention.

Roberto Newell and Luis Rubio, by contrast, have little doubt that in the aftermath of the 1982 crisis 'Mexico is on the brink of becoming an altogether different country.' They are also clear that the foremost event of 1982 was the expropriation (their word) of the private banks. (Both authors are executive directors of the Instituto de Banca y Finanzas.) They adopt a much longer-term perspective than either Buzaglo or Looney, tracing the 'origins' of the crisis back to the revolution of 1910 and beyond. They also argue against economic determinism, asserting on the contrary that in Mexico political forces (broadly interpreted to include implicit social pacts) frequently determine economic outcomes, rather than vice versa. Setting aside the intricacies of their argument (which is uneven but contains flashes of insight) their key contention is that the revolutionary regime established in 1917 'espoused, from the outset, the contradictory objective of pursuing both capitalism and socio-revolutionary goals that were incompatible with capitalism'. For many years this insoluble dilemma was masked in various ways; but since the early 1970s the Mexican regime has lost legitimacy, mechanisms of elite consensus have crumbled, and social polarisation has increased. The result has been growing economic instability (traceable essentially to domestic political roots, rather than to international economic fluctuations) culminating in the 1982 crisis. Only through a far-reaching reform of the political system can economic stability and a resumption of development be accomplished. The authors are remarkably vague about what such an overhaul of the system would require (they refer to 'more participation', but not explicitly to 'democratisation'). It is difficult to escape the conclusion that what they are really recommending is wholehearted espousal of the 'capitalist' option, and the systematic abandonment of socio-revolutionary goals, but they never explicitly say so; and their occasional choice of vaguely Marxist terminology clouds the issue. Their account of economic policy-making in the 1970s and early 1980s contains much substance, but the strictly economic component of their analysis is surprisingly thin. Prospects for the economy are not quantified, and no attempt is made to relate the social consequences of economic crisis to the political tasks either of re-legitimation or of capitalist consolidation.

Vaguely Marxist terminology is also deployed by James D Cockcroft (who like Nora Hamilton and Timothy Harding, is an editor of Latin American Perspectives, a radical journal widely circulated in the USA). These two remaining volumes have no doubt about where responsibility lies for the 1982 crisis and for many other ills. It lies with the Mexican capitalist state. In contrast to Newell and Rubio, Cockcroft argues with considerable historical detail that the regime was always committed above all to capitalist development. He interprets its 'socio-revolutionary goals' as a strategy of co-optation and control, to thwart radical demands from the property-less majority. Like Newell and Rubio, however, Cockcroft also sees growing polarisation (he would call it 'class struggle') as the root cause of the current political and economic crisis, but from his perspective 1982 looks more like another incident rather than a great divide. He writes with some authority on Mexican history, and with some passion on social—particularly labour—conflicts, but his analysis is marred by rhetorical excesses and a cavalier attitude to inconvenient evidence. On two key issues Newell and Rubio are more convincing: they try to explain why there has been so little effective lower-class resistance to the regime whereas he implies that it must be ever-increasing; and they view the Mexican private sector as at least semi-autonomous, whereas Cockcroft writes as if state monopoly capitalism (dependent on transnational corporations) has a monolithic and uniquely determined character. These two positions lead

Cockcroft to this quixotic conclusion: 'As monopoly capital tightens its grip over people's lives in both Mexico and the United States, working and progressive people will increasingly have to forge international networks of unity and struggle if a better future is to dawn.'

Hamilton and Harding reprint twelve articles on Mexico that have been published in Latin American Perspectives over the past decade. Some of these are now distinctly dated and the general analysis is much the same as in Cockcroft, although for the most part better argued. However, there are two chapters that shed additional light on the crisis of the 1980s. Barry Carr provides a left-wing analysis of the labour movement, which nonetheless makes clear why little effective resistance to government policies has been forthcoming from that sector. His provisional figures indicate that about two million workers were dismissed from their jobs as a result of the 1982-83 recession; and it is safe to assume that the 1985-87 downturn has been at least as severe. This is bound to produce 'a substantial erosion of the material welfare, and self-confidence of organised labour, and perhaps a severe challenge to the authority of the trade union bureaucracies'. Traditionally, Mexican labour leaders would have turned to the regime for support and reassurance during such downturns, but since 1982 the government has lacked both the resources and the inclination to counteract market pressures. Interestingly, Carr suggests that the bank nationalisation may have had a sobering, even a 'demobilising' effect on much of the labour movement. After 1982 it no longer has the private bankers to blame, but it still remains extremely reluctant to attack the incumbent administration directly, so the result is the adoption of a highly defensive posture. In the same volume, Nora Hamilton contributes an undogmatic interpretation of the bank nationalisation and its impact on business/government relations. This essay also raises doubts about the thesis that 'class struggle' is necessarily becoming more open and relentless in contemporary Mexico. However, it was written at a time when Mexico was still being touted as an example of successful emergence from the debt crisis. With hindsight it seems that President de la Madrid's 'neo-liberal' economic strategy has been less successful than she supposed in cementing a new alliance between state planners, Mexican businessmen and foreign suppliers of capital.

After five years of debt crisis few illusions persist about the Mexican government's strategic capacity or foresight. On the other hand, predictions of imminent social conflict and the collapse of the regime have been repeatedly falsified. What has remained unaltered are the powerful long-term demographic and social realities that impelled the Mexican authorities to attempt their failed dash for growth. Whatever the oil price, or the inflation rate, or the availability of external finance, Mexico's labour force will continue growing rapidly for at least another generation. On present form it may be a dangerously wasted generation.

Reflections of Kampuchea

Craig Etcheson

Cambodia 1975–1982

Michael Vickery

Boston, Massachusetts: South End Press. 1984. 361pp. $9.00pb

Kampuchea: Politics, Economics and Society

Michael Vickery

London: Frances Pinter; Boulder, Colorado: Lynne Rienner Publishers. 1986. 211pp. £17.50. £6.95pb

Kampuchea Between China and Vietnam

Chang Pao-Min

Singapore: Singapore University Press. 1985. 201pp. $20.00hb

Southeast Asia Divided: The ASEAN–Indochina Crisis

Edited by Donald E Weatherbee

Boulder, Colorado: Westview Press. 1985. 151pp. £17.25

Unlike Western innocence, Western ignorance about Indochina survived the Second Indochinese War intact. Even in the late 1970s, the quantity and quality of scholarly work on Indochina in general—and Kampuchea in particular—left much to be desired. The dearth of serious study on this much-abused corner of the world was extended by volume after volume of propaganda, disinformation and confusion. Over the years, however, scholars and writers have made some progress. The 1980s has witnessed a deluge of serious work on Kampuchean politics and the role of Kampuchea in international affairs beginning to fill some of the many gaps in our understanding of Cambodia. Four of these recent volumes form the subject of this review.

Numerous valuable works have been produced by such noted Kampuchea scholars as David Chandler, Ben Kiernan, Stephen Heder, and others. Books with a more journalistic orientation, such as those by William Shawcross and Elizabeth Becker, have also continued to add to our knowledge of that unhappy land. Less well known, but nonetheless well established Indochina watchers, such as Doug Pike and M E Osborne have also increasingly played an important role in producing new knowledge about Kampuchea. It is into this category that most of our present authors fall.

The exception is Michael Vickery, author of two of the volumes under review. A member of the Centre for Asian Studies at the University of Adelaide in Australia, Vickery earned a PhD in history at Yale, writing on ancient Khmer chronicles. He is a fluent Khmer speaker known for his command of obscure dialects. Vickery is rightly regarded as one of the world's leading authorities on Cambodia, albeit one with a very definite perspective and an acid style. He offers first a contribution to history, focusing on the Khmer Rouge state of Democratic Kampuchea (DK): Cambodia 1975-1982; and second, a study of the present regime, the People's Republic of Kampuchea (PRK): Kampuchea: Politics, Economics and Society.

In Cambodia 1975-1982, with the skill of an aerialist, Michael Vickery treads a fine line between an intensely personal, journalistic approach, and a stance of objective, analytical scholarly inquiry. As his title implies, he studies the reign of the infamous Pol Pot regime, the Khmer Rouge state, DK. Dr Vickery is trained as a professional historian, and this is evident in his method. He pays strict attention to empirical evidence, and seems to trust only the data he has generated first-hand. This contributes to the fire in his passionately critical historiography. Among his fellow Cambodianists, Vickery's style elicits reactions ranging from delight to rage. Reading Vickery is an exhausting but a rewarding undertaking.

Vickery sets out a record of painstaking and expertly conducted field research, relying largely on his extensive interviews with Khmers of all kinds. He proceeds then to indict all of those writings at variance with his data. 'A chronicler, or journalist, may simply repeat stories . . . but an historian may not' (p 51). He begins this indictment in Chapter Two, 'Problems of sources and evidence', where he reviews the considerable challenges to serious historical analysis inherent in the Kampuchean situation.

Vickery synthesises the most lurid of journalistic and academic accounts of contemporary Cambodian history into what he terms the Standard Total View or 'stv'. The stv holds that, from the very beginning of their victory in 1975, the DK authorities instituted a uniform, nation-wide, and brutally effective programme of class genocide; that DK abolished all modern appurtenances such as money, schooling, medical care, and religion; that they consciously separated families; and that they did lots of other irrational and unpleasant things. Vickery's extensive evidence comparing people's experiences at different times and in different places confirms conclusions from my own research. He successfully refutes the view that the stv was an accurate description of the situation across time and space throughout the 1975-79 reign of the Khmer Rouge. The stv was probably an accurate description of the situation in 1977-78, that is, after Pol Pot had crushed all opposition to his programme within the party. The situation in the first two years of the Khmer Rouge state, however, was much more complex. It is clear from evidence uncovered in the Tuol Sleng prison archives and elsewhere that some of the people Pol Pot crushed really did oppose his policies. The heart of Vickery's contribution is Chapter Three, 'The zero years', where he lays out much of his interview data, substantiating his overall argument about the srV. Chapter Four deals with the transition between DK and PRK, largely through the device of a 'debate' with Stephen Heder.

In Chapter Five, 'The nature of the Cambodian Revolution', Vickery attempts a theoretical synthesis of his empirical investigations. Unfortunately, this becomes a rather weird attempt to dissociate Pol Pot's organisation from the label, 'communist'. It is as if he does not wish to sully the terms 'socialist' and 'communist' by associating them with Pol Pot's Kampuchean Communist Party (KCP). This effort leads to the most strained logic in an otherwise impeccably logical presentation. He argues that they were 'petit-bourgeois radicals overcome by peasant romanticism' (p 287). Certainly, the KCP rejected a number of revered elements of Marxist dogma, such as proletarian internationalism and the vanguard role of the proletariat. Does this also mean that Mao was not a Marxist because of his alliance with the peasants, or that Lenin was not a Marxist on account of his bald-faced voluntarism? Though he is correct to emphasise the heavy influences of peasant chauvinism evident in the Khmer Rouge revolution, this portion of Vickery's argument is not persuasive.

Despite the reservations noted above, Cambodia is required reading for anyone with a serious interest in Indochinese politics. Vickery's aim in Cambodia is to find out 'why a peasant revolution . . . became so bloody that in the end it lost the support of its most favored class, the peasants' (p 66). His answer—that 'nationalism, populism, and peasantism really won out over communism' (pp 289-90)—is not likely to satisfy all his readers. While it is possible to dispute some of Vickery's conclusions, the evidence and arguments he brings to bear will influence the terms of the debate over what happened in Democratic Kampuchea, and why. One hopes that his style and tone will not have the same influence. Although Vickery's style is sometimes needlessly antagonistic, his contributions to our understanding of Kampuchea are substantial.

Vickery's second contribution Kampuchea: Politics, Economics and Society, is in many ways perhaps the more valuable of the two, on account of its uniqueness. Essentially, this volume is a much-needed country study of the current regime and society in Kampuchea. It is part of the Pinter-Rienner Marxist Regime Series, and is cast in the mould of the American University Foreign Area Studies series. His presentation covers geography and demography, a brief political history, social structure, the party, the constitution, governmental structure, the economy, and domestic and foreign policies. The general lack of information about current conditions in Kampuchea, both externally and internally, makes such an enterprise a daunting task indeed. Vickery made two trips to the People's Republic of Kampuchea to gather data, for three weeks in 1981 and another five weeks in 1984.

There are a few minor problems with the work. For example, the chapter on the PRK constitution is curious. Vickery analyses four successive draft versions of the Constitution, attempting with limited success to deduce the existence of factions within the nascent PRK. Missing from Chapter Seven is any comparison of the PRK Constitution with that of DK or any previous Cambodian regimes. Comparison with DK's Constitution might be instructive with regard to the existence of factions in Khmer communism, and might be decisive—either for or against—in respect of one of Vickery's unstated but underlying themes, viz. that the PRK represents the true, legitimate heritage of the Khmer revolution, as distinct from the 'petit-bourgeois', 'chauvinistic', 'feudal fascist' DK. It is also unfortunate that, though he devotes an entire chapter to a discussion of it, the book does not include the full text of the final PRK Constitution.

The weakest portion of the work is the chapter on foreign policy. The continuing international diplomatic and economic isolation of the PRK, enforced by the West, reduces the scope of this topic, but it does not reduce its importance. There are several critical dimensions of the PRK's foreign relations which Vickery barely mentions or neglects to treat. The triangular relationship among the Indochinese nations, relations with ASEAN countries, with the CGDK, Japan, the Non-Aligned Movement, the UN, with regional and superpowers; these matters would seem to be of great moment in Cambodian foreign policy, but they are not adequately treated here. This seems implicitly to give ammunition to those who assert that the PRK's foreign policy is made in Hanoi, and that the PRK does not enjoy sovereignty. This is at variance with the impression Vickery seems anxious to convey, and thus it is surprising that he devotes so little attention to this aspect of the PRK.

Overall, Vickery has done a very professional job with a difficult and sensitive topic. This is a useful and well produced effort. It stands in considerable contrast to Dr Chang's book.

Chang Pao-Min is a Senior Lecturer in Political Science at the National University of Singapore. Dr Chang specialises in Sino-Vietnamese relations. His Kampuchea Between China and Vietnam deals with the 'Cambodia problem' in Sino-Vietnamese relations. Parts of this book have previously appeared as articles in such publications as Asian Survey, International Affairs, Studies in Comparative Communism, and Survey.

This slim volume differs from the others under review here in that, unlike the Vickery and Weatherbee volumes, Kampuchea emerges in the book not as subject but rather as object, an object in the foreign relations of the socialist Republic of Vietnam (SRV) and the People's Republic of China (PRC). As such, Cheng's book is not really 'about' Cambodia per se, but rather the 'Cambodia issue' in Sino-Vietnamese-Soviet triangular relations. It is about superpower and regional power foreign policy.

Both Vietnam and China are vulnerable to the charge that they treat Kampuchea as an object to be manipulated. While it is to be expected that the state apparatus will objectify its environment, it is puzzling when this is done by a scholar. The greatest problem with the Chang volume is that it tends to treat Kampuchea on the same terms that China and Vietnam use. If one wishes to read Chang Pao-Min's volume, one would do well to have Vickery's Kampuchea: Politics, Economics and Society to hand. Chang treats the current government of Kampuchea as if it did not exist, which, as Vickery amply demonstrates, is indeed a severely fractured reflection of the situation. Not only does it exist, but it is probably the most benign government Kampuchean have seen in a generation or more.

Chang begins his work with an overview that demonstrates a great sensitivity to the respective positions and concerns of the Chinese and Vietnamese alike. For example, he very delicately observes in his introduction that if 'historically China has felt especially akin to Vietnam and also shown greater inclination to intervene in Vietnamese affairs, such an orientation has unfortunately not been matched by Vietnam's receptivity to Chinese influence' (p 12). This is followed by several chapters of historical review, including a chapter on the double invasions of 1979, and, finally, chapters focusing on SRV and PRC diplomacy.

However, in several chapters (notably Chapter Five) Chang's argument is coloured by an apparent sympathy for the Chinese point of view vis-à-vis that of Vietnam. The author concludes in the final chapter that Vietnam's behaviour is at the root of the problem in Indochina: 'Hanoi is apparently no longer satisfied nor feels secure with anything less than a thoroughly unified entity in the form of a greater Vietnam' (p 177). This view is extreme, and made more suspect by numerous examples of apparent anti-Vietnamese bias. Moreover, he is sometimes imprecise with facts; for example, citing out-of-date Vietnamese troop strength figures, mentioning the 200,000 strong invasion force present in 1980, but neglecting to mention that this level has steadily declined since then to about 130,000.

Throughout the volume he repeatedly suggests, but never really attempts to build the case, that the Vietnamese are colonising Kampuchea. There is no serious effort carefully to examine the evidence; this is perhaps fortunate, for given Chang's apparent attachment to the idea, examination would likely lead to disappointment. Chang seems to subscribe to the highly alarmist view that the SRV intends to absorb Kampuchea and exterminate or enslave the Khmer people: 'Kampuchea was being dismembered as a functioning society with dire consequences on the entire Khmer race' (p 106). In a meek effort to substantiate this view, Chang mentions the presence of some 250,000 Vietnamese residents in Kampuchea. He seems unable to connect this with the fact that the pre-war Cambodian population contained an ethnic Vietnamese cohort approximately twice that size, not that ethnic minorities who were subject to persecution and expulsion under DK and its predecessor now feel free to return to Kampuchea under the PRK.

Chapter Eight is a valiant attempt to conclude with a sensitive and balanced summary. Unfortunately, it quickly flounders in continued feckless thrashing about the colonisation thesis, and a continuing neglect of the de facto government.

Topical books concentrating on policy issues can be rendered outdated by sudden turns of events. Although Chang's brief index mentions the recently retired Vietnamese leaders Truong Chinh, Le Duc Tho, and Pham Van Dong, there is no entry for Nguyen Van Linh, the new party Secretary.

Such weaknesses aside, it is disappointing that a book focusing on relations between Vietnam, China and Kampuchea has so little hard information on the history of party-to-party and state-to-state relations between and among the various parties and states. This information is crucial to any honest and expert assessment of the overall triangular relationship. Chang's failure to treat it adequately severely damages the usefulness and credibility of his entire effort.

Donald E Weatherbee, the Donald S Russell Professor of Contemporary Foreign Policy at the University of South Carolina, is the Executive Editor of Asian Affairs. His volume, Southeast Asia Divided: The ASEAN-Indochina Crisis is an edited collection of papers originally prepared for a panel, 'Competing Security Interests in Southeast Asia', at the International Studies Association Conference in 1984. To a greater extent than is typical in such edited volumes, there is a thematic and organisational coherence to this collection which makes it a valuable contribution. Moreover, comparison of the original conference papers and the final edited versions in the book show that the authors profited from the panel discussion and did more to revise their works than simply account for the intervening events by back-filling their arguments. The collection is enhanced by the reprinting of fifteen useful official documents and declarations by ASEAN, the PRC and related bodies, covering the period 1979 to 1984.

The volume begins with an overview by Professor Weatherbee. His contribution, 'The diplomacy of stalemate', briefly reviews the recent history of Indochina, outlining the current actors and their respective positions. He sums up the international situation in one masterful sentence: 'While Vietnam resists being bled and politically disciplined by the PRC and the PRC seeks to contain Soviet hegemonism by proxy, the ASEAN nations would like to free the region from great power conflict and domination' (p 8). This is a classic 'security dilemma', a multi-player non-zero sum game. But it is a real game, one that Weatherbee believes is largely controlled by forces beyond the ASEAN and Indochinese nations: 'Settlement' of the Kampuchean problem, he predicts, 'will result from great power, primarily the USSR and the PRC, perceptions of the linkages of their interests to the local interests', and 'neither

ASEAN nor the SRV may be happy with a formula that satisfies the great powers.'

A second contribution is by Karl D Jackson, Associate Professor of Political Science with the University of California at Berkeley. Jackson specialises in ASEAN politics. His 'Doves of peace or dogs of war' speculates on the geopolitical purposes underlying Vietnam's annual dry season offensives against the Khmer rebels in the Thai border area. He wonders from the perspective of early 1984 whether or not Vietnamese peace overtures in late 1983 and early 1984 presaged movement toward a negotiated settlement in Kampuchea. Jackson suggests that these moves were rather of a tactical nature in Vietnam's continuing effort to split the united front presented by the ASEAN states. Pointing to the roots of the conflict, Jackson argues that both the Chinese and Soviet positions on Kampuchea seem relatively stable, and that consequently no major movement should be expected in 1984. He turned out to be correct.

John F Copper is Professor of International Studies at Rhodes College in Tennessee, and has a long-standing interest in Southeast Asian politics. His 'China and Southeast Asia' deals directly with the China angle in Kampuchean politics, and his analysis is rather more incisive and analytical than Chang's. Copper focuses on the PRC's security relations with the ASEAN and Indochinese nations. He reviews the strategic transformation in Chinese Southeast Asia policy during the 1970s, when it changed from solidarity with Vietnam and subversion in ASEAN countries, to informal alliance with ASEAN and military aggression against Vietnam. Given the Chinese strategic security situation vis-à-vis the USSR, Copper concludes, 'China has no great interest in resolving the Kampuchea situation unless it can be resolved to its liking' (p 61).

Sheldon Simon is Director of the Center for Asian Studies at Arizona State University. His contribution to the volume is titled 'The superpowers in Southeast Asia', which, as the title suggests, focuses on Soviet and American entanglements in the area. Simon reviews US and Soviet policies in the region, and outlines their regional force deployments and their respective alliance concerns. He concludes that although the Soviet geo-strategic position would seem to have improved considerably in Southeast Asia in recent years, this is more true with respect to deployment of armed forces than with respect to political status. 'In East Asia,' Simon argues, 'a community of political, economic, and military interests is developing among the United States, Japan, Australia/New Zealand, the ASEAN states, and—as long as it seeks Western investment and market economy trade—China. The Soviets (sic) and their Indochina clients are left out of these relationships' (p 78). This is the strategic carrot that ASEAN and its allies have dangled before the SRV for several years, attempting to use offers of economic relations to lever the Vietnamese away from their growing reliance on the USSR. As yet this policy seems little closer to success than when first adopted.

The final chapter is called 'The view from the frontline states: Thailand and Vietnam'. Here is reprinted a set of local ASEAN views, including a statement from the Thai Ministry of Foreign Affairs, and editorials from Bangkok and Hanoi newspapers. This section of the book could have been improved by adding additional representative materials.

Collectively, the authors of this volume are in general agreement as to the intractability of the positions of the major players in the continuing Kampuchean crisis. They achieve a consensus that the factors giving rise to the situation are relatively stable and, thus, that the crisis is likely to continue for some time to come. As I write this in 1987, their collective judgement continues to hold.

Taken together, the four books under review give a reasonably well-rounded picture of the recent history of Kampuchea. Individually, however, each of the four has serious gaps. Moreover, some matters are not adequately covered in any of the four volumes: none of the four does much to penetrate the shroud of mystery surrounding the complex and crucial relationship between party politics in the People's Republic of China and political interaction among Kampuchean revolutionaries. Such gaps are perhaps inevitable in any historical conflict of a complexity and duration comparable to the Indochinese Wars. It is unfortunate that the field of Asian studies still awaits a definitive treatment of modern Cambodian history. For the time being, we must be satisfied with fragmented vignettes; as though the country could be seen only through a cracked mirror—a thousand incomplete reflections of Kampuchea.

The Yemens

Fred Halliday

PDR Yemen: Outpost of Socialist Development in Arabia

Helen Lackner

London: Ithaca Press. 1985. 219pp. £18.00

The People's Democratic Republic of Yemen: Politics, Economics and Society

Tareq Y Ismael and Jacqueline S Ismael

London: Frances Pinter. 1986. 183pp. £22.50. £6.95pb

The Economic Development of the Yemen Arab Republic

Ragaei El Mallakh

London: Croom Helm. 1986. 196pp. £22.50

The conventional images of the Arabian Peninsula—bedouin, oil, sudden riches—are very much a partial representation of that region. The peninsula's 14 million or so indigenous inhabitants are, on closer examination, divided into eight states, themselves no model of political or regional integration. In their simplest form, the divisions of the peninsula can be seen in three ways: between the historically nomadic and settled communities, between those states which have oil and those which do not, and between the six monarchies and two republics. It is an accident of history that the dividing line in the first dimension should coincide with the second, but the coincidence of monarchies with nomadic society, Oman excepted, and with oil is not. In the settled societies social tensions reached a pitch, issuing in social revolution that the more dispersed and atomised nomadic societies did not produce, while income from oil has given the monarchies of Saudi Arabia, Oman and the smaller Gulf states the capacity to resist pressures from below. In the south-western states of Arabia, where the settled majority of the population live, pressure from outside and revolt from below have produced two revolutions and two, very contrasting, post-revolutionary states: the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen (PDRY), and the Yemen Arab Republic (YAR). This poor, republican, and rebellious Arabia is a very long way from the profligacy of the oil-rich dynasties.

The study of the PDRY by Helen Lackner provides a detailed, unique portrait of developments in that country since the British departure from Aden in 1967. Herself resident in the PDRY for seven years, she combines a study of the history and evolution of the revolutionary movement, with some measured personal observations. Economic and social development are given special attention.

Lackner is sympathetic to the social programme of the PDRY government, stressing the welfare benefits and guarantees provided, despite the country's lack of resources. But she brings out many of the economic, social and political difficulties underlying the attempt to develop towards socialism in the PDRY, as well as the ideological obstacles posed by being a poor revolutionary state on the edge of an oil-rich and conservative peninsula. We visit schools in the interior to which parents refuse to send their daughters because education is mixed. The social reasons for the decline in production of the PDRY's main export crop, fish, are spelt out. We get a thinly masked hint of her rage at the mediocre quality of imported Egyptian television programmes, a comment it would appear, on many exasperated evenings in front of the screen.

The work by Tareq and Jacqueline Ismael, two American academics, is without this personal element and does not draw on any interviews or primary research. But it provides a lucid, well-documented, introduction to the PDRY, as one in a series of excellent monographs on Marxist regimes. They spell out the unique—in an Arab context—ideological and political character of the PDRY regime, its foreign policies in an embattled Arabian context, and the constitutional and political structures built since independence. There are a few aberrant points in their analysis: they overstate the degree to which tribal loyalties no longer operate within the state, and there is too little recognition of the importance of North Yemen in the overall development of the PDRY. Having decided to include Arabic titles of organisations, they should have taken more care to get the spelling right. But, overall, this is an excellent addition both to the literature on Arabia and to that on Third World revolutionary states.

Both Lackner and the Ismaels touch upon, but do not discuss at length, the underlying questions raised by the PDRY's development, and not least by the explosion of intra-regime factionalism in January 1986 when thousands of people lost their lives. Such murderous factionalism is by no means unique in Third World revolutionary states—China, Cambodia, Grenada and Angola have all exhibited this trend. Analysis of factionalism in the PDRY would have to combine general features of such regimes, with study of specific, local tensions, and of political culture, tribe, and, by no means least, personality. Lackner's observations on the absence of revolutionary commitment amongst junior personnel in the PDRY are particularly apposite here. But, beyond this question there lies the overriding issue of what kind of transformation is possible in a poor, illiterate, encircled and often badly led revolutionary state, and of how far a reforming state, however determined it may be, can change the values and practices of society. It is perhaps a failing of both Lackner and the Ismaels that they make too little use of the material provided on social problems by the PDRY's press.

The history of the Yemen Arab Republic, or North Yemen, has been as conflictual as that of the South, but it has a larger population base and a substantial agricultural sector. El Mallakh's study provides a wealth of statistical information on the YAR economy since the revolution of 1962, and discusses the central issue of migration in addition to the main sectors of the domestic economy. But overall this is a disappointing book: too much of it is 'wish-list' talk based on current, unfulfilled plans; there is no realistic attempt to assess the capacity of the state to develop the economy; difficult problems such as the social consequences of qat consumption and migration are treated superficially; and the issue of land tenure is ignored. The real question about the YAR economy must be whether the changes of the last quarter of a century constitute 'development' at all, or whether, given the running down of domestic agricultural potential, and the consumerist distortions of the economy, there has not rather been a process of growing 'underdevelopment'.

LITERARY PROFILE

Punching holes inside people: words of Wole Soyinka

Adewale Maja-Pearce

'We haven't begun actually using words to punch holes inside people.

But let's do our best to use words and style when we have the opportunity. To arrest the ears of normally complacent people, we must make sure we explode something inside them which is a parallel of the sordidness which they ignore outside.'¹

Wole Soyinka, the recipient of the 1986 Nobel Prize for Literature, made this statement while in self-imposed exile from Nigeria, in 1974. Though referring specifically to his prison journal, The Man Died, which had appeared two years previously, these words also serve as a general statement of Soyinka's intentions, a statement well borne out by his career to date.

Seven years after independence in 1960, Nigeria was plunged into civil war. By then, Wole Soyinka had achieved a considerable reputation as the country's most exciting dramatist. Some of his best-known plays had already been produced both at home and abroad to critical acclaim, including The Swamp Dwellers (1959), The Lion and the Jewel (1959), A Dance of the Forests (1963), The Trials of Brother Jero (1964) and Kongi's Harvest (1965).

The Swamp Dwellers was first produced in 1958 for the University of London's Annual Drama Festival. At this time, Soyinka was attached to the Royal Court Theatre as a script-reader, a position he held for eighteen months after taking a degree in Literature at the University of Leeds. In the same year he also presented an evening's entertainment at the Royal Court Theatre under the title, The Invention and Other Tales, which included some poems as well as a one-act play. But it was on his return to Nigeria for the Independence celebrations that his career really began to gather momentum. A Dance of the Forests won first prize in a competition organised by a British literary magazine. Soyinka produced it himself, with his own acting company, 'The 1960 Masks'. This acting company was the first of many which Soyinka formed, usually in association with his students at the various universities to which he was attached over the next few years. In using his own companies, he not only kept a great measure of control over the actual productions of his plays, but was continuing an established tradition within Nigeria. One of the most popular forms of entertainment in Yorubaland, the part of the country from which Soyinka comes, is the Yoruba Travelling Theatre, consisting of itinerant theatre companies which travel around the country putting on performances in villages and towns. There are presently reckoned to be over one hundred of them in competition with each other, the most successful finding their way into the weekly television slots allotted to the Travelling Theatre companies. Each company usually operates under the direction of one man, who writes the material, directs the production and stars in the lead role.

¹ 'Interview with Wole Soyinka in Accra, Ghana, 1974', in John Agetua (ed), When the Man Died: Views, Reviews and Interview on Wole Soyinka's Controversial Book, Benin City, 1975.

During this period of creative activity Soyinka also wrote radio plays, a novel, The Interpreters (1965), as well as poetry and essays. At a time when many of the country's most promising writers were attempting to rescue the African past by re-creating pre-colonial African society from an African perspective, Soyinka alone was directing his full attention at the contemporary scene. Kongi's Harvest, for instance, which was later turned into a film with Soyinka playing the leading role, is a bitter attack on the corruption of power in a newly-emergent African state; The Interpreters, which focuses on a group of disaffected intellectuals, denounces the cynicism and incompetence of the ruling elite. In one of his earliest essays, 'The writer in a modern African state', first delivered at a conference in Sweden in 1967, Soyinka took his fellow-writers to task for ignoring what he regarded as the most pressing issue of the day:

In the movement towards chaos in modern Africa, the writer did not anticipate. The understanding language of the outside world, 'birth pains', that near-fatal euphemism for death throes, absolved him from responsibility. He was content to turn his eye backwards in time and prospect in archaic fields for forgotten gems which would dazzle and distract from the present. But never inwards, never truly into the present, never into the obvious symptoms of the niggling, warning, predictable present, from which alone lay the salvation of ideals.²

Not surprisingly, Soyinka was also known, to the authorities at least, as a trouble-maker. In 1965, at the height of the elections in which those in power exhibited a scale of corruption for which the country was to become legendary, he was charged with holding up a radio station at gunpoint and forcing the broadcasters to transmit a pre-recorded tape demanding that the ruling politicians 'get out of town'. He was subsequently acquitted on a technicality. The following year the army seized power but was unable to halt the slide into civil war. At the outbreak of the war Soyinka was arrested and spent almost the entire duration, from August 1967 to October 1969, in detention—most of it in solitary confinement. Since he was never formally charged and brought to trial the reasons for his incarceration can only be a matter for speculation; but it is certain that it had something to do with his clandestine missions to the break-away state of Biafra in order to try to convince the rebel leader, Lieutenant-Colonel Ojukwu, that the course he was embarking on could not possibly solve the underlying problem of Nigerian society. Soyinka seems to have believed in the existence of what he terms 'the Third Force'; in The Man

² Wole Soyinka, 'The writer in a modern African state', in Per Wastberg (ed), The Writer in Modern Africa, Uppsala: The Scandinavian Institute of African Studies, 1968, p 17.

Died (1972), he reproduces part of a conversation he had at the time with a colleague:

The army must be returned to its status as part of the proletariat. The politician-patrician mentality is already destroyed but it has begun a new life by its anonymous infiltration of a naive, purely instinctive Army. We need a Third Force which thinks in terms of a common denominator for the people. If the East [Biafra] will pause, ask for a cease-fire and give the Third Force time to proliferate through all the key places . . . well, the time is right. I did not come all this way to ask the East to surrender. But the secession must be called off.³

Self-dramatisation and political naivety are among the criticisms that have most consistently been levelled against The Man Died; and yet, however naive such a recipe might sound, his vision of the post-civil war state gives the true measure of the man:

Militarist entrepreneurs and multiple dictatorships: this is bound to be the legacy of a war which is conducted on the present terms. The vacuum in the ethical base—for national boundary is neither an ethical nor an ideological base for any conflict—this vacuum will be filled by a new military ethic—coercion. And the elitist formulation of the army, the entire colonial hangover which is sustained by the lack of national revaluation will itself maintain and promote the class heritage of society. The ramifications of the alliance of a corrupt and rapacious Mafia in society are endless and are nearly incurable. The war means a consolidation of crime, an acceptance of the scale of values that created the conflict, indeed an allegiance and enshrinement of that scale of values because it is now intimately bound in the sense of national identity.⁴

This is precisely what happened. What finally emerged by the early 1980s was a powerful group known as 'the Kaduna Mafia'—'a cohesive amalgam of Northern politicians, intelligentsia, top bureaucrats, investors, gentleman farmers, military and police commanders'⁵—who were sucking the life-blood out of the country. It is they, for instance, who are presently being held responsible for the murder of Dele Giwa, the investigative journalist and founder of the weekly Newswatch magazine, who was killed by a letter bomb delivered to his house in Lagos on 19 October 1986. At the time of his murder he was known to have unearthed fresh evidence concerning the Johnson Matthey Bank (JMB) scandal in which N100 million of government money had left the country illegally during the second civilian regime of the early 1980s. The scale of the corruption associated with that regime, of which the JMB scandal was only the most spectacular of many, was merely a continuation of the deteriorating moral climate which Soyinka had already identified.

Between the end of the civil war and the second coming of civilian government, Soyinka repeatedly hammered home the thesis at the heart of The

³ Wole Soyinka, The Man Died, Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1975; first published by Rex Collings, 1972, p 178.

⁴ ibid., p 182.

⁵ Quoted in Chief Francis Arthur Nzeribe, Nigeria—Another Hope Betrayed, London: Kilimanjaro Publishing, 1985 p 28.

Man Died. His prison journal was itself only one of a quartet of civil war books which included a play, Madmen and Specialists (1971); a volume of poetry, A Shuttle in the Crypt (1971); and a novel, Season of Anomy (1973). This intensively productive period, which also included a re-working of Euripides' The Bacchae (1973), a book of literary criticism, Myth, Literature and the African World (1976), and a three-part poem, Ogun Abibiman (1976), which was inspired by Mozambican President Samora Machel's declaration of war against the Smith regime in Rhodesia, culminated in one of his finest plays, Opera Wonyosi. It was first performed in 1977 at the University of Ife, where Soyinka had been appointed Professor of Comparative Literature on his return to the country in 1975.

Opera Wonyosi, a Nigerian version of Brecht's Threepenny Opera covering the familiar ground of corruption, violence and hypocrisy in the modern state, was immediately attacked by the new breed of Nigerian Marxists who, according to Soyinka, complained that it did not go far enough to 'lay bare unambiguously the causal historical and socio-economic network of society in such a way as to enable us to master reality and, in fact, transform it.'⁶ In his foreword to the published version of the play, Soyinka is unequivocal about his intentions:

Opera Wonyosi is an exposition of levels of power in practice—by a satirist's pen. To ask for a 'solid class perspective' in such a work curtails creative and critical options and tries to dodge labour which properly belongs to the socio-political analyst. The Nigerian society which is portrayed, without one redeeming feature, is that oil-boom society of the seventies which every child knows only too well. The crimes committed by a power-drunk soldiery against a cowed and defenceless people, resulting in a further mutual, brutalization down the scale of power—these are the hard realities that hit every man, woman and child, irrespective of class as they stepped out into the street for work, school or other acts of daily amnesia.⁷

Soyinka has always been impatient with the critics who 'cover reams of paper with unceasing lament over the failure of this or that writer to write for the masses of the people, when they themselves assiduously engage—with a remorseless exclusivity—only the incestuous productivity of their own academic, bourgeois-situated literature'.⁸ In the essay from which this is taken, 'The critic and society: Barthes, leftocracy and other mythologies', Soyinka asserts that 'liberation', which involves 'strategies of reducing the status and structure of the power-wielding class in public consciousness, exposing and demystifying its machinery of oppression', is one of the overriding functions of the theatre. He adds:

The satirist operates with an implicit recognition of the social limitations of his art; his

⁶ Wole Soyinka, 'The critic and society: Barthes, leftocracy and other mythologies' in Henry Louis Gates (ed), Black Literature and Literary Theory, London: Methuen, 1984, p 39.

⁷ Foreword to Opera Wonyosi, London: Rex Collings, 1981.

⁸ 'The critic and society . . . ' p 28.

methodology is allied to the social strategy of preparation. The mastering of reality and its transformation requires the liberation of the mind from the superstition of power, which cripples the will, obscures self-apprehension and facilitates surrender to the alienating processes ranged against every form of human productivity.⁹

In other words, the ability to see clearly, and to report what one sees, is not only the proper function of the writer but is itself a revolutionary act.

The most interesting criticism of Soyinka has come, not from the Marxist camp, but from what might be called the 'authenticity school of African writing' following the publication of the influential critique of African literature by the Nigerian poet and critic, Chinweizu, in collaboration with two others. The theme of their book, Toward the Decolonization of African Literature, is stated succinctly enough in their introduction: 'The cultural task in hand is to end all foreign domination of African culture, to systematically destroy all encrustations of colonial and slave mentality, to clear the bushes and stake out new foundations for a liberated African modernity.'¹⁰

At the heart of the rot is what they identify as the tension between the universal and the local, the universal being, in the case of African literature, an invidious concept of what constitutes 'proper' literature, which is defined wholly in European terms. Of all African English-language writers, Soyinka is seen as coming closest to the European model. Their argument is rather long-winded, not to say hysterical, and involves a close examination of Soyinka's poetry. Because Soyinka is an often tortuous and even wilfully obscure poet—and not a very good one at that—he is identified by Chinweizu et al. as a 'euromodernist', one of those who, taking their cue from Eliot, Pound and Hopkins, have merely 'aped the practices of twentieth-century European modernist poetry'.¹¹ This is taken to be because they are ashamed of their own traditions, proof of which is Soyinka's refusal to explore sufficiently the possibilities of the African world: 'He appears to want to give center stage to the European cultural imports since he insists that to give center stage to traditional African phenomena is to create a neo-Tarzanist Africa.'¹² This sentiment, in their view, explains Soyinka's refusal to consider the African past as a fitting theme of African literature:

Those who reject the African past and would have as little to do with it as possible are those who, shamed by imperialist propaganda and misrepresentation, would wish to forget it entirely and hurry off into a euromodernist African future. Prominent among them are those . . . African neo-Tarzanists who dismiss African literature that deals with the African past as a 'literature of self-worship', a literature of narcissism.¹³

⁹ ibid., p 40.

¹⁰ Chinweizu, Onwuchekwa Jemie and Ihechukwu Madubuike, Toward the Decolonization of African Literature—African Fiction and Poetry and Their Critics, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1985; first published by Fourth Dimension, 1980, p 1.

¹¹ ibid., p 163.

¹² ibid., pp 235–6.

¹³ ibid., p 256.

It cannot be denied that there is an interesting and important idea buried in this argument, but Chinweizu et al. weaken their case considerably. This is partly because their argument against Soyinka assumes the level of a personal vendetta, but much more seriously because they underestimate the importance of language itself.

The language issue is absolutely central to any discussion of modern African literature. To the extent to which literature is language, one wonders how far it is possible to talk of creating authentic African literatures in the colonial languages. But Chinweizu's dismissal of the language issue is altogether too hasty, almost as though he intuitively understands its importance:

Ideally, African literature should be written in African languages. But the same historical circumstances that presently compel African writers to use Western languages . . . also compel African writers to write in them. Until those historical circumstances are changed . . . it is pointless debating whether or not to use these Western languages in our literature (emphasis added).¹⁴

It so happens that the historical circumstances and the Western languages are inseparable: the one is a result of the other. To continue to use those languages is to remain within the historical circumstances imposed upon the societies by the European colonial powers. One wonders just how Chinweizu imagines that the historical circumstances can be changed without the use of African languages to re-define the African reality. This redefinition must go far beyond any simple list of artefacts—which would result in an intolerably parochial literature dependent on exoticism for its narrow appeal—and has to do with an entire world-view. Meanwhile, since Soyinka writes in English it is as an English-language writer that he demands to be assessed.

On that assessment he stands head and shoulders above his contemporaries, including his fellow-countryman, Chinua Achebe, and the Kenyan novelist, Ngugi wa Thiong'o, both of whom were also contenders for the distinction of being the first African writer to be awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature. Achebe, in particular, is just that type of parochial writer who produces novels that depend almost entirely on a relentless accumulation of cultural artefacts for their appeal. The fact that his novels are immensely popular only confuses the question of his status; many second-rate writers may be popular without their meriting the status of literary giants. One of the critical problems of modern African literature is the absence of a sense of scale precisely because it is new. Soyinka, in winning the Nobel Prize, has placed himself at the forefront of an emerging tradition: all future Nigerian writers will have to come to terms with and be judged by the standard of what he has done.

Nigeria reached its lowest point during the second civilian administration of 1979–83, when the army finally relinquished power. Soyinka continued to expose the moral failings of the Nigerian leadership, and particularly those of the President, Shehu Shagari, who 'presided for four years over the most unscrupulous and insatiable robbery consortium that the nation has ever known'.¹⁵ During the notorious 1983 elections in which 'Special Units of the anti-riot Police . . . baton-charged lines of voters'¹⁶ who were unwilling to accept another four years of the ruling party, Soyinka made a film, Blues for a Prodigal, intended, in his words, as 'an almost unambiguous call to arms' to 'mobilize people's opinion and outrage against the Shagari regime'.¹⁷ The film was based on an actual incident in which a student had been recruited by a political party to carry out raids on their opponents, but after squandering the money on a spending spree in London with his girl-friend, changed his mind and sought refuge with a group at the University of Ife. In the same year, Soyinka produced a full-length play, Requiem for a Futurologist, which charted the spiritual malaise and confusion of Nigeria through the career of a fortune-teller and 'con man'.

¹⁴ ibid., p 242.

Chinua Achebe recently paid tribute to Soyinka's 'stupendous energy and vitality'.¹⁸ It is a fitting comment on a man who, in a distinguished career spanning thirty years, from his student days in Leeds in the 1950s to his present position as Head of the International Theatre Institute in Paris, has presented us with an enduring record of the corruption and decadence of modern Nigeria. In eschewing the political rhetoric of the Left as well as the Right—the 'smelly little orthodoxies', in Orwell's phrase—Soyinka has come much closer than anyone else to revealing the sinister forces in Nigeria society.

¹⁵ Wole Soyinka, 'Electoral fraud and the Western press', Index on Censorship 12(6) December 1983, p 13.

¹⁶ ibid., p 11.

¹⁷ James Gibbs, 'Soyinka's blues', New African (London) June 1985, p 43.

¹⁸ 'An event to celebrate', The African Guardian (Lagos) 30 October 1986, p 16.

LITERARY REVIEWS

Old wine in new bottles: re-publishing African writers

Alastair Niven

Things Fall Apart

Chinua Achebe

1986. 150pp. £3.50pb

Arrow of God

Chinua Achebe

1986. 230pp. £3.50pb

A Grain of Wheat

Ngugi wa Thiong'o

1986. 247pp. £3.95pb

Petals of Blood

Ngugi wa Thiong'o

1986. 250pp. £3.95pb

God's Bits of Wood

Sembène Ousmane

1986. 245pp. £3.50pb

Estrangement

Elechi Amadi

1986. 244pp. £3.95pb

London: Heinemann Educational Books (African Writers Series)

The Beggar's Strike

Aminata Sow Fall

London: Longman (African Classics). 1987. 112pp. £2.95pb

It was difficult for those people who, upon hearing of Wole Soyinka's recent award of the Nobel Prize for Literature, asked 'Who's he?' to understand the wave of jubilation that swept literate Africa when the news was announced. It was for readers of African literature an honour long overdue, not just for Soyinka himself but for Africa. Presumably the judges considered it indefensible to withhold the award from Africa any longer, though on my last visit to Sweden, in April 1986, there were gloomy voices abroad saying that, as Senghor was too old, Achebe apparently written out (untrue in either case) and Fugard and Gordimer white, Africa's only hope for a Nobel Prize was Soyinka. And he was unlikely to make it because he was too abrasive, too intellectual, or too pessimistic for the Nobel assessors, who were deemed to be seeking spiritually uplifting authors for their approbation. Soyinka has never been a populist writer, and his reputedly cerebral attitudes are the basis of the charge which an influential school of Nigerian critics, led by Chinweizu in Towards the Decolonisation of African Literature, have made against him. His work, however, shows a versatility which is unique in African writing and one does not have to reach far into it to realise that his humanity is uncompromisingly present in everything he writes.

Soyinka's writing is now the natural starting-point for a discussion of contemporary African writing, and one may presume that it is only a matter of time before his books are re-issued with 'Nobel Prize Winner 1986' emblazoned on them. A few years ago, Chinua Achebe was the first person anyone mentioned in connection with African writing, a position that may arise again if the novel which he is now known to have completed lives up to even a fraction of the expectations that exist for it. Even now Achebe's is the first name in any chronological account of the post-war emergence of Anglophone African writing. Things Fall Apart has a unique status as the novel which taught African people 'that their past—with all its imperfections—was not one long night of savagery from which the first Europeans acting on God's behalf delivered them'. It was the first novel from Africa to be a world best-seller: the publishers say that over two million copies have been sold, but its readership, given its place on virtually every African literature syllabus inside and outside Africa, must be many millions more than that. It was No. 1 in the old Heinemann African Writers Series list and it is in the first batch of novels to be brought out under the same imprint in a newly vamped presentation. It is the progenitor of much modern African fiction and nothing is likely to detract from that status, not even the radical accusations of a few young African intellectuals who have taken to interrupting Achebe when he gives a public talk. Liberal, humanist, tragic by either an African or a Eurocentric aesthetic definition, ironic, concerned with balanced English rooted in indigenous culture—one can list the sins of this novel in the eyes of post-structuralists and oraturists. Yet, it is in the end a work of such compulsive intelligence that it is bound to hold its place not only among the foremost works of African literature, but internationally in modern fiction, which is in itself its ultimate crime, of course, for those who say that authenticity in African expression precludes cross-cultural comparisons. Joining it there will be Achebe's other master work, Arrow of God, which many people regard as the greatest African novel yet published. It, too, has been re-issued in the new African Writers Series.

Things Fall Apart and Arrow of God are among several well-known African books which are included in the new unnumbered African Writers Series. The story of the earlier series, which in effect came to an end when the commissioning editor, James Currey, parted company with Heinemann Educational Books (HEB) to establish his own Africa-focused publishing company, is one of the great unsung tales of twentieth-century publishing. Hardly an African writer of consequence was left out of the series, which launched the great and the minor writers, poets, playwrights and story-tellers, oral texts and translations, essays, autobiographies and criticism. Its transmogrification into the slow but as yet far less adventurous African Writers Series, Mark 2, has not been fully explained publicly, though it is easy to make some deductions not unconnected with take-over bids by multi-national companies which rate publishing as fairly marginal to their main profit direction. Perhaps, however, the time was also right for such a change. For the past ten years at least there has been, despite shortages of paper and ink, poor distribution and serious under-capitalisation, an extraordinary increase in the quantity—and quality—of indigenous African publishing. This phenomenon is another of the unsung triumphs of modern publishing and one of the many positive features of Third World life that are almost completely disregarded by Western commentators. The domination of the big European and American publishers in African literature has waned to such an extent that today most of the best new writers emerge first in Africa itself. This is surely how one would wish it to be, not least because it helps to pre-empt the kind of carping which Achebe and Ngugi wa Thiong'o in his James Ngugi days had to endure—namely, that they were writing for European readers and not for Africans.

LITERARY REVIEWS

Ngugi's A Grain of Wheat, included in the new African Writers Series, is a novel that I have always considered a half-way house between the Christian-centred early novels, The River Between and Weep Not, Child, and the full-blooded socialism of Petals of Blood, which is also re-issued by Heinemann. Other re-issues include Alex La Guma's A Walk in the Night, which groups a collection of short stories and the eponymous novella, and in which the atmosphere of urban oppressiveness bred by apartheid has never been better depicted; Bessie's Head's A Question of Power, with its searing personal account of a mind verging on insanity (how far apart in objectivity are these two writers of South African origin and how sadly close their deaths); and Nelson Mandela's No Easy Walk to Freedom, a celebrated assembly of articles, speeches and letters, including those statements from the dock in 1964 which we cannot today hear repeated too often: 'Fear cannot be allowed to stand in the way of the only solution which will guarantee racial harmony and freedom for all.' Perhaps most enduring of all the books which the African Writers Series has brought out afresh is God's Bits of Wood, Francis Price's translation of Les bouts de bois de Dieu by Sembène Ousmane. This tells what had hitherto been the little-known tale of how workers on the Dakar-Niger railway went on strike in 1947-48. It is in the best sense, a more densely written work than any of the others I have mentioned, graphic in detail, epic in scope, historically convincing in its portrait of the effects of colonisation upon the poor.

The new editions in the African Writers Series are colourfully presented and well marketed. They deserve to be successful, especially as the Series will from time to time include among its titles new works that have in no way acquired a classic status. The first crop, for example, includes Estrangement by Elechi Amadi. Amadi wrote two of the most deceptively simple and hence sometimes underestimated African novels, The Concubine and The Great Ponds. Estrangement examines what has to some extent become obligatory subject-matter for the modern Nigerian novelist—the civil war and its aftermath. Away from the world of gods, Amadi loses some of the haunting fatalism of earlier novels, but this is still a well-plotted and socially animated story.

The Longman company's own new series, Longman African Classics, has re-issued some well-known books in its first list—Isidore Okpewho's The Victims and Ama Ata Aidoo's The Dilemma of a Ghost and Anowa, for example—but none of these, frankly, is a masterpiece in the Things Fall Apart or God's Bits of Wood class and they tend only to underline the extent to which the old Heinemann African Writers Series had so cornered the African literature market. There is perhaps one 'classic' of this kind in the Longman list, La Grève des Bantu, translated by Dorothy S Blair as The Beggar's Strike. This short novel by the Senegalese author, Aminata Sow Fall, distils some of the same concerns as Ousmane's but it is a more ironic and immediate depiction of a strike; and a novel totally lacking in portentousness.

The real distinction in Longman's African list lies with the works in the more simply named Longman African Writers series. Here is the place to find new novels by emerging authors whose names have already become worthy of note—Festus Iyayi, for example, whose new book, Heroes, is his contribution to the literature of civil war and who had in an earlier novel, Violence, begun to define a new kind of Nigerian urban sensibility. In the Heinemann publishing empire, meanwhile, it appears that the main section of the company, Heinemann itself (rather than the HEB African Writers Series in its new format), has been left to nurture new African writers. It has already introduced us to the brilliant Kojo Laing, whose latest work, together with that of Festus Iyayi, will be reviewed in the next issue of Third World Quarterly. This piece has been about the establishment of a pantheon. The tents outside its entrance must await a further visit.

The Real Life of Alejandro Mayta

Mario Vargas Llosa (Translated by Alfred MacAdam)

New York: Vintage books. 1986. 309pp. $6.95pb

Reviewing an earlier Vargas Llosa novel, Anthony Burgess ascribed to Latin American fiction 'a total lack of hope, except in the demented form of chiliastic prophecy'. He was wrong about the fiction as a whole, but he was characteristically perceptive about Vargas Llosa.

In writings spanning twenty-five years, Vargas Llosa observes the interwoven fatalities to which he believes everyone is subject. In his first novel, Time of the Hero (1962), for example, a group of cadets in a military school are taught that the price of survival is to yield to the violent machista norms of adult social behaviour. In the parallel short novel, Los Cachorros (1967), Vargas Llosa poignantly describes the expulsion into a social wilderness (and eventual suicide) of a boy rendered useless by accidental castration.

The scenario recurs in all his novels. The socially marginal, the inadequate and the impotent seek a mode of survival in the wildernesses to which society assigns the eccentric and undesirable. In his elaborate novel, The Green House (1966), the attempt to create a community in the metaphorical desert is set in a number of Peruvian locations at different times. In every case, the attempt fails, leaving only an epitaph in folk memory. Those reluctant rebels wage an often heroic struggle to create a living space. Yet they never consciously seek to install an alternative power, nor to challenge what exists. They only claim the right to live outside the walls.

As long as they remain the sad victims of our rigid rules of social exclusion, Vargas Llosa reserves for them his curious blend of pity and fatalism. Thus in his extraordinary novel, The War at the End of the World (1980), Vargas Llosa uses the historical experience of the Canudos community as the apotheosis of his negative vision. In Canudos, the halt, the lame and the despairing gather around an evangelist called 'the

LITERARY REVIEWS

Counsellor', to build a millenarian community in the isolated plains of north-eastern Brazil. Its very existence proved intolerable to the Brazilian government, which destroyed it, in the face of magnificent resistance, with exemplary ferocity. There is no suggestion that it could have been otherwise; the lines of fate are clearly drawn. This is a deeply fatalistic vision: It asserts that human beings can never achieve a level of understanding that enables them to effect a successful transformation of the world. The quest for such knowledge is the stuff of delusion. All that remains is the wisdom of revelation, of knowing what is, which can redeem the individual alone. The Canudos novel therefore ends with scientists examining the evangelist's head for signs of madness.

That is the background to Vargas Llosa's latest novel, The Real Life of Alejandro Mayta. I was struck by the significant substitution of 'real' for the word 'true' in the Spanish title. In my view this novel is anything but true, because its imperatives, its laws of motion as a novel lie outside its own field of action. In fact, it is a series of caricatures, at the centre of which is a quite vitriolic parody of the revolutionary, Mayta. It is not only that Mayta is presented as weak, self-indulgent and naive to the point of stupidity (an impression reinforced by the ingenuous American suburban youthspeak adopted by the translator), for it is much more than a portrait of a misguided individual.

Mayta takes the form of an investigation. Its context is a Lima which the narrator presents in apocalyptic terms; the city is 'the stinking garbage dump whose birth and growth I've witnessed' (p 4). The insistent question is, why has it come to this, and who is responsible? The novel traces back through time the life of a revolutionary, Alejandro Mayta, whose career has paralleled the decline and collapse of the city. Through interviews with his friends, his comrades and his critics, the narrator describes his role in a ridiculous attempted coup in the mountain town of Jauja in 1948, his subsequent immersion in sectarian conflict, his move to individual terrorism, and his new idealism born of the Cuban Revolution.

Mayta is also a homosexual, a sexual preference inescapably linked in the novel to self-delusion and corruption. Each political action has an immediate genital response: 'It was as true and concrete as the imminent revolt; he had had in his arms the boy he had desired for so many years' (p 142). Predictably, revolutionary ideas are shown as bad faith at best, manipulative dishonesty at worst, a way of getting gullible young men into bed. Ultimately, all Mayta's efforts fail, his friends remember him indistinctly as a deluded romantic, and he is finally rediscovered as a taciturn ice-cream seller in a state of terminal amnesia.

In his earlier work, Vargas Llosa appeared to recognise the nobility of the resister. Even if such rebellion was futile, it was the mark of an active humanity. Yet here, the rebel is a corrupter, a fool, and a dangerous threat to order as such (and no longer the repressive bourgeois order scrutinised in his earlier work). In Mayta, Vargas Llosa serves an ideology whose central concept is that the desire for change is the most dangerous subversion, a desire vilified in the person of Alejandro Mayta. Why does he reserve such venom for Mayta? Although a brief flirtation with Cuba in the 1960s earned him a reputation as a progressive, Vargas Llosa has always been a writer of the right, convinced that the autonomous product of the individual creator is the highest expression of which human beings are capable. Any collective action, by contrast, is futile by definition (since what exists is immutable), and thus becomes mere destruction.

Two years ago, Vargas Llosa headed a commission investigating the death of several foreign journalists in Peru, reputedly at the hands of the guerrilla organisation, Sendero Luminoso. His report was a denunciation of the guerrillas, and a vindication of government repression. And it was informed with an explanation of the deepening crisis closely reflected in Mayta. The shadow of the guerrillas of Sendero falls across every page of the novel. Their surrogate, Mayta, is made responsible for the widespread repression in Peru in recent years, which culminated in the massacre of nearly 300 Sendero prisoners in the Lurigancho prison in 1986. Those responsible for the killing are still unidentified. But the writer finds other culprits—those, like Mayta or the revolutionary Trotskyist, Hugo Blanco, who have been prepared to offer their lives to the principle that the potential for a just world lies within the reach of the exploited and the dispossessed. He reserves particular vitriol for those intellectuals, such as the Nicaraguan poet and priest, Ernesto Cardenal, who have renounced their 'autonomy' in the name of the same belief (pp 79–80).

The violence of Vargas Llosa's reaction can only be explained in terms of the deepening economic recession which threatens the fabric of economically vulnerable societies such as Peru. In a time of crisis, the role of the intellectual as an 'independent' counsellor, wise in the futility of transforming action and close to the ear of power, is no longer clear. Having accepted the fatality of what is, Vargas Llosa sees no cause for the crisis other than the desire for change itself. The fate that governs his world is not a limiting condition, but an iron law, and those who have the impudence to defy it must reap the whirlwind. That is the unmistakable lesson to be drawn from Mayta.

This is not real history, and it offers no guide to the real tensions that gnaw at the heart of Peru. History is not made by individuals but by social forces. Mayta's errors were the fruit of idealism and a commitment to change. Vargas Llosa's error is to have offered us in the guise of truth the nightmares of a conservative.

MIKE GONZALEZ

University of Glasgow

The Penguin Book of Modern Urdu Poetry

Edited by Mahmood Jamal

Harmondsworth: Penguin. 1986. 165pp. £3.95pb

It is a courageous translator who undertakes to translate a cross-section of the contemporary poetry of a language which is as different in diction and emotional ambience as Urdu is from English, since the poets and their aficionados remain to challenge his interpretation. There is a growing body of Urdu works translated into English to provide precedents, but, with few exceptions, the main forum for such translations is confined to specialist and academic periodicals and anthologies. There has been nothing as comprehensive, up-to-date and accessible as this much-needed volume from Jamal.

Jamal has in general selected well-known poets, many still active in their careers. Often too, he has chosen poems so well-known as to be committed to the memories of many readers (Faiz: 'Poetry's Theme', 'Do Not Ask of Me', 'My Love, Prayer', pp 24, 33, 41; Rashed: 'Revenge', 'Afraid of Life?' pp 47, 55). Many of these have appeared before in translation, and the space would probably have been better exploited by the publication of fresh poems. Conversely, the inclusion of the powerful Saqi Farooqi (whose reputation was built in the West) and the undoubtedly talented Iftikhar Arif (primarily a lyricist and broadcaster) may perhaps best be explained by the fact that they live in London and create an immediate reference point for readers in Britain. It is perplexing to note, therefore, the exclusion of Zehra Nigah (also a British resident) who has been internationally acclaimed in the highest literary circles and has stood at the vanguard of the impressive and increasing number of established women poets. However, the selection of material and writers must ultimately remain the prerogative of the translator, particularly if his publisher/editor is working with an unknown medium.

Having made his choices, Jamal has proceeded with considerable acumen to select the most representative and characteristic of each poet's verse. In Riaz's 'Mohajir' (p 158) the poem expresses her personal conflict about being brought up in Sindh, which she loves as home, while belonging to a community which is still labelled as 'immigrant', despite of its having migrated during Partition. Also, 'She is a "Woman Impure"' (p 156) a poem which characterises Riaz's female consciousness, as do poems by other feminist writers, of whom Jamal includes only 'Kishwar Naheed' (pp 134-40). Pre- and post-independence verse from Pakistan, poems reacting to international events (Vietnam, Korea, Bangladesh, Palestine, Beirut) and poems addressing other universals such as censorship, personal dilemmas and emotional impressions are all well represented. This range enables the discerning reader to trace general concerns and trends which contribute to an overall impression of the broad field of contemporary Urdu poetry, as well as the phases of development and individual strands represented within it. Sadly, the poems do not always appear in chronological order, nor is any indication given of the approximate date of composition. Hence, there is little sense of a historical perspective within the volume.

Jamal amply demonstrates the wide-ranging and varied content of Urdu poetry, and translates with sincerity and reasonable accuracy, achieving an immensely readable anthology which conveys the essence of the original works. The field cries out for contemporary translations into English from the ever-developing and dynamic literary cultures of South Asia, a concern which formed the theme of the 1986 Frankfurt Book Fair. Jamal sets out to make Urdu poetry accessible to English-speaking readers, and I have little doubt that he will succeed in his aim. It would have been of additional value, however, had he concerned himself not simply with those who read solely for pleasure but also with those who hope for a literary dialogue with writers of another culture. The translations themselves, though true in terms of content, lack form and sometimes polish. Faiz, for example, almost always composed in recognisable metres and easily distinguishable structures perhaps best described as vers libérés, ie verse which begins from a set form and continually departs from it. The result is therefore of lines which contain the feet of recognisable metres but whose punctuation is varied spontaneously according to the individual sense of the poem. As a result of this liberation from a conventionally structured starting point, the poems contain both the movement of blank verse, and a pattern which is clearly distinguishable from it. This trend is almost universally true of Urdu poets writing in so-called blank verse. Thus, often when Jamal refers to 'free verse' (cf. N M Rashed, p 42) he fails to convey the sense that the poem in Urdu has a clear rhythm generally derived from one of the classical Persian metres inherited by Urdu in the late sixteenth century. Undoubtedly, the volume's introduction would have benefited from the inclusion of some notes on prosody, since attempts at versification or metric approximation in translation often serve only to render the work into doggerel and thus divest it of its charm.

Given the kind of problems of language and metre that the translator faces, it must be said that Jamal (and Penguin in facilitating his publication) has done a competent and even laudable job in introducing to an international lay audience a true and representative sample of this very vital and popular force in South Asian culture. It is to be hoped that the book finds an appreciative audience.

SHAKRUKH HUSAIN

London

BOOK REVIEWS

The Jesse Jackson Phenomenon: The Crisis of Purpose in Afro-American Politics

Adolph L Reed, Jr

London: Yale University Press. 1986. 170pp. £4.95pb

Adolph Reed's essay is a passionate and remorseless dissection of Jesse Jackson's bid for the Presidency in 1984 and his claim to be the authentic political voice of the black masses. Reed, on the one hand, carefully rebuts exaggerated claims for Jackson's impact on black politics in the South, a region in which he had not lived for a decade. He shows that Jackson's campaign was only one of many factors in the increased registration and turn-out of southern black voters and that his 'coat-tails effect' on other black candidates was negligible. On the other, Reed challenges the uncritical acceptance by the media and the left of the view that Jackson, rather than elected black leaders, genuinely represented the black masses. He shows that Jackson, like earlier charismatic protest leaders, derived his authority from a supposedly 'organic' relationship with the black masses. Reed is particularly sceptical of the view that the authority of the black church is sufficient evidence of the existence of that 'organic' relationship. He argues that the lack of critical reflection on Jackson's claims sprang from either casual ignorance—the inability 'to distinguish between a social movement and a group of people shouting in a church'—or an exceptionalist approach to Afro-American politics which exempts black political leaders from judgement by conventional norms. Black political leaders, argues Reed, face a very real crisis, unable to satisfy their constituency because of the collapse of consensus in the Democratic coalition, the hostility of the Reagan Administration and the widening gap between the black middle class and the black poor. The authoritarian, anti-democratic and anti-rational campaign by Jackson, whose policies 'could be expressed on a bumper sticker', offered no solutions to that crisis. Reed's case is powerful and persuasive.

TONY BADGER

University of Newcastle upon Tyne

The Struggle for the Third World: Soviet Debates and American Options

Jerry F Hough

Washington DC: Brookings Institution (Distributed in the UK by Costello) 1986. 300pp. £31.80. £12.50pb

In The Struggle for the Third World: Soviet Debates and American Options, Jerry Hough has achieved his central purpose in that he informed American policymakers, scholars and the general public that Soviet officials and scholars discuss issues of foreign policy. For those who do not realise that there are debates conducted in the Soviet Union concerning policy, and that every action the USSR undertakes in the international arena is not pre-ordained by the dictates of Marxist-Leninist ideology, this book should be enlightening. For the more sophisticated reader, this book provides a general overview of major debates that have occurred in the Soviet Union concerning the Third World. Dr Hough's analysis suffers from serious methodological problems which must be of concern to scholars conducting research in this field.

Though Dr Hough implies that there is a causal relationship between Soviet debates and foreign policy, he does not substantiate the claim. At one point, he asserts that 'on the whole, it would be wrong to emphasise the direct influence of scholars on policy' (p 263). Yet, at the same time, Hough makes the point that 'if Soviet leaders knew what they wanted, they would not permit the kind of debates they do' (p 267). This suggests that Hough believes changes in Soviet viewpoints precede policy shifts, and therefore, are a driving force in Soviet foreign policy. Hough claims that everyone can draw their own conclusions about Soviet debates—in his judgement they matter, and are worthy of extensive research (Chapter 1). However, it is certainly possible that debates play little if any role in determining Soviet international behaviour. The Soviet domestic situation or international conditions may determine choices made by the Soviet leadership, while debates conducted in the Soviet Union simply reflect efforts to establish justifications for shifts in policy which are dictated by the environment. Thus, without establishing that a clear causal relationship exists between debates conducted in the Soviet Union and changes in Soviet behaviour, Hough is wrong to assume that these debates are important for explaining Soviet foreign policy.

Dr Hough also discusses debates conducted in the Soviet Union as if all participants are equally important in the policymaking process. Statements by Khrushchev and Brezhnev are slung together with statements by Soviet military officials, and scholars, providing no means to distinguish the relative impact each actor exerts on policy. It can not be assumed that the highest ranking official exerts the greatest influence on policy decisions. For example, military officials, possessing professional expertise and access to information, might be a more potent influence than the General Secretary on certain issues. In one instance, Jerry Hough claims that Evgenii Zhukov was the 'highest political scholar', sceptical of offering assistance to the 'bourgeois-nationalist' leaders in the mid-1950s (p 229–30). However, Hough does not explain why Zhukov merits the title, nor does he account for the fact that Zhukov's views did not prevail in determining Soviet policy. Without specifying the influence of various officials and scholars on policy outcomes, analysis of these debates is of no use for making explanations or predictions about Soviet behaviour.

Hough's analysis not only fails to satisfy the expectations of the scientifically inclined concerned with explanation and prediction, but analysts should also refrain from accepting the assumption that these statements can be utilised as a good barometer of Soviet behaviour, or that Soviet writings are relevant for a description of Soviet foreign policy. For example, Hough discusses the Soviet method of political analysis for less developed nations, among numerous other issues which he claims are relevant for Soviet foreign policy. Hough provides substantial documentation indicating that Soviet scholars emphasise the 'state' as the appropriate means of political analysis, and are concerned with such questions as 'which classes struggle for the creation of the political system and support it, and in whose interests does the state act?' (pp 123, 128). But Hough fails to clearly specify the policy relevance of classifications utilised by Soviet analysts. If these classifications indeed influence behaviour, should it be assumed that retaining an emphasis on the 'state' as the appropriate means of political analysis would be accompanied by a positive Soviet assessment of 'progressive' or 'socialist-oriented' regimes, systems in which the leaders of the state supposedly act in the interest of the working class, while a negative appraisal would be offered of the 'dependent capitalist' regimes in which Soviet analysts claim that the state leadership acts in the interest of the domestic and foreign entrepreneurial class? Further, should we expect that the level of

BOOK REVIEWS

Soviet military and economic interaction with 'socialist-oriented' regimes would be greater? Clearly this is not always the case since Soviet statements do not always provide a good indication of Soviet behaviour. For example, total combined military and economic transactions with the capitalist military regime in Brazil far exceeds the level of Soviet interaction that occurred with the 'progressive' military regimes that emerged in Latin America in the late 1960-70 period, despite the fact that the latter were given a more positive assessment in Soviet writings. Hough does not compare Soviet discussions to actual Soviet policy towards different types of regimes in the Third World to demonstrate the manner in which assessments actually correspond with behaviour.

Finally, even if we were to accept the assumption that debates matter, or that Soviet statements are a good indicator of behaviour, the analysis is further flawed by the fact that Hough fails to provide an adequate description of Soviet views at least on some issues discussed in this book. For example, Hough's analysis of Chile is not fully representative, generating conclusions about Soviet debates that may be inaccurate. Hough contends that in the early 1970s, Soviet analysts began to call for the establishment of democracy before socialism could be created in the nations of Latin America (pp 136-7). To support the point, Hough claims that Irina Zorina, a scholar at IMEMO, criticised Allende for lack of caution, and recommended that Allende undertake a greater effort toward 'political compromise, collaboration and alliances with the parties representing the peasantry and middle strata' (pp 136-7, 172).

Dr Hough fails to mention that many Soviet analysts were calling for the democratic phase preceding socialism in Latin America before the 1970s which has been carefully documented in the writings of Jaques Levesque and others. Moreover, many Soviet analysts of the Chilean coup, individuals typically considered more influential than Zorina, faulted Allende not for lack of caution, but for excessive caution. Boris Ponomarev, Chief of the International Department, and Sergo Mikoyan, editor of Latinskaya Amerika, criticised Allende's excessive concern with constitutional procedures, and stated that armed means should have been employed to counter societal forces which did not support the Allende regime. Even though Hough makes an issue of the tremendous research he conducted for this project, 'eight years of reading and re-reading Soviet sources, and talking with some 200 Soviet scholars', at least on some issues, the evidence indicates that his conclusions are not adequately supported.

SHARYL CROSS

University of California, Los Angeles

Linking the South: The Route to Economic Cooperation

Edited by Bernard Chidzero and Altaf Gauhar

London: Third World Foundation. 1986. 344pp. £20.95

'South-South' has been articulated over the last decade as a powerful ideological response to the elusiveness of North-South development and dialogue. It is also a forceful policy position in an era of differentiation within the South, among continents, countries and classes. This important restatement of South-South assumptions and assertions is distinctive because of its emphasis on Africa, on debt and on networks. If the South fails to enhance its cause it will not be because of the absence of either ideas or institutions.

This current South-South 'debate' between statesmen and scholars deserves to be widely read because of its novel data and concepts. It constitutes a comprehensive 'South Agenda', with a timely emphasis on South(ern) Africa. As its resultant 'Harare Statement' recognises, the prestigious assembly on which this collection is based was concerned in the context of the continuing dominance of the North in all economic spheres. The object was to stimulate forms of cooperation within the South which would decrease dependence on the North. Such a new relationship must be based on the economic strength and viability of the South, and is vital to future global peace and prosperity (pp 303-4).

Despite or because of its counter-dependence intentions, South-South constitutes a re-definition of 'internationalism' or 'mutuality' as Prime Minister Mugabe noted in his opening address (p 318). From such a perspective, self-reliance is not a retreat into isolation but a prerequisite for negotiation: an attempt to contain inequalities within and between both North and South. Hence the welcome moves to establish a 'South Commission' (pp 236-7 and 311-12) as a think-tank for the majority of the world's states and peoples: an institutionalisation of South-South aspirations and contributions to advance and enhance Third World positions in future negotiations. Happily the subsequent Harare Non-Aligned summit approved such a concentration and direction of South human resources.

The imperative of a new dispensation is apparent in the original data and descriptions of the debt crisis. Several eminent Third World (Dadzie, Ndegwa, Mulaisho) and sympathetic (Taylor, Avramovic) economists present important analyses of Southern, especially African, debt, relating it to inappropriate policies and unsupportable terms. They advocate a mixture of reorientation, renegotiation and refinancing for revival in which a new mutuality is defined: sufficient liquidity for global development. But arranging a coherent Southern position will be challenging, given the diversity of Third World debt needs and the North's insistence on case-by-case treatment.

Self-reliance is here advocated at collective as well as national levels, so that, in the words of Bernard Chidzero, 'the South as a group can acquire, through systematic cooperation, countervailing power or leverage in its relations and negotiations with the North' (p x). Yet, beyond the declaratory level, regional cooperation has been problematic, as the informed and candid chapters by Dadzie and Onitiri recognise. Their sympathetic yet critical contributions situate Africa's disappointments in the comparative context of Third World regionalisms and the new international division of labour: most South-South trade is amongst the NICs of Asia and Latin America. As Onitiri admits, inter-regional and international divergencies now limit Southern cohesion but these could be resituated to advance Southern development:

... there is little scope for Africa to play a major role in South-South economic cooperation unless there is a determined effort to promote or accelerate new arrangements, involving specific actions by the newly industrialising countries (NICs) of the South to support agreed programmes and projects for economic development and restructuring in the less developed regions. In particular, ... this would entail NICs making a significant contribution to African efforts (p 162).

The exclusively African record of exchange is more mixed despite the number of declarations, and Wanigatunga points to a particular frustration: the difficulties of convertibility among Third World currencies despite some ambitious regional clearing house arrangements. Thus designs for a 'South Bank' are laudable but idealistic given the absence of both liquidity and convertibility (pp 305 and 310).

BOOK REVIEWS

Yet the incorporation of Africa's experiences and imperatives into Southern positions and institutions remains crucial for both continent and hemisphere. As Ramphal asserts, Economic cooperation and collective self-reliance in Africa can be a major part of the continent's response to the current crisis; but they have significance beyond emergency needs . . . they complement national effort on the one hand and South-South cooperation on the other; but it is a complementary role that can be critical to Africa's destiny (p 18).

This collection may reveal ambiguities over how to define and advance self-reliance—How socialist? How isolationist?—yet there is a consensus that Third World dialogue is essential if the South is to secure countervailing power.

One important innovation in this volume is the appreciation and advancement of Southern networks for such a purpose. South-South intellectual and institutional development is crucial, as reflected in the Harare statement's support for ongoing 'consultations between Third World statesmen and scholars' (p 312). South NGOs and Human Resource Development will provide some welcome cohesion which recurrent difficulties with economic exchange and infrastructural coordination have served to erode. Hopefully, the South Commission will advance and legitimate such intellectual direction without established, often endangered, regimes becoming paranoid about popular as well as official definitions of Southern development. Meaningful linking and delinking require the participation of people as well as leaders in the South, let alone in the North.

TIMOTHY M SHAW

Dalhousie University

Halifax, Nova Scotia

The Political Economy of Development

J Faaland and J R Parkinson

London: Frances Pinter. 1986. 265pp. £22.50

Paths to Progress: Bread and Freedom In Developing Societies

William McCord and Arline McCord.

New York & London: W W Norton. 1986. 352pp. £14.50

It is widely accepted that one of the most important challenges facing the global community is the development of the so-called 'Third World'. Social scientists and policymakers are in agreement about the multi-faceted nature of the process. Development encompasses economic, social and political variables. Nevertheless, there is no widespread agreement about the process of development. That is, some stress economic growth, others social equity, and therefore dispute rages concerning whether some particular country has developed or not. Given the problematic nature of development there are a plethora of strategies available to national governments and international agencies.

Political economy is a term which signifies not one but a variety of possible approaches. The conception of political economy employed by Faaland and Parkinson in The Political Economy of Development is that which conceives politics as separate but interlinked activities. In other words, this is a non-structuralist conceptualisation. They point out, correctly, that economic policy is shaped by the political and social setting and any attempt to analyse (economic) development must by necessity include an undertaking of political and social parameters and constraints. Both authors have served as economic consultants to a number of developing countries and this experience is brought to bear on the analysis. They are painfully aware of the constraints faced by poor countries and of the bureaucratic, historical, political and international factors which condition the operation of market forces. The market becomes a social rather than an economic construct and development policy must aim at securing economic objectives at a minimal cost whilst balancing competing forces.

This is a useful and welcome addition to the literature on development studies. It will disappoint those who from a cursory glance at the title expect a theory of economic development. The approach of this volume and its major strength lies in the cautious and sober appraisal of economic activity in the context of policy—it emphasises planning and the results which flow from different policy choices and political considerations. The focus is on real economies, with an emphasis on Bangladesh and Mozambique rather than on an abstract model of a typical developing country. Indeed, the authors show persuasively that the concept of a typical developing country is a myth. The economic and political differentiation of the developing countries is ably demonstrated by the wealth of empirical material collected. Nevertheless, Faaland and Parkinson do not lose sight of the similarities and of the very real distinctions between rich and poor countries. The eight chapters can usefully be divided into three sections. The first comprises Chapters 1 and 2. Here the authors provide a useful overview of the differences between developed and developing countries, the nature of developing countries and various strategies designed to foster economic growth. The implicit question is, 'Why have some countries achieved modern economic growth and others have not?' A related question is, 'What is the best strategy for achieving structural transformation of the economy?' Chapters 3 and 4 look in detail at the planning process—purpose, organisation, scope, techniques and the instruments available to governments. Chapters 5 to 8 discuss policymaking with respect to six issue-areas viz. agriculture, industry, population and family planning, employment, welfare and international development policy. Faaland and Parkinson review various controversies, analyse the effects of different options, assess the available evidence and present us with carefully reasoned conclusions. Cool, dispassionate and scholarly, with a wealth of empirical material from a variety of countries, this book deserves a wide audience.

Paths to Progress is an entirely different kind of book since it is an explicit attempt to provide a solution to Third World underdevelopment. It is in many senses an old-fashioned book. It is written, I suspect, with the general reader rather than an academic audience in mind. The argument proceeds through a plethora of illustrative examples but references to source materials are largely absent. Many of the claims made are tendentious but no attempt is made to support the 'factual' argument. The majority of the scanty footnotes relate to judgements and opinions rather than facts. The McCords have written an openly polemical book and no doubt will elicit a number of hostile responses since they confront head-on the arguments with which they disagree. This book is a defence of tolerance and the middle-way against extremes. Liberal capitalism, ie market-oriented economies, are the authors' ideal. They reject untrammelled capitalism, doctrinaire socialism and Islamic fundamentalism. They attempt to reconcile economic growth with political liberty. It is only through free institutions, they argue, that economic progress can be achieved and sustained and be compatible with man's longing for freedom.

BOOK REVIEWS

I support the goals of increased material progress and political freedom but do not think that William and Arline McCord provide a convincing account of the development of the countries which they discuss or a sufficiently rigorous theoretical model of their 'fourth way'. This is a very odd mixture indeed—whirlwind economic history, ideological prescriptions and rampant inductivism. The links between the national and international are almost non-existent. For example, although one agrees with the castigation of local tyranny and dictatorship there is no analysis of the global forces which sustain these regimes. In the end, the weight of the evidence and the rigour of the analysis is not sufficient to sustain an interesting hypothesis.

MARC WILLIAMS

University of Sussex

Development Economics on Trial: The Anthropological Case for a Prosecution

Polly Hill

Cambridge: University Press, 1986. 174pp. n/p

The author describes her purpose in writing this book as follows:

As a polemical work it aims to expose both the unnecessary degree of unreality and the Western bias involved in most economic theorising about the rural tropical world, as well as economists' gullibility in their use of official statistics; its positive purpose is that of demonstrating . . . that economic anthropologists are well capable of generalising about broad issues in a way which should seem highly relevant to development economists (pp 66-7).

A key word in this statement of purpose is 'rural'. Polly Hill's book shows us ways in which development economists can misunderstand rural societies in the Third World and how economic anthropologists can understand them better.

As a plea for greater use of economic anthropologists' work by rural development economists, it is convincing. Some important rural development economists 'such as Chambers, Lipton, Myrdal and Schultz' are given due credit for their willingness to be multidisciplinary in this way. Some others are criticised for uni-disciplinary narrowness when analysing problems of agricultural development. As a general case against development economists, Chapters 1 to 4 are much too casual and selective. Despite the title Development Economics on Trial, Polly Hill seems mainly interested in tracking down one or two examples of particular errors in development economists' work. As a general indictment, her 'anthropological case for a prosecution' could hardly get beyond the academic equivalent of the Magistrate's Court.

This does not matter much, however, except perhaps as grounds for a counter-claim of wrongful arrest, or misleading advertising. The value of the book lies in its positive rather than its negative purpose. Drawing largely on her field work and associated study of parts of West Africa and South India, the author is able to cast important light on the workings of these rural economies—light which economists would be unlikely to generate by rubbing bits of their own conceptual apparatus together.

Specifically, the pervasive nature of social and economic inequality in rural areas is emphasised, in contrast with the economists' tendency to assume a homogeneous set of 'farm households'. Certain rural institutions, such as indebtedness, land fragmentation, bonded labour and townward migration, of which economists tend to disapprove, are shown to require a more careful, and more ambivalent, assessment. There is no doubt that the strong empirical and quantitative basis of Polly Hill's work allows her to speak much more confidently about the fine grain of Third World rural reality than development economists who rely on 'plausible assumptions' to achieve descriptive accuracy.

On the other hand, it clearly is difficult to achieve generalisations, rather than just well-based insights, using the geographically limited material deployed in the book. Indeed, in straining for generalisations, the author is in danger of putting herself in an equally vulnerable position to that which she finds some development economists have adopted.

JOHN TOYE

University College, Swansea

Women in the World: 1975–1985, The Women's Decade

Edited by Lynne B Iglitzin and Ruth Ross

Santa Barbara, California: ABC-Clio Press. 1986. (2nd edn, revised). 484pp. £33.00

In their second edition of Women in the World . . . Iglitzin and Ross have put together a rich collection of country, comparative, and regional studies. Part 1, 'Industrial democracies', contains seven selections; Part 2, 'Developing countries', contains eight; and Part 3, 'Communist countries', three. The book is a veritable goldmine of solidly researched chapters, most of which are overviews of existing literature that highlight activities during the international decade for women. While no new empirical research is presented, the authors are experienced field researchers in areas about which they write.

Iglitzin and Ross provide a conceptual framework on the patriarchal model to compare and assess what they term the 'status of women'. For the editors, patriarchal institutions and ideologies sustain male supremacy and female inferiority. This second edition focuses on the ideological components of patriarchy and the attitudes it creates about women as dependent, apolitical wives and mothers who are naturally suited for particular work. Iglitzin and Ross propose that their model be a standard for comparing policy impacts on women and list questions that permit assessment of degrees of patriarchy. These questions are grounded in a Western view, with modernity representing a 'good'. Fortunately, most contributors do not use the model. Specific chapters stand out for the contributions they make to contextually rich analysis, as follows.

BOOK REVIEWS

Mary Cornelia Porter and Corey Venning, in 'Italy and Ireland: women, church, and politics in two Catholic countries', make perceptive comparisons. Despite Italy's overwhelmingly Catholic population and a special status for the Church, the Italian women's movement has made impressive gains. Were it not for stimulation of the ILO, the EEC and other European institutions towards policies toward economic equity, the inhibiting effects of the church on Irish politics would have saddled the women's movement with a long political agenda.

In 'Law, education, and social change: implications for Hausa Muslim women in Nigeria', Barbara Callaway and Enid Schildkrout examine women's situation in a most religiously conservative part of Africa to which non-Hausa Muslims turn for doctrinal interpretation. Girls learn submissiveness, female civil rights were late in coming, and women are secluded (although they often earn incomes with the help of their children who act as intermediaries). In a fascinating section of this chapter, Callaway and Schildkrout analyse Nigerian constitutional debates of the late 1970s which resulted in the continuation of Sharia courts and laws about women that contradict other human rights provisions of the Constitution. The authors argue that universal free primary education will have far greater effects on reforms than legal change or confrontation over gender issues. Yet, school attendance figures cited for Kano State show 70 per cent for males as opposed to 30 per cent for females.

Eliz Sanasarian, in 'Political activism and Islamic identity in Iran', analyses retrogressive policies over the decade, with what she terms 'devastating effects' for women. Existing family laws were dismantled; women were removed from parts of the labour force; vigilante groups roamed the streets on the lookout for 'improperly' covered women; and women's education opportunities were narrowed and their quiescence enforced. Paradoxically, women participate and are encouraged to participate in public affairs that benefit the state, increasing numbers of female preachers are being trained, and images of veiled rifle-carriers are widespread.

In 'Women, the family, and the state: Hong Kong, Taiwan, Singapore—newly industrialised countries in Asia', Janet Salaff examines Chinese women in three economic 'success stories' where export-led manufacturing development strategies are pursued that rely heavily on female labour. Through an analysis of macro-policies and micro-level family survival strategies, Salaff shows the consequences of economies that are dependent on international market forces and of family collective advances on women.

Inevitably, questions will be raised about why the editors chose these eighteen countries, for they do not represent the world. Women in a number of African countries are more powerful economically and less subordinated by religions than these selections suggest. Similarly, women from countries in transition to socialism in (formerly?) dependent capitalist economies may have provided some contrast. However, readers are reminded of Chinese women in revolutionary transition in an historically grounded chapter, 'Women's rights, family reform, and population control in the People's Republic of China'. Kay Johnson details how party leaders compromised their anti-feudal ideology on marriage with the 'male peasant constituency whose aspiration and sense of manhood were shaped by and tied to traditional patriarchal, familial-religious institutions and ideals' (p 440).

THIRD WORLD QUARTERLY

At the beginning of the decade in a widely reprinted essay, feminist theorist Gayle Rubin said that an understanding of women's oppression requires an examination of the 'endless variety' as well as the 'monotonous similarity' of women's experiences.¹ With the burgeoning literature on gender reflected in this collection, our understanding has certainly advanced. Jane Jaquette's selection, 'Female political participation in Latin America' addresses how Latin American scholars have reworked feminist thought to reflect realities in that region. With the decade behind us, we now need theoretical advances in and understanding of the feminisms in the world.

KATHLEEN STAUDI

University of Texas at El Paso

¹ 'The traffic in women: notes on the "political economy" of sex', in Rayna Reiter (ed), Toward an Anthropology of Women, New York: Monthly Review Press, 1975.

The Latin American Women's Movement: Reflections and Actions

Isis International Women's Information and Communication Service

Rome: Isis International. 1986. 99pp. $6.00pb

This special issue of the Isis International Women's Journal is not a collection of academic research, but interviews with and reports by those actually involved in feminist politics. For academics, the volume is refreshing and essential reading, not bogged down with reviews of literature; rather, it is filled with accounts of women making their own literature. For activists, the volume is enormously useful for its reflective, even self-critical analyses of feminist theory as applicable to action, and for its valuable, twenty-page resource section with addresses of women's centres, audio-visual resources, information services and networks. The volume relays experiences of Peruvian women's centres, a Mexican feminist publication, and both Dominican and Brazilian feminists' use of comics as consciousness-raising tools.

Volumes like these forever put to rest the idea that feminism is a North American or European phenomenon. Latin American feminists, as Dominican Magaly Pineda and others put it, are now in a mature phase at the vanguard of progressive change, involved in the risky process of extending themselves outward and working with existing institutions. The volume reflects the diversity of feminism and its connection to other political struggles.

That connection is a problematic one, for contribution after contribution makes the point that male-dominated political machinery ranging from the state itself to the left and/or the 'democratic' opposition perpetuate the hierarchy and authoritarianism associated with female subordination. In her definitive essay, Ana María Portugal discusses how the second wave of feminism from the 1970s onwards concerns politics of everyday life, 'attitudes of comrades in the home', and 'sexism, authoritarianism, domestic violence and sexual repression' (pp 6-7). Women's movements make the important statement that if women are not part of the democracy, then no genuine democracy exists.

The section on politics contains contributions on both autonomous and integrationist feminist movements, but it is the latter that reveals special insights. Integrationism began in Chile when relatives of the 'disappeared', many of whom were women, talked together in lines outside autopsy buildings and government offices as they waited for information about their dead. Now they struggle within the opposition in the hopes that internal democracy will translate eventually into a democratic system for women as well as men, free of authoritarianism. As a Chilean feminist in exile Rafaella Lamberti describes, a key slogan of the movement is 'for democracy in our country and in the home' (p 10). The collection of the Argentinian Silvia Chester indicates that some feminists work with political parties, despite their authoritarian values, but most feminists view autonomy as a way to avoid diluting their issues. The Uruguayan feminist Carmen Tornaría, discusses women's role in Uruguay's transition to democracy, and their subsequent exclusion from central decision-making. The unsuccessful campaign of two feminists under the United Left in Peru's 1985 elections required immediate answers to lots of strategic questions: Was feminism autonomous? Should it legitimise itself in the electoral process? Which party should it align with? One of the candidates, Virginia Vargas, discusses how, with the theme 'Women, vote for yourselves', they were able to infuse the electoral process with issues related to violence against women, paid and unpaid work, and women's control over their bodies.

BOOK REVIEWS

Still seeking integration, Tornaría concludes 'women don't only want to give life, we want to change it' (p 27). In the much-hoped-for transition to democracy in Latin America, women's participation will bear close watching for whether politics will be transformed or returned to the status quo ante.

KATHLEEN STAUDT

University of Texas at El Paso

Big Deal: The Politics of the Illicit Drugs Business

Anthony Henman. Roger Lewis, Tim Malyon et al.

London: Pluto Press. 1986. 211pp. £4.50pb

In the continuing litany of woes that industrialised countries allegedly experience at the hands of wicked Third World nations, addiction to narcotics figures prominently. When Western medicine finally began to awake to the many ravages of its pharmaceutical inventions—morphine, heroin, the barbiturates and the amphetamines—source countries, largely in Southeast Asia, and now increasingly in the Andes, were targetted as being responsible for the West's thirst for intoxication.

One should not underestimate how effective this campaign has been in focusing largely on the supply side of the drug equation to find a solution for addiction. In the USA, for instance, no fewer than 102 bills related to international narcotics control were placed before the 92nd Congress, many calling for the suppression of US aid to countries that failed to 'demonstrate a vigorous and concerted effort to curb production and trafficking'.

There has been very little literature that has attempted to situate illicit narcotics use in the West in its larger and decidedly more significant North-South context. Big Deal will not change that. It is too disorganised, poorly documented and shrill to alter the course of international debates and regulations. The first chapter—obviously the most important in any book by several contributors—is the weakest. At best, it reads like a collage of old newspaper articles; it has no analysis, and its concern with the role of the Mafia contributes little that is new or interesting. Another chapter, which takes the reader into the drug-oriented world of British punks and their friends, seems pointless, too self-consciously cute and anecdotal. One of the longer chapters, by journalist Tim Malyon, looks at the cannabis trade out of Latin America. But by dismissing evidence provided by such reliable organisations as the Narcotics Intelligence Committee, and shrilly claiming that the National Organisation for the Reform of Marijuana Laws (NORML) is an authoritative source, Malyon undermines his credibility badly. NORML has admitted to accepting substantial funds from Playboy magazine and drug-dealers to conduct its now totally discredited lobbying in Washington.

Professor Anthony Henman's contribution on the cocaine trade saves Big Deal from the intellectual oblivion to which it should otherwise be condemned. His objective, to look at the impact of the cocaine trade on class structure in Colombia, and its relationship to national and international capitalism is important and fascinating. There is an extreme paucity of documentation on the cocaine trade and a market-type analysis is necessary. But Henman does not organise his material well, and at times he is naive. His call for the legalisation of drug use is vaguely articulated. Worse, it ignores the central fact of the present global drug scene—that we are witnessing a rapid Westernisation of patterns of intoxicification with the number of intoxicants permitted being restricted to alcohol and legally produced psychotropics. For many, this may be deplorable, but to understand it, and certainly to marshal forces against it, will require a much more serious effort than that made by any of the contributors to Big Deal.

What this book needed was a tough editor, a clearer focus, and contributors who can draw a distinction between fact and personal opinion.

ANDRE McNICOLL

North-South Institute, Ottawa

Slavery and Human Progress

David Brion Davis

Oxford: Oxford University Press. 1986. 374pp. £6.95

In his latest book, Professor Davis of Yale, the Pulitzer Prize-winning author of The Problem of Slavery in Western Culture, questions the ambiguity in any moral idea of human or historical 'progress'. He ironically and subtly delineates the abrupt reversals in successive concepts of such progress throughout the world, as demonstrated by the history of slavery and emancipation.

Aristotle argued in his Politics: 'For all tame animals there is an advantage in being under human control as this secures their survival. . . By analogy, the same must necessarily apply to mankind as a whole.' With religious paternalism and complacent equanimity, Prince Henry of Portugal surveyed the first shipments of slaves from Africa in the 1440s as he 'reflected with great pleasure upon the salvation of those souls that before were lost'; but four hundred years later Palmerston was equally adamant that Britain was 'the main instrument in the Hands of Providence' for eradicating slavery in Zanzibar.

BOOK REVIEWS

The human capacity for dignifying acts of exploitation—whether between the sexes, or by race, class, religious or national interests—seems depressingly infinite. When Locke criticised slavery, he did not extend his criticism to the then slave system in America from which he benefited. Eric Williams and others have lately persuasively argued that it was in fact economic pressure which underlaid the motives of many of the nineteenth-century emancipators, when slave labour became uneconomic.

Only a four-page epilogue in this book deals with events which have taken place in the most recent half-century. It is to be hoped that Professor Davis will, in a future book, pursue his theme as far as contemporary manifestations of slavery. He mentions Lord Shackleton's recent evidence that certain travellers in the Middle East sell slaves upon arrival 'using them as living travellers cheques'; one hopes he will now also examine other modern forms of servitude—including debt bondage and the labour camps of Hitler and Stalin—and the familiar if unappealing rationalisations of their defenders.

BEN WHITAKER

Minority Rights Group, London

A Year in the Death of Africa: Politics, Bureaucracy and the Famine

Peter Gill

London: Paladin. 1986. 191pp. £3.95pb

The History of Famine and Epidemics in Ethiopia Prior to the Twentieth Century

Richard Pankhurst

Addis Ababa: Relief and Rehabilitation Commission. 1985. 120pp. £2.50pb

The Challenges of Drought: Ethiopia's Decade of Struggle in Relief and Rehabilitation Relief and Rehabilitation Commission

London: H and L Communications. 1985. 280pp. £9.95

'God cannot be blamed and the Emperor cannot be accused,' quotes Peter Gill from a medieval Ethiopian proverb. The relevance of the proverb seems as applicable to the Ethiopian famines of the 1980s as it did to those in ancient Ethiopian history. It is a proverb that underscores the cycles of famines in Ethiopian legends and in that nation's pre-twentieth-century history. It is one of the leitmotifs which sustains Richard Pankhurst's interesting overview of Ethiopian famines and epidemics.

Given that Pankhurst seems to have had the support of the Ethiopian Relief and Rehabilitation Commission in preparing this work, one might have assumed that the 'Emperor' at least would have indeed been accused. However, what stands out so clearly in my mind is the persistent attempts of Ethiopia's rulers throughout its pre-twentieth-century history to come to the assistance of their peoples. Such help was often belated, rarely sufficient to sustain a full-scale relief effort, and certainly not intended to deal with the root causes of the cycles of despair to which that country had grown all too used. Nevertheless it was impressive to read of Emperor Menilek's efforts in the 'Great Famine of 1888' to set an example by taking 'a pick-axe to dig the soil and a hatchet to cut the wood', but even more important to prevent grain speculation and seek to import grain from abroad (p 103). When a plague of locusts swept through Tigre in 1627, it was once again the Emperor who was reported to have provided the afflicted 'with much alms and soon ordered the distribution among them of two thousand cotton cloths' (p 40).

Impressive as these gestures of charity might seem, in the end they merely sustained the myth that the causes of Ethiopia's persistent plights were not within the control of man. God could not be blamed, and ultimately disasters reflected His divine will and retribution. It was an attitude ingrained in the attitude of the Emperor and in the minds of the people. Indeed, it was a view fostered by those foreigners who even from the seventeenth century onwards sought to assist those stricken by disaster in Ethiopia. This link between Divine and the human condition made religious conversions all the easier; for, as Pankhurst notes, 'the famine stricken, naturally enough, were all too ready to throw themselves on the charity of any denomination' (p 108).

The rich harvest of converts gathered in by Catholic and Protestant missionaries during times of Ethiopia's hardships did not go unnoticed. The proud and ancient Abyssinian Empire developed more than a degree of distrust for those who came bearing relief from distant parts for motives which appeared mixed and unclear. The prospect that Ethiopia's plight would lay it open to the ambitions of foreigners was certainly uppermost in the mind of Emperor Menilek, for the horrifying famine of 1888-92 'actually heightened' Italian ambitions to claim the devastated areas (p 110).

Pankhurst's slim volume is indeed informative when it comes to capturing the history of Ethiopia's horrendous heritage of epidemic and famines. However, beyond interesting description, there is little analysis, little that one can suggest as a theme which transcends the blow-by-blow accounts of one disaster after another. This is a pity, for the fascinating historical material in this work transcends the pre-twentieth-century history of that beleaguered nation. The work deserves a broader context.

That 'the Emperor cannot be accused' might have had its late-twentieth-century counterpart in the Ethiopian Relief and Rehabilitation's The Challenges of Drought. On the contrary, there is little in the RRC's descriptive analysis of twelve years of relief and rehabilitation work that seeks to raise the 'Emperor' above the battle. In several instances, the RRC accepts areas of institutional inadequacy. It accepts that it has embarked upon rehabilitation programmes with which it really could not cope alone (p 138). It readily admits that, for example, mergers with smaller government agencies did 'raise problems of administration, deployment and integration' (p 142).

Yet, before one assumes that this work is the RRC's mea culpa, read on. On the whole, the RRC finds that, like the Emperor, it need not be 'accused'. Given the upheavals which surrounded the RRC's birth in 1974 and the interminable crises (eg: the Ogaden war, which hampered its rehabilitation efforts elsewhere in the country) the RRC gives itself high marks. What in effect one has here is less a work of 'ideological perspective' and more one of 'institutional self-justification'. The RRC, despite what outsiders might suggest, sees its rôle as the dominant chef d'orchestre of Ethiopia's relief and rehabilitation. The book does acknowledge the assistance provided by foreign agencies, in some instances, to the point of tedium, as the same list of names keep cropping up time and time again. Yet, one is not left with any doubt about who is and has been in charge.

BOOK REVIEWS

In light of the controversy which surrounds Ethiopian resettlement policies, the RRC ostensibly makes no attempt to duck the issue. It plunges into the purposes, procedures and relative success of resettlement without attempting to consider the arguments of the opponents of resettlement. The RRC's case makes sense and its description of the various types of resettlement schemes seems well considered . . . until one happens across a statement such as this: that Special Settlement Schemes 'consist of 500 heads of families who are chosen on the basis of their age, physical fitness and willingness not only to settle but also to follow the rules and regulations issued by the RRC, along with the acceptance of the basic principles of producers' cooperatives' (p 160). There is something ominous, too unexplained, in that phrase 'rules and regulations issued by the RRC'. As stated, it brings to mind all the worst aspects which critics of resettlement had feared about the insensitive, bureaucratic and dictatorial methods underlying the policy. Or, perhaps, one is reading too much into the unstated; for throughout The Challenges of Drought there is more a sense of reading an internal government document than a literary work. What remains unstated may just be more the result of governmental prose than a conscious attempt to obfuscate.

Be that as it may, there is certainly no attempt to obfuscate when it comes to one abiding theme, that in which the international community is accused of failing to assist Ethiopia in her attempts to deal with the root causes of famine. From former RRC Commissioner Dawit's elegant introduction to the book's concluding section on 'The struggle for self-sufficiency', one cannot ignore the feeling that once again 'foreigners' have failed to understand the true plight of Ethiopia. The suspicion about outsiders' motives and the nature of their concerns which Pankhurst suggests in his description of pre-twentieth-century Ethiopia connects only too clearly with the RRC's review of the 1980s.

The RRC's analysis is by no means great literature. It serves to present a particular point of view, and it does so in a language that is full of 'bureaucratese'. Yet, for anyone wishing to understand that particular case, supplemented by several interesting tables on donor statistics, then the book is worth reading. One also might mention that the photographs of Ethiopia and the relief camps contained in the work are truly outstanding, and serve to add to the human poignancy which the book's prose all too often tends to dampen.

With a chance to hear the RRC's case, one cannot avoid asking to what extent 'foreigners' have indeed failed to appreciate Ethiopia's plight? To what extent was the famine of 1984 used by foreigners to pursue their own interests in that beleaguered land, in a way not totally dissimilar to those which Pankhurst describes in the 1888 famine?

Peter Gill's A Year in the Death of Africa goes a very long way to addressing these sorts of issues. In an excellently documented and researched analysis of the international response to the 1984-85 Ethiopian famine, Gill looks at the way the international relief community responded to the crisis, and in some respects certainly justifies Ethiopia's doubts about the motives of 'foreigners'. 'Like the British, whom they are said to resemble, the Ethiopians are an island race. . . And any prickly reserve may spring from the number of times they have been attacked and have repulsed those attacks,' writes Gill (p 34). It is a telling statement, for it goes some way to explaining the reserve which characterised relations between donors and government authorities. But, of course, the reserve was founded even more so upon overt clashes of national interests; geopolitical differences, contending ideologies, and economic calculations, the sum total of which made the international donor community heed the plight of Ethiopia too slowly.

What A Year in the Death of Africa ably demonstrates is how such clashes affect the processes of the international aid community. Gill probes the inconsistencies between statements such as 'a hungry child has no politics' and the reality of lethargic donor responses. He takes a long hard look at the way the US Agency for International Development justified its initially meagre contributions, and comes down very hard on the hypocrisy of the British government's response.

Much of this sort of analysis is not new, and has been done by other authors describing different disasters. Gill certainly cannot be faulted for the way that he has described the governmental nexus, and these—no matter how well known the themes—still make the work worthwhile. However, where Gill has really added to the literature on the international relief community is in two areas: the press and the European Community. The insights which he gives on both make the work important. The world of the media Gill knows well, since as a reporter for The Daily Telegraph (London) and for Britain's Independent Television, he has seen the day-to-day workings of the media and all its strengths and weaknesses. The interplay between non-governmental organisations (NGOs) and the media, the rivalries between the media and the ultimate 'oxygen' which publicity gives to the relief process is a study in and of itself. Gill handles this area extremely well, and one gains real insights into a horrifying reality: the media is both a phenomenal mobiliser and perverse distorter of relief.

The European Community, with its mountains of grain, lakes of milk, and so on, often stands accused of incompetence, indifference and inefficiency. Gill takes a different view, and traces the frustrations of an international organisation that would be able to respond if given the scope. Here, too, the author opens up a wide area for further research: the interactions of member-states upon the functioning of what should be a major donor, that is, the EEC, in relief. Gill's analysis, however, is a more than adequate starting-point for future research. He captures, at least for me, the right balance between a large bureaucratic system and a potentially willing machine that could be more effective if given the latitude.

If there is any single criticism which might be made of A Year in the Death of Africa, it is that the author does not spend sufficient time in probing why donor organisations respond the way they do to such crises. He certainly explains in the case of Ethiopia (and, to a much lesser extent, the Sudan) what they did, but he might have devoted more attention to a more careful analysis of the procedures, perceptions, and processes that underlie institutional responses. Yet, perhaps this sort of criticism misses what Gill was trying to do. The additional analysis that could be included might be more relevant to a more academic work; and the author's intention is not that. Gill seems to have wanted a work that a wide body of people could read to understand the dynamics of relief. There is no doubt that, in a relatively short book, he has accomplished what he had set out to do. Dramatic, perceptive and well researched, A Year in the Death of Africa is the best work to date on the response to Africa's suffering in 1984–85.

RANDOLPH C KENT
Robertsbridge, Sussex

Mozambique: The Revolution Under Fire

Joseph Hanlon

London: Zed Books. 1984. 292pp. £18.95. £6.95pb

The sub-title of this book, 'The Revolution Under Fire', could not be more appropriate. Mozambique had experienced a generation of warfare: a decade of revolutionary guerrilla struggle against Portuguese colonialism and more than a decade of a counter-revolutionary war of attrition. Whilst the first period of struggle heralded the birth of a newly independent nation with a political leadership, Frelimo, dedicated to tackling the problem of 95 per cent illiteracy, a health service that only served the privileged few and an economic system geared to serve the interests of capital accumulation in South Africa and metropolitan Portugal, the subsequent war of destabilisation orchestrated first by Ian Smith's Rhodesia and from 1980 by the Republic of South Africa, has served to thwart at every twist and turn the new government's development policies. Destabilisation has been devastatingly effective.

Hanlon's book ably charts these events, pointing out governmental mistakes where they have occurred and Frelimo's attempts to redress these. It is particularly instructive on the crucial agricultural sector, where early neglect of the peasantry with a policy emphasis on heavy industrialisation and state farms did much to open the door of vulnerability to the destabilisation exercise. The search for quick results through large-scale mechanised agricultural production failed. Frelimo's Fourth Congress in 1983 went a good way towards redressing the balance with its emphasis on encouraging peasant-marketed production by trying to change import policy and domestic industrial production towards meeting the peasants' needs for producer inputs and basic needs consumer goods. The continuing war has made the practical implementation of this policy difficult in the extreme.

The book provides important insights into the policy-making process and the foreign policy balancing act on the East-West tightrope. It tackles the various aspects of class struggle inside the country and the difficult tasks of women's emancipation. It discusses the process of party formation and the building of the popular assemblies. A postscript covers the events surrounding the signing of the Nkomati Accord between the governments of South Africa and Mozambique. There is also a useful statistical appendix.

Events since the signing of the Nkomati Accord have brought the prospects for peace no nearer. The South African military transferred its main base of support for the anti-government Renamo (Mozambique National Resistance) forces to Malawi. The continuing involvement of the South African government in support for Renamo was clearly revealed in the capture of its leader's diaries in the combined Zimbabwean-Mozambican army assault on the guerrilla headquarters in the Gorongosa mountains in August 1985. Faced with mounting pressure in the international community for sanctions against South Africa, Pretoria has threatened retaliatory sanctions against the surrounding Frontline States. This has made the defence of the Beira corridor with its oil pipeline, road and rail links to the landlocked interior countries of Zimbabwe and Zambia all the more significant, for without this alternative trading link, the Commonwealth countries of the interior will be almost totally dependent on South African ports, road and railways.

It is clear to everyone that the prospects for development in Mozambique will remain bleak in the extreme until there is a decisive change of power within South Africa. Whilst popular resistance inside that country has brought that day nearer, the power of the existing state is such that meaningful change will only occur in the medium to long term. Hence another decade of war, economic chaos and social disruption looms in the future for the people of Mozambique. In the frontline of the struggle against apartheid it is a country which deserves much greater support than received hitherto by the international community.

BARRY MUNSLOW

University of Liverpool

Arms and the African: Military Influences on Africa's International Relations

Edited by William J Foltz and Henry S Bienen

London: Yale University Press, 1985. 221pp. £22.50

African Crisis Areas and US Foreign Policy

Edited by Gerald J Bender, James S Coleman and Richard L Sklar

London: University of California Press, 1985. 373pp. £33.95. £8.50pb

Both these books are concerned, mainly from the standpoint of US foreign policy, with the calamitous changes that have occurred in the international relationships of African states since the military revolts of 1974 in Lisbon and Addis Ababa. Since those events, wars and insurrections of varying scale and intensity have occurred in Ethiopia, Angola, Mozambique, Zimbabwe, Zaire, Uganda, Chad, Sudan and the Western Sahara. Often, they followed directly from earlier conflicts, but generally they became more portentous as a result of the appearance of Soviet logistic capacity to intervene decisively in African quarrels (in Angola in 1975 and Ethiopia in 1977) and of technical advances in the weaponry acquired by some African states.

Arms and the African, a Council on Foreign Relations book to which US government officers as well as academic writers have contributed, concludes with an expectation of further militarisation in Africa and suggests that force will be used increasingly in disputes between neighbouring states. This book contains studies of Soviet, French and South African military policies in Africa, and illuminating accounts of the rapid, but nationally uneven, growth in military capability in the continent. There are also essays on Africa's place in Great Power strategy and African military regimes as foreign policy makers. This book is a compact, informative and clearly expounded treatment of the matters indicated by its sub-title. An appendix usefully lists regime changes and coups, both chronologically and by country, up to September 1984.

African Crisis Areas, which contains nineteen papers and several shorter notes, originated in a conference sponsored by the African Studies Center and the Center for International and Strategic Affairs at the University of California, Los Angeles; understandably, it is less integrated as a book than the Foltz and Bienen volume. Crisis in Africa is defined as a state of armed conflict or acute tension produced by indigenous forces but involving, or threatening to involve, the USA and the Soviet Union either directly or through their surrogates. A crisis area is the locus of an actual crisis or a place that is crisis-prone. The areas thus identified and discussed are Southern Africa (including Namibia, Angola and Mozambique as well as the Republic of South Africa), the Horn of Africa (Ethiopia and Somalia), Zaire, Chad and the Western Sahara.

For the most part, the papers argue an 'Africanist case' against the 'globalist' tendency in US foreign policy, and in favour of a 'regionalist' stance. Globalism means the interpretation of any crisis as a Soviet attempt to obtain a military or political advantage, and the thwarting of Soviet ambitions as the supreme objective of US policy. Regionalism is less easily defined, or understood, but can perhaps be summarised as the view that the real problems of African politics have nothing to do with the Cold War, and that in the long run American interests would be best served if helping the resolution of these real problems brought peace and prosperity to Africa.

It is easy enough to find evidence of foreign policies, not only American, that have penalised their authors as a result of neglect or ignorance of local conditions and indigenous forces. Africanists naturally, and rightly, warn against undiluted globalism in Africa—though it is far from apparent that the US government has ever practised such a thing. But the scope for regionalism, on the other hand, is obviously limited in practice by the need for the Soviet Union, as well as America, to follow this approach. As Colin Legum observes (p 283): 'a regional approach to policy-making is justified, or possible, only in cases where neither major power feels threatened by, or sees any major advantage in, a changing political situation.' Only the most naive observer would suppose the USSR, unlike America, to be free of considerations of military strategy in the policies it has followed in the Horn, Angola and some of the smaller West African states (Guinea, Mali, Cape Verde, Benin, Congo). In the words of Peter Duignan, another dissenting voice in this collection: 'Soviet interests are global; therefore, US interests must be global too' (p 292). Not regionalism, but 'educated globalism', would seem the direction for Great Power policy in Africa that is both most practicable and likely to be effective, and here, it may be suggested, America, for all its failings, has a long start on the Soviet Union.

DOUGLAS RIMMER

Centre of West African Studies, University of Birmingham

Education Priorities and Aid Responses in Sub-Saharan Africa

Edited by Hugh Hawes and Trevor Coombe with Carol Coombe and Kevin Lillis

London: HMSO for Overseas Development Administration and University of London Institute of Education. 1986. 190pp. £4.95pb

Education and Society in Africa

Mark Bray, Peter B Clarke and David Stephens

London: Edward Arnold. 1986. 191pp. £6.95pb

Education Priorities and Aid Responses in Sub-Saharan Africa is a report of a conference held at Cumberland Lodge, Windsor, in December 1984 and attended by participants from African countries, British universities and major donor agencies.

Though a report of a conference, it is not a conference report in a conventional sense. The editors draw selectively from a wealth of conference papers, 'think pieces', working group and plenary reports to present answers to two related questions: What are/should be the educational priorities for development in sub-Saharan Africa? And what is/could be the aid agencies' response? They answer these questions within the context of broader problems of socio-economic development which include population increase, food production and the management of natural resources, international recession and economic crisis. The book is aimed at those interested in problems facing educational development in sub-Saharan Africa and in issues of aid policy and management as seen by those who are at the 'sharp end' of political and professional decision making.

While an understanding of the problems facing educational development is logically prior to the rational development of aid policy, the book's attempt to address the questions simultaneously in conference-book form, sometimes leaves the reader with the impression that aid agencies are running the education systems of Africa. The discussion of education priorities which begins with an appreciation of diversity among African states focuses aggressively on common background, common problems and a common list of priorities for education which, it is assumed, can be agreed between aid agencies and national governments, between African national governments and within African states. However formidable and impossible a task, the discussion does appear to facilitate the book's second aim, namely, future directions for aid policy. Indeed, this was the main purpose of the conference conceived largely by the Overseas Development Administration 'to educate itself'. One of the most readable and most important chapters is Chapter 4, 'Reflections on the Conference', in which Roger Iredale, the ODA's Principal Education Adviser, presents a frank yet measured assessment of the conference discussion and offers nine new directions for (British) aid to education in the future. These include increased donor coordination, not only in education but across the whole aid spectrum; intersectoral coordination, whereby education specialists in donor agencies will work more closely with issues of health, agriculture and the environment; pump-priming of innovations at the margin for which Ministers of Education with their huge recurrent salary and maintenance burdens have no spare funds; the development of indigenous research capacity of existing institutions; greater selectivity, appraisal and exiguity on the part of aid recipients matched by a greater degree of 'genuine learning and discovery' among institutions in donor countries; greater support for voluntary agencies in developing countries; targetted training for overseas personnel at carefully selected courses; and structural change within agencies to enable educational aid to be integrated with other disciplines and sectors. Given the current British climate for government and aid expenditure, this last change requiring flexibility on the part of British government bureaucracy may be one of the most difficult to achieve.

Education and Society in Africa addresses many of the same issues in education and development but from a very different perspective. The book is intended for students of education, comparative education and sociology in universities and teachers' colleges in Africa and the West. It offers eleven chapters on different dimensions of the relationship between education and society. These chapters cover a wide range of material—education and development in an international context, education and nation-building, education and employment, education and social stratification, Islamic education, indigenous forms of education, education and the community, the school as a society, the curriculum and society, new ways and radical alternatives, education and the future. The authors' clear distinction of at least four levels of analysis in any discussion of education and society—the international, national, community and school—is a particularly helpful contribution to the literature on education development where propositions at one level are frequently misapplied to other levels.

BOOK REVIEWS

The chapters stand on their own or can be read in sequence. Each chapter is clear, well-written and straightforward and is accompanied by a useful bibliography of material written by African and Western authors. Some of the chapters include case studies of projects or problems which help to set the general issues in context. Each chapter finishes with a set of questions and suggested project work to be addressed not only by students but also by teachers who choose to use this book as a course text. It is particularly notable that the three authors have produced a book so consistent in style—all in all, a useful text for courses not only in education, but also sociology, psychology and economics.

ANGELA LITTLE

*Institute of Development Studies,
University of Sussex*

The Music of Africa

J H Kwabena Nketia

London: Victor Gollancz. 1986. 278pp. £6.95pb

Professor J H Kwabena Nketia has written numerous books and articles which have earned him recognition as one of the leading authorities in the field of African music. He is currently the Andrew W Mellon Professor of Music at the University of Pittsburgh, as well as being the Director of the Institute of African Studies at the University of Ghana in Legon.

Up until the publication of this book in 1974, Profesor Nketia had been concerned with the music of his own people, the Akan of Ghana. However, with the increasing interest in Africa shown over the last two decades, a solid introduction to African music became necessary. The Music of Africa is an attempt at such a text. I call it an 'attempt' because if one considers that there are some 2,000 different ethnic groups in Africa, each with their own means of musical expression, then surely the mere 245 pages of this book cannot be anything more than a very generalised overview. One therefore has to question the use of a book such as this.

In the Preface, Nketia tells us that he has aimed the book at the general reader and the college student. But surely the subject is too vast to give the student any valuable insight into the music of Africa. Furthermore, for the uninformed reader the book is very misleading in that it is strongly biased towards Ghana and Tanzania, countries in which Nketia has had his own musical experiences. In fact, over half the 'analytical observations' and roughly 80 per cent of the 'appropriate illustrations' (p ix) concern Ghanaian and Tanzanian cultures. What about the music of the rest of Africa? While one or two examples are cited, Nketia has virtually ignored music south of Tanzania because, in his opinion, 'the music practised by these societies belongs to stylistic families outside Africa' (p 3). Curious.

Perhaps this is also his reason for only dedicating four-and-a-half pages to the influence of Islam, and for completely ignoring popular music (except for half a paragraph). By not discussing these topics, Professor Nketia leads his readers to believe that the music of Africa has remained unchanged throughout its existence, and will remain thus. A sense of history is lacking here.

The structure of the book, however, is excellent: beginning with a background discussion of social and cultural aspects, becoming more detailed through the next two sections, then returning to a more general topic to end the book.

Section two deals with musical instruments. In his introduction to the section, Nketia writes: '... the study of musical instruments may be approached from different angles ... historically ... culturally ... as material objects (p 68). Thankfully, he chose not to attempt a discussion from all these angles. Instead he offers a 'brief inventory' of the instruments, classifying them according to the Sachs-Hornbostel approach. He acknowledges that 'the literature on African music abounds in detailed studies of the musical instruments' (p 68) and he continually refers readers to these. He also uses numerous photographs to enhance descriptions. (Unfortunately, many of these do not indicate the culture which they represent, thus rendering them far less useful than they would otherwise be.) In these ways Nketia has presented a valuable starting-point for the study of the musical instruments of Africa.

The third section analyses the 'Structures in African music' and therefore includes numerous definitions of terms (eg: 'time line', 'additive rhythms', etc). Many of these are rather clumsy, so that the reader is left confused about what exactly it is that Africans do when they make music. The book would be greatly improved if descriptions by the people who actually make the music were included. For example: how do performers themselves interpret 'the interplay of polyrhythms' (p 35)? The section is very well illustrated although one might question his use of conventional staff notation in his musical examples.

Section four is a pleasure to read. It examines 'Music and related arts', ensuring that the reader acknowledges the inseparability of the arts. Nketia dwells on the importance of language in relation to music in his chapters: 'Speech and melody' and 'The role of song texts'. He also looks at various aspects of the 'Interrelations of music and dance', which is an angle many scholars under-estimate.

Chapter 21 is a summary which concludes the book well. This is followed by three appendices: a discography (which would be more useful if it were related to the text); a list of all ethnic groups mentioned in the text and their location; and a list of African terms used in the text. The usefulness of the bibliography is limited as one must remember that it was compiled over ten years ago.

I agree with Professor John Blacking when he states (as is printed on the back cover of the book) that this book should be 'read wherever music is taught in the UK', but let it be the first book read, so that the student can move on to more focused works and thereby acquire a more effective knowledge of 'the music of Africa'.

JANET TOPP-FARGION

London

BOOK REVIEWS

Iraq in Transition: A Political, Economic and Strategic Perspective

Edited by Frederick W Axelgard

London: Mansell. 1986. 111pp. £15.00pb

This book contains five papers presented at a seminar held at the Centre of Strategic and International Studies at Georgetown University, Washington, in May 1985. In the first paper, the editor states the main aims of the book:

Iraq in Transition is an attempt to present insights into Iraq's response—in political, economic and foreign policy terms—to the trauma of its ongoing war with Iran. Its main justification is . . . Iraq's unchanging status as a major regional power and the belief that continuing US interest in the Middle East . . . in coming years will require more serious considerations of Iraq's role in the US approach to the region . . . [this] will almost certainly include moving US–Iraqi interaction toward a more open dialogue, and possibly discussion of limited US–Iraqi cooperation to maintain a strategic balance in the Gulf between Iran, Saudi Arabia and Iraq itself.

He goes on to say that the papers in the volume are an attempt to 'contribute to the understanding needed for constructive US policy choices vis-à-vis Iraq' (p 1).

In its own terms, therefore, the book does not claim to constitute a contribution to scholarship, and hence cannot be evaluated in such terms. It is informative to the extent that the authors give up-to-date data on topics such as the impact of the war on Iraqi oil production (Axelgard), the country's financial situation, its development programmes and the way in which foreign governments and companies have reacted to these developments, including a list of some major projects (Crusoe), or the way in which Iraq's foreign policy over the years has affected its standing and role within the Gulf (Ghareeb). Apart from this kind of information, however, the book offers little real insight into the situation in Iraq, even for the limited purpose of contributing to 'the understanding needed for constructive US policy choices vis-à-vis Iraq'.

In general, the book reads as if its main intention was not to inform US policymakers but rather to placate, or at least not to upset, the Iraqi government. None of the articles contains any statements openly critical either of the Ba'th or of Saddam Husain. This becomes particularly obvious in Dawisha's contribution, in which those familiar with the recent history of Iraq will be surprised to read that 'by 1963, [the Ba'th Party] had gained enough strength to take control of the government . . .' and later that 'its underground activities . . . continued to grow until July 1968 when the party engineered a series of coups that established it as the core political organisation in the country' (pp 21–2). In reality, a very small conspiratorial Ba'th group took power in Iraq in February 1963 through a particularly savage and bloody military coup, whose success could in no sense be attributed to the Ba'th's being a 'major political force'. Its subsequent resumption of power in 1968 was also achieved by means of a military coup, and was not a reflection either of its 'underground activities' or of a build-up of anything remotely resembling popular support.

More recently, the principal method used by Saddam Husain to maintain himself in power has been the physical elimination of all real or potential opponents; some of his closest friends and comrades were executed out of hand in July 1979 when they appeared to stand in the way of his assumption of total power. Dawisha refers to this episode in somewhat disingenuous terms: 'By the time he had assumed presidency in 1979, in the process ruthlessly ridding himself of any possible danger to his authority, Hussain had achieved a position of clear dominance over the party' (p 23). It is scarcely possible that Dawisha should not be aware of the extent of torture, execution and imprisonment without trial that has characterised so much of Ba'th rule over the last two decades which he conceals behind such generalities as 'ruthlessness' or 'coercion'. Although Dawisha's contribution seems particularly marked by such evasiveness, this tone of bland over-optimism, itself all too familiar from much recent writing on contemporary Iraq, pervades the whole book and limits its usefulness accordingly.

MARION FAROUQ SLUGLETT

Institute of Development Studies, Leiden University

Forbidden Agendas: Intolerance and Defiance in the Middle East

Edited by Jon Rothschild

London: Al Saqi Books. 1984. 400pp. £6.95pb

This is a collection of eighteen articles that have previously appeared in the journal Khamsin. Khamsin was founded in 1975 by a group of anti-Zionist Israelis and Arabs who, in their own words, were 'united in their socialist vision and their opposition to economic exploitation, political domination, and social oppression. [The journal is] independent of all organised political tendencies, it is a forum for discussion of all the crucial issues of Middle East politics.'

Forbidden Agendas is organised into thematic sections including: Israel's Oriental subjects, Women, the Civil War in Lebanon, Religion, and 'A Dialogue'. The latter is a discussion between Moshe Machover and Said Hammami about the future possibilities for Arabs and Jews to live as equals in Palestine. It is a thoughtful and authentic attempt to come to grips with the multiple issues that must be sorted out and resolved before the two peoples can live together. It is also a fitting conclusion to a volume that provides a variety of perspectives on the most important questions confronting the region.

The articles are basically well-written and provocative, though there is some unevenness in quality. They are informed by the central concerns of Khamsin as stated above. One of the most interesting essays is Sadiq Jalal al'Azm's 'Orientalism and Orientalism in reverse', in which the author examines Edward Said's well-known perspective on Orientalism. It is a stimulating and thought-provoking piece; one only wishes that a rejoinder by Said was part of the collection. The point/counterpoint by Emmanuel Farjoun and Avishai Ehrlich on Oriental Jewish support for Menachem Begin is particularly useful.

It is enormously refreshing to find a book (and a journal) in which progressive Arabs and Jews are struggling to deal with such compelling issues. I would highly recommend Forbidden Agendas to all—scholars, students, and citizens—who are interested in the Middle East. While there will be many who will dismiss this work with the labels of 'radical', 'ideological', 'biased', etc. that conventional or mainstream political scientists, sociologists and journalists use to discredit ideas that do not conform to the dominant, orthodox ideas and to generally accepted conventional wisdom; there is nevertheless a truth in these pages that those who know the region will be forced to recognise. It is not even necessary to share the socialist vision to appreciate the value of the analyses in this volume, eg the subordinate place of the Oriental in Ashkenazi-dominated Israel, the negative role that religions play in the political processes throughout the Middle East, the oppression of women in the region, and so on. This book deserves to be widely read and thoroughly considered.

BOOK REVIEWS

CHERYL A RUBENBERG

Florida International University

Understanding Indonesia

Edited by Leslie Palmier

London: Gower. 1975. 113pp. £13.50

An up-to-date introduction to Indonesia both for academics and for professionals who intend to work in Indonesia is long overdue. In the 1960s the obvious book to turn to was the one edited by Ruth McVey entitled Indonesia. Since then there has been nothing comparable to keep us up to date, although there have been useful books by Polomka (Indonesia Since Sukarno) and McDonald (Suharto's Indonesia). Understanding Indonesia, then, could potentially have provided a useful service. Unfortunately, it does not live up to such expectations.

The text consists of an introduction by Palmier, chapters by Demaine and Walton on the economy, a chapter by Palmier on 'National integration', one on 'Drama and society' by Angela Hobart, and one by Michael Leifer on 'Attitudes to the world' (which seems to be a précis of his book on Indonesian foreign policy). The range of subjects covered in the book is, therefore, limited and it is difficult to see the readership for which it is intended. Business people going out to Indonesia will find the articles by Demaine and Walton useful, in so far as they contain a considerable amount of information, and reading them will save the reader the trouble of going over the relevant issues of the Bulletin of Indonesian Economic Studies and the Far Eastern Economic Review from which the information is largely derived. Angela Hobart's article is interesting but limited to one or two specific forms of theatre in Java and Bali. Leifer's article sketches some of the principal considerations but is too brief to do anything but skim the surface.

The most disappointing feature of the book is the omissions and inaccuracies. Readers who wish to know something about the Indonesia government's human rights record, or the political problems arising from the invasion of East Timor, or the implementation of the transmigration policy in West Iran will find nothing to enlighten them. Palmier's account of national integration gives a misleading impression of the current educational system, and the writer seems unaware of the changes which have occurred in the last ten years. A further irritating aspect of the book is the tendency of the writers to stray from their brief and, in their asides, misleading the reader. Examples of this are Demaine's remarks concerning the coup of 1965 and Leifer's comments on Sukarno and Pancasila. All in all, then, the book represents a lost opportunity. Even the suggestions for further reading, a mere six titles with no comment on them, are inadequate. Anyone wishing to understand Indonesia is therefore advised to look elsewhere.

WILLIAM BODDY

London

An Indian Rural Economy 1880-1955: The Tamilnad Countryside

Christopher John Baker

Oxford: Clarendon Press. 1984. 616pp. n/p

Do not be misled by the book's title. While it is an academic monograph elaborating and extending Baker and David Washbrook's work on the Madras Presidency, it is more than that. What was to become the Tamil Nadu province of India had, in 1950, a larger population than any country—or colony—in Africa or, with the exception of Brazil, the Latin America which has dominated the literature on (under-) development. Aiming at economists and social scientists as well as historians, Baker makes a fine contribution to the study of the colonial economy and its links with the present. After a lengthy but lucid prologue on the history of rural Tamilnad which makes the work accessible to any reader, the author deals in five substantive chapters with colonial trade, agriculture, markets, towns and the state and countryside. Space precludes detailed comment here beyond noting that it is not just, as one would expect, erudite but lively; and, like the Cambridge Economic History of India, has some of the qualities of a great intellectual detective story. For those who are too busy keeping up with work on peasants in their own bailiwick, the Introduction and Conclusion are strongly recommended. The opening eighteen pages offer a splendid review of the battlefield: dependency, mode of production and like with some affectionate side-swipes at historical materialists with no sense of history, who see the pre-British period as some kind of changeless Dark Ages, and anti-colonialists who colonise Indian history from the steppes of Russia or the plains of Eastern Europe. The themes are announced and, in the Conclusion, revisited: pre-colonial history constrained the Raj and beyond; small-scale agriculture pre-empted capitalist farming in the south; since the early nineteenth century it has been the state rather than the individual farmer which has sown the seeds of progress. The legacy of colonialism in Tamilnad and in India has been not so much the emergence of a dominating rich peasantry in the countryside as the development of a powerful and purposive state. The state used the rural rich more than vice versa. Finally, the logic of state intervention has been to preserve and extend the society of small producers which is the foundation of the region's economy and history, before and after independence. If historians have come to appreciate structure, social scientists must surely respect and learn from history of this calibre.

T J NOSSITER

London School of Economics

Gift of The Devil: A History of Guatemala

Jim Hardy

Toronto: Between The Lines. 1985. 319pp. $25.95. $12.95pb

BOOK REVIEWS

The 'Gift of the Devil' in the title is a reference both to a Mayan description of the arrival of the Spanish in the sixteenth century and to the brutal entry of the Guatemalan military into the Indian highlands in the late 1970s and 1980s, when, according to the author, 'Guatemalan peasants endured a level of violence that far surpassed any experienced since the first days of the conquest.' It is hard to disagree when it is now known that as a result of army counter-insurgency operations from 1980 to 1985 between 45,000 and 60,000 Indians were killed, 440 villages destroyed, and at least half-a-million Indians forced to flee to Mexico or live as internal refugees within the country. The aptness of the title and the strength of the book lie in the emphasis put on the historical roots to what is only the most recent attempt by outside invaders to control both Indian land and the Indian population as a cheap source of labour (indeed, some Indian survivors of the repression have ascribed the army massacres to 'los españoles from the city').

In general, the author succeeds in carrying out his main aim of 'making the Guatemala of the 1980s understandable through an examination of its history'. Although some of the summary paragraphs at the beginning and end of each chapter tend to be too reductionist, the main elements for understanding the present crisis are treated in an accessible and interesting style that makes the book an invaluable source of information and analysis for both the specialist and the student. The author seems right to play down the role of US policy in understanding the dynamics of Guatemalan politics (except in the case of the overthrow of Arbenz in 1954), and instead to concentrate on the distorted nature of Guatemalan capitalist development, the increased pressure on available land, the political suffocation resulting from a series of fixed elections and the rebirth of popular organisations addressing the country's racial divide as the essential ingredients that launched Guatemala into a full-scale civil war by the end of the 1970s.

Chapter ten on 'the economy and highland peasantry' is a particularly useful overview of the way in which Guatemala's impressive economic growth in the 1960s and 1970s only benefited a tiny agro-export elite, while over the same period the majority of highland peasants who form the cheap labour on the plantations actually became poorer in absolute terms. The author's conclusion that 'there can be no workable democracy until the coercive power of the local landowning elite, supported by the military, is destroyed through a substantial, broadly encompassing agrarian reform' (p 279), is a timely reminder that unless the recently-elected Christian Democrat government confronts the landed oligarchy, the December 1985 elections will only repeat the pattern set by previous elections of legitimising the socio-economic status quo.

The most obvious weakness of the book is its rather two-dimensional portrayal of the competing forces in the civil war. The text is dogged by the underlying assumption that the revolutionary Left is powerful and unified, while the Right is rapacious, repressive and faction-ridden. When the author writes, '(by 1982 the Guatemalan bourgeoisie and government) were tenuously held together by the national military which itself was rife with factions. Meanwhile, the popular forces that opposed the government forged strong and dynamic organisations that sought common goals through effective cooperation' (p 254), one wonders why the Left is at present confined to the hinterland and not installed in the National Palace. Handy's tendency to stress the similarities between the four guerrilla organisations is matched by his understating the military and political capacity of the armed forces. This weakness may be ascribed to the fact that much of the book seems to have been written in 1983 at a time when the Left and the majority of writing on the Left was still infused with a good deal of triumphalism, but the text would certainly have been enriched by more indication of the major differences between the guerrilla organisations, which some observers claim were an important factor in their temporary setback.

However, in general, the author's sympathetic treatment of the Left and outrage at the army's atrocities do not mean that the general tone of the text degenerates into becoming a denunciatory tract. On the contrary, Gift of The Devil is a thoughtful and extremely useful background reader and acts as an important reminder of the urgent need to understand the indigenous roots of Central America's least publicised civil war before yet more Indians are wiped out in the name of fighting communism.

JAMES PAINTER

Latin America Bureau, London

BOOK NOTES

Namibia

Stanley Schoeman and Elna Schoeman
Oxford: Clio Press. 1984. 186pp. n/p

The Yemens: The Yemen Arab Republic and the People's Republic of Yemen

G Rex Smith
Oxford: Clio Press. 1984. 161pp. £20.75

The World Bibliographical Series aims to cover eventually every country in the world, with a format that provides for everything from flora, fauna and resources to international relations. Prime space is allocated to the section on 'Politics and the International Status Issue' in the Namibia volume, which includes major cases before the International Court of Justice, the status of Walvis Bay, human rights issues and the role of the churches.

The politics section of The Yemens regrettably numbers only ten pages and lists very few titles recent to the book's publication date. Nevertheless, a commendable effort to bring together documentation of an all-too-neglected area of study, and a reference tool that should be on every Middle Eastern scholar's bookshelf. In their systematic annotation of anthropological, cultural and social science documentation, the compilers of both bibliographies have rendered an invaluable service to the specialist seeking guidance on further sources of information.

World Resources 1986: An Assessment of the Resource Base that Supports the Global Economy

The World Resources Institute/International Institute for Environment and Development
London: Harper and Row. New York: Basic Books. 1986. 353pp. £11.95pb

No expense has been spared (£400,000) in putting together the first edition of this yearbook. Emphasis is placed on population growth as a major factor to be related to the four sections of the volume: world resource perspectives, reviews, issues and data tables. The compilers' commendable industry in bringing together so much essential information in one volume ensures that this inventory will appeal not only to the specialist and the policy-maker, but also to the general reader.

Parliaments of the World: A Comparative Reference Compendium

Volumes 1 and 2
Inter-Parliamentary Union
Aldershot, England: Gower. 1986. 721pp. £65.00

This publication covers 50 per cent more parliaments than the previous edition, which was published in 1976. Eighty-three parliaments are described as they existed at 30 June 1985. The information was extracted from a questionnaire sent to all of the 142 Parliaments of sovereign states throughout the world, and also from documents at the Inter-Parliamentary Union's International Centre for Parliamentary Documentation.

The present edition contains fifteen sections each of which deals with some major aspect of the structure, powers or procedure of Parliament. These sections are broad—Parliamentary Procedure, Proceedings and Debates, Parliamentary Committees, Parliaments and the Media and so on. Each of the forty-seven chapters is illustrated by a comparative table giving basic data on each of the eighty-three parliaments. The statistics displayed serve to bring out important similarities and differences between the various parliamentary systems, and as such are a valuable tool of reference.

The Cambridge Encyclopedia of Latin America and the Caribbean

Edited by Simon Collier, Harold Blakemore and Thomas E Skidmore
Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1985. 456pp. £25.00

A sizeable proportion of this volume is devoted to Latin American and Caribbean culture, taking in languages, literature, music, visual arts, theatre, cinema, the media and science. This complements the remaining sections on physical environment, economy, peoples, history, politics and society. The result is recommended reading for the businessman, undergraduate, art historian and well-read traveller alike.

The Political Economy of Namibia: An Annotated Critical Bibliography

Tore Linne Eriksen with Richard Moorsom
Uppsala, Sweden: The Scandinavian Institute of African Studies. 1985. 423pp. n/p

This must be one of the most extensive bibliographies on Namibia to date, covering as it does the political past and present of Namibia. Its fifteen main sections include the pre-colonial era, German and purported South African rule and then the struggle for liberation, thus setting the tone for the ensuing sections on the Namibian economy, peasant society and migrant labour, women, education, culture, health and Namibia's international relations. Although much work has been published on the country since 1985, this bibliography still deserves to be recommended. A great deal of careful work has gone into annotating sources from several languages. Indispensable are the pages listing other bibliographies and periodicals on the country.

Encyclopedia of World Problems and Human Potential

Edited by Union of International Associations
London: K G Saur. 1986. 1439pp. £123.00

BOOK NOTES

This volume is intended to be a comprehensive sourcebook on recognised world problems, their interconnections, and the organisational and conceptual resources available to respond to them. The editors argue that by representing fundamentally incompatible viewpoints within the same context, readers will be encouraged to discover new approaches to understanding and action sufficiently complex to encompass the factions, conflicts and world views by which people are separated.

As much conceptual as factual, World Problems and Human Potential allocates relatively little space to classic 'mega-problems' such as over-population, nuclear war, resource depletion and hunger. More space is given to the thousands of less widely-acknowledged problems, which are claimed to compose or sustain these 'mega-problems' through a network of the 17,000 aggravating and alleviating relationships indicated in the book. Also included are the unforeseen stumbling blocks to the success of remedial projects. Problems described include: excessive public debt, acid rain, soil erosion, cruelty to children, juvenile suicide, discrimination against women in education, limited acceptance of international treaties, judicial error, incompetence, loneliness and permissiveness.

A navigational guide to the reader needing philosophical and perceptual perspectives, as well as contextual information, on the identification and solution of world problems.

Our Namibia: A Social Studies Textbook

Henning Melber

London: Zed Press. 1986. 167pp. £18.95. £6.95pb

Strangers in Their Own Country: A Curriculum Guide on South Africa

William Bigelow

Trenton, New Jersey: Africa World Press. 1985. 92pp. $14.95pb

Our Namibia is the result of a cooperative project between the Social and Educational Division of the UN Institute for Namibia and the University of Bremen. A textbook for upper primary and lower secondary classes, this pioneering book is described by project members Hinz and Modise as 'the very first Namibian school book compiled by Namibians for Namibians'. The progression from the political geography of Part One to the social experiences of today and learning for the future in Part Three guide the young Namibian pupil—young in years but no doubt much older in suffering—through a learning and questioning process to a sound grasp of national self-respect and identity. Tasks set include: 'What do you think justifies characterising our country's present economic structure as a colonial one?', followed by: 'List the kind of employment of people you know' and 'Where do you think the priorities for an independent economic development lie?'. A resourcefully designed tool that will either be recommended for inspiration to self-determination or dismissed as propaganda.

Strangers in Their Own Country is a lesson-by-lesson handbook for educating the non-South African student on what it is like to live in South Africa. Materials recommended include fact sheets, biographies, fiction and simulation situations, all designed to bring the pupil to an awareness of the oppression of a majority by minority that is the system of apartheid. One hopes that such books—along with multi-cultural and anti-racist educational resources—will eventually overcome the opposition they face, in the struggle for curriculum time in white and mixed-race classrooms.

HURIDOCs Standard Formats for the Recording and Exchange of Information on Human Rights

Bjørn Stormorken with Annie McMorris

Utrecht, Netherlands: Martinus Nijhoff. 1985. 175pp. n/p

Information about human rights is hard to obtain, difficult to disseminate and yet essential to the protection and promotion of all human rights. In the countries of the South, resources tend to be concentrated largely in the hands of a few, mainly governments and multinational corporations. The absence of information retrieval and transmission facilities has hampered human rights groups as has the lack of agreed formats for the recording and retrieving of information. Those who have the resources and technology have a vested interest in withholding such information from the open market.

The Human Rights Information and Documentation System (HURIDOCs) is a universal network of non-governmental organisations, institutes, academics and activists concerned with information on and about human rights. These Standard Formats are the result of the two years' endeavour of Executive Consultant Bjørn Stormorken, to develop a set of bibliographical and documentation control tools to bring about a higher degree of standardisation and compatibility between organisations handling human rights information. It is hoped that these guidelines will enhance the exchange of information, and thus enable a more effective division of labour within the human rights network as a whole.

The next stage in HURIDOCs' programme is a referral data base on human rights organisations and their documentation holdings.

Directory of African Technology Institutions. Volumes I and II

Compiled by J C Woillet and M Allal

Geneva: International Labour Office. 1985. 619pp. SF 65pb

The number of centres dealing with appropriate technology has more than doubled over the last ten years, increasing from approximately 500 to over 1,000 between 1970 and 1980. The renewed interest in appropriate technology has resulted in the establishment of several regional technology centres such as the Regional Centre for Technology Transfer (RCTT) established in Bangalore by the UN, or the African Regional Centre for Technology (ARCT) in Dakar, set up by the Organisation of African Unity and the UN.

The directory lists the whole spectrum of public and private institutions, from university centres, technical departments of ministries, and research institutes, to rural development agencies, and handicraft promotion centres. The criteria for inclusion are long-term programmes of work in the development and adaptation of local or imported technologies, and a capacity to disseminate these technologies and to exchange information with institutions in the region.

BOOK NOTES

The compilers of these two volumes have rendered an invaluable service to the promotion of Third World technology.

Cities of the World: Second Edition, Volumes 1, 2, 3 and 4

Edited by Margaret Walsh Young and Susan L Stetler

Detroit, Michigan: Gale Research Company. 1985. 3056pp. $235.00

Cities of the World: Second Edition Supplement

Edited by Margaret Walsh Young and Susan L Stetler

Detroit, Michigan: Gale Research Company. 1986. 758pp. $84.00

This guide offers information more pertinent than a geography book or a travel guide. Its five volumes give encyclopedic coverage to the social, cultural, political and industrial aspects of 2,400 cities in 137 countries. Maps and photographs illustrate each capital city, and information is easily found under categories such as Population, Government, Recreation, Schools for Foreigners, and so on. Individual volumes cover Africa; the Western Hemisphere (exclusive of the USA); Europe and the Mediterranean Middle East; Asia, the Pacific and the Asiatic Middle East; and a supplement provides an update on the four volumes a year after publication.

Cities of the World is doubtlessly a valuable source of information for the independent traveller, and the elementary researcher. But whether it could claim to be a comprehensive guide to the world's urban settlements is debatable. Gale Research has compiled this guide largely from 'Post Reports' issued by the US Department of State or its diplomatic personnel. Accompanying the volume's publication is the announcement that 'Countries where the United States has no embassy or consulates are not included . . . as there are no "Post Reports" issued for cities in those countries; and travel there by Americans is strongly discouraged.' This guide is clearly for the exclusive use of the Western traveller.

Western Sahara: A Comprehensive Bibliography

Lynn F Sipe

New York: Garland Publishing. 1984. 418pp. n/p

Over six thousand entries ensure that this is probably the most comprehensive bibliography on the Western Sahara, and a storehouse of treatises and documents on the last hundred years' history of the region. There is annotation of newspaper articles, dissertations, government documents, maps, yearbooks and conference proceedings, as well as the standard medium of books and journals. The four sections deal with physical and human characteristics, Spanish colonisation, international legal aspects of decolonisation and sovereignty, and the struggle for the Western Sahara.

Political Handbook of the World

Edited by Arthur S Banks

New York: Center for Social Analysis, University of New York at Binghamton. 1986. 805pp. n/p

Now nearing its sixtieth anniversary, the Political Handbook of the World contains information on the constitutional development, political parties and current issues of every country, as well as information on the legislatures, cabinets, foreign policies and intergovernmental representation. It also carries basic data and a short country profile.

Over 100 pages have been allocated to intergovernmental organisations. During 1985-86, no newly independent territory entered the community of nations; the most recent addition being that of Aruba to the Netherlands Antilles as a locally autonomous component of the Kingdom of the Netherlands. Although neither the Polisario Front nor the South West African People's Organisation of Namibia qualify for entry, the Palestine Liberation Organisation occupies its own separate category between the two main sections. This special treatment is, according to the editor, due to the PLO's importance in Middle Eastern affairs. The Intergovernmental Representation category is unfortunately mostly limited to representation to the USA and the UN.

Biographical Dictionary of Marxism

Edited by Robert A Gorman

London: Mansell. 1986. 388pp. n/p

Biographical Dictionary of Neo-Marxism

Edited by Robert A Gorman

London: Mansell. 1985. 461pp. n/p

The Biographical Dictionary of Marxism contains essays on a worldwide selection of 210 Marxist philosophers and activists. In concentrating on philosophy and strategy, Professor Gorman has chosen to adopt a broad definition of materialism. Limitations of narrow geographical and temporal interests have thus been by-passed, and the result is an extensive coverage of Third World Marxists, whose contributions have redefined Marxism in terms of post-colonial liberation struggles throughout the world. A compelling combination of the 'orthodox' and 'unorthodox' has been achieved.

The Biographical Dictionary of Neo-Marxism complements the former volume by encompassing non-traditional philosophical variations of its Marxist theory. Whereas the first dictionary deals with materialist Marxist thinkers, this tome surveys proponents of non-materialist thought, and evinces an equally sophisticated and rigorous approach on the part of its contributors.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS

BOOKS*

- Al-Rahmin, Muddathir Abd, Badal, Raphael, Hardallo, Adlan and Woodward, Peter (eds): Sudan since Independence. Aldershot, England: Gower. 1987. 181pp. £19.50hb.
- Abdulghani, Jasim M: Iraq and Iran: the Years of Crisis. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 270pp. £15.00hb.
- Abel, Christopher and Torrents, Nissa (eds): Jose Marti: Revolutionary Democrat. London: Athlone Press. 1986. 238pp. n/p.
- Akiner, Shirin: Islamic Peoples of the Soviet Union. London: Kegan Paul International. 1986. 462pp. n/p.
- Anderson, Lisa: The State and Social Transformation in Tunisia and Libya, 1830-1980. Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press. 1986. 325pp. £23.40hb.
- Alegria, Claribel: They Won't Take me Alive: Salvadorean Women in the Struggle for International Liberation. London: Women's Press. 1986. 145pp. £3.95pb.
- Anant, Suchitra, Rao, S V Ramani and Kapoor, Kabita: Women at Work in India: A Bibliography. London: Sage. 1986. 238pp. £16.50hb.
- Arap Moi, Daniel T: Kenya African Nationalism: Nyayo Philosophy and Principles. London: Macmillan. 1986. 192pp. £5.95hb/£2.95pb.
- Baark, Erik and Jamison, Andrew (eds): Technological Development in China, India and Japan: Cross-Cultural Perspectives. London: Macmillan. 1986. 263pp. £30.00hb.
- Barnes, Sandra T: Patrons and Power: Creating a Political Community in Metropolitan Lagos. Manchester, England: Manchester University Press for the International African Institute. 1986. 261pp. £29.50hb.
- Behbehani, Hashim S H: The Soviet Union and Arab Nationalism, 1917-1966. London: Kegan Paul International. 1986. 252pp. £29.95hb.
- Beck, Lois: The Qashqa'i of Iran. London: Yale University Press. 1986. 384pp. £30.00hb.
- Beckford, George, Davies, Omar, Ford-Smith, Honor, Hodge, Merle, Lamming, George, Manley, Michael, Nettleford, Rex, Nurse, Lawrence, Stone, Carl and Thomas, C Y: A Caribbean Reader on Development. Kingston, Jamaica: Friedrich Ebert Stiftung. 1986. 217pp. n/p.
- Black, Jan Knippers: The Dominican Republic: Politics and Development in an Unsovereign State. London: Unwin and Hyman. 1986. 163pp. £22.95hb/£7.95pb.
- Black, Maggie: The Children and the Nations: The Story of UNICEF. New York: UNICEF. 1986. 502pp. $21.95hb.
- Blaikie, Piers and Brookfield, Harold: Land Degradation and Society. London: Methuen. 1986. 296pp. £10.95pb.
- Brewer, John D: After Soweto: An Unfinished Journey. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 1987. 448pp. £35.00hb.
- Bridges, Brian: Korea and the West. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul with Royal Institute of International Affairs. 1986. 101pp. £5.95pb.
- Buszynski, Leszek: Soviet Foreign Policy and Southeast Asia. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 301pp. £25.00hb.
- Chadha, G K: The State and Rural Economic Transformation: The Case of Punjab 1950-85. London and New Delhi: Sage. 1986. 369pp. £21.50hb.

* This is a list of books that have been received by Third World Quarterly for review; they are not available for sale through Third World Quarterly.

- Chan, Anita, Madsen, Richard and Unger, Jonathan: Chen Village: The Recent History of a Peasant Community in Mao's China. Berkeley, California and London: University of California Press. 1986. 293pp. £7.50pb.
- Clay, Jason W and Holcomb, Bonnie K: Politics and the Ethiopian Famine 1984-1985. Cambridge, Massachusetts: Cultural Survival. 1986. 237pp. $9.95pb.
- Croll, Elisabeth: Food Supply in China and the Nutritional Status of Children. Geneva: United Nations Research Institute for Social Development and United Nations Children's Fund. 1986. 111pp. n/p.
- Dallmeyer, Dorinda G (ed): The Strategic Defense Initiative: New Perspectives on Deterrence. Boulder, Colorado: Westview (Distributed in the UK by IPI). 1986. 112pp. £24.00hb/£10.00pb.
- Davis, Uri: Israel: An Apartheid State. London: Zed. 1987. 145pp. £28.95hb/£7.95pb.
- Dietz, James L: Economic History of Puerto Rico: Institutional Change and Capitalist Development. Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press. 1986. 337pp. n/p.
- Economist Intelligence Unit: The World in 1987. London: Economist Publications. 1986. 130pp. £2.95pb.
- El-Ashker, Ahmed Abdel-Fattah: The Islamic Business Enterprise. London: Croom Helm. 1987. 242pp. £35.00hb.
- Ellis, Pat (ed): Women of the Caribbean. London: Zed. 1987. 165pp. £19.95hb/£6.95pb.
- El Mallakh, Ragaei: The Economic Development of the Yemen Arab Republic. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 196pp. £22.50hb.
- Entelis, John P: Algeria: The Revolution Institutionalised. Boulder, Colorado: Westview (Distributed in the UK by IPI) and London: Croom Helm. 1986. 239pp. £22.50hb.
- Europa Publications: Africa South of the Sahara 1987. London: Europa Publications. 1986. 1141pp. £65.00hb.
- Falola, Toyin: Britain and Nigeria: Exploitation or Development? London: Zed. 1987. 250pp. £22.95hb/£7.95pb.
- Faris, Nahi (ed): Arab Nationalism and the Future of the Arab World. Belmont, Massachusetts: Association of Arab-American University Graduates. 1986. 159pp. n/p.
- Ferrari, Paul L, Knopf, Jeffrey W, and Madrid, Raul L: US Arms Exports: Policies and Contractors. Washington DC: Investor Responsibility Research Center. 1987. 342pp. n/p.
- Galli, Rosemary and Jones, Jocelyn: Guinea-Bissau: Politics, Economics and Society. London: Frances Pinter and Boulder, Colorado: Lynne Rienner. 1986. 217pp. £6.95pb.
- Gibbs, James (ed): A Handbook for African Writers. London and Munich: Hans Zell. 1986. 218pp. n/p.
- Griffith-Jones, Stephany and Sunkel, Osvaldo: Debt and Development Crises in Latin America: The End of an Illusion. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 1986. 201pp. £20.00hb.
- Guess, George M: The Politics of United States Foreign Aid. London: Croom Helm. 1987. 297pp. £27.50hb.
- Halevi, Ilan: A History of the Jews. London: Zed. 1987. 258pp. £7.95pb.
- Hansen, Art and Macmillan, Della E (eds): Food in Sub-Saharan Africa. London: Frances Pinter. 1986. 410pp. £30.00hb.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS

- Hanson, E Mark: Educational Reform and Administrative Development: The Cases of Colombia and Venezuela. Oxford: Clio Press. 1986. 266pp. £18.35hb.
- Harris, Nigel: The End of the Third World: Newly Industrialising Countries and the Decline of an Ideology. London: I B Tauris. 1986. 231pp. £14.95hb.
- Hayes, Peter, Lyuba, Zarsky and Bello, Walden: American Lake: Nuclear Peril in the Pacific. Harmondsworth: Penguin. 1986. 529pp. £4.95pb.
- Hinchliffe, Keith: Higher Education in Sub-Saharan Africa. London: Croom Helm. 1987. 189pp. £19.95hb.
- International Defence and Aid Fund for Southern Africa: Working Under South African Occupation: Labour in Namibia. London: IDAF. 1987. 56pp. £1.00pb.
- Jackson, Karl and Mungkandi, Wiwat (eds): United States-Thailand Relations. Berkeley, California: Institute of Asian Studies, University of California. 1986. 332pp. $20.00pb.
- Jansen, Erik: Rural Bangladesh: Competition for Scarce Resources. Oxford: Oxford University Press. 1987. 351pp. £25.00hb.
- Jansen, Michael: Dissonance in Zion. London: Zed. 1987. 140pp. £18.95hb/£5.95pb.
- Jasani, Bhupendra (ed): Space Weapons and International Security. Oxford: Oxford University Press and Stockholm: Stockholm International Peace Research Institute. 1987. 366pp. n/p.
- Johnson, Michael: Class and Client in Beirut: the Sunni Muslim Community and the Lebanese State, 1840-1985. London: Ithaca. 1987. 243pp. £18.00hb.
- Jones, Rodney W and Hildreth, Steven A: Emerging Powers: Defence and Security in the Third World. London: Praeger. 1986. 436pp. £40.00hb.
- Kaku, Michio and Axelrod, Daniel: To Win a Nuclear War: The Pentagon's Secret War Plans. London: Zed. 1987. 357pp. £24.95hb/£7.95pb.
- Korn, David A: Ethiopia, the United States and the Soviet Union, 1974-1985. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 199pp. £19.95hb.
- Klein, Heinz Gunther and Nestvogel, Renate: Women in Pakistan. Eschborn, West Germany: Research Institute for International Technical and Economic Cooperation. 1986. 423pp. n/p.
- Lelyveld, Joseph: Move Your Shadow: South Africa, Black and White. London: Sphere. 1987. 390pp. £3.95pb.
- Lewis, Norman N: Nomads and Settlers in Syria and Jordan, 1800-1980. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1987. 249pp. £25.00hb.
- Mannan, M A: Islamic Economics: Theory and Practice. London: Hodder and Stoughton. 1986. 425pp. £12.95hb.
- Maoz, Moshe and Yaniv, Avner (eds): Syria under Assad: Domestic Constraints and Regional Risks. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 273pp. £25.00hb.
- Marnham, Patrick: Fantastic Invasion: Dispatches from Africa. Harmondsworth: Penguin. 1987. 238pp. £3.95pb.
- Marshall, Peter: Cuba Libre: Breaking the Chains? London: Victor Gollancz. 1987. 310pp. £14.95hb.
- Menken, Jane (ed): World Population and US Policy: The Choices Ahead. London: W W Norton. 1987. 255pp. £16.85hb.
- Moinuddin, Hasan: The Charter of the Islamic Conference: the Legal and Economic Framework. Oxford: Clarendon Press. 1987. 322pp. £35.00hb.

- Munck, Ronaldo with Falcon, Ricardo and Galitelli, Bernado: Argentina: from Anarchism to Peronism. London: Zed. 1987. 261pp. £8.95pb.
- Nakhleh, Emile A: The Gulf Cooperation Council: Policies, Problems and Prospects. London: Praeger. 1986. 128pp. n/p.
- Netton, Ian Richard (ed): Arabia and the Gulf: From Traditional Society to Modern States. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 259pp. £29.95hb.
- Onimode, Bade, Magubane, Bernard, Wolpe, Harold, Makamure, Kempton, Mahmoud, Fatima Babikar, Bathily, Abdoulaye and Nzongola-Ntalaja: Africa's Crisis. London: Institute for African Alternatives. 1987. 95pp. n/p.
- Orkin, Mark: Disinvestment, the Struggle and the Future: What Black Africans Really Think. Johannesburg: Ravan Press (Distributed in the UK by Third World Publications). 1986. 87pp. £5.50pb.
- Petersen, Kirsten Holst and Rutherford, Anna (eds): A Double Colonization: Colonial and Post-Colonial Women's Writing. London: Dangaroo Press. 1986. 188pp. £8.95pb.
- Peterson, M J: The General Assembly in World Politics. London: Unwin and Hyman. 1986. 320pp. n/p.
- Qunta, Christine (ed): Women in Southern Africa. London: Allison and Busby. 1987. 256pp. £5.95pb.
- Rais, Rasul B: The Indian Ocean and the Superpowers. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 215pp. £25.00hb.
- Guha, Ranajit (ed): Subaltern Studies IV, Writings on South Asian History and Society. Oxford: Oxford University Press. 1987. 383pp. £16.50hb.
- Randolph, R Sean: The United States and Thailand: Alliance Dynamics, 1950-1985. Berkeley, California: Institute of East Asian Studies, University of California. 1986. 226pp. $15.00pb.
- Research Institute for Peace and Security, Tokyo: Asian Security 1986. London: Brassey's. 1986. 204pp. £19.15hb/£9.95pb.
- Roach, James R (ed): India 2,000: The Next Fifteen Years. Riverdale, Maryland: Riverdale (Distributed in the UK by Lavis Marketing). 1986. 230pp. £21.95hb.
- Robertson, A F: The Dynamics of Productive Relationships: African Share Contracts in Comparative Perspective. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1987. 321pp. £25.00hb.
- Robertson, R T: The Making of the Modern World: An Introductory History. London: Zed. 1987. 212pp. £21.95hb/£6.95pb.
- Rose, Leo E and Husain, Noor A (eds): United States-Pakistan Relations. Berkeley, California: Institute of East Asian Studies, University of California. 1986. 270pp. £19.50pb.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A: Israel and the American National Interest: A Critical Examination. Champaign, Illinois: University of Illinois Press. 1986. 446pp. $24.95hb.
- Rushdie, Salman: The Jaguar Smile: A Nicaraguan Journey. London: Picador. 1987. 171pp. £2.95pb.
- Safarian, A E and Bertin, Giles Y (ed): Multinationals, Government and International Technology Transfer. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 223pp. n/p.
- Salem, Norma: Habib Bourguiba, Islam and the Creation of Tunisia. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 270pp. £19.95hb.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS

- Sampson, Anthony: Black and Gold: Tycoons, Revolutionaries and Apartheid. London: Hodder and Stoughton. 1987. 280pp. £12.95hb.
- Saunders, Alan J K: Mongolia: Politics, Economics and Society. London: Frances Pinter and Boulder, Colorado: Lynne Rienner. 1987. 179pp. £6.95pb.
- Scalapino, Robert A, Sato, Seizaburo and Wanandi, Jusuf (eds): Internal and External Security Issues in Asia. Berkeley, California: Institute of East Asian Studies, University of California. 1986. 273pp. n/p.
- Scalapino, Robert A and Sung-joo, Han (eds): United States-Korea Relations. Berkeley, California: Institute of East Asian Studies, University of California. 1986. 226pp. $20.00pb.
- Schulman, Marshall D (ed): East-West Tensions in the Third World. London: W W Norton. 1986. 243pp. £14.95hb/£5.75pb.
- Selber, Irwin: Kampuchea: The Revolution Rescued. Oakland, California: Line of March. 1986. 145pp. n/p.
- Sender, John and Smith, Sheila: The Development of Capitalism in Africa. London: Methuen. 1986. 177pp. n/p.
- Siegel, Paul N: The Meek and the Militant: Religion and Power Across the World. London: Zed. 1987. 229pp. £21.95hb/£6.95pb.
- Siriwardena, R (ed): Equality and the Religious Traditions of Asia. London: Frances Pinter. 1987. 173pp. £18.50hb.
- Skalnes, Tor and Egeland, Jan (eds): Human Rights in Developing Countries 1986: A Yearbook on Countries Receiving Norwegian Aid. Oslo: Norwegian University Press. 1986. 312pp. n/p.
- Skarstein, Rune and Wangwe, Samuel M: Industrial Development in Tanzania: Some Critical Issues. Dar es Salaam, Tanzania: Scandinavian Institute of African Studies. 1986. 291pp. n/p.
- Smollan, Roy (ed): Black Advancement in the South African Economy. London: Macmillan. 1987. 256pp. £27.50hb.
- Soloman, Richard H and Kosaka, Masataka (eds): The Soviet Far East Military Build-up: Nuclear Dilemmas and Asian Security. London: Croom Helm and Dover, Massachusetts: Auburn House. 1986. 301pp. £25.00hb.
- Somerville, Carolyn M: Drought and Aid in the Sahel: A Decade of Development Cooperation. Boulder, Colorado: Westview (Distributed in the UK by IPI). 1986. 306pp. n/p.
- Spinanger, Dean: Industrialisation Policies and Regional Economic Development in Malaysia. Oxford: Oxford University Press. 1986. 197pp. £18.00hb.
- Stone, Carl: Class, State and Democracy in Jamaica. London: Praeger. 1986. 198pp. £29.75hb.
- Strom, Gabriele Winai: Migration and Development: Dependence on South Africa: A Study of Lesotho. Uppsala: Scandinavian Institute of African Studies. 1986. 171pp. SEK 80pb.
- Swaminathan, M S: Food 2000: Global Policies for Sustainable Agriculture. London: Zed. 1987. 131pp. n/p.
- Tapp, Nicholas: The Hmong of Thailand: Opium People of the Golden Triangle. London: Anti-Slavery Society. 1986. 72pp. £4.95pb.
- Tussie, Diana: The Less Developed Countries and the World Trading System: A Challenge to the GATT. London: Frances Pinter. 1986. 162pp. £20.00hb.

- Ungar, Stanford J: Africa: The People and Politics of an Emerging Continent. New York: Touchstone. 1986. 543pp. $10.95pb.
- Vanderlaan, Mary B: Revolution and Foreign Policy in Nicaragua. Boulder, Colorado: Westview (Distributed in the UK by IPI). 1986. 403pp. £25.50pb.
- Williams, Douglas: The Specialized Agencies and the United Nations: The System in Crisis. London: Hurst. 1987. 279pp. £17.50hb.
- Wolf, Margery: Revolution Postponed: Women in Contemporary China. London: Methuen. 1987. 285pp. £6.95pb.
- Woods, Donald: Asking for Trouble: the Autobiography of a Banned Journalist. Harmondsworth: Penguin. 1987. 373pp. £3.95pb.
- Zamosc, Leon: Participation: the Agrarian Question and the Peasant Movement in Colombia. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1986. 289pp. n/p.

PAMPHLETS

- Amnesty International: Torture of Political Prisoners. London: Amnesty International. 1986.
- Bayreuth African Studies Series: The Sudan: Ethnicity and National Cohesion. Bayreuth: University of Bayreuth. 1984.
- Flavin, Christopher: Reassessing Nuclear Power: The Fallout from Chernobyl. Washington DC: Worldwatch Institute. 1987.
- Freeman, John R: The Politics of Indebted Economic Growth. Denver, Colorado: Graduate School of International Studies. 1985.
- Goncalves, Reinaldo and Richtering, Jurgen: Export Performance and Output Growth in Developing Countries. Geneva: United Nations Conference on Trade and Development. 1986.
- Independent Group on British Aid: Missed Opportunities: Britain and the Third World. London: IGBA. 1986.
- International Center for Development Policy: Crime and the Contras: A Summary Report. Washington DC: ICDP. 1987.
- Layton, Christopher with Federal Trust for Education and Research, and International Institute for Environment and Development: Europe and the Global Crisis: A First Exploration of Europe's Potential Contribution to World Order. London: IIED and FTER. 1986.
- Lemco, Jonathan: Canada and Central America: A Review of Current Issues. Toronto: Canadian Institute of International Affairs. 1986.
- Macmillan, Malcolm J (ed): The Third World: Problems and Perspectives. Exeter: International Studies Group, University of Exeter. 1986.
- Muirhead, Bruce: The Wave of the Future? Canada in the Pacific Basin. Toronto: Canadian Institute of International Affairs. 1986.
- Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development: OECD Economic Outlook. Paris: OECD. 1986.
- Scandinavian Instituté of African Studies: The Development Process and Technology: A Case for a Resources Based Development Strategy in Nigeria. Uppsala: SIAS. 1986.
- Sivard, Ruth Leger: World Military and Social Expenditures 1986. Washington DC:

RECENT PUBLICATIONS

- World Priorities (Distributed in the UK by Information on Disarmament Unit, University of Sussex). 1986.
- Socialist International Women: Thirteenth Conference of Socialist International Women. London: SIW. 1986.
- Stanley Foundation: The United Nations: Mission and Mismanagement: Report of the Twenty-First United Nations of the Next Decade Conference. Muscatine, Iowa: Stanley Foundation. 1986.
- Stanley Foundation: US Policy and Radical Regimes: Report of a Vantage Conference. Muscatine, Iowa: Stanley Foundation. 1986.
- Stavenhagen, Rodolfo: Problems and Prospects of Multi-Ethnic States. Tokyo: United Nations University, 1986.
- Swaminathan, M S A: Sustainable Nutrition Security for Africa: Lessons from India. San Francisco: The Hunger Project. 1986.
- United Nations: Approaches for the Practical Attainment of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People. New York: UN for the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People. 1986.
- World Bank: Poverty in Latin America: The Impact of Depression. Washington DC: World Bank. 1986.
- World Health Organisation: WHO Expert Committee on Drug Dependence: 23rd Report. Geneva: WHO. 1987.
- Wolf, Edward C: Beyond the Green Revolution: New Approaches for Third World Agriculture. Washington DC: Worldwatch Institute. 1986.

Who controls Latin America's economy?

Regional Integration: The Latin American Experience, edited by Altal Gashar and including papers by Celso Furtado, Juan Somavia, Enrique Iglesias and Aldo Ferrer, examines three decades of regional integration in Latin America and assesses why it has failed to protect its economies from the worst effects of the world economic crisis.

The book calls for a review of the framework under which regional integration operates and stresses that its success depends upon the will of Latin American governments to regain control over their economies, which they are in danger of losing to Western financial institutions.

Regional Integration ISBN: 0 907962 370

£12.00/US$16.00 (h/b) Members
£16.00/US$21.00 (h/b) Non-Members

Living Within Our Means by Aldo Ferrer is a lucid and candid assessment of why the Argentine economy finds itself in a critical state. He argues that Argentina's inability to resolve its economic crisis is symptomatic of a loss of political will by the government to regain control over its own economic policymaking. His prescription is simple, Argentina must learn to live within its means by developing an economic and social policy suited to its national needs and not the requirements of its foreign banker and creditors.

Living Within Our Means ISBN: 0 907962 378

£5.95/US$ 7.50 (p/b) Members
£7.50/US$10.00 (p/b) Non-Members

REGIONAL INTEGRATION: THE LATIN AMERICAN EXPERIENCE

LIVING WITHIN OUR MEANS
ALDO
FERRER

An examination of the Argentine economic crisis

Distributed in North America by Westview Press, Boulder, Colorado

Order your copy now by filling in the coupon inside this issue. Please allow 28 days for delivery.

Third World Foundation News

1987 Third World Lecture

Bob Geldof, the recipient of the 1986 Third World Prize, awarded in 'recognition of his "extraordinary effort" in helping to relieve famine in Africa', delivered the annual Third World Lecture on Friday, 23 January 1987. The Lecture and prize-giving ceremony were held at the Queen Elizabeth II Conference Centre, London. The 1986 Lecture had been delivered in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia by Dr Oliver Tambo, President of the African National Congress on behalf of the 1985 Prize winners, Winnie and Nelson Mandela.

The Lecture and presentation, the seventh of its kind since the establishment of the Third World Prize in 1980, welcomed as its Guest of Honour Dr Julius K Nyerere, winner of the 1981 Third World Prize, former President of Tanzania and now head of the Independent Commission of the South on Development Issues (see 'Third World Foundation News', Third World Quarterly 9(1) January 1987). The presentation was made by the Secretary-General of the Commonwealth and Chairman of the Third World Prize Selection Committee, Mr Shridath S Ramphal. The opening address was delivered by Mr Altaf Gauhar, Secretary-General of the Third World Foundation.

The Citation prepared by the Third World Prize Selection Committee, composed of Shridath S Ramphal (Chairman), Robert K A Gardiner, Enrique V Iglesias, B K Nehru and Azim Husain (Member-Secretary), is reproduced below with extracts from the address of Altaf Gauhar and Shridath S Ramphal and the speech of Julius Nyerere.

Citation of the Third World Prize Selection Committee

Bob Geldof described his stunned reaction to the television pictures of famine in Ethiopia in these terms: 'I would send some money, I would send more money. But that was not enough. To expiate yourself truly of any complicity in this evil meant you had to give something of yourself.'

Give himself he did, to the exclusion of all else and to the point of exhaustion. The need to act, with all the urgency and energy he could muster, became a moral imperative. That irresistible motivation fired an individual whose creativity and flair had hitherto been confined to the world of rock music; whose idealism lay largely dormant and qualities of leadership undiscovered. From such improbable beginnings came a man and a cause that captured the public imagination of people throughout the world, young and old alike.

His initial aim was to raise money by doing what he knew best—making music. But, in November 1984, he knew that to produce a No. 1 smash hit by Christmas, with a buying public of millions, he had to reach beyond the 'Boomtown Rats', to friends, colleagues and acquaintances across the British pop scene. 'Band-Aid' was born, with a glittering galaxy of stars, and with Bob Geldof's song: 'Do They Know Its Christmas?' It was a good song, but the rush to buy the record soon had little to do with the tune or its singers.

Sales of the Band-Aid single raised millions. But it was followed, in July 1985, by Live-Aid, a 16-hour concert in Wembley Stadium before an audience of 80,000, linked to a parallel event in Philadelphia and watched through global TV coverage by over a billion-and-a-half people. Technically, it was a stunning achievement, but it was also much more. Rock concerts had been dedicated to causes before; individual artists had announced their commitment; the public had watched. But Bob Geldof did more than mount a spectacle—he set in train a movement.

The active ingredients he gathered for Band-Aid sparked off a chain reaction which gathered momentum with Live-Aid and exploded into the mass participation of Sport-Aid. From building a community of artists with Band-Aid, he had created a world-wide community of concerned people. No longer passive spectators, they had become active participants, linked around the globe. Live-Aid not only raised a breathtaking sum for famine relief, it became an unforgettable experience. In Bob Geldof's words: 'Cynicism and greed and selfishness had been eliminated for a moment. It felt good. A lot of people had discovered something in themselves.'

The Sport-Aid 'Race Against Time', held in May 1986, took the process of people's involvement still further. Sponsored jointly by Sport-Aid and UNICEF, and timed to have the maximum impact on the UN debate on Africa which followed, it was preceded by a week of activities across the world. The 10 km run itself was staged simultaneously by thirty million runners around the globe, in over 270 cities and in seventy-eight countries, and through countless unofficial activities which developed spontaneously. Huge numbers, therefore, answered the challenge to 'Run the World' in a massive demonstration of support for Africa.

By the standards of voluntary giving, monumental sums were donated. Band-Aid, Live-Aid and Sport-Aid raised over US$130 million in Europe, North America and elsewhere. Its success helped to swell total donations to UK charities by 25 per cent and donations to international charities as a group were up by a staggering 163 per cent. Most of the income was entirely new money.

Some of the aid has gone to emergency disaster relief and logistics, but the bulk has been devoted to long-term development and rehabilitation in six Sahelian countries: Ethiopia, Sudan, Chad, Mali, Niger and Burkina Faso. Projects have been small-scale and localised—helping those faced with famine with the means to rebuild their lives.

THIRD WORLD FOUNDATION NEWS

The driving force—initiator, organiser and leader—was Bob Geldof, who linked three separate if massive individual efforts and gave them continuity and substance. His insistence that he faced no alternative but to withdraw his consent from what he knew was happening drove him into a mammoth personal crusade against human suffering and human indifference to suffering, with which millions the world over identified. The plight of the Third World had been brought home to people around the globe with an immediacy and a clarity which was compelling.

Bob Geldof's appeal was to people of all ages, but young people in particular, through the medium of rock music, and calling in aid another formidable element of Western popular culture, the mass media. He has described how 'every camera became a symbol of political authority'. 'Band-Aid,' in his own words, 'wrested the political initiative from the parliamentary process into the hands of ordinary people.'

Strengthened as he was by such mass support, Bob Geldof's fierce pride, driving energy and stubborn refusal to compromise, has had a profound impact on governments and on politics. He has met presidents, prime ministers and leaders around the world, cutting through the mystification and justification of present inequalities and inadequacies with a combination of charm, irrevocable moral certainty and brutally direct advocacy. His plea was powerful: if people could respond as they had, why not governments?

Bob Geldof would be the first to acknowledge that, despite the enormous sums raised, popular subscription alone will not be enough to change the face of Africa or of the Third World. That remains the task of governments: governments, whether of West or East, North or South, which have not always taken kindly to his criticisms. But people move governments. Today they recognise, acknowledge, understand, that we are citizens of one world. They are determined to do something about it. Bob Geldof has shown them that they can.

His over-riding contribution has been to bring into life a dynamic relationship across the North-South Divide, moving aid from the realm of charity into the world of popular politics. Internationalism has thereby been given a new content in bringing relief to people in Africa afflicted by famine; in changing perceptions beyond Africa of a grossly unequal world; in mobilising millions to give millions; in altering the dynamics of aid and development as a political issue. Bob Geldof has rendered a service of immense proportions to all humanity. He has made a truly outstanding contribution to the Third World.

The Third World Prize Committee takes pride in awarding this year's Third World Prize to Bob Geldof.

Extracts from Address by Altaf Gauhar, Secretary-General of the Third World Foundation

'We are here this evening to honour Bob Geldof, the man who rescued a whole generation from despair—a generation trapped in a hundred ways of doing nothing was suddenly shown a way of doing something. Millions of people resigned to indifference and cynicism were thus rescued and introduced to the ecstasy of caring and sharing. Bob elevated charity to equality and transformed the act of participation. Both Julius Nyerere and Bob Geldof are concerned with the problem of poverty: Bob Geldof with its extreme manifestation, famine and starvation, and Julius Nyerere with its root causes, injustice and exploitation. While the awareness of the problem has been enhanced, its extent and gravity have not diminished.

Forty-four years ago I saw famine in Bengal through the eyes of a painter, Zain-ul Abedin. He painted scores of black and white sketches of crows, "scrawny and very ugly and lean", and of skeletons lying in "withered and thin and scorched fields". Zain-ul "created" the famine for the people of India to see. Forty years later when I went to Bangladesh I saw the same fields of hunger, dark with swarms of crows and skeletons, and those enormous black beautiful eyes of little children enlarged in cosmic wonder.

Bob Geldof, too, allowed us to see famine in Ethiopia. It is this hideous phenomenon of exploitation and injustice which Julius Nyerere has been fighting against and which drove Bob Geldof into a state of moral outrage. However briefly, Bob shook the world. This prize is a tribute to Bob for demonstrating that "Humankind cannot bear too much reality".'

Extracts from Address by Shridath S Ramphal, Secretary-General of the Commonwealth Secretariat and Chairman of the Third World Prize Selection Committee

'The Third World Prize is awarded each year for outstanding service to Third World development. Service to the Third World is invariably service to humanity as a whole. In making the world a better place, one makes it a better place for all people. In serving the Third World one serves all humankind. In the field of human service, life is one and the world is one.

In its Citation of the Award of the 1986 Third World Prize to Bob Geldof, the Committee has tried to convey to the public what it really did not need to be told: why it is appropriate that Bob Geldof should receive this honour. In a sense, the Citation says everything about the great impact his dedicated service has had in redressing human suffering in Africa, and the impact it has made upon his fellow-citizens of the world.

Geldof will be the first to assert that the 'Bob Geldof phenomenon' was part of a wider phenomenon—that of 'people action'. When he spoke of his own revulsion to famine and starvation in a world of plenty and of waste: 'To expiate yourself truly of any complicity in this evil meant that you had to give something of yourself,' he spoke for millions of ordinary, decent people world-wide. They are people who find unacceptable the deepening desolation of the world's poor; the millions overborne by poverty, for whom life is survival until tomorrow, and always only tomorrow; millions who simply pass away from want without ever knowing the reason why.

More and more people are recognising that the evils of poverty and inequality imply some kind of complicity. They are giving something of themselves not merely in expiation, but in the resolve to end poverty. The people of the world are becoming involved in a massive quest for peace; peace which they understand as being more than the absence of war, more than freedom from armed conflict. It is a quest for peace in terms of people world-wide working together as brothers and sisters, not as adversaries; men women and children from all lands understand that their common humanity and their fate are inseparable on this small planet; people are aware that we have only one world and that we have to learn to share its bounty and its fortunes better than we do.

Despite the reverses that the spirit of internationalism has suffered in the last few years, people today to a far greater degree than ever before in human history recognise, acknowledge and understand that they are of one world. It is vested interests of all kind which cling to a status quo that denies this vision. Yet, people know it is a true vision, and they are doing something about it.

Bob Geldof has shown that if there is to be peace, real peace, not only every nation, but every city, every town, every village, every person has to live and work for it.

Today we have met to do him honour, and to honour him at the hands of one whom we have honoured in a similar way—Mwalimu Julius Nyerere.'

Extracts from Address made by Julius K Nyerere, 1981 Third World Prize winner and former President of Tanzania

'The Third World Prize has always been awarded to people involved, in one way or another, with the future of the Third World. The recipients have been promoters of, or agitators for, a New International Economic Order; or fighters for dignity and freedom in the Third World like the Mandelas; or major contributors to expanded agricultural output like the International Rice Research Institute.

This year, in an imaginative selection, the Prize has been awarded to a person who has concerned himself with trying to ensure that Third World peoples stay alive. Bob Geldof and those who worked with him, have made it much more difficult for governments in the North to excuse inaction on matters concerning gross international inequality; they can no longer plead that their peoples are unconcerned about poverty in the Third World. For in a dramatic manner, Mr Geldof and his friends have demonstrated the strong feelings of human solidarity which exist everywhere.

Without wishing to raise controversy, I think it is true to say that as a general rule, governments allow their economic heads to govern their human hearts. Yet, actions by governments—even by the most democratic governments—are actions by people taken at second hand. Actions by governments are needed; there are some things which only governments can do. But it is direct voluntary actions and contributions which most clearly reflect our internal conviction about man's common humanity.

Mr Chairman, for a very long time I have been, and still am, an advocate of the need for international and official government and institutional action in a fight against world poverty. But governments act on behalf of their people; and they cannot for long ignore what their people think and believe. Neither can they replace the passion for justice, the sense of human unity and the personal actions of individuals. The world depends upon men and women acting for what they believe. In the end it is the human hand extended to help another in trouble which gives life.

It is from that standpoint that I salute today's prize-winner. I pay tribute to the work Bob Geldof has done for the future by increasing public awareness of the nature and problems of world poverty. I salute him for his initiative, the persistence of his anger on behalf of the suffering, and the unofficial and non-governmental action he organised to help Africa's famine victims to survive, and to give them another chance of life, and in life.⁹

Third World Foundation Consultative Status with the UN Economic and Social Council

Recognition of the growing importance of the work of the Third World Foundation was made by the UN Economic and Social Science Council (ECOSOC). In February 1987, the consultative status of the Foundation to ECOSOC was upgraded to Category I. Previously the Foundation had held Category II and Category III status on the roster, Category II status being granted in 1981. The upgrading of status followed from the council's recognition of the Foundation's greatly expanded role in a range of areas related to Council activity.

The decision to upgrade was taken by ECOSOC, the 19-member Non-Governmental Organisation's Central Committee. Support for upgrading had originally been canvassed from sixteen members of the Committee. The decision to upgrade was carried unanimously. It is worthy of note that the granting of full consultative status is unusual for an organisation so recently established. Of the seven Non-Governmental Organisations which had applied for Category I status at the Session, only the Third World Foundation was successful in its application.

THIRD WORLD FOUNDATION NEWS

The upgrading entitles the Foundation to participate more fully in ecosoc's work. It allows the Foundation to attend ecosoc and ecosoc-related conferences and meetings. It also allows the Foundation to:

- Propose agenda items to the Council and its subsidiary bodies
- Submit written statements on a range of areas
- Have greater access to Hearing facilities

In addition to the status accorded to ecosoc, the Foundation has facilities for participation in the activities of the UN Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) and consultative status with UN Industrial Development Organisation (UNIDO). The Foundation also has official relations with the UN Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation (UNESCO).

Bob Geldof with (left to right) Mr B K Nehru (Member of the Third World Prize Selection Committee), HE Mr Shridath Ramphal (Chairman of the Third World Prize Selection Committee), Mr Agha Hasan Abedi (Chairman of the Board of Trustees of the Third World Foundation) and Mwalimu Julius K Nyerere (winner of the 1981 Third World Prize).

Bob Geldof, after presentation of the Third World Prize scroll, with Mwalimu Julius K Nyerere, recipient of the 1981 Third World Prize.

North-South Monitor

UN SYSTEM

▲ International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD)

Governing Council: Tenth Annual Session

Rome, 9-12 December 1986

■ Representatives of IFAD's 141 member-countries met for the annual session of the Governing Council, where they decided on the formation of a high-level intergovernmental committee to consider the future method of IFAD's funding.

In his speech to the Council, IFAD's President, Idriss Jazairy, called for a more realistic and humane, if not rational, approach to global problems of agricultural adjustment, airing some radical proposals on the issues of external debt and agricultural subsidies. On debt, he noted that record levels of absolute indebtedness had been reached in Latin America, and of per capita indebtedness in Africa. Echoing a suggestion originating from Oxfam, he raised the possibility of indebted developing countries repaying at least a portion of their debt in their local currencies, into a special development fund, which would then be part-administered by an agency such as IFAD, and directed towards serving the needs of the rural poor. Jazairy pointed to the anomaly whereby surplus food production is subsidised to the tune of $36bn in the North, while only $8bn is directed towards encouraging vital food production where it is most needed—in the South. He then suggested that the reduction of surpluses in the North, coupled with an increase in official development assistance to the South, would, in conjunction with more equitable trading terms for primary commodities, benefit both taxpayers in the North, and the malnourished in the South.

While Idriss Jazairy was able to inform the Council that most of the funds pledged for the second replenishment of IFAD (IFAD II) had been received, the replenishment had been secured only after difficult and protracted negotiations. The major obstacle lay in the reluctance of members of the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) to continue providing 42 per cent of IFAD's funding (as opposed to 58 per cent from the industrialised countries), given the drastic decline in oil prices and the changed financial circumstances of OPEC member-countries. Consequently, agreement on IFAD II, for the period of 1985-87 had been reached only at the expense of a 50 per cent drop from previous funding levels.¹

The intergovernmental committee established by the Council was to consist of twelve members from each of IFAD's three categories. (IFAD consists of twenty OECD countries, twelve OPEC countries and 110 non-oil exporting developing countries, and is unusual in that each category has equal voting power within the organisation's governing bodies.) The committee was to consider various funding options, proposed by IFAD's President in a report to the Council. The Council's discussions of the report had apparently already established some common assumptions among IFAD members: that changing economic circumstances would have to be taken into account in reconsidering the capacity of donors to contribute to the fund; that IFAD's members were nevertheless committed to solving the problem of IFAD's funding, to enable it to continue its universally recognised achievements in targetting concessional loans to small-scale agricultural projects; and that any solution must preserve IFAD's unique structure and mandate. It was decided that the committee would meet four times in 1987, under the chairmanship of Idriss Jazairy.

The North-South Monitor was written and researched for Third World Quarterly by Maya Jaggi.

North-South Monitor

The Council discussed a report on the implementation of IFAD's Special Programme for sub-Saharan African Countries Affected by Drought and Desertification. The Programme's separate budget of $300m had been determined at the same time as IFAD II, partly to compensate for reduced overall funding levels, and was intended to assist twenty-two drought-stricken countries in Africa.² Apparently, $197m of the target $300m had so far been firmly pledged, and five projects had been scheduled at a total of $30.6m, with eight further projects planned for 1987. The Council also endorsed a programme of new IFAD projects in 1987, at a cost of SDR 250m, roughly equivalent to $300m.

The Governing Council voted by acclamation to extend Idriss Jazairy's term of office as President from three to four years, due to run until November 1988. It also approved the application for membership of IFAD's 142nd member-country, North Korea.³

● 'Would it be too bold to suggest that a link be established between the pangs of hunger and the burden of external debt? The President of the International Council of Voluntary Agencies . . . has recently suggested that careful consideration be given to converting at least a portion of the official debt of developing countries so that it be repaid in local currencies and placed in a development fund managed by an external donor such as IFAD, in conjunction with government and non-governmental organisations.' Idriss Jazairy, President of IFAD. UN Press Release IFAD/86/51, 9 December 1986.

WORLD BANK/INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND (IMF)

▲ International Development Association (IDA)

Meeting of Deputies

Rome, 15 December 1986

■ Deputies of the thirty-one donor countries which are members of IDA, the World Bank's concessional lending arm, agreed on the final terms of IDA's eighth replenishment (IDA VIII).

The total replenishment for the three years beginning on 1 July 1987, was determined as $12.4bn, higher than the target of $10.5-12bn originally set when negotiations began in Paris in January 1986, and higher than the level of $11.5bn agreed as a minimum at the last meeting of the deputies in September 1986.⁴ The final sum was, however, considerably lower in real terms than the allocation of $12bn in 1981-83.

The extra funds were forthcoming from Japan, and other countries including Italy and the Netherlands, which had made their increased contributions dependent on gaining a larger shareholding in the World Bank, and hence greater voting power. The US, meanwhile, had agreed to make such a redistribution possible by relinquishing some of its own shares. The deputies proposed a draft resolution providing for share increases for Japan, Italy, Canada, Korea and the Netherlands, while the US shares were to be reduced from 20 to 18 per cent. As a US condition of this change, another draft resolution recommended that the Bank's fundamental Articles of Association be amended to increase the majority by which major policy changes could be effected, from 80 to 85 per cent, thus preserving the USA's effective veto in such matters.

North-South Monitor

The terms of IDA loans were also modified. While the ten-year period of grace before capital repayments began was retained, the length of maturity was reduced from fifty to forty years for the least developed recipients, and to thirty-five for other countries. There was, however, provision for a regular review of the economic circumstances of recipient countries, to allow for adjustment in their terms of credit. While IDA's function in financing investment was reaffirmed, the deputies agreed explicitly to place increasing emphasis on conditional lending directed towards specific policy reforms and adjustment, sometimes in conjunction with the IMF's Structural Adjustment Facility (SAF). Such lending was to amount to $3-3.5bn of the IDA total.

The deputies' proposals were approved by the World Bank Executive Directors on 27 February 1987.⁵

COMMODITIES

▲ International Coffee Organisation (ICO)

Governing Council: Emergency Meeting
London, 23 February-2 March 1987

■ An emergency meeting of the ICO's Governing Council, called to consider the reimposition of export quotas under the International Coffee Agreement (ICA), ended in failure. Producer and consumer countries were unable to agree over the method of distributing market shares among exporters.

The session of the Council had been called by the ICO Executive Board, which consists of representatives of both consumer and producer countries, following separate meetings where the two sides had coordinated their positions. The fifty producer countries were urging the reintroduction of export quotas as a means of lifting prices into the 120-140¢ per pound price range stipulated by the ICA. Export quotas had lapsed in February 1986, in anticipation of a shortfall in the 1986 Brazilian coffee crop as a result of drought, but prices had fallen since then, as the shortfall appeared to have been overestimated.⁶ There was, however, no provision within the ICA for the automatic reintroduction of quotas, despite prices having fallen below the support level. Producers had first, therefore, to convince consumers within the Executive Board that they were in agreement as to how the new quotas would be distributed among themselves, before the Board would call a full Council meeting at which to negotiate the reintroduction of quotas.

The producers' proposal, formulated at their meeting in London on 28-30 January 1987, aired at the subsequent Executive Board meeting, and tabled in the Council, was for an overall ICO export level of 58m bags, distributed on the same formula as had applied before quotas were suspended. The proposal included provision for the redistribution of 1.22m bags, however, as a result of shortfall declarations by Brazil (1m bags), the Organisation of African and Malagasy Coffee Producers (200,000 bags) and Angola (20,000 bags). The producers called for quotas to be resumed for twelve months from 1 March 1987. Producers also undertook not to engage in unilateral intervention in the market to support prices, a commitment which had been sought by the main coffee importer, the USA.

North-South Monitor

While consumers proved willing to convene a full Council meeting of the ico's seventy-five members, to renegotiate the introduction of quotas, they were opposed to the producers' specific proposal. The twenty-five consumers, led by the USA, with the support of Britain, West Germany and the Netherlands, objected to the traditional method of distribution, on the grounds that it reflected political influence rather than availability, and would fail to ensure importers a constant supply of coffee. Proposing their own method of distributing quotas on the basis of 'objective criteria', they advocated that calculations be based on average exportable production over the period 1980-86, rather than on gross production, as before. Countries standing to lose under this new system would include Brazil, the largest exporting country, accounting for roughly 30 per cent of the global market, and Ivory Coast, while other countries including Colombia, the second largest producer, and Indonesia, would gain. The consumers were supported in their opposition to the producers led by Brazil, by a dissenting group of seven producer countries: Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Honduras, India, Indonesia, Papua New Guinea and Peru. Currently accounting for 16 per cent of the global market, the countries favoured a redistribution of market shares which would reflect production capacity rather than historical importance.

The meeting broke up in disagreement, with neither side willing to accept the proposal of the other. Brazil's chief negotiator, Jorio Dauster, questioned the existence of such things as 'objective criteria', and accused the USA of attempting to dictate rather than negotiate the reintroduction of export quotas. The US chief negotiator, Jon Rosenbaum, on the other hand, criticised Brazil for considering its past market share to be a historic right, calling instead for what he termed flexibility and fairness. Coffee prices were left, therefore, without a supporting mechanism, at least until the Council reconvened, probably in September 1987.⁷

●'For too many years we have gone along with what the producers wanted. We cannot go on like that.' Abraham van Overbeeke, spokesman in the ico for the consumers. The Guardian (London) 9 March 1987.

'We will not accept that our quota will be dictated by anybody.' Jorio Dauster, Brazil's chief negotiator. The Guardian (London) 9 March 1987.

'The way we've been treated is not democratic.' Luis Escalante, Economy Minister of Costa Rica, one of the producer countries which opposed the status quo with regard to quota distribution, supporting the USA against Brazil. The Guardian (London) 9 March 1987.

North-South Monitor

DISARMAMENT

▲ Soviet Union–United States
Summit
Reykjavik, Iceland, 11–12 October 1986

Soviet Union–United States
Ministerial Meeting
Vienna, 6 November 1986

■ US President Ronald Reagan and the Soviet leader, Mikhail Gorbachev, met for the first time since their 'fireside summit' in Geneva in November 1985.⁸ The meeting, billed as an interim one to prepare for an envisaged summit in the USA, was suggested by Gorbachev in a letter of 19 September 1986, and agreed to by Reagan after the resolution of a dispute over the arrest in Moscow on 30 August 1986 of a US journalist, Nicholas Daniloff, on charges of spying.⁹ The Reykjavik summit followed two bilateral meetings of experts to negotiate possible arms control agreements to be signed at a forthcoming summit,¹⁰ and a meeting between US Secretary of State, George Shultz and Soviet Foreign Minister, Eduard Shevardnadze, on 20–21 September 1986 in New York, which had been dominated by the 'Daniloff Affair'.¹¹

The Reykjavik summit included four meetings between the two leaders, together with sessions of two working groups—on arms control and on humanitarian and regional issues. The summit itself was dominated by the issues of nuclear and space weapons and, after a temporary blackout on the substance of the talks, the positions of the two sides were made public. The Soviet proposals were explained in a speech by Mikhail Gorbachev on Soviet television, on 14 October 1986, while the US position was outlined in President Reagan's speech on US television on 13 October 1986, and in a US State Department text issued on 17 October 1986.¹²

At first, there appeared to have been an unprecedented level of agreement on the means of reducing strategic nuclear arms and intermediate-range nuclear forces (INF), as well as on the issues of nuclear testing and verification of arms control agreements. There were substantial concessions on the Soviet side, which went a considerable way towards accommodating both long-standing US proposals, and more recent suggestions at Reykjavik.

On strategic nuclear weapons, the Soviet Union proposed mutual reductions of approximately 50 per cent over five years, until 1991, when each side would be left with a maximum of 6000 warheads on 1600 launchers. As regards former obstacles to agreement, the Soviet Union conceded that US medium-range missiles in Europe and US forward-based systems need no longer be categorised as 'strategic' simply by virtue of their capacity to reach the other superpower's territory. The USSR also agreed to negotiate large cuts in its SS18 heavy Inter-Continental Ballistic Missiles (ICBMs) with their ten warheads each. The two sides seem to have accepted that each bomber would be counted as one warhead (as opposed to previous Soviet demands for each bomb on a bomber to be counted as one warhead), and that sea-launched Cruise missiles would be the subject of later negotiations. The US apparently agreed to these proposals. Gorbachev proposed that over the following five years, from 1991 to 1996, all remaining strategic nuclear weapons would be eliminated. Despite subsequent claims by the Soviet Union that Reagan had agreed to this formulation, the official US proposal later referred instead to the total elimination after ten years of only 'all offensive ballistic missiles', effectively excluding Cruise missiles and long-range bombers.

North-South Monitor

On INF, the Soviet Union proposed the removal of all US and Soviet medium-range nuclear weapons in Europe, including US Cruise and Pershing II missiles, and Soviet SS20 missiles. Despite Gorbachev's pointed reminder that this proposal mirrored the original US 'zero option', the USA rejected the offer, primarily out of concern over Soviet INF in Asia. In a subsequently modified proposal, the Soviet Union suggested the elimination of medium-range missiles in Europe coupled with their reduction elsewhere, until only 100 warheads remained on Soviet INF in Asia, and 100 warheads on US INF in the USA. The Soviet Union conceded that British and French nuclear forces would be exempt from restrictions (when it had previously demanded that they be frozen at current levels), and that there would be a freeze on short-range INF (with a range of less than 1000 kilometres) in Europe, which would become the subject of later negotiations to reduce their levels. The USA, while apparently receptive to the proposals on reducing medium-range weapons, made counter-proposals on short-range INF. It first suggested a mutual ceiling at current Soviet levels (which were higher than those of the US) and then advocated a reduction to at most the level prevailing in January 1982.

On nuclear testing, the Soviet Union accepted in principle US suggestions for a phased approach towards the ultimate ending of nuclear tests, rather than demanding that the USA match its own moratorium. The USA called for improved verification of the Threshold Test Ban Treaty and Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty, and for further constraints on the size and number of explosions, in parallel with nuclear arms reductions. The Soviet Union also accepted in principle US proposals for verifying agreements on strategic weapons, INF and nuclear tests.

The possibility of a historic agreement on these arms control issues receded, however, in the face of continuing differences on the subjects of defensive weapons in space, and the Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM) Treaty of 1972, which currently limits the superpowers' development of defensive weapons. It became apparent, after the common ground on other areas had tantalisingly been defined, that the Soviet Union intended to link agreements on strategic arms and INF to US acceptance of limitations on withdrawal from the ABM Treaty, and on the development of the US Strategic Defence Initiative (SDI, or 'Star Wars'). Such linkage appeared to reverse the understanding at the superpower summit in November 1985 that progress on INF would not be made conditional upon agreement on space weapons.

At Reykjavik, the Soviet Union proposed a mutual undertaking for both sides not to withdraw from the ABM Treaty for ten years (less than the proposed period of fifteen years tabled at the Geneva Nuclear and Space Talks).¹³ During that decade, successive cuts in strategic weapons would be made, and at the end of 1996, further negotiations would determine subsequent action. Explicit in the proposal was acceptance of an interpretation of the Treaty which precluded all development or testing of space weapons outside the laboratory. The USA answered with two successive positions. Initially it proposed that the ABM Treaty be adhered to for a five-year period, with the following five years made conditional on the success of the first five years' strategic reductions. Subsequently, it agreed to a commitment to observe the ABM Treaty for the whole ten-year period. In both cases, at the end of ten years, either side would be free to deploy defences, though in the second formulation the proviso was added: 'unless the parties agreed otherwise'. President Reagan, however, resolutely refused to countenance the restriction of SDI to the laboratory, claiming that research, development and testing (short of actual deployment) were permitted by the ABM Treaty. Given this fundamental disagreement, no accord was reached.

North-South Monitor

Despite earlier hopes that Reykjavik would pave the way for a further summit in the US, no such meeting was arranged. A subsequent ministerial meeting between George Shultz and Eduard Shevardnadze in Vienna during the Conference for Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE) Review, intended to preserve the momentum behind the arms control efforts at Reykjavik, also failed to secure any results. There was even a strong suggestion from the Soviet side that the USA was attempting to redefine its position at Reykjavik, notably by couching its version of the agreements reached there in such a profusion of technical detail as to obscure the common ground.¹⁴ President Reagan and Mikhail Gorbachev did agree, however, that their proposals at Reykjavik should formally be tabled at the Geneva arms talks.¹⁵

● After Reykjavik, the infamous SDI has become more conspicuous as a symbol of obstruction in the way of peace, as a concentrated expression of militaristic designs and the unwillingness to avert the nuclear threat looming large over mankind. It is impossible to perceive it otherwise. This is the most important lesson of the Reykjavik meeting.' Mikhail Gorbachev in his television speech following the summit. Soviet News (London) 15 October 1986.

'SDI is America's insurance policy that the Soviet Union would keep the commitments made at Reykjavik. SDI is America's security guarantee—if the Soviets should—as they have done in the past—fail to comply with their solemn commitments, SDI is what brought the Soviets back to arms control talks at Geneva and Iceland. SDI is the key to a world without nuclear weapons.' President Reagan in his Address to the Nation. US Information Service, October 1986.

'The offer put to us in Vienna can be compared to a political theatre of the absurd. All those levels and sub-levels, limits and sub-limits, all that expert arithmetic which seemed to have been abolished once and for all in the Icelandic capital, re-emerged to obscure the substance.' Eduard Shevardnadze, the Soviet Foreign Minister, speaking after his meeting with the US Secretary of State, George Shultz, in Vienna. The Independent (London) 11 November 1986.

▲ Soviet Union—United States

Nuclear and Space Talks (NST): Sixth Round
Geneva, 18 September–12 November 1986

■ The fifth round of 'umbrella' NST, embracing arms control in the three fields of INF, strategic nuclear weapons and space and defensive weapons, had been characterised by a Soviet proposal to which the US had undertaken to reply by the opening of the sixth round.¹⁶

North-South Monitor

The US response was apparently contained in a confidential letter from US President Ronald Reagan, to the Soviet leader, Mikhail Gorbachev, on 25 July 1986. The proposals it contained were said to be similar to those subsequently made in President Reagan's speech to the Forty-First Session of the UN General Assembly (UNGA) on 22 September 1986. They included the following:

- A continued US commitment to achieving mutual reductions of 50 per cent in strategic forces, focusing particularly on cuts in ballistic missile warheads, and a US willingness to countenance interim cuts of a smaller percentage;
- the global elimination of INF, or interim cuts towards this goal;
- an agreement committing the US and the Soviet Union to observe the ABM Treaty until 1991, while continuing research, development and testing 'which is permitted by the ABM Treaty', to determine the technical feasibility of defensive space weapons;
- the negotiation of a new seven-year treaty superseding the ABM Treaty, stipulating that if either side wished to deploy space weapons after 1991, 'that side would be obliged to offer a plan for sharing the benefits of strategic defence and for eliminating offensive ballistic missiles'. If after two years no agreement had been concluded, either side would be free to deploy an advanced strategic defensive system after giving six months notice;
- the USA would progress towards ratifying the threshold Test Ban Treaty and the Treaty of Peaceful Nuclear Explosions after what it regarded as essential new ideas regarding their verification had been discussed. Though opposed to an immediate Comprehensive Test Ban (CTB) Treaty, the US was prepared to seek a programme of limiting and ultimately ending nuclear testing, in parallel with arms reduction.¹⁷

The NSR were interrupted for the duration of the Reykjavik superpower summit, but were resumed after its conclusion. The USA formally tabled proposals which were said to derive from the Reykjavik talks. They included:

- a draft treaty on strategic arms reductions in two phases of five years, to achieve the elimination after ten years of all ballistic missiles, leaving both sides with nuclear bombers and Cruise missiles;
- strategic sub-limits in the first five years of 6000 warheads on 1600 launchers, no more than 4800 being on ballistic missiles and 3300 on land-based missiles. Of these 3300, no more than 1650 could be heavy missiles, such as the Soviet SS18s, and missiles with over 6 warheads. Long-range missiles were to be banned unless their limits could be verified, in which case they would be counted within the 1650 ceiling;
- a draft treaty on INF to eliminate all medium-range nuclear forces in Europe, leaving 100 warheads on Soviet INF in Asia, and 100 warheads on US INF in the USA;
- for both INF and strategic weapons, elimination would mean either destruction and dismantling or conversion to other uses, and accompanied by on-site inspection;
- mutual adherence to the ABM Treaty for ten years, with the reported qualification that the US reserved the right to withdraw if there were 'material breaches' in the Treaty or a change in the strategic situation endangering a nation's 'supreme interest'.

As the sixth round ended, Soviet negotiators tabled proposals which reflected their own position at Reykjavik. They advocated:

- a 50 per cent reduction in all strategic weapons over five years, including a 50 per cent cut in Soviet SS18 Inter-Continental Ballistic Missiles (ICBMs), together with agreement on the complete elimination of all strategic nuclear weapons in ten years.

North-South Monitor

● two treaties on INF, one banning all Soviet and US INF in Europe, and the other stipulating a limit of 100 warheads on US INF in the USA and 100 warheads on Soviet INF in Asia. A freeze on short-range INF (with a range of less than 1000 kilometres) would precede immediate negotiations to reduce their levels. A difference emerged between the two sides, however, on whether the US would be permitted to deploy INF in Alaska, within range of the Soviet Union, or whether the terms would preclude stationing the remaining INF within range of the other superpower's territory.

The USA meanwhile, was reported to have proposed a mutual pledge to adhere to the ABM Treaty for seven years, in parallel with a seven-year programme of mutual 50 per cent cuts in strategic arms.¹⁸

The seventh round of NST was due to begin on 15 January 1987.

THE NORTH

▲ Group of Seven (G7)

Ministerial Meeting

Paris, 22 February 1987

■ Finance ministers and central bank governors from six of G7's major industrialised countries (Britain, Canada, France, Japan, USA and West Germany) reached an agreement which was subsequently dubbed the 'Paris' or 'Louvre Pact'. The ministers agreed to cooperate to stabilise exchange rates at roughly their current levels, while intensifying efforts to coordinate their domestic economic policies.

The Italian Finance Minister, Giovanni Goria, withdrew from the meeting in protest against the holding of informal talks by the Group of Five (G7 minus Canada and Italy) on 21 February 1987, during which key details of the subsequent agreement had apparently been worked out. Wary of the Italian delegation's reduction to the status of a rubber stamp, the minister described the G5 meeting as a 'substantial violation of the Tokyo Summit agreement', by which G7 had been created to monitor international economic and financial matters of concern to all members.¹⁹ The Italian withdrawal was seen to jeopardise plans for the next Western Economic Summit, scheduled to be held in Venice in June 1987.

The Paris accord was the first since the breakdown of consensus among G5 members over the 'Plaza Pact' of September 1985, which had presaged the depreciation of the US dollar. This pact had been intended to increase the competitiveness of US exports, thereby helping to reduce international trading imbalances (particularly the US deficit and the Japanese and West German surpluses), and diffuse protectionist pressures in the US Congress.²⁰ Emerging differences between the major industrialised countries had, however, been highlighted during the last meetings of the G5 and G7 in Washington DC in September 1986. There, despite anxiety among Japan and the European countries for the stabilisation of the value of the dollar, the USA had expressed an unwillingness to arrest its fall in the absence of accelerated growth outside the USA.²¹ The dollar's continuing decline had prompted calls since January 1987 (notably by Japan, whose yen had appreciated by 60 per cent against the dollar in the past eighteen months) for a G5 meeting. Others, however, had been unwilling to disrupt the markets further by announcing a new meeting without the preliminary talks necessary to ensure its success.

North-South Monitor

In their Paris communiqué,²² the six ministers agreed on the priority of reducing global trade imbalances, and expressed concern over continuing pressures for the erection of 'self-defeating' protectionist barriers. Affirming that since the Plaza Pact, the key currencies (the US dollar, the Deutschmark and the yen) had come within ranges 'broadly consistent with economic fundamentals', they 'agreed to cooperate closely to foster stability of exchange rates around current levels'. The commitment in effect to intervene in currency markets to prevent a renewed slide in the dollar was, however, qualified by the phrase 'in current circumstances'. The agreement, rather than instituting the 'reference ranges' or 'target zones' previously advocated by the French Finance Minister, Edouard Balladur, and endorsed by the US Treasury Secretary, James Baker, was for a short-term standstill. The circumstances of intervention to enforce this standstill were left unspecified. Moreover, current exchange rates were described as likely to contribute to reductions in external imbalances given the implementation of a series of coordinated policy commitments, set out by the six in their communiqué. It was partly this apparent qualification of the commitment to intervene to stabilise exchange rates that raised doubts as to whether the US would continue to refrain from 'talking down' the dollar, if unsatisfied with the efforts of Japan and West Germany to foster growth.

In their communiqué, in an attempt to promote balanced global growth, the ministers agreed that surplus countries should increase domestic demand and reduce their external surpluses, while deficit countries would encourage steady growth, reducing their domestic imbalances and external deficits. Accordingly, Japan agreed to expand domestic demand as a means of reducing the external surplus, and to endeavour to implement tax reforms, in addition to cutting its discount rate by half a per cent on 23 February 1987. West Germany, while making no explicit commitments to increasing domestic demand, agreed to increase the tax cuts planned for 1988, and drew attention to the recent fall in its short-term interest rates. The USA, meanwhile, made specific commitments to reduce the fiscal 1988 deficit to 2.3 per cent of its GNP, from its estimated level of 3.9 per cent in fiscal 1987. It aimed to limit the growth in governmental spending to 1 per cent in the fiscal year 1988, in an attempt to reduce government spending from its present level of 23 per cent of GNP.

The communiqué recognised the responsibility of the major industrialised countries to foster an open and growing world economy, in order to support the efforts of the developing countries, particularly those with external debts, to restore growth and viable balance-of-payments positions. It also, however, issued a warning to Newly Industrialised Countries (NICs) whose recently accumulated trade surpluses were said to be contributing to unsustainable global imbalances, and hence to protectionist pressures. The NICs, which include Taiwan, South Korea, Hong Kong and Singapore, were advised to reduce their own trade barriers, and allow their currencies to reflect their true strength, rather than being kept perpetually undervalued against the dollar.

The ministers also agreed on further measures to enhance the multilateral economic surveillance accepted in the Tokyo Economic Declaration of 1986. They decided to institute periodic reviews of 'medium term economic objectives and projections', to ensure their mutual compatibility, and of actual current trends, to determine their consistency with these objectives and projections. These assessments would initially be made using six key variables: growth; inflation; current accounts/trade balances; budget performance; monetary conditions; exchange rates.²³

North-South Monitor

The next meeting of the G7 was expected to be held during the Spring meetings of the IMF and World Bank, in April 1987.

●The Paris Pact is 'a direct linear descendant of the Plaza meeting . . . Now, we have all agreed that the time has come for a period of stabilisation, and we will act accordingly.' Nigel Lawson, Britain's Finance Minister, speaking after the Paris meeting. International Herald Tribune (Paris) 23 February 1987.

I am 'not prepared to call the meeting Plaza 2. The agreement is simply to force stabilisation at current levels . . . the most difficult negotiations were on the stimulative measures to be taken by the trade-surplus countries.' US Treasury Secretary, James Baker, after the meeting. International Herald Tribune (Paris) 23 February 1987.

'Italy is very disappointed at the behaviour of the Five. They are clubbing together and clinging to an outdated privilege.' Antonio Baldini, Diplomatic Adviser to the Italian Prime Minister, Bettino Craxi, speaking in Rome after the meeting, of the G5's decision to hold an informal gathering prior to the G7 meeting. International Herald Tribune (Paris) 23 February 1987.

NORTH-SOUTH

▲Central American Common Market (CACM)—Contadora Group—European Economic Community (EEC)
Joint Ministerial Conference
Guatemala City, 9–10 February 1987

■Foreign ministers from the EEC, the CACM (Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua) and the Contadora Group (Colombia, Mexico, Panama, Venezuela) met principally to examine proposals of a renewal of EEC aid to Central America, but also to perform the customary review of the continuing conflict in the region. The meeting was the third in a series of annual ministerial conferences, begun in Costa Rica in 1984, and continued in Luxembourg in November 1985.²⁴ The fact that of the twelve EEC countries, only four were represented by their foreign ministers (Belgium, Denmark, Netherlands and Spain) was perhaps indicative of the low expectations they placed on the meetings, which had in the past resorted to bland protestations of support for the Contadora peace process.

In his opening speech, the Belgian Foreign Minister and President of the EEC Council of Ministers, Leo Tindemans, cautioned that without the political will to find a settlement for the region's problems, no amount of economic aid would help. Notwithstanding this warning, the meeting seemed marked by a widening gulf between on the one hand the US allies, Costa Rica, El Salvador and Honduras, which denounced Nicaragua as the chief cause of regional tension, and on the other, Nicaragua itself. A dispute between El Salvador and Nicaragua, resulted in El Salvador's Foreign Minister, Ricardo Acevedo Peralta, boycotting the opening session, though appearing in time for a press conference at which to lambaste the Sandinist regime. Acevedo had been scheduled to deliver a speech on behalf of the Central American countries, but withdrew after a protest from Nicaragua that it had not been invited to send a representative to the meeting at which El Salvador had been chosen as a spokesman for the region. Instead, the Nicaraguan Foreign Minister, Father Miguel D'Escoto, proposed that the relatively neutral Guatemala speak for the region. In the event, the Guatemalan President, Vinicio Cerezo, spoke both on his own behalf, and on that of Central America. On the European side, the meeting was characterised by a consensus that a military solution to the region's problems, as advocated by the USA, was undesirable.

North-South Monitor

Agreement on the wording of a final joint declaration was delayed by opposition to some clauses from the US allies. In particular, the Costa Rican Foreign Minister, Rodrigo Madrigal, initially objected to an expression of joint support for Contadora as the 'only viable solution' to the Central American crisis, no doubt mindful of Costa Rica's own fledgling peace initiative (see below). The eventual communiqué, however, both reiterated support for the principles of the Contadora process, including its search for a diplomatic solution, and announced the EEC's decision to maintain its aid to the region.²⁵

● 'The open or latent conflicts in this part of the world will find no solution unless there can be found the firm political determination to seek solutions.' Leo Tindemans, the Belgian Foreign Minister, and President of the EEC Council of Ministers, in his opening speech. The Independent (London) 11 February 1987.

'Contadora is a corpse which no one dares bury.' Rodrigo Madrigal, Foreign Minister of Costa Rica. Financial Times (London) 12 February 1987.

'All the conditions now exist for a regional war.' Ricardo Acevedo, El Salvador's Foreign Minister. The Guardian (London) 14 February 1987.

'We don't believe the problems of the area can be resolved by armed force.' Lady Young, the British representative at the meeting. International Herald Tribune (Paris) 12 February 1987.

▲ South Pacific Forum Meeting of Foreign Ministers Auckland, 4 March 1987

■ The South Pacific Forum (SPF) issued a joint appeal to France to postpone its referendum on independence for New Caledonia, scheduled to be held in July 1987, and to seek further consultations instead. The special meeting was attended by eleven of the Forum's thirteen member-countries (Australia, Cook Islands, Fiji, Kiribati, Nauru, New Zealand, Niue, Papua New Guinea, Solomon Islands, Tonga, Tuvalu, Vanuatu and Western Samoa) and had been called by Sir Kamisese Mara, the Prime Minister of Fiji and current Chairman of the Forum.

Kamisese Mara expressed concern at what he perceived to be attempts by France to divide the Forum, following its pronouncements on New Caledonia at its last annual summit in Suva, Fiji, in August 1986.²⁶ There, Australia, New Zealand and the traditionally moderate Polynesian states had united behind the views of the more radical Melanesian countries, in criticising French moves to delay progress towards independence for the territory, and in initiating a successful campaign to have New Caledonia reinscribed on the agenda of the UN Committee on Decolonisation, as a 'colonised territory', as occurred on 2 December 1986. Since the summit, France had reduced its aid to Vanuatu and the Solomon Islands, which, together with Papua New Guinea, formed the most militant Melanesian contingent in favour of assisting the movement for independence in New Caledonia. It had also expelled Australia's representative in New Caledonia and suspended ministerial visits to Canberra. On the other hand, France had offered generous relief to Polynesia following the effects of recent cyclones, in an apparent attempt to woo its island states away from the rest of the Forum.

North-South Monitor

In a final statement, the foreign ministers asserted that the approach of the French Prime Minister, Jacques Chirac, to the issue of New Caledonian independence had 'serious shortcomings and clearly did not meet accepted principles and practices of the UN'. The proposed referendum, unlike that suggested by the former Socialist government, offered a stark choice between full independence (with no guarantee of French support) or continued colonial status. The SPF countries had also accused France of further manipulation by encouraging a recent influx of white settlers into the country, in order to ensure their predominance over the indigenous Kanak vote in the referendum. The UN alternative which the Forum countries supported entailed 'free, honest and genuine choice' in self-determination, with a long-term residence requirement for voting (rather than the French proposal of a minimum of only three years) and special recognition of Kanak rights. The Forum also advocated that all options on the status of the territory be left open, and not coupled with threats of punitive consequences, in order to sway voters.

The ministers decided in favour of continuing an attempt at dialogue with the French government, in an effort to secure postponement and consultation. Henceforth, however, negotiation on the territory would take place between France and the Forum as a whole, rather than with its individual member-countries. It was determined, though, that if its overtures elicited no response from France, the Forum's position would be reconsidered at its next annual summit, due to take place in Apia, Western Samoa, on 29 May 1987.²⁷

● 'They have been doing their best to divide the Forum with friendly pressure.' Sir Kamisese Mara, Prime Minister of Fiji and Chairman of the SPF, speaking of selective offers of French aid to particular SPF countries. Far Eastern Economic Review (Hong Kong) 19 March 1987.

SOUTH-SOUTH

▲ Non-Aligned Movement (NAM)

First Consultative Meeting on the External Debt

Lima, 12-14 November 1986

North-South Monitor

■ Representatives from thirty-six heavily indebted countries in Africa, Asia, Latin America and Europe gathered under NAM auspices to discuss the world debt crisis. The meeting, which had first been suggested at the NAM summit in Harare in September 1986, was broadened to encompass other members of the Group of 77 (G77) and any interested debtor countries.

The official purpose of the meeting was technical rather than political. It was hoped that it would initiate an exchange of information on debt negotiations and establish a monitoring system and information base on debt statistics and their relation to other economic indicators within developing countries. A final communiqué, however, called for the replacement of the existing case-by-case approach to debtor countries by 'political dialogue' between creditors and debtors, based on the 'shared responsibility' of finding a permanent, global solution to the problem. Calling for long-term agreements rather than short-term rescheduling arrangements, many delegates advocated the automatic application of the generous terms allowed large debtors to smaller countries. Echoing the conclusions of a conference of Latin American and Caribbean Middle Country Debtors in San José, Costa Rica, in December 1985,²⁸ they argued that the present system of negotiating on an individual country basis operated to the detriment of the smaller, relatively powerless debtor countries, which were unable to dictate the terms of their own rescheduling agreements.²⁹

▲ Contadora Group—Lima Support Group
Meetings of Foreign Ministers
Rio de Janeiro, 17–18 December 1986
Mexico City, 21 January 1987

■ Foreign ministers from the four member-countries of the Contadora Group (Colombia, Mexico, Panama, Venezuela) and their Lima Support Group (Argentina, Brazil, Peru, Uruguay) met in Rio de Janeiro in an effort to revivify their search for peace in Central America. The four-year long Contadora peace process had been stalled in its efforts to find a non-military solution to the region's conflicts since June 1986, when US allies in the region (Costa Rica, El Salvador, Honduras) had rejected what Contadora members claimed would be the final version of the Draft Treaty on Peace and Cooperation in Central America.³⁰

In a final joint communiqué, the eight ministers expressed grave concern over recent events in the region, citing an increase in activity by the US-supported anti-Sandinist 'Contras' operating on the Nicaraguan border; increased political intervention from outside the region; and the suspension of dialogue aimed at a peaceful settlement. Calling on the USA to end its military and economic aid to the 'Contras', the ministers agreed to tour the countries of Central America, using the good offices of the Secretaries-General of the UN and the Organisation of American States (OAS). There was speculation that the group may have chosen to re-launch the peace process at a time when there were signs of disenchantment with US policy among the region's US allies, following the 'Iran-Contra' scandal in Washington DC, linking covert US arms sales to Iran with funding for the 'Contras'. There were also signs that the Contadora process was becoming increasingly pragmatic, abandoning its emphasis on the spurned legal peace treaty, and attempting instead to solve individual issues of contention on a bilateral basis. The communiqué also referred to a plan to create a Latin American Consultative Body to address regional problems such as foreign debt and trade.³¹

North-South Monitor

The tour of the five Central American capitals by the eight foreign ministers, together with Javier Pérez de Cuéllar, the Peruvian UN Secretary-General, and João Baena Soares, the Brazilian OAS Secretary-General, took place on 19–20 January 1987. The ten-member mission held talks with Presidents Oscar Arias Sánchez of Costa Rica, José Azcona Hoyo of Honduras, José Napoleon Duarte of El Salvador, Vinicio Cerezo Arevala of Guatemala and Daniel Ortega Saavedra of Nicaragua. As anticipated, the leaders of the three US allies in the region were reported to have emphasised the need for democracy in Nicaragua as a precondition for peace in Central America, though President Duarte went on to advocate the holding of a Central American summit as a means to resolving differences. President Cerezo of Guatemala, meanwhile, proclaimed Guatemala's continuing policy of 'active neutrality', and President Ortega issued his own statement expressing support for Contadora and a willingness to resume negotiations on its proposed peace treaty.³²

At a press conference in Mexico City after the tour, Pérez de Cuéllar issued pleas for the region's member-countries to put aside their 'marginal political differences' in order to resolve their problems, and for the superpowers to stay out of the region. His scepticism as to the existence of sufficient political will among Central American countries to find peaceful solutions was echoed in a final joint communiqué issued by the eight foreign ministers on 21 January 1987. They proposed, however, to continue their dialogue with all concerned parties, including the USA, in the hope of discovering a non-military solution.³³

● 'There will be no peace in Central America without democracy in Nicaragua. The day the Sandinista government can say it has been elected freely by the majority of Nicaraguans there will be no more problems.' President Arias of Costa Rica, at a press conference after his meeting with the mission. The Times (London) 21 January 1987.

'Our advice to Contadora is simple: stop pressurising the four democracies for concessions and start pressurising the Sandinistas for concessions.' Elliot Abrams, US Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, giving the US view of Contadora before its meeting in Rio. The Guardian (London) 24 December 1986.

'I don't think this is the last chance for peace. I think Contadora will keep on producing proposals and ideas. But neither Contadora nor the United Nations nor the Organisation of American States can do very much if there is not the political will and the sincerity to find peaceful solutions among the Central American governments.' Javier Pérez de Cuéllar, UN Secretary-General, at a press conference in Mexico City after the tour. The Times (London) 21 January 1987.

▲ Costa Rica—El Salvador—Guatemala—Honduras
Summit
San José, Costa Rica, 15–16 February 1987

North-South Monitor

■ Leaders of the Central American countries met at the invitation of President Oscar Arias Sánchez, to discuss a Costa Rican regional peace initiative. The Nicaraguan President, Daniel Ortega Saavedra was not invited to the meeting, apparently on the grounds that Nicaragua did not qualify as one of the region's democracies.

The Costa Rican peace plan under discussion was reportedly first proposed at a meeting between President Arias and US President Reagan in December 1986. It was further considered at a meeting in Miami on 7 January 1987 between Madrigal Nieto, the Costa Rican Foreign Minister, Elliot Abrams, the US Assistant-Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, and Philip Habib, the US special envoy for Central America.³⁴ The plan was to some extent an attempt to wrest the peace initiative from the Contadora Group, whose peace treaty the USA strongly criticised for failing to demand stringent enough reforms from Nicaragua, and for lacking adequate enforcement measures. While the new initiative had received apparent US backing, it was uncertain as to how far the Reagan Administration, which had perpetually advocated the need for a solution obtained through military pressure on the Sandinist regime, was in accord with every aspect of the detailed peace plan.

The ten-point peace plan was proffered by President Arias for signature by all four leaders, in the hope of the summit's issuing a fifteen-day ultimatum to Nicaragua for its acceptance. Such an ultimatum was refused, however, notably by Guatemala, and the plan was endorsed though not signed by the leaders, thus failing to create the united front against an isolated Nicaragua, which the USA and its allies had reportedly been hoping for. It was decided to invite President Ortega to a further Central American summit in Esquipulas, Guatemala, within ninety days, at which the plan would be open to modification.

The ten-point plan and time-table for peace was made public in a document issued by the summit.³⁵ Ostensibly designed for all Central American countries whose governments were engaged in fighting guerrilla wars, its main force was directed at Nicaragua, which was singled out as the principal destabilising influence in the region, whose 'democratisation' was expressed as a precondition for lasting peace throughout Central America. The 'Arias Plan', which the document described as an 'indivisible whole', proposed the following (the timings referred to are from the time the plan takes effect, namely when all five Central American presidents have signed it):

- 1) where there are armed struggles, a general political amnesty within sixty days, and an immediate dialogue between government and internal opposition, as a means to national reconciliation;
- 2) an immediate cease-fire;
- 3) 'democratisation', entailing the immediate instigation of an 'authentic, democratic, pluralist and participatory process', including within sixty days (a) a free press and (b) freedom of association for political parties;
- 4) 'free, pluralistic, honest' and OAS-supervised elections in every country in 1988, for a Central American Parliament, as proposed in the Declaration of Esquipulas of May 1986;³⁶
- 5) an immediate suspension of overt and covert military aid to irregular forces and insurgent groups, at the request of the five governments on signing the document, and an end to arms trafficking;

North-South Monitor

- 6) a renewed commitment to preventing the use of their territory by groups seeking to destabilise governments in the region;
- 7) negotiations beginning within sixty days on the reduction and control of troops and arms, with measures for the disarming of irregular forces;
- 8) the creation within thirty days of a follow-up committee consisting of the Secretaries-General of the UN and OAS and the eight foreign ministers of the Contadora Group and its Lima Support Group, for the purposes of verifying and supervising the implementation of the plan;
- 9) the holding of a summit of the five Central American leaders within six months, to evaluate progress towards the implementation of the plan;
- 10) economic and cultural agreements to promote regional development.

Among the significant aspects of the plan were its apparent concessions to Nicaragua. The negotiations advocated towards national reconciliation were to be between government and unarmed internal opposition, and not necessarily with the 'Contra' rebels, which the Sandinist regime had consistently dismissed as puppets of the Reagan Administration, demanding direct talks with the USA whenever talks with the 'Contras' were urged. These armed groups were to be covered, instead, by the political amnesty. Moreover, the suspension of US military aid to the 'Contras' was in effect to be immediate, while the obligation to begin arms control reductions was delayed for two months. Hence, the progressive demilitarisation of Nicaragua was no longer to be made a precondition for the ending of aid to the rebels, a departure from the scheme advocated by the USA.

Within a few days of the document's release, President Ortega had accepted the invitation to Esquipulas, despite earlier Nicaraguan condemnation of the San José summit as a US-inspired manoeuvre. President Ortega insisted, however, that the new initiative could not be seen as superseding the Contadora process, and should not constitute the sole subject of discussion at the projected summit in May 1987.³⁷

● 'A stable and lasting peace cannot be reached if there is not democracy in all the countries of the isthmus.' President Arias of Costa Rica, voicing the fundamental principle behind his new peace plan. The Guardian (London) 16 February 1987.

▲ Arab League

Extraordinary Ministerial Council Meeting
Kuwait, 25 January 1987

■ Foreign ministers from the Arab League's twenty-two member countries met during the fifth Islamic Summit Conference in Kuwait (see below).

According to the Arab League's Secretary-General, Chedli Klibi, the ministers ratified a plan submitted by the Council's committee on ending the 'camps war' in Lebanon. The seven-member committee had recently visited Damascus and Beirut. Describing the plan as 'positive and encouraging', Klibi said that the committee had been entrusted by the Council with supervising the implementation of the plan, and with continuing its contacts, notably at the Ico summit.³⁸

North-South Monitor

▲ Islamic Conference Organisation (ico or oic)

Fifth Summit

Kuwait, 26-29 January 1987

■ Delegations from forty-four countries, including twenty-one Heads of State, attended the triennial Islamic Summit Conference, which had last convened in Casablanca in 1984. Leaders present included King Fahd of Saudi Arabia, President Assad of Syria, King Hussein of Jordan, President Gemayel of Lebanon, Yasser Arafat, Chairman of the Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO) and President Mubarak of Egypt, whose membership of the ico had been suspended following the country's Camp David peace accord with Israel in 1979, and reinstated in 1984. Notably absent were King Hassan II of Morocco, Colonel Qadhafi of Libya, President Suharto of Indonesia and President Saddam Hussein of Iraq.

The ico has forty-six member-countries, but Afghanistan's membership was suspended in 1980, following the Soviet occupation, and the country sent representatives of the Mujahideen as guests. Also absent was Iran, which boycotted the summit on the grounds that Kuwait fell short of a neutral location, which could guarantee safety to the participants. Kuwait, along with Saudi Arabia, had been a principal supporter of Iraq in the Gulf War, and was accused by Iran of allowing Iraq to use its airspace to launch attacks on Iranian targets, and its ports to tranship goods to Iraq, whose own ports had been damaged in the war. In boycotting the summit (having made an unsuccessful formal application to the ico's Secretary-General, Syed Sharfuddin Pirzada, for a change of venue), Iran declared that it would ignore any subsequent summit resolutions on the Gulf War.

The conference was dominated by the Iran-Iraq conflict being waged in close proximity to Kuwait, and by inter-Arab divisions centring mainly on the Palestinian problem and relations with Israel. Discussions on the Gulf War focused initially on plans to send a further ico mediation committee to negotiate with the two sides. Given, however, that Iran had previously announced its refusal to receive a mission without the ico's prior denunciation of Iraq as the aggressor, such deliberations assumed an air of futility.

More positive were signs of tentative rapprochement between various leaders in the Arab world, notably involving steps towards the political rehabilitation of Egypt. Egypt's readmission to the ico had been strenuously opposed by Iran, Libya and Syria at the sixteenth Islamic Foreign Ministers' Conference in Fez in January 1986.³⁹ At the summit in Kuwait, however, President Assad of Syria held a bilateral meeting with President Mubarak of Egypt, while at the same time criticising Egypt in his speech for its continuing relations with Israel. In his own address to the conference, President Mubarak chose not to respond to these criticisms, in the interests of preserving the harmony of the conference.⁴⁰ While the moves towards re-acceptance of Egypt by Arab leaders appeared to be partly in response to the threat they perceived from a powerful Iran, and in recognition of the need to offset that threat with the presence of another leading power in the Middle East, there were limits to the extent of that acceptance. In an informal meeting between five Arab heads of state on 28 January 1987, President Mubarak was not invited to join the leaders of Algeria, Jordan, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and Syria. Other bilateral meetings held during the conference included that between President Assad and King Hussein of Jordan, and between Assad and President Gemayel of Lebanon, whose relations with Syria had been strained since his rejection of a Syrian-brokered peace pact between Lebanese Christian and Muslim militiamen in January 1986. King Hussein also held a reconciliation meeting with Yasser Arafat of the PLO, resulting in a mutual agreement to provide more support to the virtually defunct joint Jordanian-PLO Committee on the West Bank. The rift between President Assad and the PLO, notably over Syria's support for the Muslim militiamen engaged in the 'camp wars' against Palestinian guerrillas in Lebanon, remained unhealed.

North-South Monitor

The conference issued a number of final resolutions, including the following. The summit:

- called for an international peace conference on the Middle East under UN auspices, with the participation of all concerned parties, including the PLO, on an equal footing, and the five permanent UN Security Council members. The summit rejected UN Security Council Resolution 242 of 1967 as a sufficient basis for the settlement of the Palestinian problem (a view held by the PLO but not shared by the 'moderate' Arab states, such as Egypt and Jordan). Continued US support to Israel was condemned;
- further condemned the resumption of relations with Israel by some states, and appealed to states contemplating such relations to forbear (Egypt and Morocco whose King Hassan had met with the Israeli Prime Minister, Shimon Peres, in 1986, were not explicitly named);
- called for an immediate ceasefire in the Lebanese 'camp wars', the lifting of their state of siege, and the return of people who had been driven from them;
- expressed concern at the escalation of the Gulf War and called for its immediate cessation and a withdrawal to international borders;
- called on the Soviet Union to withdraw its troops from Afghanistan;
- condemned the Pretoria regime in South Africa, calling for the imposition of comprehensive mandatory economic sanctions under Chapter VII of the UN Charter. Members of the ICJ were enjoined to contribute to the newly-established AFRICA Fund of the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) for the Frontline States in Southern Africa (see below);
- issued two resolutions on international terrorism, one sponsored by Kuwait, which condemned the phenomenon, together with attempts to associate it with Islamic forces, and another sponsored by Syria, which denounced attempts to eradicate the difference between terrorism and 'people's legitimate national struggle';
- denounced US aggression against Libya, during its raids in April 1986, as a violation of the UN Charter and of international law. It urged that the US compensate Libya for the material and human costs incurred;
- called for Libya and Chad to resolve their differences without recourse to foreign pressure and intervention;
- called for efforts to combat the production, sale and smuggling of narcotics.⁴¹

The sixth Islamic Summit Conference was to be held in Senegal in 1990, and the seventeenth Islamic Foreign Ministers' Conference in Jordan.⁴²

● 'We tried hard to get them to come. We would have wished for the two parties to be here so we could reach a solution to this war.' Kuwait's Foreign Minister, Sheikh Sabah al-Ahmed al-Sabah, lamenting the absence of an Iranian delegation. International Herald Tribune (Paris) 27 January 1987.

'An Arab cannot be at the same time with the Arabs and with Israel. We must put an end to existing relations between Israel and certain other Arabs.' President Assad of Syria in his speech to the summit. The Independent (London) 28 January 1987.

North-South Monitor

▲ Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC)

Ministerial Council: Twenty-Second Session

Riyadh, 17-18 February 1987

■ Foreign ministers of the GCC's six member-countries (Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and United Arab Emirates) issued a final communiqué in which they appealed to Iran to respond to the peaceful initiatives in UN Security Council Resolutions 582 and 588 of 1986, on the Gulf War. The Council also discussed inter-Arab differences and the possibility of securing sufficient agreement among Arab leaders to summon an Arab summit.

Appealing to all parties in Lebanon for an immediate end to the fighting, the ministers expressed support for all international efforts directed at lifting the siege of the Palestinian camps, and ending the attack on them.⁴³

▲ Organisation of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries (OAPEC)

Ministerial Council: Thirty-Seventh Meeting

Kuwait, 3 December 1986

■ Budget problems dominated OAPEC's biannual ministerial conference, which was attended by five ministers (from Bahrain, Iraq, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and Syria) and officials from four other countries. Tunisia was not represented, as it had notified the organisation of its intention to withdraw its membership with effect from January 1987.⁴⁴

Tunisia was among five of OAPEC's member-countries that had failed to pay previous budget contributions, resulting in arrears totalling $13.6m. Appealing to Tunisia to postpone its withdrawal, the Council approved its request to pay by instalments its membership dues for the past three years. The ministers absolved Tunisia from further budgetary obligations until it once more became an active member of OAPEC. Iraq and Syria, also in arrears for several years, benefited from an arrangement made outside OAPEC, whereby the Gulf States would pay their contributions. Qatar and Algeria, which had delayed contributing, undertook to pay their dues in the near future.

The OAPEC members also pledged themselves to fulfilling the coming year's financial obligations, and voted a new annual budget of $9.2m, 23 per cent less than the previous year. In a related move, Dr Ali Attiga, Secretary-General of OAPEC since 1973, announced that he would be tendering his resignation at the next meeting, due to be held in Damascus on 10 June 1987. Dr Attiga was known to be in favour of maintaining OAPEC's budget at its present levels, and developing the organisation into a wider Arab energy body, rather than acceding to the wishes of member-countries to reduce expenditure and limit OAPEC principally to a research role.⁴⁵

North-South Monitor

▲ Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC)

Ministerial Committee on Pricing

Quito, 14 November 1986

Eightieth Ministerial Conference

Geneva, 11–20 December 1986

■ Twelve of OPEC's thirteen member-countries reached agreement on the key issues of pricing, price differentials between different types of OPEC crude oil, and production. Iraq dissented from the agreement, which was signed by the other twelve ministers on 20 December 1986.⁴⁶

The twelve member-countries approved the recommendations of OPEC's Ministerial Committee on Pricing, which had met in Ecuador, for a return to a fixed pricing system, based on an OPEC Reference Price of US$18 per barrel. This decision followed a period presaged by an OPEC Conference in December 1985, of unrestrained OPEC production, as part of a strategy to retrieve for OPEC a 'fair share' of the global oil market,⁴⁷ followed by two interim agreements on temporary production curbs in August 1986 and October 1986.⁴⁸

Following the Quito recommendations, the ministers also agreed to base the reference price on the average values of a basket of seven crude oils, rather than maintaining the system of a single marker crude, namely Arabian Light. Despite initial objections to the change from Algeria and Iran, Saudi Arabia argued that the fixed marker had failed to make the various crudes equally competitive, placing a disproportionate burden on Saudi Arabia. It was agreed that the difference in value between Saudi Arabian Heavy at the bottom end of the scale, and Nigerian Light at the top, would be no more than $2.6 per barrel over the next three months, and a table with the fixed prices of twenty-four crude oils was appended to the agreement. This figure was to be reviewed periodically by a Ministerial Committee on Price Differentials, composed of the oil ministers of the United Arab Emirates, Algeria, Kuwait, Libya, Nigeria, Qatar and Saudi Arabia, which would convey its subsequent recommendations to the next conference. The fixed Reference Price of $18 per barrel was to come into force on 1 January 1987, with a one month period of grace during which to eliminate current contracts based on netback and other market-related pricing systems. In other words, no new discount deals were to be made after 1 January 1987, and no such deals continued after 1 February 1987.

In order to raise current oil prices and defend OPEC's new Reference Price, the ministers agreed to production cuts. The overall OPEC production ceiling was determined at a level of 15.8m barrels per day (b/d) in the first and second quarters of 1987 (representing a production cut of over 7 per cent from recent levels), rising to 16.6m b/d in the third quarter of 1987 and 18.3m b/d in the fourth quarter. The annual average output for 1987 was therefore to be 16.632m b/d. The agreement stipulated, however, that if in the light of actual production in the first half of 1987, perceived demand in the third quarter were lower than the agreed level, actual production in that quarter should be maintained at its level in the first half of the year.

The agreement was made possible by a shift in Saudi Arabia's position. Rather than countenancing only temporary curbs on production (as under his predecessor, Sheikh Yamani) the new Saudi Petroleum and Minerals Minister, Hisham Nazer, signalled a willingness to implement cuts in favour of a price of $18 per barrel, provided that those cuts were distributed amongst OPEC members, rather than being shouldered disproportionately by Saudi Arabia. The December 1986 agreement did in fact accomplish such a distribution.

North-South Monitor

Unanimity proved elusive, however, owing to continuing wrangles between the protagonists of the Gulf War, Iran and Iraq. Iran insisted that Iraq, which had been exempted from the previous interim agreements on output curbs and allowed to engage in unrestrained production, should once again be forced to accept a fixed quota. When Iraq, which maintained its insistence on a quota at least equal to that of Iran, refused a Saudi proposal for a fixed quota at a lower level, Iran's Oil Minister, Gholamreza Aqazadeh, advocated that Iraq be censured and if necessary disciplined by expulsion from OPEC. Saudi Arabia, however, after consultation with Iraq and other Arab members, refused to support any motion of censure, and no mention was made in OPEC's final communiqué of Iraq's dissent. Iraq, meanwhile, issued a statement dissociating itself from the agreement, on the grounds that its suggested production level had not been determined by any logical criteria, and was far below the actual level of its output, and would inflict a revenue loss of 25 per cent on the country. Iraq consequently refused to recognise the agreement, on the basis that it had not been endorsed unanimously.⁴⁹

Iraq's dissociation from the agreement meant that projected production would have to be revised upwards, to take account of its probable extra output of 500,000 b/d in the first half of 1987 and 800,000 in the second half. While in practice these additions could have been offset by a shortfall in Iran's output, owing to air strikes on its export facilities, the likely level of output remained difficult to predict. The effectiveness of the entire agreement depended on its observation by each OPEC member, and the agreement contained the same stipulation as in previous accords, that in the event of an officially-confirmed unilateral violation, all other members would be released from their obligations.⁵⁰

The next regular OPEC Ministerial Conference was scheduled to begin on 25 June 1987, in Vienna.

● 'For the time being, we are married to $18 a barrel, but we would not mind if it goes higher.' Rilwanu Lukman, Nigeria's Oil Minister, and President of the OPEC Conference. International Herald Tribune (Paris) 22 December 1986.

'The countries will have to be patient over the next couple of months. The system is not perfect, let's be frank about it.' Sheikh Ali al-Khalifa al-Sabah, Kuwait's Oil Minister, on the difficulties ahead in making the agreement succeed. International Herald Tribune (Paris) 23 December 1986.

▲ African Petroleum Producers' Association (APPA)

First Ministerial Meeting

Lagos, 26-7 January 1987

■ Oil ministers and delegates from nine African oil producing countries met to inaugurate the African Petroleum Producers' Association (APPA). First suggested by the largest African oil producer, Nigeria, the idea to launch the Association was supported by the three other African members of OPEC—Algeria, Libya and

North-South Monitor

Gabon—at a meeting in Algiers in February 1986. APPA also included the non-OPEC members, Angola, Benin, Cameroun, Congo and Egypt. Together, the nine countries account for 96.7 per cent of Africa's oil production, 7.7 per cent of total world production.

The stated objectives of APPA include the promotion of cooperation among member-countries in exploration, production and refining of hydrocarbons, as well as in petrochemicals, manpower development, legal matters and the acquisition and adaptation of technology. It is also intended to promote technical assistance among member-countries. The Nigerian Oil Minister, and President of OPEC, Rilwanu Lukman, had already rejected objections, notably from Saudi Arabia, that the new organisations would undermine OPEC. He pointed out that OPEC member-countries had already formed themselves into regional sub-groups, such as OAPEC and the Latin American energy organisation (OLADE), and that APPA would be a means of bringing non-OPEC members into line with OPEC policies. At their inaugural meeting, which was opened by President Babangida of Nigeria, APPA members stressed cooperation with OPEC in influencing oil markets, and elected the Algerian Energy Minister, Balkacem Nabi as the first Chairman of APPA.⁵¹

The next APPA ministerial conference was scheduled for 20 June 1987, in Algiers.

● APPA is 'a symbolic representation of member-nations' dedication to the protection and promotion of the continent's petroleum interests . . . Africa's oil fortune must not be left in the hands of the multinationals.' President Ibrahim Babangida of Nigeria, in his opening speech to the meeting. West Africa (London) 2 February 1987.

▲ Organisation of African Unity (OAU)

Ministerial Council: Forty-Fifth Meeting

Addis Ababa, 13–18 February 1987

■ At its regular meeting, the Council of Foreign Ministers from the OAU's fifty member-countries considered the problems of Chad, Southern Africa and the funding of efforts to combat drought and famine in Africa.

Among the resolutions adopted by the Council were those:

- appealing to Libya and Chad to find a peaceful solution to their conflict, and to avert any action likely to contribute to the further deterioration of the situation;
- strongly condemning the USA, Britain and West Germany for opposing sanctions against South Africa, which constituted 'an act of hostility against member-states of the OAU';
- launching an appeal in favour of eradicating apartheid, mobilising increased support among the international community for the implementation of mandatory economic sanctions against Pretoria, and for the intensification of the armed struggle;
- appealing to OAU member-countries to contribute to the Special Emergency Fund against drought and famine in Africa, and to fulfil existing pledges to contribute. According to the OAU Secretary-General, Ide Oumarou, only four African countries and one non-African country had honoured their commitments to the fund, which had been established by the twenty-first OAU summit in Addis Ababa in July 1985.⁵² The fund currently stood at $15.5m and the Secretary-General was urged to publicise the appeal for funds all over the world;

North-South Monitor

- setting up a ministerial commission to seek a solution to the problems of atrocities directed against the Palestinian camps in Lebanon. The commission was to consist of Angola, Burkina Faso, Congo, Egypt, Nigeria, Sudan and Tanzania.

The Council also adopted a budget of $23.2m for 1987-88, a reduction of roughly $2m compared with the previous year. Those, including Ide Oumarou, who favoured the maintenance of budget levels at $25m were apparently defeated in debate by countries urging cuts, including Ethiopia, Kenya, Tanzania, Uganda and Zimbabwe. While the sectors destined to suffer cutbacks were not specified, Ide Oumarou offered assurances that funds designed to fight drought and famine or to assist the Southern African Frontline States, would be maintained. He made a plea, however, for countries to pay their budgetary arrears, as only two member-countries had yet paid their full contribution for 1986-87.⁵³

▲ OAU

Coordination Bureau Meeting

Cairo, 11 March 1987

■ Leaders of the nine member-countries of the OAU Coordination Bureau (including the Presidents of Congo, Djibouti, Egypt, Sierra Leone, Uganda and Zambia, and high-level delegations from Algeria and Mali) convened for a 'mini-summit' in Cairo. Johnny Makatini of the Executive Committee of the African National Congress (ANC) also attended as an observer.

Issues raised by a report of the OAU Chairman, President Denis Sassou-Nguesso of Congo, on the organisation's activities since the twenty-second OAU summit in July 1986, were discussed by the leaders.⁵⁴ Their final statement reaffirmed the OAU position on a number of these issues.⁵⁵

The statement condemned apartheid and the imposition of a State of Emergency within South Africa, while deploring the escalation of South Africa's destabilisation campaign against the Frontline States (FLS), including its actions in killing civilians and refugees, and destroying the economic infrastructure and communications, both through direct military actions and through the support of internal rebel movements. The leaders appealed to the international community to assist the FLS, and praised the establishment of the Non-Aligned Movement's AFRICA Fund (see below) to which all countries were urged to contribute generously. Comprehensive and mandatory sanctions were once more described as the only way of persuading Pretoria to abandon its policies. The leaders also reaffirmed UN Security Council Resolution 435 of 1978 on Namibia, as the only basis for a settlement of the Namibian question, urging the international community to press Pretoria to accept the plan for Namibian independence, and denouncing South Africa for its continuing refusal to do so.

Following discussions on the continuing conflict in Chad, where Libya is supporting the opposition to the French-backed government, the leaders noted that recent developments had further destroyed the social and economic infrastructure of the country, and increased the suffering of its people. They appealed to all parties to work for comprehensive national reconciliation, urging Chad and Libya to settle their dispute through peaceful negotiation.

North-South Monitor

The meeting also reviewed the economic situation in Africa, reaffirming the principles of self-reliance as enshrined in the Lagos Plan of Action. Their statement praised the efforts of African states to implement the UN General Assembly's Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development 1986-90, as adopted at the UN Special Session on Africa, in May 1986.⁵⁶ While stressing that African resources should themselves form the backbone of such efforts, the leaders appealed to the international community to help mobilise the resources required by the programme. Reaffirming the need for an international conference to address the problem of Africa's foreign debt, they praised the efforts of the OAU Chairman to convince reluctant creditor countries of the existence of such a need.

Other subjects touched in the final statement included Western Sahara, the 'camps war' in Lebanon and the need for an international conference on the Middle East, and Afro-Arab cooperation.⁵⁷

▲ Non-Aligned Movement (NAM)

AFRICA Fund Committee: First Summit

New Delhi, 24-25 January 1987

■ Leaders of the nine non-aligned countries of the AFRICA Fund committee (Algeria, Argentina, Congo, India, Nigeria, Peru, Yugoslavia, Zambia, Zimbabwe) met to approve rules of procedure for the solidarity fund created at the NAM summit in Harare in September 1986.⁵⁸ They included Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi of India, the Chairman of the Fund; President Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia, its Vice-Chairman; Prime Minister Robert Mugabe of Zimbabwe, the current NAM Chairman and President Denis Sassou Nguesso of the Congo, current Chairman of the OAU.

The AFRICA Fund, based on an acronym for Action for Resisting Invasion, Colonialism and Apartheid, was intended to strengthen the economic independence of the Southern African Frontline States (FLS), helping them to bear the cost of economic sanctions applied against South Africa. In particular, it was designed to counter the argument advanced by some of South Africa's major trading partners (notably Britain) that sanctions would damage South Africa's neighbouring countries more than they harmed Pretoria.

The leaders approved a document containing rules of procedure for the management and operation of the AFRICA Fund,⁵⁹ and were reported to have agreed on the following priorities in the use of the Fund:

- establishing strategic reserves of 150,000 tons of grain, together with other vital commodities, and entailing the building of fifteen grain silos in the region;
- up-grading various road and rail links from the FLS to the sea;
- developing Tanzania's ports at Dar es Salaam, Tanga and Mtwara;
- training and supplying security personnel to defend communications links from the actions of the South African-backed rebel movements, UNITA in Angola and the MNR in Mozambique;
- increasing the utilisation of refineries in Angola and Zambia, and providing emergency supplies of coal and fuel oils to Mozambique.

North-South Monitor

The leaders also launched a world-wide appeal for finances to support the Fund, particularly from Western governments and voluntary organisations. It was reported that $70m had been raised in initial pledges, including $39 from India in goods, commodities and technical assistance over three years, $15m from Nigeria and $10m from Peru.

According to Eduardo Faleiro, India's Minister of State for External Affairs, the AFRICA Fund was not intended to provide military assistance to the FLS or to Southern African liberation movements. Donors would, he said, earmark their contributions for specific projects, and could ensure against their being diverted for other purposes.⁶⁰

●The AFRICA Fund 'will provide emergency assistance to the liberation movements in South Africa and Namibia. It will strengthen the economic infrastructure of the Frontline States. It will help them resist the blackmail of the racist regime.' Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi of India, Chairman of the Fund. The Times (London) 26 January 1987.

The Fund has 'served notice upon South Africa—and upon all those who bear sympathy for apartheid—that we mean business, that the Non-Aligned Movement is not the powerless organisation that some see us to be'. N D Tiwari, the Indian Foreign Minister, speaking before the meeting. The Times (London) 24 January 1987.

▲ Southern African Development Coordination Conference (SADCC)

Eighth Annual Consultative Conference

Gaborone, Botswana, 5–6 February 1987

■SADCC's annual conference was attended by 1,200 delegates from the nine SADCC member-countries (Angola, Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Mozambique, Swaziland, Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe), thirty-four donor countries and seventeen international organisations.

The conference's theme for 1987 was 'Investment in Production', and marked a new receptiveness on the part of SADCC to the potential contribution of the private sector to agricultural and industrial development. Though the development of the region's infrastructure remained a mainstay of the organisation's efforts to achieve increasing independence from South Africa, it appeared that after seven years of SADCC's existence, and despite the continuing infrastructural damage wrought by South Africa's destabilisation policy, SADCC was partially shifting its attention towards the development of production and trade. These new preoccupations featured largely in the speech of Peter McPherson, head of the US Agency for International Development (USAID), who announced a US pledge (subject to Congressional approval) of $93m in new aid to SADCC countries, over eighteen months. The aid, said to be additional to the regular $175–200m provided by the USA for food and development in the region, was to be designated for three purposes:

- private sector-oriented reform policy;
- the facilitation of trade within the region and with other areas; and

North-South Monitor

● regional transport projects.

McPherson made it clear, however, that the extra finances were not intended as compensation for the negative effects of sanctions imposed against South Africa, nor as insulation against South African retaliation against the FLS. Rather, he warned SADCC member-countries against imposing their own sanctions against Pretoria (as Zambia and Zimbabwe had announced they would do in 1987), on the grounds of the damage they would cause their own economies. None of the new aid was to be channelled directly into either Angola, whose MPLA government was not recognised by the USA; or Tanzania, whose failure to repay its soft loans to the USA made it ineligible under US law for new US aid; or Zimbabwe, with which the USA no longer had a bilateral trade agreement. McPherson announced that the priority would be in directing the aid to the routes in Mozambique which serve Malawi and Swaziland.

The commitments of Western donors were praised by the Chairman of SADCC's Council of Ministers and Vice-President of Botswana, Peter Mmusi. Singled out for particular commendation was the commitment of the Nordic countries to provide $300m in regional bilateral aid over the next four years. Nonetheless, the combined donations did not amount to the $540m which SADCC had estimated that it required, only 34 per cent of which, according to Peter Mmusi, had been secured, leaving the rest subject to negotiation. The conference had, however, succeeded in attracting the interest of regional and foreign businessmen, who held a meeting just prior to the consultative conference, at which they proposed that SADCC establish a business council, to lend structure to its relations with the private sector.⁶¹

The 1988 SADCC Consultative Conference was scheduled to be held in Arusha, Tanzania.

● 'No one in this room is any longer in doubt that apartheid is a danger to peace and security, let alone development in the region. The world seems to appreciate the intensity and the depths of the problems we are facing.' Richard Hove, Zimbabwe's Minister of Mines, assessing the level of agreement at the conference. West Africa (London) 23 February 1987.

'It would be tragic if the future of this region is mortgaged by counter-productive recriminations or further sanctions . . . which would jeopardise the economic future of all the parties in the subcontinent.' Peter McPherson, Director of USAID, warning the FLS against applying their own sanctions against South Africa. The Times (London) 7 February 1987.

'The private sector is not only an important player in economic growth—it must play the leading role.' Peter McPherson, explaining the priorities for the new sum of US assistance to SADCC. West Africa (London) 23 February 1987.

'All states act out of self-interest.' Armando Guebuza, Mozambique's Minister of Transport and Communication, conceding that the new US aid was directed chiefly at encouraging private enterprise in the region. West Africa (London) 23 February 1987.

North-South Monitor

▲ Malawi-Mozambique

Joint Defence and Security Commission

Nampala, Mozambique, 4 December 1986

Lilongwe, Malawi, 18 December 1986

■ Two agreements were signed in Lilongwe between Malawi and Mozambique, following a first working session of their Joint Defence and Security Commission in Nampala. The two delegations were led by John Tembo, a member of the Malawi Congress Party Executive Committee, and General Alberto Chipande, Mozambique's Minister of National Defence.

The decision to establish a joint commission had been taken following an unprecedented summit between President Kamuzu Banda of Malawi and leaders of the Southern African Frontline States (FLS) in Blantyre in September 1986. At this meeting, the FLS leaders had accused Malawi of, among other things, assisting the South African-backed MNR rebel movement in Mozambique, and abetting Pretoria's regional destabilisation policy. They had resolved to exert pressure on the Banda regime to change its policies, and had possibly already suffered South African retaliation for presuming to apply this pressure.⁶²

The Lilongwe agreements comprised an accord on mutual cooperation and a bilateral protocol on defence, state security and public order. They reportedly enshrined the principles agreed between the two delegations at the earlier meeting in Nampala, where good neighbourliness, friendship, cooperation and mutual trust had been lauded. The two sides also reportedly discussed practical means of defusing tension, by eliminating terrorism and destabilisation along their common border, and established two working groups to consider further cooperation.⁶³

● There should be 'maximum cooperation between the two countries in wiping out banditry'. General Alberto Chipande, Mozambique's Minister of National Defence, speaking of his hopes for the agreements. BBC Summary of World Broadcasts ME/8447/ii, 20 December 1986.

▲ Southern African Frontline States (FLS)

Summit

Lusaka, 21 December 1986

■ The leaders of Botswana, Mozambique, Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe, together with a representative of the Angolan government, held a one-day summit to review the situation in Southern Africa. The meeting was attended by Oliver Tambo, the President of the African National Congress (ANC), and Sam Nujoma, the leader of the South West Africa People's Organisation (SWAPO).

The leaders reportedly pledged support for the region's liberation movements and for Mozambique under its new President, Joaquim Chissano. This was not the Mozambican President's first attendance at a summit of the FLS, however, as he had been part of a delegation to a summit in Maputo in October 1986, which had discussed the circumstances of former President Samora Machel's death in an air crash on 19 October 1986.⁶⁴

No communiqué was issued by the summit, which was curtailed prematurely by the departure of the Zambian President, Kenneth Kaunda, on hearing the news of the death of one of his sons.⁶⁵

North-South Monitor

NOTES

In these notes the following abbreviations are used for newspapers and periodicals: Econ = The Economist (London); FT = Financial Times (London); FEER = Far Eastern Economic Review (Hong Kong); Gma = Granma (Havana); G = The Guardian (London); I = The Independent (London); IHT = International Herald Tribune (Paris); MEED = Middle East Economic Digest (London); MEER = Middle East Economic Review (Washington DC); MEES = Middle East Economic Survey (Nicosia); Obs = The Observer (London); S = South (London); SN = Soviet News (London); SW = Soviet Weekly (London); ST = Sunday Times (London); SWB = Summary of World Broadcasts (London); T = The Times (London); TWQ = Third World Quarterly (London); UNPR = UN Press Release; USIS = US Information Service; WA = West Africa (London); XNA = Xinhua News Agency.

- ¹ On the agreement of IFAD II at IFAD's Governing Council session in January 1986, see TWQ 8(3) July 1986, pp 1031-2.
- ² See TWQ 8(3) July 1986, pp 1031-2.
- ³ UNPR IFAD/86/60, 12 December 1986 and IFAD/86/51, 9 December 1986.
- ⁴ For the meeting of IDA deputies in Washington DC in September 1986, see TWQ 9(2) April 1987, p 681.
- ⁵ Econ 20 December 1986; World Bank News (Washington DC) 27 February 1987; WA 22/29 December 1986 and 9 March 1987.
- ⁶ On the suspension of coffee export quotas, see TWQ 8(3) July 1986, pp 1036-7.
- ⁷ G 28 January 1987, 2, 9, 24 February 1987, 9 March 1987; FT 28, 29 January 1987, 20, 24 February 1987, 2, 3, 4 March 1987; IHT 2, 4 February 1987; I 5, 24 February 1987.
- ⁸ For the first Gorbachev-Reagan summit in Geneva, see TWQ 8(2) April 1986, pp 702-5.
- ⁹ The 'Daniloff Affair' was resolved by the US decision to release the alleged Soviet spy, Gennadi Zakharov, and the Soviet decision to release Daniloff together with the human rights activist, Yuri Orlov.
- ¹⁰ The expert meetings were on 11-12 August 1986 in Moscow, and 5-6 September 1986 in Washington DC.
- ¹¹ IHT 22 September 1986; FT 22 September 1986.
- ¹² Gorbachev's television speech is in SN 15 October 1986. Reagan's Address to the Nation of 13 October 1986 is available from USIS. Excerpts from these documents and from the US State Department text of 17 October 1986 can be found in Survival (International Institute of Strategic Studies, London) March/April 1987, pp 166-88.
- ¹³ On the Geneva Nuclear and Space Talks, Round Five, at which the Soviet proposal concerning adherence to the ABM Treaty was originally made, see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, pp 1379-82.
- ¹⁴ FT 5, 6, 7 November 1986; I 6, 12 November 1986; IHT 5, 6, 7 November 1986; T 3, 6, 7 November 1986; G 4, 5, 6 November 1986. Shultz's opening remarks at the Vienna conference are in USIS 6 November 1986. Shevardnadze's statement at his Vienna press conference is in SN 12 November 1986.
- ¹⁵ FT 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16 October 1986; IHT 10, 11-12, 13, 14, 15, 16 October 1986; T 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17 October 1986; I 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17 October 1986; G 10, 11, 13, 14, 17, 18 October 1986; ST 12, 19 October 1986; Obs 12, 19 October 1986; Econ 11, 18, October 1986; Armament and Disarmament Information Unit (ADIU) Report (Sussex) November-December 1986.
- ¹⁶ On the fifth round of Geneva NST, see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, pp 1379-82. On the previous four rounds, see TWQ 7(4) October 1985, pp 1030-32, 8(1) January 1986, pp 289-92, 8(2) April 1986, pp 699-701, and 8(3) July 1986, pp 1042-4.
- ¹⁷ Reagan's speech to the UNGA is in USIS Official Text, 23 September 1986. See also T 23 September 1986; G 23 September 1986; FT 23 September 1986; IHT 23 September 1986.

North-South Monitor

- ¹⁸ IHT 3, 7, 8-9, 13 November 1986; T 7, 8 November 1986; FT 7, 8 November 1986; 18 November 1986; G 26 September 1986, 1, 8, 11 November 1986; Armament and Disarmament Information Unit (ADIU) Report (Sussex) January-February 1987; USIS Official Text 13 November 1986.
- ¹⁹ On the Western Economic Summit in Tokyo in May 1986, see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, pp 1392-5.
- ²⁰ On the G5 Plaza Pact of September 1985, see TWQ 8(1) January 1986, pp 293-4.
- ²¹ On the G5 and G7 meetings in Washington DC in September 1986, see TWQ 9(2) April 1987, pp 685-6.
- ²² The G6 Paris communiqué is reproduced in full in FT 23 February 1987 and IMF Survey (Washington DC) 9 March 1987, pp 73-5. Excerpts are in I 23 February 1987 and IHT 23 February 1987.
- ²³ FT 20, 21, 22, 23, 24 February 1987; IHT 20, 21-2, 23 February 1987; G 20, 23 February 1987; I 20, 23 February 1987; T 23 February 1987; Obs 22 February 1987; Econ 28 February 1987; FEER 5 March 1987; IMF Survey (Washington DC) 9 March 1987.
- ²⁴ For the Luxembourg EEC-CACM-Contadora meeting in 1985, see TWQ 8(2) April 1986, pp 721-2.
- ²⁵ I 3, 9, 11, 12 February 1987; G 4, 11 February 1987; FT 9, 12 February 1987; IHT 10, 11-12 February 1987; SWB ME/8489/iii, 11 February 1987, 8490/iii, 12 February 1987 and 8491/iii, 13 February 1987.
- ²⁶ On the South Pacific Forum summit in Suva, see TWQ 9(1) January 1987, pp 308-10.
- ²⁷ IHT 27 February 1987; I 5 March 1987; FEER 19 March 1987, pp 29-30.
- ²⁸ On the San José Middle Country Debtors' Conference in December 1985, see TWQ 8(3) July 1986, p 1057.
- ²⁹ G 12, 13 November 1986; WA 1 December 1986.
- ³⁰ On the Panama City meeting in June 1986, see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, pp 1409-10.
- ³¹ T 20 December 1986; G 24, 31 December 1986; IHT 29 December 1986; SWB ME/8445/iii, 18 December 1986, 8446/iii, 19 December 1986 and 8447/iii, 20 December 1986.
- ³² See SWB ME/8471/D/1-2, 21 January 1987.
- ³³ I 19, 20, 21, 22, 23 January 1987; IHT 20, 22 January 1987; FT 22 January 1987; T 21, 22 January 1987; Econ 31 January 1987; SWB ME/8460/iii, 8 January 1987, 8470/iii, 20 January 1987, 8472/iii, 22 January 1987, 8473/iii, 23 January 1987 and 8474/iii, 24 January 1987.
- ³⁴ On the Miami meeting, see T 9 January 1987; FT 9 January 1987; G 9 January 1987.
- ³⁵ The San José summit document and ten-point peace plan are in SWB ME/8494/D/3-6, 17 February 1987.
- ³⁶ For the Declaration of Esquipulas of May 1986, see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, p 1408.
- ³⁷ IHT 14-15, 23 February 1987; FT 16, 17 February 1987; G 14, 16, 17 February 1987; I 16, 17 February 1987; T 17, 19 February 1987; SWB ME/8494/iii, 17 February 1987 and 8497/iii, 20 February 1987.
- ³⁸ SWB ME/8476/i, 27 January 1987 and 8477/i, 28 January 1987.
- ³⁹ For the 100 Foreign Ministers' meeting in Fez, see TWQ 8(3) July 1986, pp 1051-2.
- ⁴⁰ The speeches of President Assad and President Mubarak are in SWB ME/8478/E1-16, 19 January 1987.
- ⁴¹ The final resolutions of the Islamic Conference are in SWB ME/8481/E/1-7, 2 February 1987, 8482/E/1-8, 3 February 1987 and 8483/E/1-10, 4 February 1987, and are summarised in the Conference's final communiqué, in SWB ME/8479/E/11-20, 30 January 1987.
- ⁴² IHT 5, 19, 26 January 1987; I 26, 27, 28, 29 January 1987; FT 26 January 1987; G 26, 27, 28, 30 January 1987; Obs 5 January 1987 and 1 February 1987; T 30 January 1987; Econ 31 January 1987; S March 1987; MEED 31 January 1987;

North-South Monitor

- ⁴⁰ MEES 12 January 1987, p C1, 26 January 1987, p C2 and 2 February 1987, pp C2-3; Arabic, March 1987; SWB ME/8477/E/1-3, 28 January 1987, 8478/E/1-16, 29 January 1987, 8479/E/1-20, 30 January 1987 and 8480/E/1-8 31 January 1987.
- ⁴¹ SWB ME/84936, 18 February 1987 and 8497/A/6-7, 20 February 1987.
- ⁴² On Tunisia's withdrawal from OAUPEC, see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, p 1405.
- ⁴³ MEES 8 December 1986, pp A2-3; MEED 6 December 1986, p 2 and 13 December 1986, p 2; SWB ME/8432/i, 3 December 1986 and 8434/ii, 5 December 1986.
- ⁴⁴ The agreement and subsequent press communiqué of the OPEC Conference are reproduced in MEES 22/9 December 1986, pp A5-8.
- ⁴⁵ For the OPEC Conference in December 1985, see TWQ 8(2) April 1986, pp 730-1.
- ⁴⁶ On the two OPEC interim agreements, see TWQ 9(1) January 1987, pp 314-6 and 9(2) April 1987, pp 692-3.
- ⁴⁷ For Iraq's statement, see MEES 22/9 December 1987, p A8.
- ⁴⁸ FT 11, 12, 13, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 22, 23 December 1986; IHT 11, 12, 14, 15, 16, 19, 21, 22, 23 December 1986; T 11 December 1986; G 15 December 1986; WA 22/9 December 1986, p 2662 and 5 January 1987, p 26; MEES 1 December 1986, pp A1-2, 8 December 1986, pp A1-2, 15 December 1986, pp A1-3 and 22/9 December 1986, pp A1-8; MEED 3 January 1987, p 22.
- ⁴⁹ FT 26, 27 January 1987; T 21 January 1987; WA 2 February 1987, p 226; SWB ME/8477/iii, 28 January 1987, 8478/ii and 8478/B/1 of 19 January 1987.
- ⁵⁰ On the OAU summit in 1985, see TWQ 8(1) January 1986, pp 324-5.
- ⁵¹ WA 16 March 1987, p 541; SWB ME/8501/ii, 25 February 1987, 8502/33 and 8502/B/3 of 26 February 1987, 8503/B/4-6, 27 February 1987, 8585/ii and 8505/B/5-6 of 2 March 1987, 8506/B/1-2, 3 March 1987.
- ⁵² On the twenty-second OAU summit in July 1986, see TWQ 9(1) January 1987, pp 322-4.
- ⁵³ The OAU's final statement is reported in SWB ME/8515/A/1-3, 13 March 1987.
- ⁵⁴ On the UNGA Special Session on the Critical Economic Situation in Africa, see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, pp 1372-4.
- ⁵⁵ I 2 March 1987; FT 12 March 1987; WA 23 March 1987, p 590; SWB ME/8514/i, 1 March 1987, 8515/i and 8515/A/1-3 of 13 March 1987.
- ⁵⁶ On the NAM summit in Harare, see TWQ 9(1) January 1987, pp 327-9.
- ⁵⁷ The document on the AFRICA Fund is in Review of International Affairs (Belgrade) 5 February 1987, pp 151-7.
- ⁵⁸ Obs 4 January 1987; T 24, 26 January 1987; IHT 26 January 1987; G 26 January 1987.
- ⁵⁹ I 5, 7 February 1987; G 6 February 1987; T 7 February 1987; IHT 7-8 February 1987; WA 23 February 1987; SWB ME/8486/ii and 8486/B/1-3 of 7 February 1987, 8487/B/9-10 of 9 February 1987.
- ⁶⁰ On the Blantyre summit in September 1986, see TWQ 9(1) January 1987, pp 326-7. For the follow-up FLS summit in Maputo in October 1986, at which South African retaliation was discussed, see TWQ 9(2) April 1987, pp 694-5.
- ⁶¹ SWB ME/8434/ii, 5 December 1986, 8435/ii, 6 December 1986, 8445/ii, 18 December 1986, 8447/ii 20 December 1986, 8448/ii 22 December 1986.
- ⁶² On the FLS summit in Maputo, see TWQ 9(2) April 1987, p 695.
- ⁶³ SWB ME/8449/ii, 23 December 1986.

THE JOURNAL OF DEVELOPMENT STUDIES

Since its foundation in 1964 The Journal of Development Studies has established itself as a major international forum for the discussion of the fundamental issues of development. It has published many seminal articles, opened up many areas of debate, and broadened its scope to interpret the concept of development in its widest sense. Each issue contains a number of full-length research articles, notes and comments, review articles and a book reviews section.

Editors: David Booth, Department of Sociology and Social Anthropology, University of Hull

Charles Cooper, Institute of Social Studies, The Hague

E. V. K. FitzGerald, Institute of Social Studies, The Hague

Karel Jansen, Institute of Social Studies, The Hague

David Lehmann, University of Cambridge

The Journal of Development Studies

VOLUME 22

Special Issue

THE AGRARIAN QUESTION IN SOCIALIST TRANSITIONS

Edited by David Booth

1986 FOR 1986

Articles from recent issues include:

Extrinsic versus Intrinsic Problems of Agricultural Cooperation:

Anti-incentivism in Tanzania and China

Louis Putterman

North-South Comparison of the Sources of Change in Manufacturing

Value Added, 1975-80: A Decomposition Analysis

Se-Hark Park

The Decline of an Export Industry, or the Growth of Peruvian

Sugar Consumption in the Long Run

C. D. Scott

Seasonal Dimensions of Rural Social Organisation

Louise Fortmann

The Labour Market in a Dual Economy:

Another Look at Colonial Rhodesia

Susan J. Ranney

Domestic Credit and the Balance of Payments in Ghana:

A Comment

Francis Teal and Y. M. Giwa

Conceptualising Technical Change in the Third World in the 1980s:

An Interpretative Survey

Martin Fransman

'Primitive Accumulation', Agrarian Reform and Socialist

Transitions: An Argument

Ashwani Saith

Primary Accumulation in the Soviet Transition

Mark Harrison

Agrarian Reform as a Model of Accumulation:

The Case of Nicaragua since 1979

E. V. K. FitzGerald

THE JOURNAL OF DEVELOPMENT STUDIES

1986 Subscription Rates

£75.00 Institutions

£38.00 Individuals

Frequency: Four times per year

1986 - Vol. 22 No. 1

FRANK CASS

Gainsborough House, 11 Gainsborough Road, London E11 1RS, England

Tel: 01-530 4226

Telex: 897719

Gorbachev and the Third World: an era of reform?

At the time when this article is being written, Mikhail Gorbachev has been in power for twenty-eight months. This is about half the period of a normal term in office for many Western leaders, but in the case of the Soviet Union we can perhaps expect to see Gorbachev at the helm in the Kremlin into the next century. During the past two years the new Soviet leader has made numerous personnel changes at all levels of decision-making, drawn up a new Party Programme, and instituted radical economic and political reforms. These changes have been ratified by a Party Congress and Plenums of the Central Committee of the Communist Party. In effect we have a new government with a new manifesto. In this article I will examine Gorbachev's objectives and strategy toward the Third World, provide an assessment of Soviet policies in this arena since 1985, and finally make some tentative predictions for the future.

The two revolutions that provide a reference point for Gorbachev in the late 1980s are not those of February and October 1917, but that of rising expectations and the scientific and technological revolution. Both are related to the aims within the economy: the first being to prevent an increase in 'social contradictions' (now acknowledged to be a problem); the second being to develop high technology in order to be able to compete in global markets. Increased consumption for the Soviet population and the development of high technology are also linked to Soviet national security interests. Failure to meet domestic demands for more and better goods could at the least lead to discontent and increasing disaffection among the population, and at worst create a situation similar to that of Poland in 1980. Failure to develop high technology industries would not only mean poor economic performance in the global competition for markets, but also the increasing inferiority of Soviet weapons in comparison to those being produced in the West. Economic growth is thus linked both to Soviet domestic stability and to Soviet military capabilities, each essential for the maintenance of Soviet national security. It is not surprising, therefore, that Gorbachev's main priority is to restructure the Soviet economy.

Gorbachev has made it clear that this domestic priority largely determines the conduct of Soviet foreign policy. The General Secretary himself has referred to the state of the Soviet economy in the late 1970s and early 1980s as in a 'pre-crisis' phase.¹ As such, the remedy required radical, even 'revolutionary' steps. The Brezhnev legacy was one of declining economic growth rates, corruption and political inertia. The Soviet Union had achieved strategic military parity with the USA, which marked a significant shift in the global balance of power. However, despite the fears of many Western commentators, the Soviet Union's position in global politics, and with regard to its border areas, in 1985 would have given Gorbachev little cause for optimism. The largest land border between two states is that between the Soviet Union and China (4,673 miles); not only had the Sino-Soviet rift remained unhealed, but China in the 1970s had actually moved closer to the USA. The Soviet Union shares a long border with Iran (1,227 miles); the continuing war in the Gulf, on the USSR's southern periphery, remains a major source of concern to Moscow. The threat of Islamic fundamentalism, while it should not be exaggerated, should likewise not be discounted as a potential destabilising force in Soviet Central Asia. The long border with Afghanistan (1,481 miles) has recently been penetrated by Afghan guerrillas, threatening to spread the Afghan war into Soviet territory. Looking westwards, political instability in Poland (sharing a 755-mile border with the Soviet Union) was undermining the cohesiveness of the Warsaw Pact. Romania (an 812-mile border) was in dire economic straits, and Turkey (sharing 382 miles of border) was engaged in increasing polemics with neighbouring Greece, threatening at any moment to engage in military conflict. Soviet-US relations had effectively reverted to a Cold War stance with little prospect of an arms control agreement. Western Europe, despite fierce opposition from large segments of public opinion, had begun to deploy a new generation of medium-range nuclear weapons aimed at the Soviet Union. The Reagan Administration's Strategic Defence Initiative (SDI) threatened to extend the arms race into space and, given US technological superiority, to subvert strategic parity in favour of the USA. In the Middle East the Soviet Union's principal client state, Egypt, had shifted allegiance to the USA, effectively excluding the Soviet Union from any significant participation in the peace process. The Palestinians were divided and Syria, which supports Iran in the Gulf war, had shown on a number of occasions its independence of the Soviet Union. In the late 1970s Somalia abruptly ended its close ties with Moscow.

¹ Soviet Weekly (London) 30 May 1987.

The gains the Soviet Union is said to have made in the Third World in the 1970s do not, it may be argued, compensate for the loss of Egypt and Somalia. Those gains have in any case been costly, with the new allies possibly of dubious loyalty and benefit to the Soviet Union. Ethiopia and Angola are two of the poorest countries in the world, riven by conflict and reliant on the Soviet Union essentially for a single commodity: military hardware. Vietnam costs the Soviet exchequer a daily figure estimated variously at between US$1 and US$3 million. Cuba, Moscow's relatively long-standing and only close ally in the Western hemisphere, costs considerably more (up to US$9 million per day). Overall, the domestic and international situation which Gorbachev inherited from his predecessors left much to be desired, and the new General Secretary has made clear his intention to rectify his country's poor standing in global politics.

How does Gorbachev intend to improve the Soviet Union's position, and what specifically does this mean for Soviet Third World policy? In his speech to the Central Committee in March 1985 he stated that his objective was to ensure that the Soviet Union attains the 'highest world levels of production'.² At the 27th Party Congress in February 1986 he outlined some of his domestic economic reform proposals, adding that 'Our activity in the sphere of foreign economic contacts must be tied up more closely with the new tasks. There should be a large-scale forward-looking approach to mutually advantageous economic relations.'³ It is clear that Gorbachev's basic objectives in resolving the Soviet Union's economic problems will result in a reduced commitment to aid those poor Third World countries most prone to radical revolution. Gorbachev barely mentioned regimes of 'socialist orientation' in his Congress address, in stark contrast to Brezhnev's emphasis on such regimes in his Congress speeches as General Secretary. In a report to the Central Committee in June 1985 Gorbachev justified his policies by reference to Lenin, arguing that socialism would have influence on the rest of the world only through its own economic achievements.⁴ He went on to warn against the dangers of 'recent years' in becoming dependent upon the West for technology and manufactured goods, the 'lesson' being that the Soviet Union must be 'totally independent of the capitalist countries'. He was not here advocating autarky in the Stalinist mould, but rather self-sufficiency in basic manufactured goods. Gorbachev acknowledged that Soviet products were poor competitors on the international market, hence the solution proposed was to improve the quantity and quality of Soviet exports.

² Pravda (Moscow) 12 March 1985.

³ Pravda, 25 February 1986.

⁴ In M S Gorbachev, Izbrannye rechi i stat'i, Moscow, Politicheskaya Literatura, 1985, pp 108-36.

As part of this strategy Gorbachev is seeking to strengthen Soviet economic relations with the more dynamic, capitalist-oriented states of the Third World. In the new (revised) Party Programme, reference is now made to the 'newly-liberated' countries, with no separate section on 'national liberation movements', as there was in the 1961 edition. Countries of 'socialist orientation' do get a brief mention in the new Programme, but the Soviet commitment to them is restricted to assistance that is 'within its means' to provide. The Soviet Union expects such countries to develop 'mostly by their own efforts', and not by relying on large injections of Soviet economic aid.⁵ The Programme does, however, explicitly state the new Soviet commitment to improve relations with the newly-liberated states 'following a capitalist path of development'.

In political terms, too, Gorbachev wishes to build up diplomatic links with these states in order to gain more influence and leverage in global politics, and to exploit anti-US sentiments. The Soviet leadership in the 1970s expected to increase its influence in global politics as a direct result of attaining strategic parity with the USA. Also, with an increased power projection capability and the capacity to supply military hardware to Third World client states, Brezhnev's Politburo hoped the correlation of forces would shift in their favour as radical regimes in Africa, Asia and Latin America requested Soviet military assistance. In the late 1980s the Gorbachev Politburo has come to realise that a sound economy and a more sophisticated and flexible diplomatic strategy are more conducive to enhancing Soviet state interests.

It is interesting that Gorbachev is now putting into practice something which has long been advocated by a number of scholars and Third World specialists in the Moscow-based area institutes of the Soviet Academy of Sciences. There has been a spate of literature in the West that traces changing Soviet perceptions of the Third World, the global economy, US politics, the dynamics of capitalist development, and revolutions of national liberation, largely based on their writings.⁶ Three years before Gorbachev came to power, the policy that he is now pursuing towards the Third World was strongly championed by Karen Brutents, deputy head of the International Department of the Central Committee, in an article in Pravda.⁷ Viktor Volskii, the head of the Latin American Institute in Moscow, has also given his support for such a change in policy orientation.⁸ Cuba and Vietnam are large economic burdens to the Soviet Union, and in the specialist literature and in statements of public officials criticism of this burden is often implicit. It is also acknowledged by many in Moscow that Cuba and Vietnam do not provide an attractive model of economic development for other Third World states to emulate—particularly as such a model entails huge amounts of Soviet aid.⁹

⁵ See Programma Kommunisticheskoi Partii Sovetskogo Soyuza, Moscow, Politizdat, pp 64-6.

⁶ See, for example, Jerry Hough, The Struggle for the Third World: Soviet Debates and American Options, Washington DC: Brookings Institution, 1986.

So what impact has Gorbachev's new foreign policy focus had in practice? First, there have been a large number of personnel changes and these in themselves tell a story, indicating that the USA is still uppermost on the Soviet foreign policy agenda. It makes a difference who the leader is in any political system, although systemic factors obviously serve to constrain and limit the power any particular individual has in implementing his or her chosen policy. For example it makes a difference whether a Reagan or a Carter is in the White House, a Thatcher or a Kinnock in residence at No. 10, Downing Street. Likewise it makes a difference in the Soviet Union who occupies the post of General Secretary of the Communist Party. Whilst bureaucratic politics are clearly important in the formulation and execution of policy, it will also make a difference whether a Perle or a Shultz, a 'hawk' or 'dove', heads a particular organisation or ministry. In Britain there are Tory 'wets' (although in ever decreasing numbers) and Thatcherites, and their respective weighting in Cabinet will be reflected in the kind of decisions the government reaches. Given that there is only one party in the Soviet Union, and a single party line, it is far more difficult to identify different policy orientations among individuals, especially given the secretive nature of the system. However, it is not impossible.

In a very short space of time Gorbachev succeeded in revamping the Soviet leadership, removing his chief contender for General Secretary, Romanov, from the Politburo. Romanov was a hard-liner who advocated a more confrontational approach to the USA and was far less willing than Gorbachev to make concessions in order to reach arms control agreements.¹⁰ Gromyko, the stiff, uncompromising figure who had served for thirty years as Foreign Minister, was replaced by Shevardnadze, a slick, astute and intelligent Gorbachev loyalist. Ponomarev, who had served as head of the International Department since the 1950s, was retired in 1986 and replaced by Dobrynin, former Ambassador to the USA. Ponomarev, who joined the Bolsheviks in 1919 at the tender age of fourteen years, had a special interest and expertise in the Third World, national liberation and the world revolutionary process. Unlike Ponomarev, Dobrynin had not been a party ideologue before taking up his new post but a professional diplomat. Yakovlev, the new man in the Party Secretariat who coordinates Soviet propaganda on international relations, is likewise a former diplomat, having served previously as Soviet Ambassador to Canada. The new First Deputy Head of the International Department, Vitalii Shaposhnikov, is also not an expert on the Third World, but rather a specialist on Western Europe. Another West Europeanist, Anatoly Chernayaev, has recently taken over from Aleksandr Agentov as foreign policy adviser to the General Secretary. Georgii Arbatov, a leading Americanist and head of the US Institute in Moscow, continues to enjoy influence in the Kremlin. Konstantin Katushev, who served as Soviet Ambassador to Cuba from 1982 to 1986 is now the Chairman of the State Committee for Foreign Economic Relations—an organisation also responsible for foreign aid disbursements. Katushev had earlier served in the Central Committee Secretariat, and he is thought to be an economic hard-liner when it comes to giving aid to poor Third World states. At lower levels of the Foreign Ministry and the party apparatus there seems to be a trend towards the appointment of specialists on Europe and the USA, and fewer specialists on the Third World. One Third World specialist whose star has risen, Karen Brutents, is among those who have been advocating a change of direction for Soviet foreign policy, in courting states such as Mexico, Brazil, Argentina, India, the Philippines and the oil-rich states in the Gulf.

⁷ Pravda, 21 February 1982.

⁸ Pravda, 8 August 1985.

⁹ See on this Yu. Novopashin, 'Vozdeistvie real'nogo sotsializma na mirovoi revolyutsionny protsess', Voprosy filosofii, (8) 1982, pp 3-16.

These personnel changes at the top of the Soviet foreign policy decision-making process suggest, despite some Western commentaries to the contrary, that Gorbachev still views the world in essentially bipolar terms. There are more US specialists in positions of authority than ever before. US-Soviet relations are still by far the most important in Soviet global calculations, and in many Third World areas the USA is still a central consideration in the formulation of foreign policy. This is perhaps inevitable given the realities of the international system and the central roles played by the superpowers in global politics. Whereas Khrushchev, in attempting to place missiles in Cuba in 1962, and Brezhnev, in his African adventures in the 1970s, both underestimated or failed to understand US concerns and perceptions or the effects these would have on superpower relations, Gorbachev, with a far more sophisticated team of advisers, is very much aware of the impact of Soviet behaviour in the Third World on US-Soviet relations. Gorbachev is very unlikely to risk a superpower crisis over unstable, impoverished Third World states of dubious loyalty or benefit to the Soviet Union. This is not to imply Soviet inaction and unilateral restraint. Far from it. It is rather to suggest a more sophisticated, pragmatic, cautious and self-interested approach in Soviet Third World policy.

¹⁰ These differences in policy orientation between Gorbachev and Romanov come out clearly if one compares their writings and public pronouncements before the death of Chernenko.

In reviewing the first two years of Soviet foreign policy under Gorbachev, it is clear that the new Soviet leader has indeed made a difference in Soviet relations with the Third World, in style and in substance, although it is still too early to give a definite assessment of failures and successes. In terms of his overall economic priorities, Gorbachev has instituted a number of reforms in the way foreign trade is conducted. Between 1975 and 1985 the volume of trade between the Soviet Union and the thirty-nine poorest countries in the world (those designated by the UN as the 'least developed countries') increased fivefold. But with all developing countries (LDCs) taken together (i.e., including the more dynamic Third World economies) the increase was only two-and-a-half times during this same period—and the rate of increase has been slowing. As a percentage of Soviet foreign trade, the LDCs accounted for only 3.9 per cent in 1950, but this figure had increased to over 13 per cent by 1970, reaching 15 per cent by 1981 (see Table 1). By 1985, however, as the table demonstrates, as a percentage of Soviet foreign trade the LDCs accounted for only 12.2 per cent. By the beginning of the 1980s LDCs taken together conducted only 6 per cent of their foreign trade with the socialist bloc, which marks an increase of only 1 per cent since the mid-1960s. The problem, as Gorbachev recognises only too well, is that the Soviet Union has been unable to compete with the West in exporting manufactured goods. The principal Soviet export earner has been fuel and raw material products. Gorbachev noted at the 27th Party Congress that these account for 66 per cent of exports to the capitalist market, and yet in 1986 prices have

Table 1: Soviet foreign trade (as a percentage of total)

	1950	1960	1970	1975	1980	1985
CMEA:	57.4	53.1	55.6	51.8	48.6	54.9
Other socialist (PRC, Yugoslavia, North Korea):	23.7	20.1	9.6	4.5	5.1	6.2
Developed capitalist:	15.0	19.0	21.3	31.3	33.6	26.7
LDCs:	3.9	7.9	13.5	12.4	12.7	12.2

Sources: Various editions of the annual statistical collection Vneshniaia Torgovlia, Moscow, Finansy i Statistiki.

fallen by some 50 per cent. Gorbachev stated that it is necessary for the Soviet Union to reduce raw materials as a percentage of exports in favour of manufactured goods.

In order to stimulate production and raise the quality of Soviet manufactured goods, Gorbachev has extended his domestic economic restructuring (perestroika) programme into the field of foreign economic relations. Between August 1986 and January 1987 four important new decrees have been ratified which give increased freedom to a number of large enterprises and ministries to engage directly in foreign trade activity.¹¹ V M Kamentsev, Soviet Deputy Prime Minister, outlined these new reforms at a Moscow press conference in March 1987, estimating that during the course of the year some 40 per cent of export/import operations of machinery and equipment would be conducted outside direct state control. He stated that by January 1987, sixty-seven large enterprises and twenty-one ministries had been given the right to engage independently and directly with foreign companies.¹² These reforms are supported by the new Soviet Minister for Foreign Trade, Boris Aristov, who replaced Nikolai Patolichev, the incumbent from 1968 to 1985. Whereas Patolichev had worked his way up through the Party apparatus, Aristov is a representative of the new technical political elite, having earlier worked as Chief Technologist at a large engineering plant in Leningrad. Aristov has diplomatic experience too, having served in Warsaw as Soviet Ambassador during the crisis in Poland in 1980. It is perhaps worth pointing out that Gorbachev's new appointee (from December 1985) as Soviet Minister of Finance, Boris Gostev, also has a technical background with a specialism in light industry. Definite moves have been made, therefore, to restructure decision-making in the field of foreign economic relations aimed at improving the Soviet domestic economy and encouraging economic ties with the Third World for mutual economic advantage.

¹¹ The text of these four decrees were published as a supplement to Vneshniaia Torgovlia (3) 1987.

¹² Pravda, 28 March 1987.

In the diplomatic realm, too, there has been a corresponding shift in Soviet foreign policy towards the Third World. The moderate, capitalist-oriented states with larger markets, more dynamic economies and regional influence have been the targets of this new diplomatic offensive. Whilst Gorbachev has expressed 'sympathy' for the poor states seeking 'national liberation' from 'neo-colonial oppression', he is actively courting the larger, relatively rich states in Latin America, Asia, Africa and the Middle East.¹³ Gromyko in all his years as Foreign Minister never once set foot in Africa or mainland Latin America. His successor, Shevardnadze, has already paid an official visit to Mexico, and Gorbachev himself will be in Mexico City later this year, as well as in a number of other Latin American capitals; he has also accepted invitations to visit African countries, including Algeria, Madagascar and Mozambique. Diplomatic relations have recently been established with the oil-rich states of Oman and the United Arab Emirates. Shevardnadze has visited a number of Pacific states, and Indonesia, the Philippines and Thailand are all actively being courted. Jordan, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia are similarly targets of Soviet diplomacy. Diplomatic relations with Egypt have improved significantly following a temporary break in official ties, and tentative steps have been made to restore diplomatic relations with Israel. But the one relationship that is held up as a model for others to follow is that between the Soviet Union and India, and it is significant that of all Third World countries it was India that received an official visit from Gorbachev, in November 1986.

In relation to regional conflicts, international debt, and international terrorism, Gorbachev has expressed his commitment to international cooperation to solve these problems through agencies such as the UN. Soviet officials now constantly refer to interdependency, the indivisibility of security, the inter-relatedness of politics and economic, and the need to strengthen the role of international law. Gorbachev has asserted that

The world is in a process of swift changes, and it is not within anybody's power to maintain a perpetual status quo in it . . . What is required is . . . tactical flexibility, a readiness for mutually acceptable compromises, and an orientation on dialogue and mutual understanding rather than on confrontation.¹⁴

¹³ See his speech to the Central Committee, Pravda, 12 March 1985.

Gorbachev has called for a political solution to the conflicts in Afghanistan, Kampuchea, the Middle East, Central America and Southern Africa. He has put forward proposals for nuclear free zones in the Asian/Pacific region and the Mediterranean. And he has expressed support for the Group of 77's demand for a New International Economic Order (NIEO). But what do all these reforms, diplomatic initiatives, and proposals amount to in practice? In order to answer this question I will now turn to a more detailed examination of Soviet policy in different Third World theatres.

Asia and the Pacific region

In the hierarchy of Soviet interests in the Third World, this region has always been the most important. The Soviet Union itself is a power in Asia, with two-thirds of its territory and the bulk of its rich natural resource endowments to be found east of the Urals. The Soviet Far East is of critical importance for the Soviet economy and for Soviet security. In a speech to party activists in Siberia, Gorbachev noted that by the turn of the century the Soviet Far East will account for over 70 per cent of fuel supplies for the USSR, 25 per cent of electric power, 33 per cent of non-ferrous metals and 25 per cent of chemical products. He also stressed the geopolitical importance of the area as the Soviet Union's outlet to the Pacific, a '... dynamic region which plays an increasing role in world politics'.¹⁵ His speech focused upon the economic potential of the region, which, he stated bluntly, was not being adequately tapped. Gorbachev envisages Vladivostok (now a closed city to foreigners) becoming a major international trading centre, or, as he put it himself, the Soviet Union's 'window to the East'.¹⁶ In order to develop the Soviet Far East, Gorbachev has offered foreign companies the opportunity to engage in joint ventures in establishing industrial enterprises. In this context Japan, as the region's economic superpower, is obviously the most attractive potential partner. Indeed, in May 1987 the foreign trade association, Tekmashimport, signed an agreement with a group of Japanese companies for the construction of a plastics complex in Blagoveshchensk in the Soviet Far East. This represents the ¹⁴ Gorbachev's Congress speech translated in Soviet News, 26 February 1986.

¹⁵ Gorbachev, Izbrannye rechi i stat'i, pp 233-54.

¹⁶ Pravda, 29 July 1986.

GORBACHEV AND THE THIRD WORLD

Soviet Union's largest foreign contract for many years, valued at around US$600 million.¹⁷ In the Third World arena Indonesia, the Philippines, Thailand and Burma offer the best potential markets in the Asia/Pacific region for imports and exports with the Soviet Union. As Table 2 demonstrates, Soviet trade with these states has increased in the 1980s. Foreign Minister Shevardnadze paid a visit to Indonesia in March 1987, and the Thai Foreign Minister visited Moscow in May 1987. These are the target states for increasing economic ties for mutual benefit, and some headway appears to have been made during the past two years.

It is India, as Table 2 clearly shows, that is the Soviet Union's main trading partner in Asia. Indeed Soviet trade with India is greater than

Table 2: Soviet foreign trade with Third World countries (million roubles)

	1970	1975	1980	1985	1986
Africa
Algeria*	118.3	247.0	155.1	405.2	327.8
	62.5	112.3	92.6	132.3	88.4
	55.8	134.7	62.5	272.9	239.4
Angola			84.9	96.5	158.2
	—	—	69.1	94.0	154.9
			15.8	2.5	3.3
Cameroon	7.5	36.6	10.4	39.6	31.0
	0.6	1.9	5.2	8.2	7.1
	6.9	34.7	5.2	31.4	23.9
Congo	1.5	4.2	14.3	9.9	10.3
	0.8	1.8	9.7	5.8	4.9
	0.7	2.4	4.6	4.1	5.4
Egypt	606.4	710.3	383.7	590.1	531.8
	326.9	262.0	172.7	282.5	263.6
	279.5	448.3	211.0	307.6	268.2
Ethiopia	2.1	5.3	146.5	317.2	182.3
	1.3	3.2	120.8	282.6	153.1
	0.8	2.1	25.7	34.6	29.2
Ghana	49.7	57.0	122.6	39.4	55.8
	9.9	10.7	0.3	1.0	1.0
	39.8	46.3	122.3	38.4	54.8
Guinea	14.2	34.1	64.0	98.5	87.0
	11.2	19.7	13.2	40.5	35.9
	3.0	14.4	50.8	58.0	51.1

¹⁷ Soviet Weekly, 30 May 1987.

THIRD WORLD QUARTERLY

	(million roubles)
	1970	1975	1980	1985	1986
Ivory Coast	1.9	32.7	79.7	130.2	128.9
	0.4	13.2	2.9	4.6	5.9
	1.5	19.5	76.8	125.6	123.0
Liberia	0.4	3.1	4.8	—	—
	0.4	2.6	1.8
	—	0.5	3.0
Libya	12.9	18.8	450.9	961.2	730.6
	12.9	18.8	163.4	83.4	35.2
	—	—	287.5	877.8	695.4
Madagascar	0.6	1.1	9.1	—	—
	—	—	6.0	—	—
	0.6	1.1	3.1	—	—
Morocco	50.1	86.9	198.0	178.7	118.1
	32.5	45.7	92.6	112.5	65.6
	17.6	41.2	105.4	66.2	52.5
Mozambique	—	—	19.6	85.6	59.6
			17.9	84.1	57.9
			1.7	1.5	1.7
Nigeria	31.2	108.3	99.6	190.1	109.4
	10.9	24.3	80.2	149.1	99.9
	20.3	84.0	19.4	41.0	9.5
Sierra Leone	1.6	2.2	8.3	—	—
	1.6	1.7	5.1
	—	0.5	3.2
Sudan	77.4	12.6	17.5	—	—
	32.5	4.7	5.6
	44.9	7.9	11.9
Tanzania	1.8	8.5	10.7	—	—
	1.1	2.6	0.8
	0.7	5.9	9.9
Tunisia	5.7	10.5	25.0	23.0	38.9
	3.1	3.5	19.5	11.4	19.7
	2.6	7.0	5.5	11.6	19.2
Asia
Afghanistan	66.9	132.2	504.7	873.6	786.7
	36.0	67.9	247.7	550.6	542.1
	30.9	64.3	257.0	323.0	244.6
Bangladesh	—	52.2	53.7	76.4	67.7
		37.2	27.2	41.5	49.9
		15.0	26.5	34.9	17.8

GORBACHEV AND THE THIRD WORLD

	1970	1975	1980	1985	1986
Burma	4.4	4.9	7.9	6.6	21.2
	3.0	4.5	6.4	—	1.2
	1.4	0.4	1.5	6.6	20.0
China (PRC)	41.9	200.9	316.6	1614.9	1822.0
	22.4	93.1	169.6	780.4	910.3
	19.5	107.8	147.0	834.5	911.7
Cyprus	9.3	16.8	42.6	33.1	23.1
	4.1	12.7	28.5	21.4	11.6
	5.2	4.1	14.1	11.7	11.5
India	364.9	685.6	1739.8	3084.4	2191.2
	122.3	292.1	861.2	1574.9	957.6
	246.2	393.5	878.6	1509.5	1233.6
Indonesia	29.5	28.6	59.9	94.2	45.4
	4.5	7.7	15.0	3.7	3.1
	25.0	20.9	44.9	90.5	42.3
Iran	231.2	509.7	334.6	348.4	76.0
	169.0	281.5	259.2	204.2	57.8
	62.2	228.2	75.4	144.2	18.2
Iraq	63.5	599.5	731.7	824.2	638.6
	59.4	274.1	473.2	261.5	293.0
	4.1	325.4	258.5	556.7	345.6
Jordan	6.4	4.0	14.1	—	—
	6.4	4.0	13.9
	—	—	0.2
Kampuchea	1.7	—	3.2	100.3	122.7
	0.3		1.6	91.2	114.0
	1.4		1.6	9.1	8.7
Korean D.R.	329.3	338.2	572.1	1059.2	1207.9
	207.0	186.8	287.9	654.8	757.2
	122.3	151.4	284.2	404.4	450.7
Kuwait	10.0	3.5	16.7	—	—
	9.7	3.5	15.2
	0.3	—	1.5
Laos	—	—	37.3	87.9	67.3
			37.0	85.6	62.2
			0.3	2.3	5.1
Lebanon	17.5	21.4	17.2	12.4	9.2
	13.7	15.2	13.1	12.2	8.2
	3.8	6.2	4.1	0.2	1.0
Malaysia	112.6	102.1	207.5	191.2	104.2
	1.6	0.8	14.2	10.8	7.6
	111.0	101.3	193.3	180.4	96.6

THIRD WORLD QUARTERLY

	(million roubles)
	1970	1975	1980	1985	1986
Mongolia	230.9	480.4	883.6	1537.0	1547.4
	178.3	355.1	676.3	1150.3	1137.5
	52.6	125.3	207.3	386.7	409.9
Nepal	1.3	5.5	14.4	20.9	1.3
	0.7	5.0	9.2	15.7	0.1
	0.6	0.5	5.2	5.2	1.2
Pakistan	60.4	60.7	176.6	117.7	85.0
	32.1	37.1	126.2	58.6	37.1
	28.3	23.6	50.4	59.1	47.9
Philippines	—	12.8	134.2	39.7	17.4
		0.4	8.5	10.7	7.4
		12.4	125.7	28.8	10.0
Saudi Arabia	5.4	5.6	30.8	393.9	193.7
	5.4	5.6	30.8	15.1	18.6
	—	—	—	378.8	175.1
Singapore	8.4	14.5	83.3	90.3	62.6
	5.5	3.8	14.9	10.7	26.7
	2.9	10.7	68.4	79.6	35.9
Sri Lanka	17.0	22.4	30.3	38.1	25.1
	5.0	12.0	4.6	8.3	12.9
	12.0	10.4	25.7	29.8	12.2
Syria	59.1	167.8	321.0	514.0	472.5
	41.8	99.0	167.6	321.6	295.1
	17.3	68.8	153.4	192.4	177.4
Thailand	3.4	17.3	173.1	67.9	90.9
	2.6	4.0	8.6	13.4	10.2
	0.8	13.3	164.5	54.5	80.7
Turkey	83.3	95.3	443.1	316.1	220.5
	56.2	38.2	329.3	162.6	121.2
	27.1	57.1	113.8	153.5	99.3
Vietnam	183.2	206.5	612.4	1458.9	1612.7
	166.5	158.7	454.9	1176.1	1318.4
	16.7	47.8	157.5	282.8	294.3
North Yemen	11.0	5.6	48.1	15.2	10.1
	10.0	5.0	47.9	15.1	10.0
	1.0	0.6	0.2	0.1	0.1
South Yemen	4.5	13.9	61.2	153.7	107.2
	4.3	13.8	55.9	145.3	102.0
	0.2	0.1	5.3	8.4	5.2

GORBACHEV AND THE THIRD WORLD

	1970	1975	1980	1985	1986
Latin America
Argentina	29.9	304.4	1192.5	1292.9	245.7
	1.7	10.7	30.4	63.0	53.3
	28.2	293.7	1162.1	1229.9	192.4
Bolivia	3.1	12.6	25.5	—	—
	0.0	3.0	5.5
	3.1	9.6	20.0
Brazil	23.2	396.1	275.0	450.3	266.8
	2.4	93.3	22.1	70.3	30.3
	20.8	302.8	252.9	380.0	236.5
Chile	0.8	—	—	—	—
	0.5
	0.3
Colombia	10.9	9.0	21.1	26.4	4.9
	1.5	1.9	9.1	5.2	4.9
	9.4	7.1	12.0	21.2	0.0
Costa Rica	6.2	—	—	—	—
	—
	6.2
Cuba	1045.0	2589.0	4266.0	8017.5	7602.5
	580.0	1141.3	2288.4	3877.4	3802.3
	465.0	1447.7	1977.6	4140.1	3800.2
Ecuador	0.8	13.5	—	5.9	—
	0.1	0.6		1.1
	0.7	12.9		4.8
Guyana	—	24.5	—	—	—
		—
		24.5
Jamaica	0.7	11.2	—	—	—
	—	—
	0.7	11.2
Mexico	1.0	6.1	13.8	20.3	11.9
	0.7	4.4	11.9	4.2	4.3
	0.3	1.7	1.9	16.1	7.6
Nicaragua	—	—	5.6	213.1	284.1
			0.1	212.9	276.4
			5.5	0.2	7.7
Panama	0.1	2.6	15.1	7.1	10.5
	0.1	2.6	15.1	7.1	10.5
	—	—	—	—	—
Peru	0.3	118.5	13.3	119.8	84.4
	0.1	28.3	3.1	11.3	9.2
	0.2	90.2	10.2	108.5	75.2

	(million roubles)
	1970	1975	1980	1985	1986
Uruguay	1.8	15.0	23.8	65.9	24.9
	0.8	1.0	2.4	33.5	4.3
	1.0	14.0	21.4	32.4	20.6
Venezuela	—	0.2	—	—	—
	—	0.2	—	—	—

* In each case the first figure is the total volume of trade the second figure Soviet exports, and the third figure Soviet imports.

Sources: Vneshniaia Torgovlia SSSR, 1922-1981 (Moscow, Finansy i statistiki, 1985) and Vneshniaia Torgovlia, No. 3, 1987.

Soviet trade with Britain, and greater than the total volume of trade with the whole of Latin America (excluding Cuba). V Mordvinov, Katushev's deputy in the State Committee for Foreign Economic Relations, predicts that Soviet-Indian trade will increase 2.5 times between 1985 and 1992.¹⁸ Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi was the first foreign head of state to pay an official visit to the Soviet Union following Gorbachev's appointment as General Secretary, and on the eve of his visit the new Soviet leader gave an interview to an Indian press agency in which he held up Soviet-Indian relations as a model of peaceful coexistence in action.¹⁹ Gorbachev reiterated this during his Kremlin speech in honour of the visiting Indian Prime Minister on 21 May 1985.²⁰ In this speech Gorbachev spoke warmly of the long-standing, friendly and cooperative relationship the two states had enjoyed, based on 'equality and mutual respect', and predicted that the two sides would increase their ties to a 'qualitatively new level'. India has the longest-standing Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation with the Soviet Union of any Third World state (see Table 3), signed in 1971 for twenty years' duration. India has been allowed to manufacture Soviet weapons under licence on Indian territory for a number of years, including MiG fighter aircraft. There has also been a joint Soviet-Indian space flight.

The Soviet Union has maintained good relations with India without resorting to the application of political or military pressure. It has studiously avoided interfering in India's internal affairs or applying leverage to gain acquiescence in New Delhi in support of Soviet ¹⁸ V Mordvinov, 'SSSR-India: rost potentsiala ekonomicheskogo sotrudnichestva', Vneshniaia Torgovlia (4) 1987, pp 25-7.

¹⁹ Gorbachev, Izbrannye rechi i stat'i, pp 81-5.

²⁰ Gorbachev, Izbrannye rechi i stat'i, pp 88-92.

Table 3: Soviet Treaties of Friendship and Cooperation with Third World Countries

Country	Date	Duration
Egypt	May 1971 (abrogated March 1976)	15 years
India	August 1971	20 years
Iraq	April 1972	15 years
Somalia	July 1974 (abrogated November 1977)	20 years
Angola	October 1976	20 years
Mozambique	March 1977	20 years
Vietnam	November 1978	25 years
Ethiopia	November 1978	20 years
Afghanistan	December 1978	20 years
South Yemen	October 1979	20 years
Syria	October 1980	20 years
Congo	May 1981	20 years
North Yemen	October 1984	20 years

objectives. In a sense there has been no need, for both states share a number of common regional interests, including balancing the power of China, Pakistan, and the USA. Yet, by holding up Soviet-Indian relations as a model for other states in the Third World, Gorbachev is signalling that he is not so much interested in trying to spread socialism as in developing mutually advantageous political and economic relations with capitalist-oriented states, with larger markets and higher levels of development. Gorbachev returned Gandhi's visit to Moscow with a trip to India in November 1986. In a speech to the Indian Parliament he spoke about regional disputes between states, proposing the establishment within the UN of a 'multilateral centre for reducing the risks of war'. He also called for the implementation of conflict resolution methods contained in the UN Charter, including mediation, arbitration, judicial settlement, and regional agencies. Specifically for the Indian Ocean region, Gorbachev gave his full backing for an international conference on security which could lead to demilitarisation and the creation of a 'zone of peace'. He expressed a readiness to begin immediate negotiations with the USA and other non-littoral states for a mutual reduction of naval operations in the Indian Ocean, to hold talks with the USA and Asian countries on confidence-building measures, and to work out an international guarantee for the safety of sea lanes, including the Persian Gulf and the Straits of Hormuz. He also suggested international cooperation of combating terrorism 'on the seas and in the air'.²¹

Shevardnadze, too, has been actively promoting not only increased trade relations with Asian and Pacific countries but also the concept of a zone of peace in the Indian Ocean and in the South Pacific. His 'peace offensive' in May 1987 took him to Australia, Indonesia, Laos, Kampuchea and Vietnam. He had earlier held talks in New York with the delegates to the UK from Australia, New Zealand, Fiji, Papua New Guinea, the Solomon Islands and the Cook Islands, seeking to gain support for a treaty establishing a nuclear-free zone in the South Pacific. The Soviet Union has called for a Conference on Security and Cooperation in Asia and the Pacific, modelled on the Helsinki process in Europe. There is every reason to believe that Gorbachev's proposals are serious, and that the USSR is willing to make mutual concessions in order to reduce tensions in the area and to create more stable relations with all the states in the region. These include China, the other great military power in Asia, and here again some tentative moves have been made to improve Sino-Soviet relations and to close the rift which developed in the 1960s after the short honeymoon of the 1950s.

Yet Soviet proposals for a Conference on Security and Cooperation in Asia are not likely to make much headway, and Gorbachev's comparison with the Helsinki process in Europe is really quite inappropriate. By the 1970s the European theatre was fairly stable, and it was a relatively simple exercise to establish a conference to ratify the status quo. In contrast, the situation in Asia is far more complex, with no bisecting 'iron curtain' dividing the continent into two blocs. There is a war under way in Afghanistan and the question of Kampuchea, as well as historical rivalry between China and Vietnam, India and Pakistan, and India and China. Furthermore, the whole idea of an Asian Security Conference is a non-starter because even India, despite its cordial relations with the Soviet Union, has failed to endorse it. Whereas Brezhnev had sought to isolate China in Asia during the 1970s, Gorbachev is encouraging full Chinese participation in his proposals for regional security, and the Indian Prime Minister is worried that his own position could be weakened by any collusion between the two communist giants.

During a visit to Vladivostok in the summer of 1986, Gorbachev made a most important speech which was principally aimed at a Chinese audience. He correctly pointed out that China and the Soviet Union in the late 1980s have similar priorities in improving their domestic economies (through 'modernisation' in China, and perestroika in the Soviet Union), and hence it would serve both countries well to men their differences and engage in constructive economic relations. In order to facilitate this the Soviet leader gave some small but nevertheless positive indicators of good intent towards meeting some of the conditions Peking has placed in the path of a normalisation of relations. He promised to send home six Soviet regiments from Afghanistan by the end of 1986, and to withdraw 'a substantial part of Soviet troops from Mongolia'.²² Another stumbling-block to improvement in Sino-Soviet relations is the question of Kampuchea with the Chinese demanding a withdrawal of Vietnamese troops from the country. China perhaps overrates the leverage Moscow has over the Vietnamese, but nevertheless, indications suggest that Gorbachev is putting pressure on Hanoi to reach a political settlement. In June 1987 Le Duan, then General Secretary of the Vietnamese Communist Party, was informed during a visit to Moscow that Gorbachev wished to see improvement in Vietnam's relations with China—and it was always clear that this would involve a settlement of the Kampuchean question. When Nguyen Van Linh, Le Duan's replacement as General Secretary, was in Moscow in May 1987, he was told by Gorbachev that a solution to the problem lay in a process of national reconciliation and 'unification of all patriotic forces' in Kampuchea.²³ In 1986 there was a radical turnover in the leadership of the Vietnamese Communist Party and the new General Secretary has displayed a greater degree of flexibility than his predecessor on the Kampuchean question. However, a solution to the problem does not appear to be in sight, and Gorbachev cannot afford to risk alienating Hanoi in his quest to improve relations with China. Vietnam is extremely important to Moscow, as evidenced by Vietnam's entry into the CMEA and the signing of a bilateral Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation in 1978 (see Table 3). Cam Ranh Bay and Da Nang military installations represent for the Soviet navy and air force significant strategic bases which are highly prized by the Soviet military.

²¹ Gorbachev's speech to the Indian Parliament, see Soviet News, 3 December 1986.

Afghanistan is Gorbachev's most pressing problem in Asia. In his speech to the 27th Party Congress he referred to Afghanistan as ²² Pravda, 29 July 1986.

²³ Soviet News, 20 May 1987.

'bleeding wound', and expressed hope that Soviet troops would be withdrawn in the shortest possible time. However, speaking in terms of geopolitics, he also referred to Soviet 'vital interests' requiring a stable and friendly government in this neighbouring country.²⁴ The removal of six regiments from Afghanistan in 1986 was more symbolic, a gesture aimed at China rather than a significant move towards a complete withdrawal. However, Gorbachev clearly does wish to extricate himself from the imbroglio on the Soviet Union's southern periphery. Towards this end he has shown tactical flexibility and a willingness to compromise, being prepared to accept something substantially less than an ideal solution (i.e., a staunchly pro-Soviet Marxist-Leninist regime firmly in place in Kabul). Gorbachev recognises the complexity of the situation in Afghanistan, the lack of broad appeal that socialism has among the largely illiterate masses, and the need for what he terms a 'government of national reconciliation' which would incorporate all sections of Afghan society. In April 1986 Gorbachev engineered the removal of Babrak Karmal and his replacement by Najibullah, in the hope that he could create the conditions which would draw the opposition forces into a government of national unity. At the same time Gorbachev has given his support to the proximity talks between Afghanistan and Pakistan that take place under the auspices of the UN envoy, Diego Cordovez. A key to the success of these talks, Gorbachev argues, is the USA. In a speech in the Kremlin at a reception for Najibullah in December 1986, Gorbachev stated that if the USA really wished for a settlement in Afghanistan then the Reagan Administration should 'begin scaling down its interference' in Afghanistan's internal affairs.²⁵ It would appear that the General Secretary would be prepared to accept a neutral, coalition government in Kabul, and would agree to withdraw Soviet troops in stages if the USA and Pakistan were to cease their aid to the guerrillas. As part of the strategy to encourage national reconciliation, and as an important indication that the Soviet Union is not trying to impose a rigid socialist structure on the Afghans, Gorbachev is providing assistance to private entrepreneurs. Katushev was in Kabul in April 1987 to sign a new agreement on economic and technical cooperation, and part of this agreement provides assistance to the 'private sector' to further promote 'national reconciliation'.²⁶ Construction of a bicycle assembly plant and a leather goods factory are two of the private enterprise projects mentioned. The bulk of Soviet aid to Third World countries has most often been given to the state sector of the economy; thus this perhaps marks a significant departure from traditional practice.

²⁴ Pravda, 25 February 1986.

²⁵ Pravda, 13 December 1986.

²⁶ Soviet News, 22 April 1987.

Despite Gorbachev's attempts at a political solution to the Afghan war, however, the situation on the Soviet Union's southern border has worsened, with no solution in sight. Tension on the Afghan-Pakistan border has intensified, and more ominous are the recent reports in the Soviet press about incursions of Afghan guerrillas into Soviet Central Asia. In April 1987, Pravda and Izvestia reported incidents of missiles being fired across the border into a Soviet village and an attack on a small town in Tadzhikistan by groups of Afghan rebels, with the deaths of two border guards and a civilian, and two injuries, including that of a child.²⁷ Furthermore, as long as Reagan occupies the White House, the Mujahedin are likely to continue receiving military assistance and Pakistan is less likely to agree to a political settlement. Najibullah has proven to be less popular than Karmal, and the guerrillas have shown little sign of being interested in sharing power with the People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan which he heads. As with the USA in Vietnam in the 1970s, so Gorbachev in the 1980s needs to find an exit from Afghanistan which will not undermine his own domestic position nor his country's image as a superpower in global politics. This has so far proved an elusive task.

The Middle East

This is the Third World arena which, after Asia, is the next most important region on the Soviet foreign policy agenda. Gorbachev's call for an international conference to resolve the central issue of the Middle East, the Arab-Israeli conflict, is a continuation of long-standing Soviet policy. However, Gorbachev is pursuing this objective with more vigour than his predecessors and showing the same tactical flexibility that he has in other areas. It is apparent that Gorbachev realises that in the absence of unity in the Palestinian Liberation Organisation (PLO), or of official Soviet diplomatic ties with Israel, the Soviet Union's role in any such conference would be severely restricted. Syria's tendency to make maximalist demands on Israel has also been a stumbling-block. Gorbachev has attempted during the past two years to overcome these difficulties whilst at the same time seeking to increase the Soviet Union's dealings with other states in the region, and generally to play a much greater role in the Middle East than hitherto. Diplomatic relations were established with Oman and the United Arab Emirates in September and November 1985 respectively. Prime Minister Ryzhkov has held talks with the oil ministers of Arab states, and Moscow, as the world's largest oil producer, has cooperated in fixing stable prices on the world market. Trade with Saudi Arabia has increased substantially (see Table 2) during the past two years. Relations with Egypt have improved perceptibly under Gorbachev. In 1986 Vladimir Polyakov paid two visits to Cairo for negotiations on the situation in the Middle East and on the rescheduling of Egypt's debt to the Soviet Union. Polyakov heads the Soviet Foreign Ministry's Near Eastern Department, and is the former Ambassador to Egypt who was expelled by Sadat in 1981. Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister Vladimir Petrovsky visited Cairo in August 1986, paving the way for a new bilateral trade agreement between the two countries, the details of which were later worked out by the Chairman of the USSR State Bank who also spent two weeks in the Egyptian capital in December 1986. Since Gorbachev's rise to power a number of meetings have taken place between Israeli and Soviet officials, and although the Soviet Union denies that it is planning an immediate restoration of diplomatic relations (broken after the 1967 war in the Middle East) it is evident that this is the ultimate aim. The number of Jews being allowed to leave the Soviet Union for Israel is also increasing, which should perhaps be seen in the light of this objective.

²⁷ See Pravda, 2 April 1987, and Izvestia, 22 April 1987.

Gorbachev has achieved a significant amount of success with his diplomatic offensive in the Middle East. With the loss of Egypt to the Western camp in the 1970s the Soviet role in the Middle East was restricted to supporting the radical Arab states of Syria and Libya, the relationship in both cases largely restricted to arms transfers. This posed a number of problems for Gorbachev. Not only did this limited presence in the Middle East marginalise the Soviet role in the region, but Syria and Libya were seen in the West as sponsors of international terrorism; also, they both took an uncompromising stance against Israel, and they undermined the unity of the PLO and the Arab cause in general. Gorbachev has gone some way to rectifying this situation through a combination of sophisticated diplomacy and practical policies. He has successfully courted the more moderate Arab states, and, as already noted, substantially improved relations with Egypt. He has deliberately distanced himself from terrorism, openly denouncing those terrorist acts for which the West holds Libya and Syria responsible, and on 7 May 1987 the Soviet Union joined the International Convention Against Taking Hostages. Whilst seeking to gain some political capital out of the US air strikes on Libya in April 1986, the Soviet Union's active response was mild, and limited to diplomatic channels of communication. The Soviet Union does not have a Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation with Libya and it would be a misnomer to refer to Libya as an ally of the Soviet Union. Libya is a maverick in international politics, and Gorbachev would not wish to undermine his overall strategy of expanding Soviet ties with the more important countries in the region by linking the Soviet Union too closely with such an unpredictable regime as that of Tripoli. The Soviet Union has put pressure on Syria, which is dependent on Soviet military supplies, to agree to peace talks with the Israelis under the umbrella of an international conference. Gorbachev has also been putting pressure on President Assad to use his influence towards the unification of the PLO, beset as it has been with vicious faction fighting. During a visit to Moscow in April 1987 Assad was told by Gorbachev that he was '... saddened by disunity, frictions and conflicts in the Arab world which are vigorously exploited by the imperialists ...'²⁸ Gorbachev stressed the need for unity, and the importance of an international peace conference on the Middle East. It is probably not coincidental that Assad has moderated his position on negotiations, helped to restore unity to the PLO, and even held discussions with his traditional arch-enemy, Iraq. Due largely to the success of Gorbachev's tactics in the Middle East, more and more moderate countries, including extra-regional states, are recognising the legitimacy of an active Soviet role in any international peace conference.

This Soviet diplomatic offensive extends to the Gulf region, with Gorbachev showing a much greater willingness than his predecessors to take a more active role in ensuring the freedom of passage through the Gulf for merchant ships. Here it is Kuwait which has taken the initiative by requesting superpower naval protection for its tankers. The Soviet Union, which had already leased three Soviet tankers to Kuwait, responded positively. It was President Carter who defined the Persian Gulf as vital to American security interests. There was a high dependency of the West on Gulf oil, and central to the subsequent ²⁸ Soviet News, 29 April 1987.

'Carter Doctrine' was ensuring that the Gulf was safe from Soviet encroachment. With the Soviet display of a forward policy in the area, both diplomatically and militarily, the Reagan Administration felt obliged to take a more active role itself in showing the American flag in the Gulf. The Iran-Iraq War has made the Gulf a perilous place for both superpowers. A Soviet freighter was hit by an Iranian gunboat on 6 May 1987 and then, a month later, within hours of each other, a Soviet tanker struck a mine off the coast of Kuwait and the US frigate, Stark, was hit by a missile from an Iraqi fighter aircraft. Neither superpower struck back directly against the perpetrators, but both have shown a greater willingness to become more actively involved. This is certainly not a case of collusion between the superpowers to keep the Gulf open to international shipping, but rather an attempt by the Soviet Union to gain unilateral advantage and a response by the USA in order to maintain its leading position.

One of the objectives of the Brezhnev Politburo in the 1970s was to gain acknowledgment from the USA of the Soviet Union's status as a global superpower equal to the USA, and hence a political power whose participation would be essential for the resolution of major international disputes. Gorbachev believes that this was not achieved, partly owing to the weak economic and political links existing between Moscow and the Third World. Gorbachev's policy in the Middle East and the Persian Gulf should be seen in this light as the Soviet Union seeks to strengthen its political and economic ties with the more moderate states. By increasing the Soviet stake in the region, Gorbachev seeks to gain US acceptance of a greater Soviet role. This strategy appears to be gaining at least limited success as the question of Soviet participation in a peace conference to help solve the central Arab-Israeli dispute is becoming more widely accepted. Furthermore, there are strong forces in Washington advocating that the UN Security Council should have the responsibility of protecting the Gulf, which of course would give the Soviet Union a legitimate and important role in an area that the USA has (since the withdrawal of British influence after the Second World War) traditionally viewed as its own preserve.

Africa

Of the thirteen Treaties of Friendship and Cooperation the Soviet Union has signed with Third World countries since the 1970s, six have been with African countries (see Table 3). With the decolonisation process and the withdrawal of the European Colonial powers after 1945, Africa was the area which seemed to offer the best prospects for increasing Soviet influence. Indeed, Soviet interventions in African conflicts in the 1970s were largely responsible for undermining superpower détente, as the perception grew in the USA that Soviet behaviour in Angola and Ethiopia was designed to gain unilateral advantage and was incompatible with the basic principles thought to underlie the new relationship. Détente was therefore considered in Washington to be a one-way street favouring the Soviet Union in a 'zero-sum' game. However, the reality is somewhat different. Due to the changing structure of the international system, the collapse of the European empires, and the emerging bipolarity of the global balance of power, both the Soviet Union and the USA sought to take advantage of regional dynamics in the African continent. One of the failures of détente was the lack of any agreed rules of conduct for superpower behaviour in the increasingly important and unstable Third World arena. Khrushchev sought to buy influence for the Soviet Union by providing aid and assistance to the most radical African states; these were usually for the construction of high prestige projects such as the Aswan Dam in Egypt. Brezhnev's strategy, designed to achieve the same goal of increasing Soviet influence in Africa, was more pragmatic, as he sought to forge political and economic ties for mutual advantage with almost any state willing to reciprocate. However, where the opportunity arose, the Brezhnev Politburo did make substantial political, economic and military commitments towards those states considered 'progressive' and embarked upon a path of socialist orientation.²⁹

Reviewing the outcome of these previous policies in Africa, in March 1985 Gorbachev had little reason to feel satisfied. In Arab North Africa, Egypt had unilaterally abrogated the Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation and, as already noted, relations with Libya have proved to be a mixed blessing; if anything, they have served only to marginalise Moscow's influence in the Middle East. The Horn of Africa seemed at one point to hold the promise of becoming a socialist enclave in a geo-strategically important region, but the Soviet Union was unable to prevent the war in the Ogaden, and subsequently 'lost' Somalia, when Siad Barre unilaterally abrogated its treaty with Moscow in 1977. In southern Africa the two states where the Soviet Union did gain influence following the collapse of the Portuguese empire in the 1970s are both poor and struggling against economic decay and armed insurgencies. In the case of Zimbabwe, Brezhnev had backed the losing Nkomo faction in the struggle for independence with the result that Prime Minister Robert Mugabe initially distanced himself from Moscow. Other states labelled as 'progressive', such as Madagascar and the Seychelles, had strengthened their ties with the West, and even the key client states of Angola and Mozambique, whilst heavily dependent on the Soviet Union for military supplies, have actually increased their trade dependency on the West since independence. The Soviet impact in Africa is minimal and tenuous. So what, if anything, is Gorbachev doing to improve the situation?

²⁹ See Peter Shearman, 'Soviet foreign policy in Africa and Latin America: a comparative case study', Millennium 15(3) Winter 1986, pp 339-66.

It is evident from a reading of Gorbachev's speeches and statements on Soviet foreign policy that he has drawn a number of lessons from past failures. Decolonisation, on which so much store was set, is now all but complete and the Soviet Union did not make the gains that were expected in Africa. Nationalism, which the USSR sought to take advantage of, has not, as it was earlier hoped, naturally led to a socialist path of development. Supplying military equipment to those few states that have taken a progressive path, and cooperative intervention with the Cubans in areas of conflict, have not resulted in Soviet leverage and influence over its clients. The most telling example here is the Accords of non-aggression that South Africa signed with Angola and Mozambique, which were opposed by Moscow and mediated by Washington. The Soviet Union was unable to use its good offices, even had it wished to, for it has no official diplomatic relations with South Africa; as in the Middle East, Moscow's political influence is marginalised by its restricted diplomatic relations. The Soviet Union may be a military superpower in the global arena, but politically and economically in comparison to the USA it is a mouse. The lesson for Gorbachev lies in an appreciation of the need for the Soviet Union, if it wishes to strengthen its position in Africa, to increase its political stake in the continent. As we have noted in the above section, Gorbachev has achieved some success in the Middle East in part by improving political and economic relations with Egypt.

If Gorbachev's rhetoric is any guide he is seeking to improve his position in Africa, and the Third World generally, by a sophisticated diplomatic offensive designed to appeal to some of the core interests many Third World countries share. The catchword under Gorbachev has become 'disarmament for development' and many of his disarmament proposals are diplomatic responses to the demands of Third World states for arms control agreements between the superpowers.³⁰ Gorbachev has also taken up the question of the New International Economic Order, arguing for a more equitable economic relationship between advanced industrial countries and the LDCs.³¹ Concerning conflict resolution in the Third World, Gorbachev articulates support for mediation through the UN and respect for international law, and for mutually acceptable compromises and dialogue.³² Gorbachev's public diplomacy reveals a power politician who recognises the inadequacy of the military instrument for the furthering of Soviet interests in a competition for influence with the USA. This is not to say that the Soviet Union is about to relinquish its military support to established client states such as Angola and Ethiopia. Rather, it is to say that Gorbachev will be unwilling to take on any more military aid commitments in Africa as long as he has the primary goal of improving the political and economic standing of the Soviet Union.

During his first two years in power, Gorbachev has had some success in Africa, but this has been due more to regional and local factors than to skilful diplomacy. However, where opportunities have materialised Gorbachev has been cautious not to commit the Soviet Union too deeply or to impair his other African objectives, again having learnt from past mistakes in the 1970s. President Gaafar Numeiri of Sudan, for example, was overthrown in a coup in 1985 and his successors began making overtures to Moscow, releasing a number of communists from prison in a gesture of goodwill. Under Numeiri's sixteen-year rule, Soviet-Sudanese relations were severely strained, but now the prospects looked promising for re-establishing close links with this geo-strategically important country, lying proximate to Egypt, Libya, Chad and Ethiopia. Relations have improved between the two countries, but Soviet coverage of internal developments in the Sudan has been fairly neutral, marked by a cautious 'wait-and-see' approach.³³ In an earlier period, these events would have been viewed in Moscow in a very positive light, providing an opportunity to step in with offers of Soviet assistance. However, the Sudan is in the midst of a civil war and suffers from famine, economic decay and a major refugee problem.

³⁰ See for example Gorbachev's speech at a Kremlin dinner in honour of the Angolan leader Dos Santos, Pravda, 7 May 1986.

³¹ Gorbachev articulated support for the NIEO in his Congress speech.

³² This line of argument can be found in a number of Gorbachev's speeches.

³³ Pravda, 9 May 1986.

nificantly, when the new Prime Minister, Sadiq al-Mahdi, visited Moscow in August 1986, he was not given the opportunity to meet Gorbachev, and no substantive bilateral agreements were concluded.³⁴

The Soviet Union has also improved relations with Zimbabwe since Gorbachev's rise to power. After initially distancing himself from Moscow, Mugabe paid a visit to the Soviet capital in December 1985 and negotiated a number of collaborative projects. In 1986, Harare hosted the summit of the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM), an organisation to which Gorbachev attaches importance in disseminating Soviet propaganda on disarmament issues and the NIEO. Mugabe's position as current Chairman of the Non-Aligned Movement thereby makes Zimbabwe a more important target state for Gorbachev's diplomacy than many other African states. Between 1985 and 1987 the Soviet Union has also re-established ties with Liberia, and increased economic and military links with Nigeria and Tanzania. During this period a number of African leaders visited Moscow and Gorbachev has accepted invitations to visit some of the African states, including Nigeria, Madagascar and Mozambique.

The Soviet Union has long been the principal supplier of arms and aid to the African National Congress (ANC) in its struggle against the apartheid regime in South Africa. This continues to be the case under Gorbachev, but there is evidence that the Soviet position on South Africa is becoming less radical and more pragmatic. For example, Gorbachev has made it clear that he does not support terrorism against civilian population, and Gleb Starushenko of the Soviet Academy of Sciences sees the Zimbabwean road to independence as the model for South Africa. In a conference paper Starushenko referred to the need for 'compromise' and 'guarantees' for the minority white population. His suggestion is for a two-chamber parliament, one of which would be based on equal representation and the right of veto for each community.³⁵ One Western specialist on African affairs suggests that these Soviet proposals '... come closer to the views of President Botha than his advisers than to the African National Congress'.³⁶ Gorbachev is distancing himself from those advocating maximalist demands in regional conflicts in order to gain wider influence with the more Pravda, 12 August 1986 and Pravda, 13 August 1986.

Gleb Starushenko, 'Problems of struggle against racism, apartheid and colonialism in South Africa', paper presented at the Second Soviet-African Conference, Moscow 24-26 June 1986. Colin Legum, 'Soviet theoretician favours peaceful negotiations in South Africa', Colin Legum's Third World Reports, Richmond, Surrey: CSI Syndication Service, 13 January 1987.

moderate states and thereby to achieve legitimacy and acceptance for a Soviet role in the peace process alongside that of the USA. Gorbachev has called for a political solution to the conflicts in Southern Africa, based on mutual compromise between the antagonists, and under the auspices of the UN. Discussions have also been held between the USA and the Soviet Union on regional stability in Southern Africa and, although they have not made any headway in resolving the problems, it is significant that the superpowers are now communicating on the very regional issues that undermined their relations in the 1970s.³⁷

Latin America

Latin America has traditionally been an area of little concern to the Soviet Union, strategically, economically and politically. Given its place in what the Soviet leadership viewed as the US sphere of influence, little real attempt has been made to penetrate the area. The exception, of course, is Cuba, and this unique relationship is a legacy of the Khrushchev and Brezhnev eras. Had the Cuban revolution occurred in 1979 rather than 1959, it would most likely not have been integrated into the socialist bloc's economic sub-system. It has been noted above that Khrushchev's Third World strategy was to offer large amounts of aid to radical regimes in an attempt to 'wean them away from the Western orbit. It is remarkable that the one successful outcome of this strategy should be an island in the Caribbean just ninety miles off the coast of Florida, in the Western hemisphere. However, Cuba is an expensive drain on the Soviet economy, costing an estimated US$9 million a day in aid and credits. Gorbachev has made it clear that other Third World states should not look upon Cuba as a developmental model, for no longer is the Soviet Union willing or able to provide aid on such a large scale. Nicaragua is a case in point, for since the Sandinista Revolution of 1979, whilst Soviet aid and trade with Managua have increased substantially, Moscow's commitment is relatively modest. Gorbachev is supplying the Sandinistas with military equipment sufficient to defend the revolution against the 'Contras', combined with only small amounts of economic aid. Gorbachev is aware that any radical increase in the degree of Soviet involvement in Nicaragua would not only stretch further the Soviet economy, but would run the risk of alienating countries, such as Mexico, that have become the main target for his foreign political and economic strategy. He is not willing to undermine relations with Mexico by engaging in risky and costly adventures in the poorer states of Central America.

³⁷ Pravda, 7 March 1986, reports on a meeting between C Crocker, US Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs and V M Vasev, head of the Soviet Foreign Ministry's Third African Department for talks on Southern Africa.

It is noteworthy that Soviet specialists and policymakers do not refer to Nicaragua as a state of 'socialist orientation', which indicates that Nicaragua is not accorded a particularly important status in Soviet eyes. When President Daniel Ortega was in Moscow in April 1985, Gorbachev offered only 'diplomatic support' in defending the Nicaraguan revolution, a clear message to the Sandinistas that the Soviet leadership is not prepared to offer any direct military assistance.³⁸ The Soviet Union does not have a single Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation with a Latin American state, not even with Cuba (although the resolution of the missile crisis can be viewed as a guarantee against US military intervention).

Since 1985 a number of leading government figures from Latin American states (including Argentina, Brazil, Mexico and Uruguay) have visited the Soviet Union where the discussions have focused upon improving economic ties and forging closer cooperation in the fields of science and technology. By establishing joint collaborative projects with the more developed Third World states the Soviet Union could possibly be hoping to gain access to technology which it has been unable to get from the West. The Soviet Foreign Minister, Edvard Shevardnadze, paid a visit to Mexico in October 1986, and then in May 1987 his Mexican counterpart, Bernardo Sepúlveda, held talks in the Kremlin with Gorbachev. During this visit a new agreement was signed on cultural and scientific cooperation, and trade between the countries was expected to increase from US$18 million in 1986 to US$300 million during the next five years.³⁹ Gorbachev told the Mexican Foreign Minister that it was not the Soviet Union's objective to 'stage a series of socialist revolutions' in Latin America, for this would run counter to 'the new mode of thinking and the entire foreign policy concept to which we adhere'.⁴⁰ The Soviet leader expressed his support for the Contadora peace process in Central America and stated that he had no desire to interfere in relations between the USA and Latin America. Gorbachev has accepted an invitation to visit Mexico later in 1987, as well as a number of other Latin American states. The agenda has not yet been drawn up, but thus far there has been no mention of a visit to Managua, and rumours in Moscow have it that he may not even pay a courtesy call on Castro in Cuba. Clearly Gorbachev is seeking to give the Soviet Union an image of a status quo participant in international relations, and to integrate the USSR into the world economy whilst distancing himself somewhat from the more radical revisionist Third World states. It is significant, as one Western correspondent pointed out, that the Libyan Foreign Minister, who was in Moscow during the same period as the Mexican Foreign Minister, was not given an audience with Gorbachev, and his visit passed almost without mention, whereas Sepúlveda's visit was given massive coverage in the Soviet media.⁴¹ Mexico has the longest-standing Latin American ties with the Soviet Union (and Cuba) and is the major regional power in Central America, an influential participant in inter-American relations, a member of the Five Continent Peace Initiative, an important influence in the Non-Aligned Movement, and a developing country with a potential market for Soviet trade. It is just such a state which has become the chief focus of Gorbachev's new foreign policy strategy.

³⁸ Pravda, 30 April 1985.

³⁹ See Latin American Weekly Reports (London) 14 May 1987.

⁴⁰ Soviet News, 13 May 1987.

Strictly speaking, Cuba should not be included in the Third World category, for as a member of the Council for Mutual and Economic Assistance (COMECON), Cuba is part of what the Soviet Union refers to as the 'world socialist system' or the 'socialist commonwealth'. Nevertheless, for our purposes, it is useful to place Cuba in the Third World and to assess briefly Soviet-Cuban relations under Gorbachev. Cuba has been Moscow's most reliable ally in the Third World—despite some early antagonisms and tensions. By the 1970s the Soviet Union and Cuba shared common objectives and engaged in close cooperation and coordination in order to attain them (for example, in Angola and Ethiopia).⁴² However, Soviet priorities have changed under Gorbachev and there may be a growing prospect of renewed strains in Soviet-Cuban relations as a consequence. At a reconvened session of the Cuban Communist Party's Third Congress, Castro attacked certain tendencies in the party which oppose his new disciplinary and moral crusade. These are apparently '... groups of technocrats ... with strong sympathies for and professional connections with the Soviet Union'.⁴³

⁴¹ The International Herald Tribune, 26 May 1987.

⁴² However, one should be careful not to underestimate Cuba's independence of action in the conduct of its foreign policy. See Peter Shearman, The Soviet Union and Cuba, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul/Royal Institute of International Affairs, 1987.

⁴³ Latin American Weekly Report, 11 December 1986.

In April 1987, Viktor Chebrikov, a member of the Politburo and head of the security services (KGB), visited Havana where he briefed Castro on the Soviet Union's perestroika campaign.⁴⁴ Two years earlier Mikhail Solomentsev, another member of the Politburo, was in the Cuban capital, and stated in a speech that the 'most important international duty' of the CPSU (Communist Party of the Soviet Union) was to ensure 'growth in the Soviet economy' and the 'well-being of the Soviet people'.⁴⁵ In his fraternal speech to the Cuban Party Congress, Egor Ligachev, the second most important figure in the Soviet Politburo, referred to the need for Cuba to rectify its poor economic record.⁴⁶ The Cuban economy has been in dire straits for the past couple of years, and the message from the Kremlin is that Castro should put his own house in order, as Gorbachev is himself trying to do in Moscow. To add to his problems, Castro now has to pay above world market prices for Soviet oil imports, and the price the Soviet Union pays for Cuban sugar is fixed at roughly the 1986 price for the next five years.

It is instructive to note the different approaches that the two leaders are taking to overcome similar structural economic problems. Whereas Gorbachev is introducing limited market mechanisms and small-scale private enterprise, Castro has recently abolished private peasant markets, outlawed the selling of private houses, and imposed more stringent centralised control over the economy. Whereas Gorbachev is appealing to economic instincts to motivate the labour force, Castro is tightening up on discipline and appealing to moral incentives to stimulate production. In foreign economic relations, whereas Gorbachev does not view the Soviet-Cuban link as a model for other Third World states, Castro argues that the type of economic relations existing between the two countries be established with other LDCs. And whereas Castro has consistently proposed non-payment by Third World states of their international debts, Gorbachev has consistently advocated a political solution to the debt crisis. The restructuring process that is at the centre of Castro's concerns is the NIEO, and here he argues that the Soviet Union, as part of the industrialised North, shares a similar obligation to the former colonial powers to redirect a percentage of GNP to Third World development. Gorbachev, whilst voicing support for the NIEO, does not feel that the Soviet Union has responsibility to share the burden for Third World development with the 'neo-colonialist' powers which have been exploiting the poorer states. These marked differences in perceptions and policies are relevant to our analysis of Gorbachev's Third World policy, for they demonstrate the extent to which Gorbachev's domestic economic priorities affect foreign economic ties.

⁴⁴ Granma Weekly Review, 15 April 1987.

⁴⁵ SSSR-Kuba: Dokumenty druzhby i solidarnosti, Moscow: Politicheskaya literatura, 1985, pp 39-47, p 44.

⁴⁶ Soviet News, 12 February 1986.

Conclusion

It is evident that Gorbachev's Third World policy is subordinate to and dependent on the Soviet leader's other more important objectives. That Soviet national security and state interests take precedence over any commitment to socialism in the LDCs, with Soviet policy towards the Third World indeed designed to further these interests, is not a new phenomenon, but can be traced back to the 1920s. Elizabeth Valkenier shows how the Third World has been consistently manipulated to serve Soviet state interests, with any changes in policy simply reflecting responses to transformations in the international system and Soviet domestic priorities.⁴⁷ In the immediate post-revolutionary period after 1917, the colonies were briefly viewed as important in the pursuit of world revolution. From the late 1920s through to the mid-1950s this faith in world revolution evaporated as Stalin set about, at tremendous cost, constructing socialism in one country. In the 1950s and 1960s Khrushchev's policy was designed to extricate the Soviet Union from 'capitalist encirclement' by challenging the West's global alliance structure and offering large amounts of aid to selected developing states. In the 1970s, having gained military parity with the USA, the Brezhnev Politburo sought to gain acceptance as a political equal with a legitimate role to play in the Third World arena. Superpower détente (political, economic and military) was the principal goal, and the Third World in the early period of détente was accorded second place to improving relations with the USA. However, the Nixon Administration never intended to give Moscow the equal status it sought. It rather hoped to contain Soviet influence in the Third World through a strategy of linkage, combined with sophisticated diplomacy designed to exclude the Soviet Union from areas where it already had a stake. This US strategy was successful in the Middle East after the October War of ⁴⁷ On this point see Elizabeth Valkenier, 'Soviet decisionmaking and policy in Central America', in Peter Shearman and Phil Williams (eds), The Superpowers, Central America and the Middle East, London: Brassey's/Pergamon, forthcoming 1988.

1973, and thereafter the lack of ground rules for superpower behaviour in the Third World resulted in both sides seeking unilateral advantage in areas of regional conflict. Ultimately, Soviet policy in Angola, Ethiopia and Afghanistan helped to undermine the détente process, and with the election of Ronald Reagan to the White House, superpower relations reverted to their earlier Cold War character. In each period, then, Soviet Third World policy has been opportunistic and designed to further Soviet state interests, rather than the interests of the Third World.

Since the mid-1980s Soviet Third World policy, as this article has documented, has similarly been designed to promote Soviet interests. This is not obvious if one takes some of Gorbachev's statements out of context. The new Soviet leader often refers to the interdependence of global politics and economics and the need to pool international resources in order to assist the Third World to overcome problems of debt, poverty and hunger. Vadim Zagladin, a Deputy Head of the International Department, sees global problems in systemic terms, hence he calls for a systemic solution to overcome problems such as declining scarce resources in the face of an increasing world population, ecological problems stemming from man's impact on nature, and international security issues.⁴⁸ Gorbachev and Zagladin appear to be articulating views similar to those expressed by Jimmy Carter during the early period of his presidency, reflecting a concern with issues of global interdependence and the North-South divide. I am not here suggesting that Gorbachev is merely putting out propaganda and veiled rhetoric in order to conceal a Soviet grand design of spreading socialist revolution. His statements may well reflect a genuine perception of the complexities of global problems, but this does not imply a change in the Soviet hierarchy of interests or that the Third World is now seen separately from the interests of the Soviet state. Rather, Gorbachev realises that if the Soviet Union wishes to increase its influence in the Third World, and he clearly does wish this for his country, then a different strategy to that of previous periods is called for.

Gorbachev realises that the military instrument is no longer a useful means of gaining lasting and stable influence in the Third World (a lesson learned most graphically and painfully in Afghanistan). He also realises that the dominance of US influence in the Third World is due more to the strong American economy than to any other factor, and therefore the Soviet Union needs to strengthen its own economy and productive forces in order to be able to compete effectively with the USA in global politics. As noted, Gorbachev has stated that the Soviet Union must reach world levels of production in order to stave off domestic discontent and to enable the Soviet Union to play the international role of a real superpower. The military instrument is not a viable proposition, and the economic instrument is as yet not competitive; thus, Gorbachev is employing a political strategy to increase Soviet influence in the Third World in competition with the USA. Verbal support for the NIEO and positive responses to proposals from the Non Aligned Movement and the Five Continents Peace Initiative are designed as much to give the Soviet Union credibility and legitimacy as a global power as they are to alleviate the problems of the Third World. Gorbachev is a power politician in a new mould, but a power politician nonetheless. With skilful diplomacy he has already increased the Soviet Union's prestige in the international arena even whilst Soviet troops remain in Afghanistan. Many leading Israelis and Americans now recognise the Soviet Union's right to participate in an international conference on the Middle East, many states in the Asian/Pacific region view the Soviet Union as a useful trading partner, and the larger Latin American states are strengthening their political and economic ties with Moscow. Gorbachev has gone a long way towards creating the image of the Soviet Union as a traditional participant in international affairs, which has actually been the reality almost since the Russian Revolution of 1917. The Soviet Union's foreign policy has always been formulated according to the demands of the domestic situation and the changing structure of the international system. Domestic economic problems and the complex and unpredictable nature of Third World politics have helped to shape a more pragmatic, moderate, less risk-taking Soviet foreign policy. Were the right person in the White House, whilst these forces are in operation and Gorbachev is at the helm in the Kremlin, it could be a most opportune moment to lessen international tensions and to help alleviate some of the problems which superpower competition has hitherto exacerbated in the Third World. For such a possible confluence of forces, we will have to await the outcome of the next US presidential election.

⁴⁸ See V V Zagladin, 'Programmnye tseli KPSS i global'nye problemy', Voprosy filosofii (2) 1986.

Test case for the Reagan Doctrine: the covert Contra war*

It is much easier and much less expensive to support an insurgency than it is for us and our friends to resist one. It takes relatively few people and little support to disrupt the internal peace and economic stability of a small country.

—CIA Director William Casey
13 March 1982

As Ronald Reagan enters his last year as US President, overthrowing the Sandinista government in Nicaragua continues to dominate his foreign policy agenda. Notwithstanding the major scandal over illegal aid to the 'Contras' and strident debate over future official US assistance, his Administration remains committed to a course of escalating intervention. This obsession, overshadowing all other foreign policy issues during the Administration's two terms in office, has ensured that the CIA/'Contra' campaign against the Sandinistas will become the heritage of the Reagan presidency. Thus, to assess Reagan's probable place in history and the significance of the so-called Reagan Doctrine of 'rollback', it is necessary to examine the evolution and implications of the US war on Nicaragua.

Genesis of the covert war

By the time Ronald Reagan assumed office in 1981, the Carter Administration had already expended $1 million in covert funds to organise and bolster internal opposition groups in Nicaragua. Nevertheless, Carter's limited efforts to manipulate the course of the Nicaraguan Revolution were considered insufficient by the new Administration hardliners who viewed the Sandinistas' very existence as a challenge to US hegemony in the Western hemisphere. Achieving a modus vivendi with the Sandinist Front of National Liberation (FSLN) was all but ruled out from the beginning. Instead, the new team in Washington decided to make Nicaragua a test case of the Reagan Doctrine of taking the offensive against revolution in the Third World.

* This article is adapted from the author's book, Nicaragua: The Price of Intervention, Washington DC: Institute for Policy Studies, 1987 and appeared, in part, as a chapter in Thomas W Walker (ed) Reagan vs. The Sandinistas, Colorado: Westview Press, 1987.

'We had just witnessed a five-year period where the Soviet Union tried out a stratagem of sponsoring guerrilla movements that would topple moderate regimes, and install their own totalitarian successor, and they had phenomenal success . . . in Angola, Ethiopia, South Yemen, Cambodia, Afghanistan, Mozambique [and] Nicaragua'; that is how the former National Security Adviser, Robert McFarlane, explained to Congress in May 1987 the impetus for applying the Reagan Doctrine in Nicaragua. Administration officials believed that failure to react so close to home would encourage the Soviet Union and jeopardise American ability to dictate events elsewhere in the Third World. 'If we could not muster an effective counter to the Cuban-Sandinista strategy in our own backyard, it was far less likely that we could do so in the years ahead in more distant locations', McFarlane continued. 'We had to win this one.'¹

Within the incoming Administration a general consensus existed on this objective but not on the means to accomplish that goal.² In early meetings of the National Security Council, Alexander Haig, Reagan's first Secretary of State, advised 'a determined show of American will and power' and a 'high level of intensity at the beginning'.³ To bolster his case that the covert war needed to go 'to the source' of revolution in Central America, Haig ordered Robert McFarlane to draw up an options paper, 'Taking the War to Nicaragua', that weighed the possibility of the open use of force against Cuban ships and planes and a naval blockade against Nicaragua.⁴

Yet the President's advisers, including Vice-President George Bush, Secretary of Defence Caspar Weinberger, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, vetoed Haig's call to war. Any overt display of force, they reasoned, would conjure up the image of 'another Vietnam' in the mind of the public, divert resources from more important battlefields in Europe and the Middle East, and jeopardise the Administration's efforts to garner congressional support for its domestic and foreign policy agenda.⁵

¹ See McFarlane's testimony before the special committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives investigating illegal arms sales to the 'Contras', 11 and 13 May 1987.

² For a description of early debates within the administration, see the Wall Street Journal (New York) 5 March 1985. See also William M LeoGrande, 'The United States and Nicaragua', in Thomas W Walker (ed), Nicaragua: The First Five Years, New York: Praeger, 1985, pp 425-46.

³ See Haig's memoirs, Caveat, New York: Macmillan, 1984, p 129.

⁴ Los Angeles Times, 3 March 1985.

⁵ Haig describes the objections of Reagan's advisers in Caveat, pp 129-30.

The decision to opt for a covert tack against the Sandinistas reflected the tension between Reagan's commitment to 'project American power abroad' and the political constraints on sending US troops into a Central American quagmire. Against the backdrop of the 'Vietnam Syndrome'—widespread public opposition to US military involvement in Third World conflicts—CIA operations emerged as the centrepiece of a low intensity warfare strategy that incorporated economic destabilisation, psychological operations, and diplomatic pressures.⁶

Initiation of the proxy war

The Reagan Administration's strategy depended on the creation of a proxy force of exiles such as the one the CIA had used to overthrow the Arbenz government in Guatemala in 1954 and in its failed effort to oust Fidel Castro at the Bay of Pigs in 1961. Accordingly, in 1981 a new generation of CIA-backed counter-revolutionaries emerged. The 'Contras', as this force came to be known, could bring direct pressure on Nicaragua's fragile economic institutions, complementing US efforts to undermine the economy from abroad. Moreover, implementing US policy through a surrogate paramilitary army enabled Washington to invoke a 'plausible denial' of responsibility for the 'Contras' actions, shielding the Administration from accountability to Congress and the US public.

The surrogate supply network

Revelations of CIA responsibility for the mining of Nicaragua's harbours provoked an avalanche of criticism at home and abroad. Around the world, Washington's allies openly castigated the CIA's action as a flagrant violation of international law. In Congress, even staunch Republican supporters of the 'Contras' such as the Chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, Barry Goldwater, joined liberal Democrats in expressing outrage.⁷ Both the House and the Senate passed bipartisan resolutions condemning the mining operation.

The political uproar marked a turning point in the willingness of ⁶ For an analysis of low-intensity warfare as a new military strategy of intervention, see Sarah Miles, 'The Real War: Low Intensity Conflict in Central America', North American Congress on Latin America (NACLA), May/June 1986.

⁷ In a scathing letter to Casey, Goldwater wrote that he was 'pissed off' at not being fully informed about an operation that he called 'an act of war' and a 'violation of international law.' See Time, 23 April 1984.

Congress to look the other way while the Reagan Administration violated international codes of conduct in pursuit of the goal of overthrowing the Sandinistas. Yet, even as it became apparent in 1984 that the Democrat-controlled House of Representatives would not pass further aid for the 'Contras', a White House emissary, L-Colonel Oliver North, was dispatched to Honduras to assure FDN leaders that 'President Reagan remain[s] committed to removing the Sandinistas from power,' and that the Administration would 'see to it that they received all the support that was necessary for that purpose'.⁸

To fulfil that promise, President Reagan authorised the National Security Council to create a surrogate network that would provide funds, training and armaments to the 'Contras'. The plan called for Oliver North, then an aide to Robert McFarlane, to work through designated intermediaries, such as retired Major-Generals Richard Secord and John Singlaub, to keep the FDN financially, materially, and militarily afloat.⁹ By the time Congress passed a second 'Boland Amendment' in October 1984, banning all 'direct and indirect' aid to the 'Contras', the Administration's surrogate 'Contra' aid network was already in place, and a real covert war was well underway.

This surrogate system relied upon four components: support from foreign governments such as Saudi Arabia, Israel, South Korea and Singapore; a covert re-supply operation directed by Richard Secord; right-wing 'humanitarian aid' organisations in the USA; and paramilitary groups willing to lend men and matériel to the 'Contra' cause. Operating from the basement of the White House with the blessing, if not full knowledge, of the President, the operation was carefully designed to provide 'plausible denial' of any Administration involvement.

Documents and testimony provided to the Senate and House Select Committees investigating what is now called the 'Iran/'Contra' affair' indicate that in the late spring of 1984, National Security Council officials approached both Israel and Saudi Arabia for assistance in sustaining the 'Contras'.¹⁰ Israel eventually supplied weapons. But by July 1984, Saudi Arabia was funnelling US $1 million a month into a Grand Cayman Islands bank account controlled by the 'Contras'. In response to a personal request from President Reagan in February 1985, King Fahd doubled his financial contribution. 'From July 1984 through February 1985, the FDN received $1 million per month, to reach a total of $8 million', North reported to McFarlane concerning Saudi contributions on 11 April 1985: From February 22 to April 9, 1985, an additional US$16.5m has been received for a grand total of US$24.5m. Of this, US$17,145,594 has been expended for arms, munitions, combat operations, and support activities.¹¹ By May 1986, Saudi Arabia had contributed approximately US$32 million to the 'Contra' effort.

⁸ Quoted in Peter Kornbluh, 'Machiavellian obsession: Reagan's effort to undermine Nicaragua', The San José Mercury News, 3 May 1987.

⁹ For a description of the plan see the Associated Press, 10 June 1986. For an overall view of the NSC network, see Robert Perry and Brian Borger, 'Reagan's Shadow CIA', The New Republic, 24 November 1986.

¹⁰ See the testimony of Richard Secord and Robert McFarlane, 5 May 1987 and 11 May 1987.

Most of these funds were used to finance an international covert network—codenamed 'Project Democracy'—set up by the former Special Operations expert, Major-General Richard Secord, to procure, transport, and airdrop arms to the 'Contras'.¹² Secord and his Iranian-born business partner, Albert Hakim, were 'almost co-equal lieutenants' of Oliver North, according to the initial Senate investigation.¹³ 'Dick [Secord] can do something in five minutes that the CIA cannot do in two days', North reported to Rear-Admiral John Poindexter, McFarlane's successor as National Security Advisor. North wrote in another memo that Hakim was the man who 'ran the European operation for our Nicaraguan resistance support activity'.¹⁴

In December 1984, less than ten weeks after Congress cut off official aid to the 'Contras', Secord's associates began to acquire massive quantities of rifles, ammunition, grenades, rockets and explosives in Portugal and Poland, using false documents provided by the Guatemalan military, and front companies in Canada, the USA and Switzerland.¹⁵ Funds to pay for these munitions were laundered through a complex maze of international bank accounts and dummy corporations set up by Hakim. In 1985 and 1986, more than 800 tons of

This 'top secret' memorandum is cited in the Tower Commission Report, New York: Times Books, 1987, p 458. Hereafter referred to as the Tower Commission.

The network also included Robert Dutton and Richard Gadd, both retired military officials with Air Force Intelligence backgrounds. In El Salvador, missions were overseen by two former CIA Cuban Americans, Felix Rodriguez, a Bay of Pigs veteran, and Luis Posada Carilles, who is believed to have masterminded the October 1986 bombing of an Air Cubana jetliner over Barbados, which killed seventy-three people. On Secord's role see the New York Times, 6 December 1986. See also the Washington Post, 7 December 1986.

Cited in Kornbluh, 'Machiavellian obsession . . .'

ibid.

The documentation, known as 'End-user Certificates' were supplied by Guatemala in return for increased US security assistance. Secord originally used a Montreal company, Trans-World Arms, as a front for purchasing the arms in Europe but later created a fictitious firm, Energy Resources International, to acquire the weapons.

weapons were transported by air and sea to El Salvador and Honduras for the covert war.

On the ground in Central America, Secord's 'Project Democracy' established an elaborate air-resupply system to ferry weapons to 'Contra' bases along the Honduran/Nicaraguan border, and inside Nicaragua. Facilities in El Salvador, Honduras, and Costa Rica were utilised for this operation. In San Salvador, Ilopango International Airport—codenamed 'Cincinnati'—served as 'the primary operational support base', according to documents released during the Iran/'Contra' hearings in May 1987. It was the main depot for storing arms and the service centre for six ageing aircraft used to airdrop equipment to the 'Contras'. El Aguacate—codenamed 'The Farm'—an airfield in southern Honduras—long used as a command-and-control post by the CIA, provided a 'forward operating location' for 'Contra' supply missions into northern and central Nicaragua. 'The Plantation', a clandestine 6,520 feet long airstrip in northern Costa Rica, provided an alternative refuelling and emergency landing site for aircraft flying airdrops to 'Contra' bases in southern Nicaragua.¹⁶

Under the supervision of the Restricted Interagency Group (RIG) (made up of Oliver North, Assistant Secretary of State Elliott Abrams, and the Director of the CIA's Central America Task Force, Alan Fiers) the Secord operation began flying dozens of 'Contra' resupply missions in April 1986.¹⁷ When Saudi money to finance these operations began to run out, US officials initiated the transfer of millions of dollars in profits from arms sales to Iran into a Geneva bank account controlled by North, Secord and Hakim as a way to sustain the 'Contras' until official US assistance could be restored. In July 1986, North noted in a memorandum to his superior, Vice-Admiral John Poindexter:

We are rapidly approaching the point where the Project Democracy assets in CentAm need to be turned over to the CIA for use in new programs. The total value of the assets (six aircraft, warehouses, supplies, maintenance facilities, ships, boats, leased houses, vehicles, ordnance, munitions, communications equipment and a 6,520 runway) is over $4.5 million. . . . All of the equipment is in first-rate condition and is already in place.¹⁸

'Project Democracy's' sophisticated covert operations were camouflaged by a highly visible campaign of domestic support for the ¹⁶ For a full description of the assets and operations of 'Project Democracy', see evidence released during Richard Secord's testimony before the Joint Select Committee on 5 May 1987.

¹⁷ Associated Press, 14 January 1987.

¹⁸ Tower Commission, p 467.

'Contras' in the USA. 'Contra' charity became a cause célèbre of the new Right—encouraged, facilitated and, at times, secretly orchestrated by Administration officials, to divert attention away from the real source of rebel supplies. 'The name of one of several existing non-profit foundations we have established in the course of the last year,' North wrote in a 16 March, 1985 memo to McFarlane, 'will be changed to Nicaraguan Freedom Fund, Inc. Several reliable American citizens must be contacted to serve as its corporate leadership.'¹⁹ President Reagan then endorsed the organisation which his Administration had helped to create. As he later wrote to the head of the Freedom Fund, a 'Contra' charity ostensibly created by the Unification Church-owned newspaper, The Washington Times, 'Your efforts to help have my whole-hearted support.'²⁰

Working in concert with Colonel North, General John Singlaub emerged as the driving force behind an ostensibly private nationwide fund-raising campaign for the 'Contras'. As chairman of the US Council for World Freedom, an organisation chartered in 1981 to aid 'freedom fighters around the world,' General Singlaub became the principal generator of non-lethal aid to the 'Contras' in the USA, claiming by late 1984 to be raising $500,000 a month.²¹ Through his position as head of the World Anti-Communist League (WACL), moreover, he collaborated with North to raise funds from Asian countries for the 'Contras' campaign. Singlaub also contributed—along with paramilitary groups such as Soldier of Fortune and Civilian Military Assistance—men to the 'Contra' cause. During a trip to Central America in March 1985, the general met with FDN leaders and promised to recruit 'a few American trainers' with 'specific skills' to fill in for CIA agents legally prohibited from working with the 'Contras'. Singlaub informed North that 'these will be civilian (former military or CIA personnel) who will do training only and not participate in combat operations.'²²

North, however, did recruit professional mercenaries for special combat operations. In December 1984, according to documents released during the hearings in the spring of 1987, he approached a retired British SAS commander, David Walker, about conducting paramilitary missions inside Nicaragua. 'Walker suggested that he

¹⁹ 'Fallback plan for the Nicaraguan Resistance', 16 March 1985. p 2.

²⁰ Kornbluh, 'Machiavellian obsession'.

²¹ The Council's tax returns for 1985 show grants totalling only US$270,745. See Internal Revenue Service Form 990, statement of Program Services Rendered, 1985.

²² Tower Commission, p. C-4.

TEST CASE FOR THE REAGAN DOCTRINE

would be interested in establishing an arrangement with the FDN for certain special operations expertise aimed particularly at destroying [Soviet-built] HIND helicopters.' North wrote in a memo to McFarlane: 'Walker quite accurately points out that the helicopters are more easily destroyed on the ground than in the air.'²³

In early 1985, North informed his 'Contra' liaison, Robert Owen, that Walker's people were engaged in 'sabotage work in Managua', and in a memo to McFarlane of 11 April 1985, he indicated plans for 'a special operations attack against Sandino airport with the purpose of destroying the [HIND] helicopters and the Sandinista maintenance capability'. However, a demolition raid of this kind never came to fruition, for after scouting the helicopter base, Walker told Adolfo Calero of the FDN that Nicaraguan security was too heavy to conduct a successful mission.²⁴

Restoring official aid to the 'Contras'

The Reagan Administration's surrogate support system enabled the 'Contras' to expand their ranks, acquire new weapons, and launch scattered but not insignificant attacks inside Nicaragua. Most important, the illicit aid network salvaged the 'Contras' from political extinction in Washington, buying time for the Administration to mount an effective propaganda campaign aimed at forcing Congress to restore official US assistance.

Beyond his role as military strategist, North served as a key political planner and propagandist for the 'Contra' cause. As internal NSC memoranda show, he proffered an endless stream of suggestions for keeping the 'Contra' issue in the political limelight. In March 1985, for example, he recommended a 'fallback plan for the Nicaraguan Resistance.' According to North's scenario:

The President would announce on or about April 2 [that] the American people should contribute funds ('... send your check or money order to the Nicaraguan Freedom Fighters, Box 1776, Gettysburg, PA. . . .') to support liberty and democracy in the Americas. He would note that monies raised would be used to support the humanitarian needs of those struggling for freedom against Communist tyranny in Central America.

'By necessity,' North wrote, 'the speech must be dramatic and surprise. It cannot be leaked in advance.'²⁵

²³ See Peter Kornbluh, 'What North might have wrought', The Nation, 27 June 1987. p 887.

²⁴ ibid.

²⁵ 'Fallback plan . . .' p 1.

This plan was implemented in part. On 15 April 1985, eight days before a crucial vote in Congress on the Administration's request for $14 million in aid to the 'Contras', Reagan did make a major speech at a banquet for the Nicaraguan Refugee Fund, a new 'Contra' charity. Although he did not solicit donations, he lauded those who attended: 'You are America at its best.'²⁶

This initial attempt to sway Congress failed; the Bill was narrowly defeated; but, prompted by Daniel Ortega's ill-timed trip to Moscow, and the creation, at North's direction, of yet another civilian front for the 'Contras'—the United Nicaraguan Opposition (UNO)—the House of Representatives reversed its previous decision in June 1985, voting US$27 million in non-legal aid.

The new legislation maintained the ban on CIA participation in the war, other than in providing intelligence data to the 'Contras'. Nevertheless, the Nicaraguan Humanitarian Aid Office (NHAO), created by Congress to disperse the funds, served as a vehicle for funnelling arms to the 'Contras'. The principal air freight company contracted by NHAO to ferry 'humanitarian' supplies to the 'Contras' was owned by members of Richard Secord's network. The firm, AirMach, received over US$400,000 from the NHAO to fly clothing, medicines and foodstuffs from the USA to Central America. Once there, however, its planes were used by US operatives to drop guns and ammunition into Nicaragua.²⁷

Moreover, the passage of humanitarian aid served as a bridge to the Administration's February 1986 request for $100 million for a full resumption of the CIA's war against Nicaragua. Throughout spring 1986, US officials, led by the President, waged an intense propaganda campaign to save the 'Contras'.

At that time, passage of the 'Contra' Aid Bill seemed unlikely. Reports of 'Contra' corruption, drug-running and human rights violations filled the newspapers. On the political front, a power struggle between the three 'Contra' leaders of UNO, Adolfo Calero, Arturo Cruz, and Alfonso Robelo, had produced cracks in the civilian façade that would eventually lead to the break-up of the organisation. 'The Nicaraguan resistance remains without a political infrastructure inside Nicaragua or a clear political message to give to the Nicaraguan people', ²⁶ Kornbluh, 'What North might have wrought', p 888.

²⁷ Internal NHAO memoranda show payments of $182,000 to AirMach, a company owned by Secord associate Richard Gadd, and another $80,000 to Vortex Air, a Miami-based company with no planes. For a description of their activities see the Associate Press, 13 November 1986. See also, the New York Times, 4 December 1986.

a House Select Committee on intelligence evaluation stated in March 1986. 'It has never developed urban support. In fact, years of US assistance have not produced an insurgency capable of sustaining itself among the population in Nicaragua.' According to the classified assessments of the CIA and DIA, the Intelligence Committee noted, 'only US forces could truly resolve the conflict in Nicaragua on a military basis.'²⁸

Ironically, the 'Contras' closest supporters agreed with that evaluation. In a confidential memo of 17 March 1986 to Oliver North, Robert Owen (North's liaison with the 'Contras') offered a candid assessment of Reagan's 'freedom fighters.' The leaders of the 'Contra' vanguard, the FDN, were 'liars and greed and power-motivated'. Owen wrote:

The reality as I see it is there are few of the so-called leaders of the movement who really care about the boys in the field. This war has become a business to many of them; there is still a belief the Marines are going to have to invade, so let's get set so we will automatically be the ones put into power.

'If the hundred million is approved,' Owen added, 'and things go on like they have these last five years, it will be like pouring money down a sink hole.'²⁹

Despite the corruption, the human rights atrocities and the lack of political appeal or military prowess of the 'Contras', on 26 June 1986 the US Congress acceded to the Administration's intense lobbying and authorised $100 million to renew the war on Nicaragua. Far more important than the amount of money, the vote lifted all previous restrictions on CIA involvement in the paramilitary campaign. Nor did Congress reimpose any limitations on the purpose of supporting the 'Contras'. For the first time, US legislators unequivocally endorsed the Administration's strategy for a bloody war of attrition against Nicaragua.

In the ensuing months, the Administration's policy of punishment against the Sandinistas has escalated dramatically. Fully equipped 'Contra' forces reinfiltated Nicaraguan territory, attacking economic and civilian targets with a new ferocity. On 19 June 1986 the FDN scored a significant victory, shooting down a Soviet-built Mi 24 helicopter, killing all three Nicaraguan officials on board. Nevertheless, the prospect of any outright military overthrow of the Sandinistas without direct US intervention remained illusory. While the 'Contra' leaders predicted the eventual defeat of the Nicaraguan government, they still remained politically and militarily distant from power.

²⁸ See the House of Representatives, Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, Adverse Report, 12 March 1986, pp 5-6.

²⁹ Owen to North, 'Overall perspective', 17 March 1986, pp 2, 4.

As the test of the Reagan Doctrine in Nicaragua enters its year of reckoning, the outcome remains unclear. Some conclusions, however, can be drawn. Beyond a doubt, the Administration has proved that the USA can, through surrogate forces, wreak death and destruction upon a revolutionary experiment in Central America. Yet the six-year-old war has also demonstrated that no amount of rhetoric nor CIA manuals can transform terrorists into freedom fighters—that despite the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars, an imperial war cannot be recreated as a legitimate war of national liberation. Moreover, as the Iran/'Contra' scandal suggests, the quest to 'win' hegemony in the Third World through a doctrine of covert wars can only result in a loss of prestige, credibility, power and influence for the very system of government which such policies are, ostensibly, meant to advance. The USA is as much a casualty of the Reagan Doctrine as is the Nicaraguan revolution.

Democracy and national strategy in the periphery*

It is well-known that the Third World is a heterogeneous grouping and that generalisations are therefore usually impossible. It can be agreed, however, that social inequalities are unfortunately all too often quite blatant, in fact scandalous, and that even the most primitive form of democracy is the exception rather than the rule. The lack of solidarity between Third World states in international economic negotiations is as marked as the animosity which frequently characterises their political relationships.

Is there a connection to be discerned among these three aspects: social inequality, lack of democracy, lack of solidarity? Doubtless, everyone will readily acknowledge that one exists. But the nature of the connection and its underlying causes is the focus of diametrically opposed theoretical and ideological points of view. There are in effect two perspectives on the global evolution of modern societies which, on this question as on others, radically contradict one another.

In the dominant 'linear' perspective, social inequality and the absence of democracy are the price of poverty. The accumulation of capital is necessarily accompanied, in its initial stages, by the impoverishment of the peasantry and the penury of the working-class, described by Engels in the case of England in the middle of the nineteenth century. Later on, when the rural surplus population had been absorbed, the labour movement managed progressively to impose both better material conditions and political democracy. Sir Arthur Lewis's familiar thesis concerning the 'dualism' of societies 'in transition towards development', like that of the Latin-American desarrollismo of the 1950s, makes the same point: economic development would create the objective conditions for a better social distribution of income as well as providing the basis for a democratic political life.¹ This thesis presupposes that the external factor (integration into the world economic system) is basically 'favourable', in the sense that it offers the opportunity for 'development'. Development in this context proceeds at a rate which is governed by the internal conditions that characterise different Third World societies. These conditions are thus thought to be decisive in this process.

* Translated for Third World Quarterly by Thomas Clegg.

¹ For further reading see also various works of CEPAL, published under the direction of Raul Prebisch, during the 1950s and 1960s.

In the context of a linear perspective, today's developed countries form the image of the 'developing' countries as they will be tomorrow. A formalistic nationalism would also characterise various Third World societies during the first period of 'development'. The construction of the nation state would demand it. This nation state would assert itself by opposing others, notably its neighbours. As the European nations were constituted through an uninterrupted series of wars from the seventeenth to the mid-twentieth centuries, a similar confrontation among contemporary Third World states would not be surprising.

The thesis advanced in this article takes the opposite view. We contend that the emergence of capitalist expansion on a world scale entails an inherent inequality, which prevents the 'delayed reproduction' of the same evolutionary scheme. Social inequality and the absence of democracy are thus, in the periphery, the product of capitalist development.

I would like to illustrate this thesis, in what follows, by insisting on two aspects of the worldwide expansion of capitalism:

- i) that this expansion is accompanied by a growing inequality in the social distribution of income in the periphery, while at the system's core, it effectively creates the conditions for a lesser degree of social inequality (and greater stability in the distribution of income, the foundation of a democratic consensus);
- ii) that the bourgeoisie of the periphery is incapable of mastering the local process of accumulation, which thereby remains in a perpetual process of 'adjustment' to the constraints posed by accumulation on a world scale. In these conditions, the project of constructing a bourgeois national state is not merely handicapped by a basically unfavourable external factor, but is rendered completely impossible. The peripheral state is then necessarily despotic because it is weak. In order to 'survive', it has to avoid conflict with the dominant imperialist forces and attempts rather to improve its international position at the expense of its more vulnerable peripheral partners.

This twofold observation strongly suggests the conclusion that political and social democracy as well as international solidarity among peoples require the abandonment of the myth of the 'national bourgeoisie', and the replacement of the 'bourgeois national' project by a 'popular national' project. This is the price to be paid for democracy:

Inequalities in the distribution of income at the core and at the periphery of the world capitalist system

Although empirical research concerning the distribution of income is relatively recent, there are figures available today for a great number of countries, both developed and underdeveloped, which measure the degree of inequality in income distribution by means of Gini coefficients and Lorenz curves.

In general, this research shows that inequality in the distribution of income is more pronounced in the periphery of the system than in its advanced core. This inequality arises for a number of reasons, including the following:

Firstly, labour productivity varies from unit to unit, and from sector to sector. Productivity would only become equalised given the theoretical hypothesis of an economy constituted by production units which were all equipped with the most efficient means (and thus a state of competition would no longer continue between them!). The most developed capitalist countries approach this model, while the underdeveloped formations diverge from it in an extreme way. This is why the distribution of value added per job from one sector to another is grouped relatively closely around its average in the OECD countries, but is very unevenly spread in the Third World countries.² The fact that a comparison gives results of this kind proves, in our opinion, that the law of value operates at the level of the world capitalist system, rather than at the level of its national components.³

Secondly, the differential in salaries and payment for work in the Third World, however small, is never as reduced as it would be if it were determined solely by the social costs of training. The spread here results from the strategy of those in power and of capital, from its history and from those political requirements compatible with the exercise of power by the hegemonic social bloc at the system's core.

Thirdly, the distribution of industrial, commercial, real estate, agricultural, financial and other property is itself the outcome of the history of the social formation and of local capitalist development. If one admits that there exists no 'ideal model' of capitalism, but only its concrete historical forms, there is no reason why this important element in determining the structure of the distribution of income should operate in the same way everywhere.

² Samir Amin, 'Niveau de salaires, choix des techniques de production et répartition de revenu', in A D Smith (ed), Cahiers de l'IIES (Geneva, 1969).

³ See the argument concerning the content of the law of value operating at the world scale in Samir Amin, L'avenir du maoïsme, Paris: Minuit, 1981, pp 7-28; trans. The Future of Maoism, New York: Monthly Review Press, 1982.

Whatever the causes, it is possible to compare the current empirical distributions in the world. It is striking to see that the spread of Lorenz curves is by no means accidental. As a matter of fact, the curves of all the OECD developed capitalist countries are grouped in a tight bunch. In contrast, income distribution in all the contemporary Third World countries is considerably more unequal. Two clear medians placed within each of the two groupings correspond with the following values:⁴

- 25 per cent of the population disposes of 10 per cent of total income in the core, and 5 per cent in the periphery;
- 50 per cent of the population disposes of 25 per cent of income in the core, and 10 per cent in the periphery;
- 75 per cent of the population disposes of 50 per cent of income in the core and 33 per cent in the periphery.

The bunching of Lorenz curves for the developed countries implies that Western societies have obviously similar income distribution characteristics. The position of different countries within the core grouping of Lorenz curves also implies that the improvement in income distribution is linked to the existence of powerful social democratic forces, but that the real extent of this improvement is very limited. The most advanced social-democratic countries, in Northern Europe, are situated close to the minimum inequality curve; the most liberal (the USA) and the least developed (Mediterranean Europe) are close to the maximum inequality curve.

The spread of curves for the Third World may seem disconcerting at first sight. There is no visible correlation between the degree of inequality on the one hand, and the ranking of these countries in terms of factors such as per capita GDP, the degree of urbanisation, the level of industrialisation, and so on. But, as we will show later, a more attentive examination can provide a basis for an interpretation of this spread of results.

⁴ We will refrain from providing here the technical arguments which permitted us to elaborate these statistics based on the work of the World Bank (Hollis Chenery, Ahluwalia, etc., Growth with Redistribution) and of the ILO (WEP programme, the work directed by Dharam Ghai and others). For an explanation of the Gini coefficients and Lorenz curves used in our model, see our article in Review (cited in note 5).

We can now proceed to the more interesting questions in the following section: i) is it possible to move from the crude empirical level to a higher plane, to explain the essential reasons for the relative positions of different countries?; and ii) is there a direction to the movement observed (towards more or less equality) and how is it to be accounted for?

We will not go back over the details of the theoretical reconstruction of these curves, which have been expounded elsewhere.⁵ We will only set out the broad outlines here.

Regarding the distribution of income in the capitalist core, three successive theoretical hypotheses suffice to account for the median of the tight grouping of Lorenz curves representing the OECD countries.

First hypothesis: if the social formation were reduced to a pure capitalist mode of production, the structure of income distribution would be determined by the rate of extraction of surplus value. If it were the case that the entire population were proletarianised and all proletarians were to sell their labour power at the same price, which is the value of labour power, and if we retain the complementary assumption that the number of capitalists was negligible, the model of income distribution could be shown by a straight line whose slope would be determined by the rate of extraction of surplus value within a social formation.

Second hypothesis: we suppose that the prices paid to the labour force are distributed unequally around its average value, so that the ratio between the quartiles was 1 to 4.

Third hypothesis: we introduce within this scheme the existence of a certain number of small and medium-size firms and various activities (similar to those of the liberal professions), the salaried population comprising 80 per cent of the total population, and we suppose that individual revenues of members of these social groups are situated in the middle and high-income brackets within the total distribution.

In this way, a curve is finally obtained which is very close to one representing the empirical reality of the contemporary developed capitalist world.

With regard to the peripheral capitalist societies, we have proceeded in two steps. In the first instance, we looked at the case of a rural,

⁵ Samir Amin, 'Income distribution in the capitalist system', Review, Summer 1984; Samir Amin, Classe et nation dans l'histoire et la crise contemporaine, Paris: Minuit, 1979, pp 157-67; trans. Class and Nation: Historically and in the Current Crisis, New York: Monthly Review Press, 1980, pp 149-72.

'pre-capitalist' society in which 90 per cent of the population, also predominantly rural, is subject to exploitation of an 'egalitarian' kind by a state-class of rentiers who receive a tribute equal to half the total agricultural output. At the same time, the peasant communities have relatively little internal differentiation, but benefit to different extents from favourable natural conditions, resulting in per capita outputs ranging from 1 for the poorest quartile to 2 for the richest.

Next, one supposes that an agrarian society originally of this type is integrated into the global capitalist development of a 'semi-colony'. A small class of latifundists and rich peasant landowners (10 per cent of the rural population) appropriates tribute in the form of land rent. With demographic pressures acting over a period of fifty to a hundred years, and in the absence of industrial outlets, a third of the population falls into absolute poverty. This third of the rural population (landless peasants and minifundists) disposes of an income barely equal to that of the lowest quarter of the peasant farmers. Agrarian reforms have eventually taken place in most regions of this type. If one excludes the socialist countries (China, North Korea, Vietnam), these reforms, more or less radical in nature, have redistributed land in favour of the middle strata, to the detriment of the richest latifundists, without altering the fate of the poorest half of the peasantry.

In the end, the curve which best fits these hypotheses in fact corresponds with a median representing real situations existing in Southern and Southeast Asia, as well as in the Arab world today.

It is interesting to see that this structure, associated in the current phase of capitalist development with the hegemony of the local bourgeoisie (agrarian reforms and industrialisation), can be explained by four essential factors: i) the prior history of a rural class society which only allows the peasantry to keep roughly half its output; ii) the private appropriation of surplus in the form of land rent by latifundists and, following agrarian reform, by rich peasants; iii) a 'natural' inequality in the productivity of agricultural land ranging from 1 to 2; iv) an increase in rural population density and the formation of a reserve of surplus labour consisting about a third of the rural workforce.

The 'model' in question also corresponds, it seems, with the situation in Latin America, at least in the case of the bigger countries such as Mexico, Colombia, Peru, and Brazil. It fits less well the situation in certain Central American regions, of which Nicaragua under Somoza or Guatemala are prime examples. In contrast, the 'model' is certainly different in Sub-Saharan Africa where the prior experience of local class societies is weaker, the availability of land greater, and so on. In these areas the distribution of income is no doubt less unequal, although precise information is unobtainable. Nevertheless, even here the trend is towards the appearance of greater differentiations, as all the empirical studies have shown.

In our second step, we introduce the concept of the urban economy into our model. In this instance we find a capitalist sector (which employs at most half of the urban working population), for which the conclusions reached above remain valid, given the following assumptions: i) a higher rate of surplus value resulting in a wage-profits ratio of 40:60 instead of 60:40; and ii) a steeper wage scale (1 to 6 instead of 1 to 4). Moreover, the 'informal' sector, which manages somehow to employ half the urban working population, earns incomes of roughly the same size as those of the poorest quartile of the capitalist sector.

In order to combine both curves, rural and urban, two principal factors must be kept in mind: i) the proportion of rural to urban population, which differs from one country to another; and ii) the large gap between net per capita output in rural and urban areas, when this output is measured in current prices and income, as it is in current statistics. This gap is always roughly about 1 to 3, that is, per capita output is three times greater in the urban economy than in the rural. The end result obtained, i.e. the curve constructed by combining the simpler elements, is an interesting one. The resulting curve is, as we have already seen, a median of the actual income distributions that occur in the contemporary Third World.

The question arises as to whether this situation is 'transitory' or not, i.e. whether the corresponding income distribution and that described are evolving towards the model outlined above. In other words, is there a 'tendential law' of the movement of income distribution, in conjunction with the movement of capital? On this difficult topic, the following three types of response can be identified:

- i) That there is no tendential law governing this movement. In other words, income distribution is only the empirical outcome of diverse economic and social factors whose movements, convergent or divergent, have their own autonomy. This proposition may be restated in 'Marxist' terms by noting that income distribution depends on class struggles in all their complexity, both national (such as bourgeois-peasant alliance, social-democracy) and international (imperialism and the position occupied within the

- international division of labour, and so on). The capitalist system is capable of adapting itself to all these different situations.
- ii) That there is a tendential law working to bring about a progressive reduction of inequalities. The situation in the periphery today is simply one of an unfinished transition towards capitalist development.
 - iii) That there is a tendential law of progressive pauperisation and growing inequality. It remains to be seen why pauperisation should take place, and by means of which preponderant force (one that cannot be countered by opposing forces?), and on what scale the process occurs (at the level of each capitalist state, of all the developed countries, of all the underdeveloped countries, or throughout the worldwide core-periphery system?).

The Marxist thesis of progressive pauperisation is an abstract formulation of a concrete issue: does capitalist expansion eventually benefit the majority of people in terms of relative standards of living, or, on the contrary, does it tend to polarise society?

The actual history of accumulation in the developed centres of capitalism is fairly well known. Disregarding local variants, a plausible generalisation could be constructed on the following lines. The peasant revolutions, which often introduced the capitalist era in these centres, reduced the degree of inequality in the countryside, at least when they adopted a radical form. This reduction of inequality took place at the expense of the feudal aristocracy, but at the same time led to the impoverishment of a minority of poorer peasants who were expelled to the cities. The working-class wage was fixed from the outset at a low level determined by the income of these poorer peasants. It tended to increase after stagnating for a period at this level (or even diminishing), when the expulsion of landless peasants from the countryside finally slowed down. From this point onwards (about 1860?) workers' wages and the real incomes of the 'middle' strata of the peasantry tended to increase together, in conjunction with a rise in productivity. There was even a tendency for a rough parity to be established between the average wage of workers and peasant incomes, although this tendency is not observable at each stage of accumulation (it depended on the structure of alliances between the hegemonic classes). In the stage of late capitalism, there is perhaps a 'social-democratic' tendency towards the reduction of inequalities. But this operates in conjunction with imperialism: a favourable position within the international division of labour favours social redistribution. But it would be wrong to generalise here, as comparable cases of evolution, for example Sweden and the USA, diverge in this respect.

It is necessary to move beyond an examination of the capitalist core considered on its own, and take into account the evolution of the world system as a whole. Our thesis here is that the stability of income distribution in the core during the present presupposes rather than excludes a far more unequal distribution of income in the periphery. The realisation of value at the scale of the system as a whole requires this complementary opposition of structures.

One is thus led to an unavoidable question: what is the overall tendency of the changes in income distribution within the periphery? Although precise information in this domain is fragmentary, it seems that the most pronounced trend has been towards the worsening of inequalities, certainly during the last hundred years (1880-1980).

A thesis often advanced to explain this fact is that inequality in these regions is the price of accumulation, and once the first phase of the latter is completed (with the reduction of the labour reserve provided by the peasantry), the system will tend to reduce this inequality. This thesis has renewed its appeal among a wide variety of circles, from the traditional Right to certain Anglo-Saxon Marxists. The work of the late Bill Warren and various critiques which have been directed at our own stance are situated on this terrain.⁶ This thesis appears to us to replace the concrete analysis of the worldwide expansion of capitalism, which diversifies while at the same time unifying, with the abstract vision of a capitalism reduced to its tendency towards unification. The argument to which the supporters of this thesis turn as a last resort is that the worsening of inequalities is only 'provisional'. This abuse of the argument concerning time removes any political significance from the thesis in question. To say that capitalism aggravates the situation for a century or two, but that it will improve matters thereafter is not an answer to the problems of our society, but a way of sweeping them under the carpet. This line of reasoning suffers in general from an almost complete lack of any political analysis concerning the diversification of capitalist formations, and a consequent refusal to make any qualitative distinction between core and peripheral formations.

⁶ Bill Warren, Imperialism, Pioneer of Capitalism, London: Verso, 1980. See our commentaries in Samir Amin, La déconnexion, Paris: La Découverte, 1986, Ch. 4; Samir Amin, 'Expansion or crisis of capitalism?', Third World Quarterly 5(2) April 1983.

Without going into the details of this debate, let us say that our thesis here is that even the most radical bourgeois national projects in the Third World are probably destined to failure and will in the end submit to the demands of transnationalisation. As a corollary to this thesis regarding the transformation of the peripheral bourgeoisie into a comprador class, we believe that there is no discernible tendency towards diminishing inequality in income distribution in the Third World. If any movement can be observed, it is rather in the opposite direction: towards growing inequality. The idea of progress by stages which could be repeated after a given time-lag is obviously a powerful concept in its simplicity, but one which is obviously false. However, the belief that developed countries provide the model for the future development of the underdeveloped countries remains firmly entrenched, despite its refutation by four centuries of capitalist development, and particularly by the experience of the last hundred years.

According to the logic of the 'stagist' perspective described above, the issue of inequalities in the distribution of income is seen merely as a question of relative quantity, without any qualitative significance. But it is not just a matter of greater inequality: inequality itself determines the creation and development of a productive system in the periphery, which is qualitatively different from that which exists in the capitalist core.

If in fact the various resources (unskilled and skilled labour, capital) are allocated to the types of final consumption (of the different strata of population according to their income) which directly or indirectly command them, one finds:

- that in the core the various resources are allocated to the consumption of each stratum in proportions similar to the share of each of these stratum in consumption. For example, if necessary consumption (meaning necessary for the reproduction of labour power) represents 50 per cent of total consumption and surplus consumption 50 per cent, the shares of capital and of labour power with different skills (low, medium, high) allocated to necessary and surplus consumption respectively are 50 per cent-50 per cent for each category of resource (capital, unskilled workforce, skilled workforce).
- that in the periphery, on the other hand, the scarcer resources are allocated to the consumption of the wealthier strata in greater proportions than their share of total consumption. This 'distortion' in favour of the upper strata within income distribution is all the stronger when distribution is more unequal. For example, according to our calculations concerning the employment of medium and highly skilled labour (with secondary, technical or higher education) in the Arab world, surplus consumption constitutes 50 per cent of total consumption, but absorbs 75 per cent of these scarce resources (as against 50 per cent in France).

In addition, one observes a tendency both for a deepening of inequalities in income distribution in the Arab world (before and after 1974) and for a worsening of this distortion in the employment of scarce resources. It is also noticeable that inequalities are more marked in the Arab world (where per capita GDP is higher than in other regions of the Third World, such as Asia and Sub-Saharan Africa) and that the distortion in the use of resources is at the same time more pronounced.⁷

The productive apparatus of the peripheral countries is thus not a mere copy of that of the core at an earlier stage of evolution. It differs qualitatively, and therein resides the very purpose of the international division of labour. These differences explain why, when in the core the Lorenz curve is stable (or is even moving towards less inequality), in the periphery it is shifting in the opposite direction, towards even greater inequality. The distortion in income distribution is a condition of expanded reproduction, of accumulation on a world scale.

On this point, Marx's thesis concerning progressive pauperisation is perfectly visible on a world scale. If income distribution tends to be more and more unequal in the periphery, which constitutes the majority of the world system's population, and is stable in the core, then at the global level it is moving towards greater inequality. The very fact that pauperisation manifests itself at the world level but not at the core is surely proof of the fact that the law of value acts at the global level, rather than at the level of individual capitalist formation. Marginalisation and impoverishment in the periphery, however, operate not only by means of an increase in the rate of extraction of surplus value, but also through the indirect extraction of surplus labour in non-capitalist forms, both traditional and newly-invented.

⁷ Samir Amin, L'économie arabe contemporaine, Paris: Minuit, 1980; trans. The Arab Economy Today, London: Zed, 1982.

From the bourgeois national project to the bourgeois comprador project

If in the nineteenth century the imperialist system is seen as having virtually extended colonial and semi-colonial regimes throughout Africa and Asia, national liberation movements in the aftermath of the Second World War reconstituted them into independent states. Has this major transformation of the world capitalist system put an end to the core/periphery dichotomy? The prevailing opinion in the West is that independence effectively opened the way for the creation of new bourgeois states with the capacity to advance along the path of capitalist development. This process would depend essentially on internal conditions within each state. Thus the pace and the orientations of economic growth, of social developments and of political organisation (the latter's despotic or democratic character) would be determined, for the most part, by internal class struggles. This thesis therefore denies that there is a qualitative difference between bourgeois national states in the core and in the periphery of the system. In other words, it accepts the hypothesis that a bourgeois national project is capable of being carried out. I think, for my part, that this thesis is mistaken and is refuted by what I call the failure of the bourgeois national option in the contemporary Third World.⁸

Of course, the Afro-Asian states, nations and peoples understood that the reconquest of political independence was only the means to an end, the final goal being the conquest of economic, social and cultural independence. But here the forces of national liberation were split between two visions: there was the opinion, shared by a substantial majority, that 'development' was possible through 'interdependence' within the world economy; and that of the socialist leaders who thought that abandoning the capitalist bloc would lead to the reconstruction, with the USSR, if not under its leadership, of a world socialist bloc.

The leaders of the capitalist Third World did not envisage 'delinking' from the capitalist system, but nor did they share a common strategic and tactical view of 'development'. While this is not the place to expand on our concept of 'delinking' (see La déconnexion) we should make clear that this concept is not to be confused with 'autarky'. It refers to the need to submit foreign relations to the logic of an internal popular strategy of development, as opposed to the strategy of 'adjusting' internal development to the constraints of the global expansion of capitalism. Delinking therefore assumes opting for an internal price and income system autonomous from the global system. This national system would therefore constitute the yardstick for measuring a rationality which reflects popular interests, while the global system of so-called economic rationality, on the basis of which 'comparative advantage' and 'competitiveness' are measures, actually reflects the interests of international capital and its subordinate local transmission belt classes. To varying degrees, however, they believed that the building of a independent developed economy and society (even within a framework of global interdependence) would entail a certain amount of 'conflict' with the dominant West (the radical wing reckoning that would put an end to the control of the national economy by the capital of foreign monopolies). Moreover, careful to preserve their recently-won independence, they refused to enter into the global military game or to provide support for the encirclement of the socialist countries which American hegemonism had tried to impose. However, they also believed that to refuse to join the Atlantic military bloc did not imply the necessity of placing themselves under the protection of its adversary, the USSR. From this stance emerged 'neutralism' or 'non-alignment'.

⁸ Samir Amin, La déconnexion, Chs. 1 and 4. See also 'Bandung 30 years later', a paper presented at the UN conference in Cairo, 1985, unpublished.

The coming together of the Afro-Asian states had already begun with the constitution, within the UN, of the Arab-Asian group, aimed at defending the cause of the colonies still engaged in the struggle for independence. Bandung in 1955 reinforced this rapprochement and galvanised the struggle. From summit to summit during the 1960s and the 1970s, 'non-alignment' gradually shifted from a platform of political solidarity based on support for national liberation struggles and the rejection of military pacts, to that of a 'trade association of economic demands vis-à-vis the North'. The battle for a 'New International Economic Order' (NIEO) commenced in 1975, following the Israeli-Arab war of October 1973 and the subsequent upward revision of oil prices.

Neither on the political nor the economic plane was the West ready to accept the spirit of Bandung. Was it really only a coincidence that, one year later, France, Britain and Israel tried to overthrow Nasser through their aggression in Egypt in 1956? The genuine hatred which the West maintained towards the radical leaders of the Third World in the 1960s (Nasser, Sukarno, Modibo Keita, almost all of them overthrown in the same period, 1965-68, during which the Israeli aggression of June 1967 also occurred) shows that the political vision of Bandung was not accepted by imperialist capital. It was thus a politically weakened non-aligned bloc which confronted the global economic crisis from 1970-71 onwards. The firm opposition of the West to the idea of a NIEO demonstrates conversely that there was a very real logic at work linking the political and economic demands of the Afro-Asian bloc following Bandung.

Thirty-two years after that historic conference, we have the factual lessons and the necessary hindsight to take stock of the situation. What were the real objectives of the Bandung project? Has it simply exhausted its force, having attained its goals? Or did it fail to attain its goals because they were objectively impossible? Of course, what with hindsight appears as an 'ideology of development' was never the subject of a consensus of interpretation. Having enjoyed its 'golden age' between 1955 and 1975, it has now, as we will later show, entered a perhaps fatal crisis.

The traditional socialist bloc was not prepared to accept the objectives which emerged from Bandung. In 1948, Zhdanov proclaimed the division of the world into two camps, capitalist and socialist, preemptively condemning as illusory any attempt to place oneself outside them, in other words to seek to be 'non-aligned'. In this spirit, the socialists did not foresee the possibility of the conquest of independence by a national liberation movement which they themselves did not lead. It was only following the first 'stabilisation' of 1950-55 (the victory in China, the armistice and division of Korea and Vietnam, the acknowledged defeat of guerrillas elsewhere in Southeast Asia); the demonstration of the viability of the new 'bourgeois' regimes of the Third World; the inception of these states' conflict with the West, albeit under a 'bourgeois' leadership; and the death of Stalin (1953) and the ideological opportunities offered by Khrushchev, that the possibility of a 'viable' third bloc and of a 'third path to development' began to be perceived.

On the other hand, the radical non-socialist nationalist leaders of the Third World certainly believed in the possibility of a 'third path to development' which would be neither 'capitalist' nor inspired by the socialist models of the USSR and China. Their rejection of Marxism combined a number of considerations: they occasionally perceived in Marxism an avatar of European culture incompatible with their own peoples' value systems; they sometimes simply feared the loss of their independence, particularly given the Soviet domination of Eastern Europe (which was then being denounced by Yugoslavia and China); they were also drawn towards the Western model of efficiency and consumption, even of freedom (though perhaps this was a value to which they attached less weight), rather than to the Soviet and Chinese models, which seemed less efficient and more austere. It was perhaps from this ambivalence that the ideologies of 'particular socialisms' (African, Arab) progressively emerged.

A 'Bandung project' did, therefore, exist, in our opinion, although it was implicit and imprecise in nature. I will not shrink from labelling it our era's bourgeois national project of the Third World. Beyond the various concrete manifestations and specificities of its national expressions, the project can be defined by the following elements: i) the desire to develop the productive forces, to diversify outputs (notably by industrialising); ii) the desire to reinforce the nation-state's direction and control over this process; iii) the belief that the process did not imply in the first instance popular initiatives but only popular support for state actions; iv) the belief that the process did not fundamentally contradict participation in the international division of labour even if it did entail momentary conflicts with the developed capitalist countries.

The realisation of this bourgeois national project implied control over a series of processes by a hegemonic national bourgeois class, through its state, including at least the following: i) control of the reproduction of labour power, which entails a relatively complete and balanced development so that local agriculture, among other economic activities, is able to provide the essential elements for this reproduction in sufficient quantity and at suitable prices to assure the valorisation of capital; ii) control of national resources; iii) control of local markets and the capacity to penetrate the world market in competitive conditions; iv) control of the financial circuits permitting the centralisation of surplus value and the orientation of its productive uses; v) control of the technologies in use at the level of development reached by the productive forces.⁹

Seen from this angle, the development experiences of the Third World can be classed into two categories of objectives: that of those countries which have simply attempted to accelerate their growth without worrying about achieving the conditions listed above (Ivory Coast, Kenya, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia . . . the list is long); and that of the countries which have tried to realise the conditions in question (Egypt under Nasser, Algeria, Tanzania, India, Brazil, South Korea).

⁹ Samir Amin, La déconnexion, Chs. 1 and 2.

As can be seen, this classification does not necessarily match the division between those regimes anxious to promote a certain degree of social justice and bring about reforms, notably agrarian (such as Egypt under Nasser, or South Korea) and those which did not hesitate before accepting a worsening of social inequalities (Brazil for example). Nor does it correspond to the division created by their attitudes vis-à-vis transnational capital (Brazil and Kenya both welcome such capital, but the former tries to integrate it within its own national policies, while the latter is content to adjust to its demands), nor to the divide over the issue of maintaining political relations of conflict or alliance with East and West. Correlations do exist, but the nuances of the combinations formed to meet concrete circumstances make each Third World country a special case.

It is now no longer possible to ignore the inadequacies of all attempts at development, which have not withstood the reversal of favourable conjunctures. The food and agriculture crisis, the external financial debt, the increased technological dependency, the fragility of capacities to resist eventual military aggression, the waste produced by capitalist models of consumption and their ideological and cultural impact, point to the historical limits of this option. Even before the current crisis offered the opportunity for the 'offensive of the West' which managed to reverse the previous trends, these deficiencies had in many cases led to an impasse. I do not claim that these experiences in principle had necessarily to end where they did, and that consequently their 'bankruptcy' was predestined. I can only contend that, to go any further, a genuine 'revolution' was required, capable of putting an end to the twin illusion concerning the possibility of a national development without this being the product of a truly popular force, and the possibility of this development without 'delinking' from the world system. It is not certain whether some movements in this direction could not have been possible (and I am thinking notably of the case of Egypt). Yet significantly, popular revolution did not occur, and because of this, the historic page was turned.

In view of the experience outlined above, we can say that the project in question deserves to be called a bourgeois national project and as such was demonstrably impossible to achieve. In this way, history has shown that the national bourgeoisie within the Third World is not capable, in our era, of achieving what it achieved elsewhere, in Europe, North America and Japan in the nineteenth century. There is nothing new in this thesis, and the failure of the bourgeois national project has been repeated many times in the past. One such failure is that of Egypt. The history of Egypt since Mohamed Ali is that of a series of challenges by the national bourgeoisie, broken each time by the conjunction of their internal fragility and imperialist aggression.

A detailed examination of the history of other countries and regions of the Third World would illustrate, in our opinion, the same thesis: that of a uninterrupted succession of bourgeois national bids, their repeated miscarriage and the submission to the demands for subordination which followed each time. This has occurred in Latin America since the nineteenth century (we cite here only the most recent examples of the Mexican Revolution of the period 1910-1920 and that of Peronism in Argentina), in India (whose evolution from Nehru's 'First Plan' to the return of the Right to government following Congress's first defeat is eloquent), and in numerous Arab and African countries.

The favourable conjuncture of the post-war period was due to an exceptional combination of circumstances. On the economic side, the strong growth of the 'North' facilitated the 'adjustment' of the South. On the political side, peaceful coexistence was accompanied by the rise of Soviet military and industrial might (from the first Sputnik to the achievement of strategic 'parity' during the 1960s and 1970s), combined with the decline of the ageing British and French colonial empires and the spread of Afro-Asian independence struggles. This conjuncture lent real weight to the concept of non-alignment.

But success may bring delusions with it. One such delusion is plainly encapsulated in the theory of a so-called 'non-capitalist path', concerning a 'gradual' evolution towards socialism. Of course, the theory in question did not convince everyone. In the 1960s it was violently attacked by China as an opiate meant to lull the peoples and douse the fires of the 'zone of storms'.

The page of history has today been turned. Since the beginning of the 1970s, the economic boom of the West had faded to make way for the current structural crisis, while the competition among Europe, Japan and the United States has replaced reconstruction under American protection. In the Soviet Union, Khrushchev's promises to overtake the American standard of living by 1980 and the expectations of a rapid democratisation following the 20th Party Congress (1956) gave way to immobilism under Brezhnev (which now appears to be under challenge from Gorbachev). In China, the revisions which followed Mao's death revealed that neither the question of economic efficiency, nor that of democracy, had yet found their 'definitive' answer. Throughout the Third World, the hunger crisis, that of external debt and the impasse created by imported technology have led to a series of surrenders to the diktat of transnational capital, reorganised around the IMF, the World Bank and the consortium of big Western banks. In the countries with a radical orientation, the coups d'état and acts of military aggression (the 1967 war was not an accident) greatly contributed to putting an end to the experimentation of the post-Second World War period.

The basis of the new world conjuncture is formed by the aggression of the capitalist West against the peoples and nations of the Third World. The objectives of the capitalist West is to subordinate the subsequent evolution of the Third World to the requirements of the redeployment of transnational capital.¹⁰

But is this situation really only a conjuncture, fleeting in nature though painful, which will perforce be followed by a new hatching of advanced 'national bourgeoisies'? Or does it involve a historical turning-point which will no longer permit the pursuit of successive bids by the bourgeois national project, a project which has characterised the history of capitalism for at least a century? The real debate concerning the nature of future challenges and options is focused on these two considerations.

The hypothesis which we are putting forward is that the contemporary crisis marks the end of an era, an era which for Asia, Africa and Latin America might be termed the century of national bourgeoisies, in the sense that it has been characterised by successive attempts at bourgeois national construction. To note simply that these experiments have not produced results is hardly new. What is new, according to this hypothesis, is the affirmation that such attempts will no longer take place in the future. In other words, the bourgeoisie of the Third World has now finally accepted the pursuit of its development through economic subordination to the core. This is a project imposed upon it by the expansion of transnational capital, which has forced the new bourgeoisie to become comprador subordinates.

Many reasons militate in favour of this hypothesis. The depth of subordination of the periphery to the core and the globalisation of capital in the contemporary world indicate the existence of a political and economic situation which has little in common with the circumstances existing at the end of the Second World War. A thousand indicators illustrate this point overwhelmingly, not only in terms of national economic planning, finances and technology, but also in terms of consumption, culture and the ideology of everyday life. The social structures formed and deformed by these phenomena draw our attention to the fact that the present challenge has little to do with that which once confronted the Soviet and Chinese people.

¹⁰ Samir Amin, 'A propos du NOEI et des relations économiques internationales', Socialism in the World (29) 1982; trans. 'After the NIEO, the future of international economic relations', Journal of Contemporary Asia (12-14) 1982. See also Samir Amin, 'La crise, le Tiers Monde et les relations Nord-Sud et Est-Ouest', Nouvelle Revue Socialiste, Paris: September-October, 1983.

DEMOCRACY AND NATIONAL STRATEGY IN THE PERIPHERY

The alternative: popular national development, political and social democracy, and the ending of dependence

The worldwide expansion of capitalism is thus of a polarising nature. Since the origins of capitalism, four centuries ago, the core/periphery opposition has remained inherent within this system. This opposition, which constitutes the principal aspect of capitalism's contradictions, is unsurmountable within the framework of the world system. Inclusion within this world system, the 'external factor', is not only in itself an unfavourable influence, but I would go so far as to say that it is becoming increasingly so. It only took nineteenth-century Germany a few decades to 'catch up and overtake' England. How long will Brazil require to 'catch up and overtake' the USA? Later attempts to create bourgeois national states thus, as ever, remain doomed to failure, condemned, through compradorisation, to perpetuate polarisation in renewed forms corresponding to the development of the system as a whole.¹¹

It is this polarisation which is in fact responsible for the appearance of socially and politically unacceptable regimes in the periphery of the system. They are socially unacceptable because they are founded on impoverishment and the exclusion of the great mass of the people. They were politically unacceptable in the past in the sense that the setting up of the system required colonial domination; and they remain unacceptable because the pursuit of a form of local development integrated within the system demands that the new independent state remains despotic. Thus, democracy is not the 'rule', but the exception, produced from time to time by the impasses of capitalist development, but always vulnerable. Contrary to the 'optimistic' thesis of development by stages, according to which social misery and despotism will be progressively overcome by capitalist expansion, that expansion will continually reproduce these conditions.

¹¹ See Samir Amin, La déconnexion, and three other forthcoming studies: Samir Amin, 'L'Etat et le développement' ('State and Development'); 'L'accumulation 30 ans plus tard' (Accumulation on a World Scale, 30 Years Later); and 'A propos "The Third World Revolt"'.

Given these conditions, capitalism has raised the spectre of its being overthrown through a 'revolt of the periphery'. In this sense the 'socialist revolutions', all of them emerging in the periphery or semi-periphery of the system (Tsarist Russia, China, etc.), constitute, along with the generically similar national liberation movements, the most essential change in our contemporary world. These struggles, effectively or potentially, usher in the 'post-capitalist' era.

I would contend that 'delinking' on the basis of a popular national social alliance (as opposed to the bourgeois national project) constitutes the only positive prospect for avoiding capitalist relegation to the periphery. By 'delinking', I mean in precise terms the subordination of external relations to internal demands for popular transformation and development, as against the bourgeois strategy of adjustment of internal growth to the constraints of the worldwide expansion of capital.

The unequal character of capitalist expansion, which cannot be overcome from within its own framework, thus objectively demands the reconstruction of the world on the basis of another social system. The peoples of the periphery are obliged to become aware of this demand and to impose the new system, if they are to avoid the worst, which may extend to genocide, as the history of this expansion shows.

These challenges to the capitalist order in the form of revolts in the periphery force one seriously to rethink the question of the 'socialist transition' towards the abolition of classes. However carefully formulated, the Marxist tradition continues to be handicapped by its initial theoretical view of 'workers' revolutions' paving the way, on the basis of advanced productive forces, at least in relative terms, for a fairly rapid transition characterised by democratic rule of the popular masses. While termed a 'dictatorship over the bourgeoisie' (by means of a proletarian state of a new type which will soon 'wither away'), this rule is nevertheless considerably more democratic than the most democratic of bourgeois states. Obviously, reality has not turned out like this. All revolutions of an anti-capitalist bent have so far taken place in the periphery of the system; all have been confronted by the problems of the development of the productive forces and the hostility of the capitalist world; none has yet been able to establish any real form of advanced democracy; all have ended up reinforcing the state system. They have reached a point where doubts are increasingly cast upon their 'socialist' character and on the prospects for effecting, at whatever time in the future, the definitive abolition of classes. For some people (of whom we are not a part and whose theses we have criticised in the past) these systems are nothing more than specific forms of capitalist expansion itself.¹²

The crucial task is not of course to 'label' these systems, but to understand their origins, problems and specific contradictions, the dynamics which they allow or exclude. We have arrived at the thesis that in cases of popular national states and societies; we stress that they are popular, and neither bourgeois nor socialist. In the same way, we reached the conclusion that this popular national 'phase' was inevitably imposed by the unequal character of capitalist development.

These systems are, because of this, effectively faced with the task of development of the productive forces and are founded upon social forces that refuse to accept the argument that development can be achieved by means of a simple 'adjustment' within the framework of capitalist expansion on a world scale. They are the product of revolutions led and supported by progressive social forces in revolt against the effects of the unequal development of capitalism. Therefore such systems are contradictory and conflicting combinations of three different forces.

The first of these, socialist or at least potentially so, translates the aspirations of the popular social forces which gave birth to the new state. The second, capitalist in nature, expresses the fact that, given the actual state of development of the productive forces, capitalist relations of production are still necessary, and hence require real social forces to maintain them. This is why each time an extension of market relations is tolerated within a country of the Eastern bloc, the situation improves. But the existence of capitalist relations should not be confused with integration within the capitalist world system. Many of the criticisms directed at China, Yugoslavia, and Hungary have foundered on this slippery terrain, wrongly objecting that these countries are undergoing 'reintegration' into the capitalist world system. On the contrary, the state is present to isolate these relations from the effects of inclusion within the system dominated by the capital of the core monopolies.

The third series of real social forces operating in these regimes, which we term 'statist', have an autonomy of their own. They are neither reducible to a disguised form of capitalist relations (as statism effectively is in the capitalist Third World), nor to a 'degenerate' form of socialism. Statism represents real and potential social forces in their own right.

¹² Samir Amin, La déconnexion . . . Ch. 4; Samir Amin, 'Expansion or crisis of capitalism', Contemporary Marxism (9) 1984.

The problems faced by the capitalist Third World with the advent of political liberation were similar in nature. But the ambiguity of the strategies it adopted was more pronounced because, even where radicalisation had occurred during the struggle for independence, the option in favour of a programme of popular content and delinking was hampered by bourgeois aspirations and the illusory promise of the bourgeoisie national project. Why did the 'Third World' then not set off on the path to constructing a bourgeois national state by copying those of the capitalist core? To be sure, the outcome did not simply result from 'ideas' without any reference to the social base; it was rather the expression of certain social classes and strata of a bourgeois inclination, which dominated the 'national liberation movement' (i.e. the revolt against the effects of the unequal development of capitalism) and continue to dominate the states which emerged from it. History teaches us that the bourgeoisies of the periphery have attempted this task of constructing the state at each stage of world capitalist expansion, although of course in forms appropriate to their respective times. It also teaches us that in the end such attempts were always blocked by the conjunction of external aggression and the internal limits of these attempts.

The question of democracy, both in the socialist countries and in those of the Third World, must be placed within this context.

Let us be clear on this point: the critique which Marx directed at bourgeois democracy, i.e. of its limited and formal character, remains, to my mind, wholly correct. All the same, this democracy was not offered by the bourgeoisie to its people but conquered, relatively late in the day, by working-class struggles. For the capitalist mode itself does not require democracy. The spring behind its social dynamism is located on another level, that of the competition among capitalists and individuals. Moreover, capitalism separates economic and social management, ruled by fundamentally undemocratic principles, from political management, run today according to the democratic principle of election. We would add that this form of democracy only functions when its social impact has been annihilated by the exploitation carried out by the dominant forces of the core powers within the capitalist world system, that is to say once the labour movement has renounced its own project for a classless society and accepted the capitalist 'rules of the game'.

In the periphery, democracy, even more restricted in nature, is barely more than the expression of the crisis of despotism which is here a form of the capitalist system. Countries in Latin America, South Korea and others, currently furnish blatant examples of the violent political contradictions afflicting a Third World in crisis. I mentioned earlier that Latin American desarrollismo had claimed that 'industrialisation' and 'modernisation' (along bourgeois lines and within the context of an even greater integration into the world system) would automatically lead to a democratic evolution. The 'dictatorship' was looked upon as the vestige of a supposedly pre-capitalist past. The facts have demonstrated that modernisation within the framework of this bourgeois project has only 'modernised dictatorship' and substituted an 'efficient' and 'modern' violence of a fascistic type for the old oligarchic, patriarchal systems. The bourgeois project, however, has not delivered the promised results: the crisis has revealed the vulnerability of this construction and the impossibility of the 'independence' which legitimated dictatorship for some. But were not the democratic systems, which were imposed in these circumstances, faced with a formidable dilemma? There are only two choices available: Either the democratic political system accepts submission to the demands of 'adjustment' to the world system, and is thereafter incapable of effecting social reforms of any importance, soon precipitating a crisis for democracy itself; or else popular forces, seizing the means provided by democracy, impose these reforms. The system then enters into conflict with dominant world capitalism, moving from a bourgeois national project to a popular national one.¹³ The dilemma of Brazil and the Philippines derives entirely from this conflict.

The popular option requires democracy. This is so because democracy is a necessary internal condition of socialism. Once the spring of competition amongst capitalists is broken, social relations based on cooperation among workers instead of submission to exploitation are unthinkable without the complete expression of democracy.

In the socialist countries complex reasons of a particular nature which relate to the history of Marxism, and which we have analysed elsewhere,¹⁴ have their share of responsibility for the deadlock created by the refusal of political democracy. Despite the national and social achievements which have brought with them eventual support of the popular masses, the denial of political democracy attests to the preponderance of statist forces to the detriment of the socialist tendencies present.

¹³ Is not the doctrine of the Brazilian PMAD, which believes in the possibility of reconciling liberal political democracy and a dependent economic development, a return to the illusions of desarrollismo?

This situation is graver still regarding the radical experiments within the Third World. There the absence of political democracy works in favour of capitalism, either of the private or state form, and causes the system to degenerate towards a bureaucratic capitalism which ultimately risks becoming a form of compradorisation. In the socialist countries, this risk is unlikely to materialise, as the popular national state (although undemocratic) has sufficient solid historical grounding to allow the continuation of relative stagnation within the confines of statism, or the renewal by society of its move forward. In contrast, examples abound of complete failure among the radical states of the Third World and their subsequent 'recompradorisation'.

In every case democracy is the only means of reinforcing the chance for socialism within popular national society, of isolating the internal capitalist relations of production from the influence of their compradorised insertion into the capitalist world system, and hence reducing the degree of their external vulnerability.

What kind of democracy are we talking about? No doubt the heritage of Western bourgeois democracy is not merely to be scorned, bestowing as it does a respect for rights and for legality, freedom of expression for a diversity of opinions, the institutionalisation of electoral procedures and the separation of powers, the organisation of countervailing powers, and so on. But nor is this legacy the last word. Western democracy is lacking in any social dimension.¹⁵ The popular democracy of the moments of revolutionary social transformation (such as the USSR in the 1920s, Maoist China) also teaches us a great deal about the nature of any 'popular participation', to use a tired expression, which is to have real meaning. To conserve Western democratic forms without taking into consideration the social transformations demanded by the ¹⁴ Samir Amin, La déconnexion . . . Chs. 1, 2 and 4; see also Samir Amin, L'avenir du maoïsme . . .

¹⁵ There is no form of social phenomenon which does not allow for the occasional exception. Swedish social democracy is by no means inferior to the best achievements of the Eastern bloc. This is surely attributable to the peculiar history of Sweden and to its labour movement, without parallel elsewhere in the West. But it must also be conceded that the privileged position which Sweden occupies within the international division of labour has facilitated this exceptional evolution.

DEMOCRACY AND NATIONAL STRATEGY IN THE PERIPHERY

anti-capitalist revolt of the periphery is to become trapped within a travesty of bourgeois democracy, which will remain alien to the people and consequently extremely vulnerable. In order to take root, democracy should above all inscribe itself within a perspective which moves beyond capitalism. This domain, like others, must be governed by the law of unequal development.¹⁶

Obviously, it is this prospect which imperialism finds intolerable. For this reason, the campaign concerning 'democracy', orchestrated by the West, stresses only certain aspects of the problem and neglects others. For example, it identifies multiparty political systems with democracy. No doubt the 'single party' has more often than not, become, the expression of statist dominance.¹⁷ But equally, it is often the product of the effective achievement of popular national unity: this is true in the case of the Chinese Communist Party and some other organisations which emerged from the liberation struggle. In these instances, the creation of 'other parties' might be an artificial operation, not an urgent item on the agenda of popular struggles. The democratisation of the Party, its separation from the state, the clear distinction between state and civil society, the opening up to debate of the party and social organisations (truly independent trade unions, peasant cooperatives) are the essential reforms here which false Western friends of the peoples of the Third World refuse to acknowledge as democratic advances.

The question of the divergence of interests and of conflicts between Third World countries should also be situated within this context.

The illusions fostered by the bourgeois national project lead the states of the periphery to emphasise the divergent interests dividing them, on account of their different functions within the world system. Thus producers of energy or raw materials and semi-industrialised countries, countries liable to become indebted to the world financial market and those lacking resources, countries with food deficits and those with food surpluses, will find it difficult to form a united front against the North. This front could only be established on the basis of the common denominator linking these countries; namely, their status as peripheral entities. On this basis the popular national regimes engaged in a strategy of 'delinking' could strengthen their national ¹⁶ See my general thesis regarding the significance of unequal development in Samir Amin, Classe et nation . . .

¹⁷ For the sake of argument one could cite numerous cases of 'one party' regimes or even regimes of 'no parties allowed at all' which do not provoke Western ire, simply because these states accept the neo-colonial submission. Similarly, there are many well-known examples of 'multi-party systems' which are in practice hardly democratic!

options by a form of regional cooperation, itself delinked from the world capitalist system. At present South-South cooperation is complementary to unequal North-South relations.¹⁸ As long as Third World countries continue to attempt to achieve a capitalist development integrated in the global expansion of capitalism, these countries will be bound to compete among themselves and therefore conflict among them will be the rule. Of course, the matter of intra-Third World conflicts is vast and complex, and could by itself constitute a subject for study, for which this is not the place. So to make this long story short, and recognising that the political (and sometimes military) conflicts between Third World countries are certainly not all of the same kind, I propose here to distinguish four different groups of such conflicts:

- i) Certain conflicts are merely the continuation of the struggle for liberation of the peripheral peoples against imperialism, due to the fact that certain radical regimes have constituted or constitute a target for the West to destroy, with the latter mobilising neo-colonial regimes to fight on its behalf. The actions of the accomplices of the permanent aggression of Israel and South Africa against Egypt and the Southern African front-line states respectively provide evidence of this type of conflict;
- ii) The illusions fostered by the bourgeois national project may have stimulated 'sub-imperialist' ambitions, about which much has been written in the past. Experience has shown that, far from establishing themselves as new imperialisms, even second class ones, these attempts have finally ended with the absorption of local surrogates within the sphere of influence of the real imperialist centres. The conflicts that occur within regional groupings, conceived as 'common markets' between local surrogates in which the activities of monopoly capital concentrate, and the other second rank states of the periphery (e.g. Kenya vs. Tanzania; Nigeria and Ivory Coast vs. the ECOWAS partners), are one outcome of this problematic.¹⁹ The Iran-Iraq conflict is the result of excessive regional hegemonist ambitions of the leadership of both these countries;
- iii) Without doubt conflicts of a purely local origin exist, both within

¹⁸ Fayçal Yachir, 'La coopération Sud-Sud, une alternative?' Bulletin du Forum du Tiers Monde (2) October 1983; Samir Amin, 'Afro-Arab co-operation, the record and the prospects', Africa Development (1987).

¹⁹ Samir Amin, Impérialisme et développement inégal, Paris: Minuit, 1976, Ch. 5; trans. Imperialism and Unequal Development, New York: Monthly Review Press, 1977, Ch. 5.

the frontiers of a single state and between neighbouring states. The heterogeneous and even artificial character of many Third World states is often responsible for these conflicts. It remains the case that these conflicts are frequently caused by struggles between different segments of the comprador ruling class. These segments mobilise in their support forces which the mere fact of social diversity (ethnic, religious, regional) would not alone have caused to confront one another, either spontaneously or under the force of necessity;²⁰

- iv) Nor do the conflicts between socialist countries stem from an inevitable clash of nationalisms traversing social classes and regimes. In some cases, they involve profound differences concerning international politics (for example the refusal of Yugoslavia and China to submit to the strategy of the Soviet superpower). In others, the conflict is rather the expression of the expansionist ambitions of powers aspiring to regional hegemony (such as that of Vietnam vis-à-vis Laos and Kampuchea). Here again democratisation is the only response capable of disarming adventurist leaderships and preventing their going astray.²¹

In all these cases the conflicts of minor or secondary powers in the contemporary world are, at some point, bound to conform with the strategies of the superpowers. It can thus be perceived that these conflicts do not simply replicate the confrontations which accompanied the formation of the core capitalist nations. On the contrary, they are themselves either the result of the polarisation between core and periphery, or a vector of its reproduction.

In conclusion I do believe that the issues of 'social justice' (a better distribution of income), political democracy and international solidarity (rather than intra-Third World conflicts) in the Third World are indeed connected, so that it is impossible to 'cure' any of these evils without considering the whole problem of their interlinkage. Our thesis has been that the global expansion of capitalism is responsible for growing social inequality, political despotism and growing intra-Third World conflicts. Therefore, opting for 'another development'—based on popular interests and democracy—and building international solidarity on the basis of this option necessarily involves 'delinking' from the logic of global capitalism. The drama of Third World nationalism is that it has continuously hoped that the global system could adjust to additional national bourgeois projects. History has proved that these projects are ultimately doomed to failure and are followed by comprador subalternisation, with all its negative social and political consequences.

²⁰ Samir Amin, 'Etat, nation, ethnie et minorités dans la crise', Bulletin du Forum du Tiers Monde (6) 1986.

²¹ Samir Amin, Classe et nation . . . Ch. 7; Samir Amin, Impérialisme et développement inégal, Ch. 8.

Brazil's failure: what future for debtors' cartels?

I

In February 1987, the Brazilian government announced that, although 'it was not a moratorium', all payments of interest on its foreign debt were to be suspended. Two months later the Minister of Finance, Dilson Funaro, was forced to resign. Since then, the Brazilian government has begun moving towards the re-establishment of 'normal' relations with the international financial system and it is already clear that negotiations will begin (with Brazil in a particular weak position) for the resumption of payments on the foreign debt.

The handling of the domestic economy by Dilson Funaro and his team was less than skilful after the implementation of the 'Cruzado Plan' in February 1986. An explosion in domestic consumption since the last quarter of 1986 depleted Brazil's foreign exchange reserves. Also, in November 1986, ill-designed policies intended to adjust some aspects of that Plan backfired with a strong resurgence of inflation, widespread negative expectations for the future of the economy, and the heated protests of virtually all elements in society; these included the popular sector, that had initially supported the Cruzado Plan with great enthusiasm and high expectations, and which, just before the ill-fated November 1986 decisions, had given the government overwhelming electoral support.

Thus, the suspension of the debt payments was not undertaken from a position of strength, as would have been the case shortly after the implementation of the Cruzado Plan when the government enjoyed wide support and had a comfortable US$12 billion in foreign currency reserves. Influential commentators suggested that the foreign debt was a desperate attempt by the government to divert attention from the domestic economic crisis, and once again to marshall strong national support. Whatever the correct explanation of the subjective motivations behind that decision, it had the effect of further focusing attention on the domestic crisis and giving credence to criticisms of the alleged 'irresponsibility' and 'technical incompetence' of the Finance Ministry. Furthermore, there was very little support from public opinion and the popular sector; rather, most of the media and entrepreneurs' organisations, as well as most economists, were quick to argue (ever more loudly until Funaro's resignation) that the suspension of payments was a grave mistake, which was sure to bring about extremely negative consequences for the country. Even President José Sarney, who had announced the termination of foreign debt interest payments in a nationally televised address, soon made it clear that his support for Dilson Funaro (if not explicitly for the foreign debt decision) was wavering.

It remains a matter of speculation what might have happened had the decision on the foreign debt been made at the height of the Brazilian government's popularity and when there were ample foreign reserves, and, in addition, had the government (including its President and the Central Bank) solidly backed the policies initiated by its Finance Ministry. One lesson is at least clear: unilateral decisions on the payment of the foreign debt are too serious, and too likely to raise both domestic and international opposition, to make such a decision advisable in the politically and economically weak conditions that were prevailing in Brazil.

Yet, as this case suggests, there may be a perverse side to the problem. Precisely because the decision is so serious, and its potential consequences so damaging (both for the country and for the government), it was less likely to be made when things were going reasonably well, even if the spectre of the foreign debt loomed large in the medium and long term. Rather, the decision would tend to be made, if at all, out of despair at a critical economic and political situation. Yet, such a situation in many imaginable scenarios would in turn virtually ensure that there would be insufficient domestic support to enable the country to withstand the serious problems and innumerable pressures occasioned by such a decision.

II

Elsewhere,¹ I have analysed from the perspectives of game and coalition theory the reasons why governments of debtor countries fail to do the obvious: namely, to create a cartel that would greatly enhance their joint bargaining power in relation to their creditors. I will not repeat here the arguments that have unfortunately been supported by ¹ Guillermo O'Donnell, 'External debt: why don't our governments do the obvious?', CEPAL Review (27) 1986.

Brazil's recent failure. It is simply my view that the debtors find themselves in a 'prisoner's dilemma',² expressed and perpetuated by their inability to act collectively. The rational interest of the debtors is to form the cartel but, as we shall see, they are faced with extremely serious obstacles. From this point of view, and contrary to more conventional views on the matter, the rational interest of the creditors is not so much to maximise what they can collect from the debtors, but to prolong the imbalance of forces entailed by the fact that, while the debtors are locked in a 'prisoner's dilemma', the creditors themselves are cartelised.

What are the main obstacles to the formation of a debtors' cartel? They derive essentially from the ability of the creditors to do two things if a particular debtor country decides to attempt to act unilaterally, either by suspending payments or rescheduling its debt. One action by the creditors is to threaten, and eventually to apply, severe sanctions against that country. The other—simultaneous—action is to make what in game theory are called side-payments (differential benefits or, in other words, bribes) to other debtor countries that might otherwise be tempted to follow suit.

A rather complicated argument (for which I must refer the interested reader to my already cited article) shows that the cost-benefit analysis of the creditors will lead them to impose sanctions on any single country that defects from the rules of the game which they have laid down. But that same analysis suggests that if a 'sufficient' number of countries, holding a 'sufficient' proportion of the debt, defects, then the expected costs of sanctions may very well overcome the inconveniences of the defection (i.e., the changed balance of power). Such a calculation would entail the creditors accepting the new situation and consequently negotiating within the new parameters.

In terms of each debtor country, the situation is as follows: (1) Because of the risks directly involved, plus the side-payments, it knows that creditors will try to deflect its potential allies—and these benefits will be the larger the more crucial each ally is to the proposed cartel; each country cannot have any reasonable assurance, a priori, that a sufficient number of allies will follow its initial unilateral decisions on foreign debt; (2) If, nevertheless, a country takes the risk and makes such a decision, it should know that it thereby further increases the incentive for the creditors to offer more persuasive side-payments to its potential allies; (3) Consequently, the debtor cannot ignore the fact that, on the one hand, the likelihood of forming the cartel is low and, on the other hand, the costs that it would entail would be extremely severe, both in terms of creditors' sanctions and of the domestic disruptions likely to be generated by its unsuccessful attempt and the consequent sanctions; (4) This problem could be overcome by a decision made simultaneously by a 'sufficient' number of debtors, there serious obstacles in reaching such unanimity; (5) Consequently, before the cartel is effectively created there is a series of hurdles, each of which considerably diminishes the overall probability that such a cartel will come about (not to mention the further problems in guaranteeing that the cartel will endure for long enough to produce the intended effects); while the probability of success is small, the costs to be expected from an unsuccessful attempt are severe; (6) Given these circumstances, each debtor tends not to challenge the existing imbalance of power but rather attempts to get the best possible terms given the existing rules of the game—which, by that very policy, it helps to sustain; (7) Hence, whenever a particular debtor tries to break the rules of the game, other debtors may each receive side-payments from the creditors, thus maximising its interests within the given situation. (In game theory the lonely cooperator is called 'the sucker'.)

² Among the many texts available for an introduction to game theory, a reasonably straightforward one is Henry Hamburger, Games As Models of Social Phenomena, San Francisco: W H Freeman and Co., 1979. For interesting applications of game theory concepts to international relations, see the special issue of World Politics 38(1), October 1985.

Of course, the maximum interest of each debtor is in changing the whole structure of the system, but we have seen that it is very unlikely first, that any single debtor will be able to effect such change and second, that the coalition that could do it may be formed. Let us now turn to actual events.

III

Creditors reacted to the Brazilian decision with extremely rational, graduated sanctions: severe criticism from the governments of most central capitalist countries; the immediate curtailing by international banks of US$60 million in short-term and commercial and inter-bank credits to Brazil, with the explicit warning that more severe cuts were to follow; the refusal by the Advisory Committee of the creditor banks to endorse Brazil's request for a sixty-day renewal of its short-term commercial lines of credit, leaving the pertinent decisions to the individual banks, with the result that some of those credits were cut and the spread increased.³ Yet, despite their significance, these reactions were less severe than a simplistic view of the issue might have led one to expect.

Instead, with the support and encouragement of the US government, the banks engaged in frenetic activity on another front to conclude negotiations pending with other debtor countries (including some of the largest, such as Mexico, Argentina, Chile, and the Philippines), by offering them significantly more favourable terms than those proposed before the Brazilian decision. No action or even gesture of support for Brazil came from those countries; rather, they played 'prisoner's dilemma', took the side-payments, and left Brazil in the position of the 'sucker'.

For its part, Brazil played the game of 'chicken'.⁴ Dilson Funaro announced that Brazil was 'in no hurry'; it was ready to wait all the time that was necessary for the banks to come up with negotiation proposals that would be consistent with Brazil's decision to grow at the rate of no less than 7 per cent in the foreseeable future.⁵ This strategy embodied an obvious miscalculation: it assumed that the Brazilian government (in effect, the already politically weak Minister of Finance) could adhere to its decision long enough to harm the banks to the extent that they would have to accept negotiations on Brazil's terms. Moreover, in order to avoid serious harm to the banks, if the Brazilian government failed to 'chicken' rapidly, the creditors would have significantly increased the severity of their sanctions (a threat they indeed made), not to mention the further sanctions that creditor-country governments would probably also have applied. Furthermore, the Brazilian strategy gave the creditors time to effectively isolate Brazil from its potential allies.

Thus, well before the full scope of sanctions was applied, the attempt by Brazil to change unilaterally the rules of the game was sadly defeated. The government team that led the attempt is out of office, the authority of the government has been seriously damaged vis-à-vis both supporters and opponents of the foreign debt decision, the domestic economic crisis has further worsened, and Brazil will surely have to pay a heavy price for its 'improper behaviour' and consequent 'loss of international credibility' in the coming negotiations on its debt.

³ For further information on these and related aspects, see CEBRAP and Secretaria de Economia e Planejamento do Estado de São Paulo, Análise de Conjuntura Econômica. Março-Abril 1987, São Paulo (mimeo, 1987).

⁴ See Hamburger, Games as Models . . . The name of this game derives from reckless competitions between two automobile drivers set to run at high speed towards each other. The one who first swerves away from head-on collision (the 'chicken') loses; of course, if neither contestant gives way, the result is catastrophic for both.

⁵ Insistent statements to this effect by Dilson Funaro may be found in Folha de São Paulo (issues of March and April 1987) as well as in any other major Brazilian daily during this period.

Although such an outcome has undoubtedly entailed some significant costs to the creditors, it has had the great advantage to the creditors of acting as a powerful deterrent to similar 'adventures' by other debtor countries. What example could be more eloquent than the rather easy victory they had won over the world's largest debtor, the only country that could conceivably, in the absence of a cartel and owing to the sheer size of its debt, have unilaterally imposed its own conditions on the creditors? In this sense, acceptance of the game of 'chicken' proposed by Brazil, while at the same time also playing 'prisoner's dilemma' with other countries, was the correct strategy for the creditors (and a measure of the naiveté of Brazil). Furthermore, the strategy of applying carefully graduated sanctions, together with explicit threats about the more severe sanctions that would follow, was rational for the creditors: it did not expose them to the risks of further retaliation by Brazil or of generating in other countries feelings of solidarity that might cancel the effects of the side-payments. Finally, in terms of the dissuasive impact of this situation, the fact that restrained sanctions combined with rather rash threats were sufficient to defeat the Brazilian attempt may be an effective reminder of the further sanctions and disruptions that would afflict a country which attempted to adhere more tenaciously to a similar decision.

IV

What can be done? The case of Brazil does not allow for much optimism. The foreign debt decision was made in Brazil under unfavourable domestic conditions, and apparently there was little, if any, prior effort to rally support from other countries. The situation could only be resolved if countries holding a large percentage of the debt (large enough to make it too costly for creditors to apply sanctions against all participating countries) arrive at coordinated, simultaneous decisions.

The problems of making such moves are enormous. Operating under secrecy is scarcely feasible. The attempt to coordinate decisions would involve numerous consultations and negotiations, as well as intensive staff work among participating countries; it would be highly likely that the intelligence services of central capitalist countries would rapidly detect such moves. Furthermore, in democratic regimes the political leadership would be unable to ignore the fact that such decisions would entail considerable risks and uncertainties for the population; it is hard to imagine that those leaders would feel authorised, or find it compatible with their personal political interests, to attempt the coordinating strategy without prior public debate. On the other hand, an agreement reached by the foreign or finance ministers of the countries involved would be insufficient; they could promptly be dismissed or disavowed. Decisions taken by presidents or prime ministers would appear more binding, but they would in most cases have to obtain parliamentary approval or ratification of the agreements. During this necessarily slow, complicated and public process, the creditors—both banks and governments—would have ample opportunity to offer side-payments, apply some sanctions, and also (as the Brazilian example shows) mobilise powerful domestic sectors against such attempts.

BRAZIL'S FAILURE: WHAT FUTURE FOR DEBTORS' CARTELS?

As argued above, the likelihood of desertions along the road towards the formation of a cartel is high. If defections occur to a degree that the countries still cooperating lack sufficient weight in terms of their joint external debt, they would have played the 'sucker'. Furthermore, an explicit attempt at coordination would be more worrying for the creditors than single unilateral decisions (even if made by such a major debtor as Brazil); hence the inducement for the creditors to raise their side-payments to potential defectors would increase proportionately to the risk they perceived, and the sanctions applied to the 'sucker' countries could be correspondingly steep.

We see that the problem is a typical one of collective action. The main interest of each debtor is to coordinate its action with other debtors, but since they are held within a 'prisoner's dilemma', they are very unlikely to initiate it themselves. For the creditors this problem was solved by the pressures and threats that the largest banks (and creditors), jointly with the US government, applied to medium and small banks.⁶ Some international financial institutions, especially the IMF, have also been crucial in this respect. But who could do it for the creditor nations? To begin with, large banks have effective means of coercion over lesser ones; this is not the case among debtor nations: if coercion can effectively be applied against them, it is surely by central capitalist countries, not by other debtors.

At this point one is tempted to throw up one's hands in despair, and hope that the overall situation will deteriorate to such an extent—and hence become so threatening to the survival of the whole capitalist system—that banks and governments of creditor nations will come up with some sort of solution. But, for reasons that are in part too obvious and in part too long to discuss here, such passivity would be less than ideal: there can be little doubt that, whatever their 'solution' to the debt problem, it would further tighten the screws of dependency and international exploitation.

⁶ See Charles Lipson, 'Banker's dilemma: private cooperation in rescheduling sovereign debts', in World Politics 38(1) October 1985.

Is there any way to achieve the coordination necessary to establish the debtors' cartel and then make it function for the time needed? The initial steps could perhaps be made by an international commission of distinguished economists and former statesmen. In a similar manner to the IMF's missions, such a commission could examine the economic and social situation of a given country. Such a review would not be made from the creditor's perspective, that is, of making the foreign debt the parameter to which domestic variables have to adjust; rather, the work of the commission would take a medium-term view to set parameters for assessing how much of the debt could be paid, and when, as well as calculating a reasonable rate of growth of the national product and of employment and estimates of the foreign exchange implications of social policies aimed at satisfying the basic needs of the population.

I am assuming (my observation of the daily routines of governing in Brazil and Argentina supports this view) that, given conditions of severe economic crisis and, often, of a precarious political situation, governments tend to deal with single issues, on a day-to-day pragmatic basis. Thus, if a serious crisis directly derived from the foreign debt can be postponed, government ministers will do almost anything to achieve such a postponement, ignoring most of the indirect consequences of foreign exchange constraints and directing their attention to other issues on their short-term agenda. This tendency to divert attention away from problems that are defined as too intractable to be confronted is substantiated by studies of complex organisations—even those that are in a much better condition to deal with their environment than the public bureaucracies through which governments must make and implement policy.⁷ Under these conditions, both a marked reluctance to take the risks of moving toward a debtors' cartel, and a willingness to accept whatever side-payments may be offered, are understandable. This is so even if those governments can neither ignore the constraints presently placed on all areas of economic and social policy by the foreign debt nor the high probability that future crises stemming from debt payments will occur.

⁷ See, especially, the classic work by James March and Herbert Simon, Organizations, New York: John Wiley and Sons, 1958.

The international commission I am suggesting would offer a chance to alleviate the problem of the agenda of attention. Governments would agree to grant that commission similar access to their data to that usually provided to IMF missions. On this basis (assuming that it is adequately staffed) the commission would produce authoritative reports along the lines sketched above. Furthermore, those reports would include a projection of the strangulation points and more detrimental trade-offs (in terms of some basic goals of economic growth, employment and basic needs) that are likely to occur for the respective country if its present foreign debt arrangements, or relatively marginal variations of them, are continued.

The assumptions and hypotheses underlying such reports would indeed be controversial, and much would have to be learnt while working on the reports. But the assumptions and hypotheses underlying the reports of the IMF and other international agencies are no less controversial, even if a powerful ideology tends to sanctify them as the very embodiment of scientific rational economics. This is one reason why highly qualified economists should be part of the endeavour I am suggesting; a different logic and definition of interests—those of debtor countries and the fundamental responsibilities they bear towards their own populations—must be brought forcefully and urgently to international attention. Domestically, the information processed by the reports, their projections, and the alternatives they explore would at least improve the level of discussion about the foreign debt, both within and outside government circles. Furthermore, the availability of reports for several countries would help to focus attention on problems (in particular, strangulation points and trade-offs), as well as possibilities, that might be shared beyond the short-term.

Creating an informational and analytical basis that each debtor country is unlikely to be able to provide by itself would accomplish on a modest scale what (essentially but far from exclusively) the IMF does for the creditors. We need to increase greatly the visibility and respectability of the formulation of the alternative views and interests of the debtor countries, even for those who are eager to serve those interests but too often fall prey to what is no less than ideological domination: the view that there are really no 'serious', 'workable' solutions other than those to be found within the parameters defined at the centre of world capitalism. The goal of technical and ideological legitimization of alternatives in the interests of debtor countries would be advanced by competent reports from the commission, prepared by skilled and respected professionals, and jointly analysed with the former politicians that would also be members of that institution. In addition, one should take into account the mushrooming of further discussions and studies that the report would surely motivate.

The gloomiest suggestion that springs from the recent defeat of Brazil may be that such a large debtor could accomplish as little as even a 'sufficient' cartel might, if there are no clear and thoroughly discussed ideas. These ideas would support a strategy that goes far beyond a simple negation of some of the consequences of the structure of foreign debt. Such ideas, particularly the alternative futures they would depict (both in terms of projecting an essentially unmodified continuity of the present parameters of the situation, and of exploring structurally alternative scenarios) may well be the only way to motivate a sufficient number of debtor countries to overcome their present 'prisoner's dilemma' and begin playing a cooperative game—the continuity of short-term views by each isolated country guarantees the perpetuation of the 'prisoner's dilemma'. Finally, those same ideas could provide the basis for sufficient domestic support for new and more feasible attempts to change the asphyxiating parameters of the present situation. The international commission I am suggesting may be an important step in this direction: something has to be done, and if the governments of debtor countries are unlikely to initiate it, active and conscious segments of civil society might take on the task.

Latin American debt: debtor–creditor relations*

Latin America is facing a deep crisis arising from financial issues. The abrupt reduction of the sources of external financing—concentrated in bank loans—has been one of the determinant causes of the low level of economic activity since the beginning of the 1980s. Together with the deterioration of the terms of trade, this has brought about such a shortage of foreign exchange that an intense recession in the region's national economies has been provoked. Thus, the utilisation rate of the available productive resources has declined steeply.

At the same time, the scarcity of foreign exchange, the recessive framework and the adjustment policies adopted have discouraged investment. As a consequence, capital formation has likewise been diminishing throughout the region since the early 1980s.

In this study three issues will be addressed. First, a brief account will be given of expected trends in the flows of capital, and of net funds to and from abroad, as well as of the behaviour of economic activity and investment; secondly, background information is presented regarding the flows of funds foreseen for the period 1985–90, according to the projections available. Third, there is a brief inquiry into the causes of the inefficiency of the adjustment registered to date; subsequently, a number of tasks are outlined that have to be met with respect to external financing, its conditionality and domestic development strategies.¹

External financing, economic activity and investment

For the fifth consecutive year, capital inflows to Latin America have been at notably reduced levels. The outflow of profits and interest continues to exceed capital inflows. The subsequent net negative transfer amounted to an annual average of US$28 billion in 1983-86. Vis-à-vis exports (which were declining owing to the deterioration of the terms of trade) the negative net transfer of funds represented 23 per cent of goods and services in 1986 (see Table 1).

* Revised version of the text presented to the Seminar 'Latin America in the world economy', organised by SELA, held in Caracas from 5–7 June 1986. The author is indebted to the members of the Workshop on International Economics of CIEPLAN and to Carlos Fortin for their comments. Statistical material was updated from projections of the IMF published in October 1986 and of ECLAC in December 1986.

¹ The issues covered here are analysed in depth in the book Mas allá de la crisis de la deuda: bases para un nuevo enfoque. The volume, edited by R Ffrench-Davis and R E Feinberg, has been published by Ediciones CIEPLAN, Santiago de Chile, and Grupo Editor Latinoamericano, Buenos Aires. An English language edition will be published in August 1987 by the University of Notre Dame Press in the USA.

Table 1: Net inflow of capital and net transfers abroad
(In US$ billions per year and percentages)

	Net capital inflows	Net payments of profits and interest	Net transfers of funds	(3) as % of exports of goods and services
1974-77	15.1	6.4	8.8	18.8
1978-81	30.5	17.2	13.3	16.1
1982-86	9.7	36.1	-26.4	-24.8
1984	9.2	36.2	-27.0	-23.7
1985	2.4	35.3	-32.9	-30.2
1986	8.6	30.7	-22.1	-23.2

Sources: Calculations based on ECLAC (1986), op. cit., Table 14.

Compared with the transfers of funds recorded during the years 1974-81, the contrast is noteworthy.² For instance, in 1978 (the year of the largest net inflow of funds) positive transfers were equivalent to 26 per cent of exports. This constitutes a difference of roughly 50 per cent of exports with respect to 1986.

After the recovery of exports in 1984, which inspired premature expressions of optimism, the value of exports again shrank in 1985-86. Several countries increased their export quantum, but as a whole Latin America did not succeed in raising the value of sales in foreign markets. A cumulative fall of 13 per cent in terms of trade in the biennium 1985-86 led to a similar decline in the real value of exports. In this manner, by 1986, exports were lower than in 1981.³ During a five-year period of adjustment and after a notable increase in real exchange rates

² In the 1974-80 period part of the funds received were allotted to supplement international reserves. These were used in the years following the crisis. Hence, the net debt (gross debt minus reserves) varied to a lesser degree than the net capital flows.

³ The quantum of exports of goods increased 27 per cent between 1980 and 1986, while unit prices fell 31 per cent. In the case of non-oil countries the quantum increased by 34 per cent while the drop of unit prices was 20 per cent. See ECLAC, Balance preliminar de la economía latinoamericana, Santiago: ECLAC, December 1986, Table 7.

LATIN AMERICAN DEBT: DEBTOR-CREDITOR RELATIONS

(real depreciations), Latin America has been unable to surmount the barriers presented by the world economy: namely, restricted access and markedly lower prices.

The GDP recovered in 1986, swept along by Brazil, with a slight improvement per capita. Nevertheless, in 1986 GDP per capita was 6 per cent below its level in 1981. This percentage is equivalent to a value of production of US$40 billion annually; it represents the shortfall in the volume of economic activity which prevented the output per capita in 1986 attaining the level of 1981. In other words, assuming by conservative estimates that, without an external crisis, Latin America's per capita production in 1986 would have been the same as in 1981, the annual loss can be measured as US$40 billion. Measured in this way, the cumulative GDP foregone in five years would be in the region of US$190 billion.⁴

The productive setback of the region has meant the under-utilisation of its installed capacity. Labour, land and factories have been utilised on a reduced scale relative to 1981. Capital formation has similarly suffered from the recessive situation and from external financial stringency.

Rates of investment experienced a significant rise during the period of increasing indebtedness, which suggests that foreign resources contributed to the development of the region as a whole (see Table 2).

Table 2: Rate of capital formation, Latin America

	Rate
1977-79	24.4%
1980-81	23.1%
1982-83	19.1%
1984-86	17.5%

Source: IMF, World Economic Outlook, Washington DC: IMF, October 1986, Table A.7. Refers to Western Hemisphere, according to IMF, and to gross capital formation as a percentage of GDP.

There were, however, differences between countries as far as volume and quality were concerned. For example, those nations (such as Chile) which liberalised capital inflows, domestic financial markets and imports tended to show both lower investment and reduced domestic savings. On the other hand, a better performance was attained by those countries (such as Brazil and Colombia)⁵ that reformed their trade and financial policies in a moderate and selective manner. This evidence suggests a need to accept a diversity of approaches, resisting the mechanical transmission of standard orthodox measures to semi-industrialised nations.

⁴ Measured in this manner, the loss of production in Latin America is equivalent to four months of forgone output. In the case of Chile, a loss of eight months is reached.

Regardless of the effectiveness of the use of external borrowing, after the shock of the reversal in net financial flows, investment has been limited by the shortage of funds. Both private and public sectors have had to channel a sizeable proportion of their savings into interest payments on the foreign debt. In effect, the net transfer abroad in 1985 represented between one-half and two-thirds of the net formation of capital recorded in that year.⁶

In the present adjustment process, investment and imports of capital goods have fallen substantially below pre-crisis levels. The recessive domestic setting, the notable uncertainty and the restrictions hampering public investment have all contributed to a decline in the rate of capital formation. What is required is a boost in investment with the purpose of creating new job opportunities and restoring growth.

The pattern of capital flows changed drastically after the crisis. Official loans increased in current dollars and also in relation to total loans. In the last triennium (1983–85) they accounted for nearly two-thirds of the net increase of the debt (see Table 3). Therefore, they did fulfil a compensatory role, although their increment covered only a small proportion of the drop recorded in private loans. The figures also reveal a considerable flow of long-term net loans from banks, with public guarantees from the debtor countries. At the same time, however, unguaranteed bank credits greatly diminished, as did short-term loans (which also principally correspond to claims from creditor banks). In sum, the background information reflects: first, an intense overall drop in non-official loans (from entities other than governments and multilateral institutions), which plummeted from an average of US$44 billion annually in 1980–82 to US$4 billion in 1983–85; second, the reduction of trade credit; and, third, the involuntary nationalisation by Latin American countries of the debt incurred with private bank creditors. The foregoing is disclosed by the fact that the bank loans with

⁵ See R French-Davis (ed), Las relaciones financieras externas su efecto sobre la economía latinoamericana, Mexico City: Fondo de Cultura Economía, Mexico, 1983, and M Wionczek (ed), Politics and economics of the Latin American debt crisis, Boulder, Colorado: Westview, 1985.

⁶ See French-Davis (1986), p 39. Also, J Estévez, 'Inversión, ahorro y ajustes externos en América Latina', Notas Técnicas (92), Santiago: CIEPLAN, December 1986.

LATIN AMERICAN DEBT: DEBTOR-CREDITOR RELATIONS

Table 3: Breakdown of the increase of the debt 1980-82 and 1983-85
(in US$ billions and percentages)

	Value of increase		Percentage of total change
	1980-82	1983-85	1980-82	1983-85
Long term	99.3	68.2	68.5	191.0
Official creditors	13.9	23.1	9.6	64.7
Banks with public guaranty from debtor country	46.2	66.3	31.9	185.7
Other private	39.2	-21.2	27.0	-59.4
Short term	45.7	-32.5	31.5	-91.0
TOTAL	145.0	35.7	100.0	100.0

Sources: Calculations based on IMF, World Economic Outlook, Washington DC: IMF, October 1986, Table A.47, for Western hemisphere. 'Other private' includes, among its diverse components, suppliers and bank loans without guarantee. As is known, these figures, based on changes in stocks, are affected by the exchange rate modifications recorded between 1980 and 1985.

guarantees rose by US$66 billion during the recent triennium, while the rest of the short-term and long-term loans from private creditors (the majority from banks) decreased by US$54 billion. This reflects the fact that re-scheduled bank loans, to illiquid or bankrupt domestic private firms, benefited after 1982 from ex post facto public guarantees from debtor nations.

Prospects of external financing

Since 1982 the debt negotiations have been carried out in the expectation of an early resumption of 'voluntary' loans on the part of creditor banks. This expectation has consistently proved to be erroneous. Nevertheless, it is retained as part of the rhetoric in support of the approach followed so far.

It is argued that it is essential to demonstrate 'good behaviour' so as to gain access to external funds, especially from banks. Yet, as already pointed out, figures to 1986 show that Latin America was effecting net transfers abroad rather than receiving funds.⁷

⁷ An analysis of the forces behind this result—within the theoretical framework of a bilateral monopoly—is developed by R Devlin, 'La deuda externa vs el desarrollo: América Latina en la encrucijada', Colección Estudios CIEPLAN (17), Santiago: CIEPLAN, September 1985.

Consequently, the valid argument does not refer to the means of retaining access to funds but rather of forestalling possible retaliation of another type: a cutting of short-term trade credit and other forms of retaliation by creditors and official institutions. It is of interest to highlight the fact that bank trade credit constitutes a powerful mechanism of pressure by creditors, despite representing barely a tenth of the foreign debt.

The negative sign of transfers has derived principally from the flows with private banks, whereas with official entities it has been positive, even though only to a small degree.⁸ Projections for the coming years depict a similar outlook. In particular, the flow of funds with creditor banks is foreseen to be negative at least until the early 1980s (Table 4).

Table 4: Net transfers from official and bank creditors
(in US$ billions)

	Official (1)	Banks (2)
1982	3.0	- 9.9
1983	1.8	-18.5
1984	3.2	-25.2
1985	1.6	-23.0

Sources: See IBRD, World Debt Tables 1985-86, Washington DC: World Bank, 1986, for col. 1, years 1982-84; See R E Feinberg op. cit. for 1985. Col. 2 from R Ffrench-Davies and R E Feinberg, op. cit. based on information from IBRD and Bank for International Settlements; (2) includes only banks from industrialised countries.

If 'voluntary' loans are not resumed soon, the debtor countries will have to enter into repeated negotiations. The present policy of maintaining a 'short leash', as well as the constant process of renegotiation, will entail a prolonging of the instability, uncertainty and short horizons that debtor countries have had to endure.⁹

The October 1986 projections of the IMF for Latin America assumed that in 1986-87 the disbursed outstanding loans from private creditors would grow by a scant 1.4 per cent as opposed to an 11 per cent increase ⁸ See R E Feinberg, 'La deuda latinoamericana: renegociando el costo del ajuste', in R Ffrench-Davies and R E Feinberg (eds), Mas allá de la crisis de la deuda, Diálogo Interamericano, Ediciones CIEPLAN, Santiago, 1986; Illinois, Indiana: University of Notre Dame Press (forthcoming).

⁹ The amortisation instalments due to banks, based on debt commitments recorded by IBRD, op. cit., would reach to approximately US$40 billion in 1988. This figure has not been adjusted by the renegotiations completed in 1985 and 1986, covering amortisations due in 1988.

LATIN AMERICAN DEBT: DEBTOR-CREDITOR RELATIONS

from official sources.¹⁰ As a counterpart, the IMF estimates an average Libor rate of 6.7 per cent for 1986-91 (associated with inflation rates of 3.3 per cent).¹¹

In spite of the diminished bank interest rates projected for 1986-87, which were consistent with the fall recorded in the Libor and prime rates in late 1986 but are clearly below those currently in force and foreseen by April 1987, the net flow of funds is likely to continue to be markedly negative throughout the period observed. Even taking into account the net loans proposed by the Baker Plan, amounting to some US$7 billion annually in net financing to the main Third World debtors, Latin America would still continue to be subject to decidedly negative flows. Note that Table 5 shows that annual net transfers would amount to US$20 billion, according to calculations based on the most recent projections published by the IMF.

The same projections estimate similar transfers for the 1988-91 quadrennium. Almost ten years after the emergence of the crisis, negative transfers to creditor banks would therefore be around US$20 billion in current prices. Such a negative result is obtained in spite of debtor countries' 'good behaviour' and the rescheduling of most amortisations, while the going market rates of interest remain at nominal levels around 6.5 per cent in US dollars (as compared to the present ones of 7 per cent Libor and 7.75 per cent US prime rate in April 1987).

Meanwhile, the net flow of funds from official sources appear positive, though at very moderate levels. Moderate because the projected rate of increase disbursed of outstanding loans is only 7.2 per cent, while average interest rates are persistently drawing nearer the bank rates. Indeed, it is no longer a question of levels substantially below the private market but merely of marginally lower ones.

Hence, the outflow of interest payments to all creditors, in amounts that triple the net loans, constitutes a 'structural' obstacle to the recovery of economic activity and living standards, the return to higher investment ratios and the resumption of national development in debtor countries.

As discussed below, the negative sign of net flows with creditor

¹⁰ For capital-importing LDCs the rates of increase in DOD, according to IMF, World Economic Outlook October 1986, are 2.5 per cent and 6.5 per cent, respectively. This means that Latin America receives a smaller relative contribution from private sources and a larger one from official creditors.

¹¹ The Libor rates assumed by the IMF in the October 1986 World Economic Outlook are 7.3 per cent in 1986, 6.2 per cent in 1987 and 6.7 per cent for the 1988-91 period.

banks represents the stronger asset for debtor nations in a drive towards improving their position. Negative transfers, in face of an inflexible attitude on the part of creditors, gives space for unilateral actions to reduce the volume of transfers. This argument is illustrated by the action of Peru in July 1985 and the announcements of Brazil in March 1987.

It is interesting to underscore how the projections of the IMF have changed. For instance, the IMF (1984) foresaw an increase in private loans of 7 per cent per annum between 1986 and 1990; it also estimated drops in nominal interest rates, though smaller than those it now anticipates.¹² Yet in spite of this, the projected net transfers have worsened, even though more than a year-and-a-half has elapsed since the launching of the Baker Plan. In the projection of 1984 it estimated that as far as private creditors were concerned two-thirds of interest payments would be covered by new loans. Table 5,¹³ on the other hand, shows that this coefficient dwindles to one-fifth in the 1986-91 period.¹⁴ That is to say, it is now expected that the debtors will cover with other sources of funds four-fifths of the interest payments accruing to creditor banks.

Somehow, the contributions from official sources, though on a modest scale, are instrumental in aiding the banks to reap larger net transfers of funds in their favour. Doubtless, any increment in the official loans ought to augment the availability of resources—for investment and basic needs—in the debtor economies and not to support the transfers to banks.

The high outflow of funds occurs simultaneously with an increase in ¹² The nominal rates dropped in 1986, with the Libor falling below 6 per cent. This led forecasters to reduce the rates projected. The inflation foreseen is also lower now. Notice that in April 1985, the IMF projected an inflation rate of 4 per cent in 1986 for the industrialised countries. The figure estimated in the October 1986 IMF World Economic Outlook went down to 3.3 per cent, measured by the implicit deflator of the GNP of industrialised nations. In the first quarter of 1987 the rate of increase of the consumer price index was 1.1 per cent in twelve months. In 1986 several industrialised countries exhibited deflation of wholesale prices while some countries even achieved the same with respect to consumer prices (i.e. Japan and the Federal German Republic). Owing to its depressing impact on export prices faced by LDCs, this involves increase of the debt burden. The opposite happened in the 1970s when significant inflation in the world economy contributed to an erosion of the burden of debt.

¹³ See R Ffrench-Davis and S Molina, 'Prospects for bank lending in the remainder of the eighties', in Journal of Developing Planning (16), New York: United Nations. Table III.3. There comparisons with the projections of the IMF in 1982 are also presented (Table II.1).

¹⁴ There are some problems of comparability with regard to the previous projection, in as much as in Table 5 for 1988-91 the coefficients of all capital-importing LDCs have been used, for lack of disaggregated data for Latin America.

LATIN AMERICAN DEBT: DEBTOR-CREDITOR RELATIONS

Table 5: Projected net transfers
(in US$ billions, annual averages)

	Net loans		Net transfers
	Private Creditors (1)	Official (2)	Private Creditors (3)	Official (4)
1986-87	4.4	7.6	-20.4	3.1
1988-91	5.1	6.4	-19.6	0.6

Sources: See IMF, World Economic Outlook, October 1986. Col. (1) and (2), 1986-87, Table A.47 for Western Hemisphere; 1988-91 calculations based on Table A. 53, utilising the rates projected for the capital-importing developing countries, that assume cumulative rates of annual increase of 1.6 per cent and 7.2 per cent for private and official loans, respectively. Col. (3) based on col. (1) and the nominal interest rates from Table A.53, plus a spread of 1.2 per cent in 1986-87 and of 1 per cent in 1988-91. Col. (4) based on (2) and interest rate of 6.6 per cent for 1986-87 and 6.5 per cent for 1988-91.

the debt of 3 per cent annually between 1985 and 1991.¹⁵ Both phenomena—pronounced negative net transfers and an increase of the debt stock—are related to the prevalence of interest rates at excessively high real levels.

The negative bank flows are not the sole source of financial constraints on LDCs' development during the period after the emergence of the crisis. Flows of foreign investment have also diminished considerably. Projections were made by the IMF and the World Bank and studies realised by the Group of Thirty and by a researcher from the Third World.¹⁶ All of them indicate that the flows of foreign direct investment are expected to be on a modest scale, representing at best merely one-fifth of the projected net capital flows toward the LDCs in the coming years. Furthermore, in several countries the net transfers with foreign investors have turned negative too (net investment flows being smaller than profit remittances). Whatever discourages bank loans is also likely to affect negatively foreign direct investment.¹⁷ Within the ¹⁵ This increase is similar to that of the projected inflation. As it is assumed that the real GDP would rise by approximately 4 per cent, the coefficient $DEBT/GDP$ would improve by that proportion per annum, plus/minus the variation of the real exchange rate of each country.

¹⁶ See the survey by E White, 'Las inversiones extranjeras y la crisis económica en América Latina', in R Ffrench-Davis and R E Feinberg op. cit.

¹⁷ For a recent analysis of the behaviour of direct foreign investment see White op. cit. Note that the conversion of the debt into shareholding capital on the part of foreign investors does not framework mentioned, the indiscriminate liberalisation of existing regulations on foreign investment in debtor countries principally serves the purpose of increasing the 'economic rent' of the outstanding stock of FDI.

The adjustment record and the need to modify it¹⁸

The management of the debt crisis has proved costly for the Latin American countries. Proposals such as the Baker Plan have argued that the costs have been due to the significant 'distortions' which have supposedly continued to shield Latin American governments. This rationale can be summarised in a set of reforms that are recommended for practice by debtor nations: to liberalise trade, facilitate the inflow of foreign direct investment, privatise public enterprises and in general, widen the scope of the market. In my judgement, the formula proposed is far too simplistic. It fails to interpret correctly the recent economic history of the semi-industrialised nations, and ignores the conditions required to carry out economic policies truly efficient in societies characterised by incipient processes of democratisation.¹⁹

There are three factors determining so costly an adjustment as the one which has taken place between 1982 and 1986: a) the unfavourable world trade setting; b) the difficulties faced by debtor countries in designing a development strategy consistent with domestic structural adjustment and the actual shortcomings of the world economy; and c) the abrupt cut in the flows of funds from lenders.

Exports and the debt burden

Within the scope of this study, the discussion should focus on the third issue. Yet the three are closely interrelated. An improved export performance following more favourable access to foreign markets would alleviate the shortage of funding.²⁰ Nevertheless, an increased volume of exports involves the use of domestic productive resources. In enhance per se the net flow of capital towards the debtor countries. A situation may even arise where the foreign direct investment, which was to be undertaken in any case, will now be effected by means of promissory notes, resulting in lower net foreign financing.

¹⁸ As pointed out at the beginning the issues covered in this section are analysed in depth in the essays, comments and panels contained in R Ffrench-Davis and R F Feinberg op. cit.

¹⁹ See the articles by Dornbusch, Ffrench-Davis and Foxley in R Ffrench-Davis and R E Feinberg op. cit.

²⁰ The depressed situation of the markets together with the export drive undertaken by the majority of debtor countries are factors that have undoubtedly contributed to the deterioration of commodity prices.

this sense, for instance, a larger volume of exports to counterbalance stepped-up transfers to the banks cannot be a matter of indifference to a debtor country.

In other words, a more favourable international climate for exports is required, and in this the improvement of prices is decisive. However, it must be assured that the returns are channelled mainly into boosting national development, and not destined to support transfers to creditors in the magnitudes recorded in recent years, and foreseeable in the future if debtors do not decide to change the present framework for negotiations.

Conditionality and domestic policies

The second issue refers to adjustment policies and conditionality.

There is current agreement on the surface (to employ the terminology used by the advocates of different approaches) for the need for structural adjustment. This agreement on rhetoric was not the case only a few months ago when the official stand did not recognise the need for 'structural adjustments' in order to achieve constructive progress. Still, the substance of the policy approach apparently implied by the Baker Plan differs drastically from the real requirements of the region.

It seems to me that we should visualise a form of structural adjustment that also seeks to develop exports, substitute imports in an efficient manner and expand savings and investment. Yet by orthodox methods these goals cannot be attained, or may be only barely and partially attained, albeit with great social costs. The example of the monetarist experiments conducted in the Southern Cone during the 1970s, and still enforced in Chile, illustrate the shortcomings and social inefficiency of this approach.

Adjustment was and continues to be necessary. The question is how to render it more efficient, in the sense of being consistent with overall national development. Structural adjustment of the domestic economy involves great difficulties, and persists in being costly even if it is particularly well executed. Therefore, a greater abundance of liquid resources to smooth and make gradual the process of adjustment is bound to result in a high rate of social return. Hence, the importance of modifying the relationship with the creditor banks and of ensuring that the contributions from multilateral institutions and official sources represent effective net transfers to debtor nations rather than additional losses to the banks.

In the course of recent years, however, Latin America has been transferring a massive volume of resources to the creditor banks in interest payments. The almost US$30 billion remitted in 1985 implied supplementary US$40 billion in production foregone: the remittances of the US$30 billion implied a fall of US$70 billion in aggregate demand.²¹ Thus, the social cost of each dollar transferred abroad equalled a value of between 2 and 2.5 dollars, a manifestly exorbitant distortion in the use of productive resources.

Given the constraints of external financing, the cost of adjustment is associated with an excessive reduction in expenditure (restrictions on aggregate demand) and an inadequacy or incompleteness in the policies used to restructure the composition of expenditure and of output (switching policies).

To propose an indiscriminate liberalisation of markets in order to face this situation merely implies accentuating the cost of adjustment, because it would tend to curtail the capacity of the government to implement effective reallocative policies. On the other hand, to bring about a positive change under these circumstances involves, in the first place, realising that the capacity of response of the diverse components of demand and production is heterogeneous and, secondly, better understanding the nature of the stimuli to which these structures of demand and production react. There is no doubt that the exchange rate or interest rates, if handled in a sensible manner, can produce positive results (permitting a real interest rate of 40 per cent, for instance, could prove as harmful, or even more so, as allowing a negative one of 40 per cent). Yet the use of these instruments by themselves is limited, since they act with the same force on all sectors, regardless of their specific capacity of response. This is where elements of a structural nature should also be taken into consideration, in order to achieve an adequate policy mix that could be termed 'neostructuralist'.

At this juncture, it is requisite to use the instruments of economic policy, recognising and valuing the structural elements and combining them with both the use of indirect mechanisms (exchange rates, interest rates, tariffs, utility rates, etc.) and the implementation of direct measures in favour of certain domestic objectives (investment by the central government and public enterprises, reallocating the purchasing power of the state, design of effective agricultural and industrial development plans, etc.). The restructuring of supply and demand facilitates an increased utilisation rate of installed productive capacity.

²¹ See Ramon and French-Davis in R French-Davis and R E Feinberg op. cit., pp 233-36 and 245-50.

This, in turn, acts as an incentive towards an increased rate of capital formation.

The decline of the utilisation rate of productive resources—labour and capital—tends to lead to a drop in savings both in the public sector and in households and enterprises. Indeed, the drop in wages, unemployment and the non-utilisation of installed capacity have all gradually weakened the process of domestic saving. Add to this the reversal of the net flow of funds between creditor banks and the debtor nations. The level of investment and savings must be enhanced if reasonable growth rates are to be achieved once again. This is not an easy task to fulfil. Within each country it will be necessary to improve the macroeconomic framework, step up the domestic demand to a more normal level, apply a development strategy fully acceptable to the social forces and reduce the external gap and net transfers abroad. With that end in view, a combination of public and private investment is required. In particular, until the shaking macroeconomic framework becomes consolidated, public investment may help to attract private investment. The pursuit of the forcible privatisation of public enterprises during the present crisis would most probably tend to intensify that crisis.

In contrast, excepting cases of arbitrary and erratic interventionism which exist to a point, the formula of moving systematically towards free trade, of methodically selling public enterprises and of accentuating the passivity of the state to ensure its 'neutrality' contributes, in my opinion, only to enhancing the inflexibility of the relation between external resources (which will continue to remain scant) and economic activity. This leads to a significant rate of under-utilisation, and tends to result in reduced capital formation. All these effects reinforce each other in the short- and medium-term, producing weak and inefficient development.

As an alternative to this approach, which extols the passivity and neutrality of the state, there is another scheme which endeavours to restore a more pronounced if selective participation on the part of the state. The point here is to promote the existence of an active though highly selective state, conscious of its capacity as well as of its limitations to act, applying selective policies of relative prices as well as direct action on the structures of demand and production.

On the subject of selectivity in relation to the external sector, I would like to single out three areas of selective policies. One relates to import substitution. The innovative element as far as the historical experience of Latin America is concerned would consist in the substitution of imports being selective and accompanied by an equally selective promotion of exports. Thus both policies, instead of being competitive, would complement each other.

Another related topic refers to regional integration. Intra-regional trade has experienced an acute decline during the crisis, dropping some 40 per cent since the early 1980s. Thus, there is broad under-utilised scope: there existed marketing channels and productive capacity which at present are not being used. The option of recovering past reciprocal trade transcends bilateral agreements and instead requires a 'structural' multilateral treatment: in fact, a political component is needed, namely the will to integrate and share the future. In addition, once the countries have overcome their misgivings, this policy would enable them to take advantage of their installed capacity and henceforth create new productive bases. The object is to avoid in the 1980s a return to the unstable trade agreements of the 1950s, which as a rule were of short-term duration. Latin America must lay down the groundwork for a more permanent and constructive type of cooperation. All this requires the concerted efforts of public and private enterprises in the context of an enhanced selective activity on the part of central governments.

The third aspect concerns the topic of transnational enterprises. These are not likely to solve the finance dilemma of Latin America; as discussed above, at best their contributions in capital could help to alleviate a tenth or a fifth of the external gap. Consequently, the importance of the transnational enterprises lies in another sphere: that of facilitating access to technology and to otherwise inaccessible markets. The experience of Latin American countries more advanced in this respect, such as Brazil, indicates that it is possible to obtain positive results when resorting to transnational enterprises as a mechanism to capture or conquer some segment of the external markets. The target is that these enterprises, in exchange for taking advantage of the host domestic markets (of one or of a group of countries), come forward with an effective contribution towards gaining access to new foreign markets. Once again we are faced with a task that demands organisation and selectivity on the part of the public sector.

The convergence of strategic elements developed at a direct and central level and the appropriate use of the price system, selectively and coherently applied, will contribute to a better utilisation of productive resources, and to the creation of a more propitious atmosphere for investment. In recessive markets, where the level of output per capita has fallen by 6 or 9 per cent in a lapse of five or six years, the climate for investment is less than stimulating, and the scant private resources are siphoned off in the acquisition of public enterprises for privatisation. The recovery of investment claims the convergence of the concerted action of the public and private sectors. From this standpoint, dogmatic anti-statism could turn out to be the worst enemy of any efficient performance of the public sector and of a vigorous private sector.

Restructuring debtor-creditor relations

The third issue is that of the relations with creditors.

The crucial problem here concerns the magnitude of interest payments resulting from a high stock of debt and the high real interest rates relative to historical ones. Generally speaking, the creditor banks have been receiving interest payments at the current market rates. Indeed, the creditor banks have not suffered significant direct losses as a result of the critical situation which they helped to create.

There are diverse proposals, examined in studies by various authors,²² which aim to make the banks share, to an extent, the costs of a situation for which they are partly responsible. Without analysing in detail each type of proposal, it can be affirmed that the point at issue consists in reconciling three elements: a) the reality of the market; b) the need of the debtor countries to resume their development; and c) the contribution towards the 'normal' functioning of the international banking system or of a segment of it.

Ever since 1982, over-optimistic estimates have assumed—year after year—that the banks would soon renew 'voluntary loans'. The experience gained indicates how dubious it is that this will occur in a generalised way in the near future. This, then, is the 'reality' of the market and the sooner it is recognised the better for debtor nations, and presumably for producers of exportables in creditor countries.

To restore development involves allowing the debtor country to choose its own development strategy, mitigating the restrictions imposed by external financing constraints, lessening the effects of instability resulting from external factors²³ and lengthening the time horizon of rescheduling and new financing.

²² See ECLAC, 'Políticas de ajuste y renegociación de la deuda externa en América Latina', Cuadernos de la CEPAL (Santiago) (48); and F Bergstein, W Cline and J Williamson, 'Bank Lending to developing countries: the policy alternatives', Policy Analysis in International Economics (10) 1985, Washington DC: Institute for International Economics.

²³ Incorporating working 'contingency' clauses into debt negotiations and debt servicing might be a way of attenuating the effects of external instability, as in the cases of Mexico and Venezuela.

The drive towards a normal functioning of financial markets faced by LDCs makes it necessary to distinguish between the different components of the bank debt; in particular, it should be pointed out that the prospects for 'normalisation' of trade credits are better than for the other components of the bank debt of developing nations.²⁴ Therefore trade credit, and other new net loans, should be liable to current market interest rates and spreads. The remainder of the bank debt, on the other hand, should either be subject to drastically reduced interest rates and/or significant proportion of the balance of the debt should be written-off.²⁵

The magnitude of the net transfers in favour of the banks is the debtors' great potential bargaining leverage. Latin America annually makes net transfers to the banks instead of receiving funds. Consequently, the argument of many analysts that a tougher position of debtor nations could imperil their access to bank financing is notably outmoded: Latin America actually lost that access in the early 1980s, and will probably remain for a long period without access to net funding.

The crucial drawback for debtors is, of course, the eventual loss of trade credit. This is the strong bargaining asset for bank creditors, an asset representing roughly 10 per cent of the debt, while the strong asset for debtors is the captive debt (the remaining 90 per cent) and the periodical transfers that debtors are in a position to stop or reduce drastically.

As long as nations where creditor banks are based remain inflexible on the maintenance of market terms for interest payments, debtor countries will increasingly tend to be forced to act on their own, in isolation or collectively. I think that isolated action is more probable, but with each country learning more and more from each other's experience. In that sense, the Peruvian treatment of the debt service is illustrative. It is a positive example of how the debt service can be reduced drastically, without repudiating the debtor's liabilities, yet improving significantly the availability of net foreign financing and potential development prospects. However, those steps are not the solution, but a movement toward a solution.

The stable solution would need an overall change in the framework in which specific bilateral negotiations are conducted. The change must be made multilaterally, with creditors and governments or creditor and debtor nations. The new framework would include broadly extended maturity terms for rescheduling, interest payments below market rates, some write-offs particularly of private debts contracted originally without public guaranty and contingency clauses. Net lending by multilateral banks should be increased and conditionality revised, in order to encourage rather than impede development. The approaches implicit in conditionality should be defined with the explicit and decisive participation of the Third World.

²⁴ As already mentioned, short-term credit (which includes so-called trade credit), only represents a tenth of the total debt.

²⁵ The proposal made by Senator Bradley of the USA, for instance, embraces both components. See International Herald Tribune 30 June 1986, and R Dornbusch 'La economía mundial: tópicos de interés para América Latina', in R French-Davis and R E Feinberg, op. cit., p 31.

All changes would not be free and easy. They need courage, creativity and responsibility, with a good dose of organisation and cooperation among Third World nations. Utopia? It will depend to a large degree on LDCs themselves, but also on the existence of less 'unilateralism' in the North.

FRANCES STEWART

Money and South-South cooperation

Monetary arrangements may sound technical and of subsidiary significance. The production and distribution of goods and services are what matter for the pattern of development. From this perspective it would appear that the important international arrangements are those that regulate flows of goods and services and of investment, technology and labour: trade agreements, and rules or codes of conduct concerning investment, technology and labour would appear to take precedence over monetary arrangements. The experience and achievements of South-South agreements seem to exemplify this view: there have been more, and more effective, agreements on trade and investment than on money, and where monetary arrangements have been undertaken they have, typically, been introduced as a supplement to trade arrangements.

But a brief look at the world today shows how fundamentally mistaken this view of priorities is: money dominates economic affairs. The debt crisis—which is basically a monetary matter, being concerned with flows of finance and their repayment—is of overriding importance to most countries in Latin America and Africa and some in Asia. The International Monetary Fund (IMF)—the nearest we have to a world central bank—is now the central policymaker in two-thirds of the countries of Africa and Latin America. The collapsing exchange rate of the dollar threatens to bring about a trade war between the US and Japan, and possibly a world financial collapse. These events have a dramatic impact on countries in the Third World—in many cases far greater than that of their domestic plans and their own monetary policies. Yet in such areas they are virtually powerless—victims of decisions taken elsewhere, in which their interests are ignored completely or given very little weight. Decisions on the exchange rates of the major currencies are taken without regard to their effects on the Third World. Despite much pleading, the country-by-country approach to the debt crisis has been devised to rescue the major Western banks, with little concern for the Third World. Developing countries, which are overwhelmingly those most affected by IMF decisions, have a voice but no power over its decisions.

Monetary constraints and possibilities are also of decisive influence on South-South trade and investment, setting the limits to the effectiveness of trade agreements. This itself represents a powerful argument for Third World countries to support collective monetary arrangements. But there is more at stake than this. Third World countries need to take a more active role in monetary arrangements so that they can cease to be passive recipients (typically victims) of decisions taken elsewhere, and can instead begin to control events in their own interests. In the forty years since Bretton Woods—years in which the majority of Third World countries acquired political independence—there have been a number of attempts to develop South-South monetary arrangements on a regional basis. On the whole these have been successful in relation to their aims. But while this progress has been important, it has hardly impinged on the broader issues of control. Northern domination remains as strong as ever in monetary matters, and this domination reinforces Northern power over policymaking in Third World countries, over trade and investment, and even over politics.

South monetary arrangements, then, can be viewed at two distinct levels: in terms of their impact on trade and development within the region they encompass; and in terms of their effects in countering Northern domination. The two are by no means unrelated, but it is helpful to start by considering them separately. The aim of this article is to review the achievements of South-South cooperation at both levels: to consider the potential and past achievements in promoting Southern development through South-South flows of trade and investment; and to discuss how the South might develop monetary cooperation as a means of securing greater independence from Northern domination. The article concludes by suggesting specific institutional arrangements which would help greater realisation of the potential in the area of monetary cooperation.

To start with, it will be helpful to review some of the major functions of international monetary arrangements, and how these have developed over recent decades.

Functions of international monetary arrangements

International monetary arrangements can be viewed as institutions which reproduce internationally the functions that are performed domestically by national currencies, commercial banks and government authorities, through the activities of the Central Bank.

Generally, within each country there is a single currency that is accepted as a means of payment for all transactions. In addition, commercial banks provide credit which facilitates transactions, and the central bank supports the commercial sector, being prepared to be 'lender-of-the-last-resort'. The central bank thereby prevents catastrophic bank failures, and it can also ensure adequate liquidity in the economy through its power of creating money. The system facilitates production and trade. There is no problem of currency inconvertibility, as there can be between countries, since there is only one currency. Similarly, problems of exchange rate fluctuations and uncertainty, which may also inhibit trade, are automatically ruled out. Assuming adequate but not excessive credit creation, the national monetary system provides the conditions for specialisation, production and exchange, and hence for growth and development.

International currency areas—generally associated with empires (both of the colonial and neo-colonial variety) and their aftermath—have much the same conditions as national currency systems, with a single currency (or if more than one, fixed exchange rates and full convertibility) and credit creation controlled by the imperial central bank. While this system has some of the virtues of a national system, it has disadvantages which have led most countries (other than those in the franc zone) to reject it soon after gaining political independence. First, it means that only the imperial centre controls credit creation, and the other countries have to accept whatever is decided there. Secondly, the exchange rate of each country vis-à-vis the rest of the world outside the currency area is determined by the imperial exchange rate. Thirdly, there can be no change in the exchange rate of a country with respect to the rest of the currency area. Each of these factors can severely inhibit development. In a national system, there may be other policies to compensate weaker members (e.g. tax and investment policies). In an imperial type system, this is less likely, and if it does apply, control tends to be with the centre. Probably, the decisive objection to the system, however, is symbolic: it is obvious that independence is only nominal in such a system. For most countries, the trappings of independence include separate currencies, national central banks, independently determined exchange rates. Yet once these are instituted, there immediately follows a need for international monetary arrangements, because without such arrangements trade may be highly restricted except within national boundaries. Lack of currency convertibility between countries, the absence of credit to facilitate trade across boundaries, and exchange rate uncertainties all inhibit and may even prevent international trade flows.

For many Third World countries, a complete interruption of international trade could be near disastrous—more so than for most industrialised countries—for two reasons. In the first place, the very small size of most Third World economies (to be analysed more fully below) makes autarky very expensive. Secondly, their economies—partly as a consequence of the colonial experience with its single currency area and near-free-trade policies—were highly specialised when they became independent. Apart from food for self-subsistence, the production of many countries was concentrated on one or two primary products, for which the domestic market was almost non-existent. To diversify and industrialise, imports were essential. To make use of their inherited specialisation, and to earn foreign exchange to pay for the imports, they needed to export. Consequently, international monetary arrangements were necessary to permit trade and payments across countries.

The functions of international monetary arrangements, then, are to ease international trade and payments, given the existence of national currencies and national exchange rates. Broadly they may be categorised as (i) securing currency convertibility and/or providing an internationally acceptable means of payment. This function provides for the international counterpart of a national currency; (ii) providing international liquidity. Provision of liquidity to countries in foreign exchange difficulties can promote a greater degree of exchange rate stability, and prevent drastic trade-restricting action in response to temporary problems. Liquidity creation is also needed to ensure adequate levels of international liquidity and prevent liquidity shortages from depressing economic expansion and trade. The liquidity function represents the international aspect of the credit creation and lender-of-the-last-resort functions of national central banks; and (iii) providing international credit to help to finance international transactions. This is the function that is normally performed domestically by commercial banks.

Formal mechanisms are not always necessary to generate arrangements or institutions which perform these functions. Over the last forty years, a host of mechanisms have developed, some formal, the majority informal, to meet the international needs created by the change from imperial currency areas to domestic currency systems among Third World countries. Formal institutions include the IMF, which provides international liquidity in the form of access to quotas and the creation of Special Drawing Rights (SDRs), and official export credit agencies in developed countries, which provide trade credit. There have also been regional monetary arrangements including those between Third World countries, to be discussed later. Informal mechanisms include the use of the dollar as a trading currency, and using dollars, other industrialised countries' currencies and gold as a source of foreign exchange reserves and international liquidity; as well as credit extended by commercial banks and companies to finance international trade and investment.

In one way or another, each of the three functions of international monetary arrangements has been fulfilled to some degree. But there have been major problems with the way in which they have been fulfilled. First, important functions have not been satisfactorily performed. This is especially true of the liquidity function, where levels of international liquidity have been very inadequate,¹ leading to a strongly deflationary bias in the world economy; and the lender-of-the-last-resort function has not been performed at all, thus putting the whole financial system at risk during the debt crisis.² The South has suffered from the excessive deflation, and the cautious view taken towards the debt situation, which have resulted from these deficiencies in international monetary arrangements. However, the second set of problems with the way in which international monetary arrangements have evolved is of even greater relevance to the discussion here. All the mechanisms have been directed towards North-South transactions, not South-South, and at the same time each mechanism has been dominated by the North which has retained much the same power as it had in the colonial system. This will become clearer with a more detailed discussion of how the three functions are performed.

Third World trade, for the most part, is dominated in dollars or some other industrialised country's currency, whether the trade is with the North or with other Third World countries. In general, payments for the sale of goods or for purchases are also made in such a currency, again whoever the trade is with. The only exception near to this near universal rule is where there are specific regional payment arrangements, or countertrade arrangements (where the goods may be paid for with goods). Thus the international means of payment are Northern currencies.

¹ J Williamson, 'A new SDR allocation?', Washington, DC: Institute for International Finance, 1984.

² M Lipton and S Griffith-Jones (1984) 'International lenders of the last resort: are changes required?', Midland Bank Occasional Paper, No. 1.

The international liquidity function is performed formally by the IMF. Voting power in the IMF is determined mainly in relation to size of national quotas. This means that the USA alone has 19.3 per cent of the voting power. The USA, European countries and Japan together have more than half the voting power. One-third of the votes are needed to veto a decision, i.e. an alliance of the USA and three European countries is sufficient. Informal liquidity creation is a function of US monetary policy, as long as dollars are accepted as means of payment and international reserves. Both formal and informal mechanisms for international liquidity creation are therefore controlled in the North. The irony is that this is true even where it is South-South trade and payments for which the liquidity is needed.

Credit for trade and investment is provided by Northern export credit agencies (which are often subsidised by their governments) and commercial banks whose headquarters, regulatory procedures and owners are located in the North. The main exception here—apart from some regional arrangements—is the growth of international banks based in, or financed by, the Middle East. But these are of minor magnitude compared with the activities of Northern banks. Again, besides trade with the North which forms the bulk of their business, Northern banks also finance much of the trade within and between Third World countries—trade which, aside from the financing, has nothing to do with the North, but which can be stopped or promoted by decisions made by Northern banks.

The dominance of Northern institutions in monetary arrangements reinforces trading links between North and South, and gives no encouragement to the development of intra-South trading links. The biases in the international monetary system as it has evolved, with the institutional dependency which reinforces and creates other forms of dependency, themselves provide a very strong case for promoting Southern financial arrangements. But there is also a more positive case: monetary arrangements within the South could promote a dynamic, efficient and independent pattern of development.

Advantages of South-South trade

The historic—and current—biases which have favoured North-South trade and have discriminated against South-South trade justify corrective action. These biases are not only monetary, as described above, but include almost every element which facilitates trade—transport, insurance, technology, communications and culture. More positively, trade between Third World countries permits small and underdeveloped economies to exploit economies of scale, specialisation and learning, while maintaining some protection against competition from advanced economies which—if there were free trade—would limit or prevent any form of industrialisation for some countries.

The very small size of many Third World countries needs to be emphasised. It is not only a question of small populations—though this is true for many countries. Thirty-four members of the UN have populations of below 1 million, and another thirty-one have populations of between 1 and 5 million. But low per capita incomes, with a low proportion of those incomes spent on manufactured products, mean that the domestic market for manufacturing output is typically a fraction of the size of that of developed countries. This fact, together with the early stage of development, leads to very small manufacturing sectors in many countries. This is illustrated in Table 1, which excludes countries

Table 1: Size of manufacturing sector in Third World countries 1984
($ million, Gross Value Added)

40,000 and over (over 42% of UK manufacturing sector)	Brazil 50,525 Mexico 41,112
20-25,000 (21.4%-26.7% of UK)	Republic of Korea 24,702 India 24,340 Argentina 22,863
7-12,000 (7.5%-12.8% of UK)	Turkey 11,390 Venezuela 8,550 Philippines 8,210 Saudi Arabia 7,657
5-7,000 (5.3%-7.5% of UK)	Colombia 6,192 Malaysia 5,563 Pakistan 5,546 Greece 5,319
3-5,000 (3.2%-5.2% of UK)	Peru 4,698 Singapore 4,555 Chile 4,150

MONEY AND SOUTH-SOUTH COOPERATION

1-3,000 (1.1%-3.2% of UK)	Nigeria	2,938
	Morocco	2,261
	Ecuador	1,875
	Kuwait	1,737
	Zimbabwe	1,236
	Libya	1,222
	Ivory Coast	1,137
500-1,000 (0.5%-1.1% of UK)	Tunisia	972
	Dominican Republic	933
	Cameroon	858
	Sri Lanka	760
	Bolivia	722
	Nicaragua	708
	Paraguay	658
	El Salvador	651
	Kenya	617
	Zambia	554
	Burma	552
	Jordan	515
100-500 (0.1%-0.5% of UK)	Ethiopia	450
	Senegal	430
	Jamaica	428
	Honduras	426
	Panama	409
	Yemen A.R.	265
	Ghana	224
	Mauritius	146
	Congo Republic	121
Under 100 (under 0.1% of UK)	Nepal	92
	Botswana	69
	Liberia	69
	Sierra Leone	54
	Central African Republic	45
	Togo	43
	Guinea	42

Source: World Bank, World Development Report 1986, Washington DC.

with population below 1 million. Twenty-eight countries have manufacturing sectors which are less than US$1 million in value added, or less than 0.18 per cent of the US manufacturing sector (less than 1 per cent of the UK manufacturing sector). This small size makes it impossible for countries to exploit economies of scale and specialisation. A study in 1969 estimated that only eight of thirty-eight manufacturing industries would be efficient at a scale of production of 1 per cent of the UK market or below, while half the industries would only be efficient with more than half the UK market.³ Economies of scale tend to increase with technological change over time, so it is likely that efficient size has grown since then. Some industries may be efficiently produced in small developing economies, but only if there is just one firm and one plant. This means there is a lack of competition, which is liable to result in inefficiency, and also that consumers can only enjoy a single type of product.

One of Adam Smith's most important statements was that 'Specialisation is limited by the extent of the market.' And the reverse is also true: the market depends on specialisation, because specialisation produces increasing productivity through economies of scale and learning. Small and underdeveloped economies are thus trapped in a vicious circle. Because of their small size, they cannot raise productivity through increased specialisation. Moreover, they also lack industrial experience which is another important aid to improved productivity. Consequently, they cannot compete in international markets. Protection is therefore introduced to offset these disadvantages and permit industrialisation. But protection confines the economy to the size of its own market and therefore prevents specialisation and economies of scale.

Countries in the early stages of industrialisation need to extend their markets without having their industrial sectors totally undermined by competition from the industrialised countries. Trade between Third World economies achieves this: it extends the market and therefore the scope for specialisation, without destroying it. It permits countries to combine variety in their consumption, with specialisation in their production. It generates intra-industry trade—with different plants specialising in the production of different parts of a product—which is the quintessential feature of specialisation, and formed the core of the massive expansion in trade that occurred in Europe after the Second World War. It is also conducive to the development and adoption of more appropriate technology, since Third World markets offer potential for appropriate products designed for low-income consumers, and appropriate techniques are thus less likely to be rendered obsolete because they fail to produce the sort of sophisticated products demanded among high-income consumers in advanced countries.

Some Third World countries have overcome the disadvantages of very small size—nine countries have markets which are 5 per cent or more of the UK market, five of which are more than 20 per cent of the UK market. Most of these countries compete successfully in world markets, and do not face the dilemmas just described. But these economies today face other problems, for which trade with the South may offer a solution. First, the consequences of slowdown in growth in the North require a search for a new 'engine of growth'. For a variety of reasons—some to do with sociological and technological factors, and some related to society's objectives and policies—the 'old' industrialised countries are likely to grow more slowly than the 'new' industrialised countries would like to, and could, given fast-growing trading partners. These countries would find it easier to realise their growth objectives and potential through focusing on trade with each other. This is the argument put forward by Sir Arthur Lewis⁴ in favour of South-South trade. Secondly, and not unrelated to this, most of the countries in this group (in fact two-thirds) are in severe financial difficulties, largely because of debt-servicing problems. These countries are unable to buy imports essential for growth because they lack foreign exchange, are unable to sell their goods to earn foreign exchange in the North because of sluggish and protected markets, and are unable to sell their goods in the South because most Southern countries are also suffering from foreign exchange difficulties. The result is slow (or negative) growth. Trade with each other would permit faster growth for all.

³ C F Pratten, Economics of Scale in Manufacturing Industry, London: Cambridge University Press, 1971.

South-South monetary arrangements

The functions of international monetary arrangements were described earlier. In summary, the main purpose is to facilitate trade. A large number of South-South monetary arrangements have been established on a regional basis, over the past quarter of a century. While the historic biases against South-South trade and the obstacles to its expansion extend well beyond monetary matters, monetary arrangements are a powerful and essential support for trading agreements.⁵

Three types of monetary arrangement have been instituted: clearing arrangements (typically also involving some credit), multilateral credit arrangements for balance-of-payments support, and monetary unions.

⁴ Sir W Arthur Lewis 'The slowing down of the engine of growth', American Economic Review 70(3) 1980, pp 555-64.

⁵ T A Medina, (1983) 'Monetary and payments agreements among developing countries' in B Paulic, R Uranga, B Cizelj and M Svetlicic (eds) The Challenges of South-South Cooperation

Complete monetary integration—which is rare, but there are two instances in Africa—performs both functions. Multilateral clearing arrangements aim to encourage trade within the area by multilateralising payments, making greater use of local currencies in trade between members, economising on 'hard' currencies, and extending credit among members. For example, before the establishment of the West African Clearing House the 'principal channel for effecting settlements [was] through the region's commercial banks. They in turn settle[d] in convertible currencies through correspondent banks in the major financial centres of Western Europe, and the United States'.⁶ By replacing this system, the Clearing House reduced the use of foreign exchange for transactions within the region, and also the transaction costs incurred by Western commercial banks. The second type of arrangement provides mutual support for temporary disequilibria in countries' balance of payments. Some of these arrangements involve formal pooling of part of countries' foreign exchange reserves. These schemes are not directed at intra-regional trade, but at mutual support, performing like a mini-IMF, with the resources of the associated countries.

A. Multilateral clearing arrangements include:

- 1) The Central American Clearing House (1961): this is a mechanism for multilateral clearing and reciprocal credits established by the central banks of Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras and Nicaragua. The purpose is to expedite monetary transfers within the region and to support the Central American Common Market (CACM).
- 2) Reciprocal Payment and Credit System of the Latin American Free Trade Association (LAFTA) (1965): this agreement is between Argentina, Brazil, Bolivia, Colombia, Chile, Ecuador, Mexico, Paraguay, Peru, the Dominican Republic, Uruguay and Venezuela, with the aim of achieving the orderly settlement of balances, and the extension of some credit between members.
- 3) The West African Clearing House (1975): the agreement includes the members of the West African Monetary Union together with Cape Verde, Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Liberia, Mali, Mauritania, Niger, Nigeria, and Sierra Leone. There is a common unit of account for trade between members and transactions between members are debited/credited in the centralised clearing system, with the outstanding balances settled periodically. Additional credit, above that arising between settlement dates, is not provided. The system is intended to encourage use of local currencies for intra-regional trade, thereby economising on hard currencies and encouraging intra-regional trade.

⁶ P. Robson, Integration, Development and Equity, Economic Integration in West Africa, London: George Allen and Unwin, 1983.

- 5) The Asian Clearing Union (1974): this provides multilateral clearing for commodities traded between Bangladesh, Burma, India, Iran, Nepal, Pakistan and Sri Lanka. National currencies can be used so that members economise on foreign exchange reserves.
- 6) The Multilateral Clearing Facility of the Caribbean Community (CARICOM) (1977) covers Barbados, Belize, ECCA, Guyana, Jamaica, and Trinidad and Tobago, and as with the others involves multilateral clearing facilities and the use of national currencies for approved transactions. It is intended to support the CARICOM trade arrangements.
- 7) The Central Africa Clearing House (1979) between Zaire and the Central African States provides for multilateral clearing.
- 8) The Monetary Arrangement of the Economic Community of the Great Lakes (1978) has clearing arrangements supporting the Economic Community of the Great Lakes covering Burundi, Rwanda and Zaire.

B. Multilateral balance of payments support arrangements include:

- 1) The Central African Monetary Stabilisation Fund (1969) established among five central African states to provide financial assistance to correct temporary disequilibria in the balance of payments of member countries.
- 2) The Multilateral Mutual Assistance Agreement to correct Temporary Deficiencies of Liquidity (1969) for mutual assistance among LAFTA members.
- 3) The Central American Stabilisation Fund (1969).
- 4) The Arab Monetary Fund (1976), which has twenty-one members, aims to coordinate monetary systems with the objective of greater monetary and economic integration, as well as providing balance-of-payments assistance among members.
- 5) The Association of South-East Asian Nations (ASEAN) Swap Agreement (1977) including Indonesia, Malaysia, Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and Brunei.

- 6) The Andean Reserve Fund (1976) among the five members of the Cartagena Agreement.

C. Monetary Unions include:

- 1) The West African Monetary Union (1962) covering six countries—Benin, Burkina Faso, Ivory Coast, Niger, Senegal and Togo. These countries have formed an integrated monetary area, with a freely circulating common currency which is pegged to the franc, and a common central bank, which holds the foreign exchanges of members in a common pool.
- 2) The Central African Monetary Union (1972) comprising Chad, Cameroon, Central African Republic, Congo and Gabon, which operates on similar principles.

Assessment

It is apparent from this brief review that there has been considerable progress in instituting monetary arrangements among Third World countries. Over half the countries in the South have been affected in one way or other. Each of the three major functions delineated above has been performed in one or other arrangement, i.e. means of international payment, liquidity creation, and credit for international transactions. The Clearing House Mechanism had been most extensive—this performs the means of payment function and typically involves some credit, but not normally a great deal. The mutual balance-of-payments support schemes effectively add to countries' liquidity.

It is not possible to make a definitive assessment of the schemes because (i) they have typically been associated with other attempts to promote intra-regional trade, particularly agreements on tariff liberalisation; indeed their major function is to support such measures; and (ii) in recent years, there has been a marked deterioration in the financial and trading environment for most countries. That being said, it seems the schemes were fairly successful while times were 'normal' in the 1960s and 1970s, but do not seem to have been able to counter the effects of the crisis of the 1980s. There were two aspects to their success in the 1960s and 1970s: first, the various schemes accumulated functions and members over time and were not limited or disbanded. In this respect they differed from trade agreements, which in some cases had a more chequered history, with some retreat and occasional complete breakdown. Secondly, South-South trade in general expanded fast over

ORDER FOR

BERNARD CHIDZERO
A.L.A.F.G.A.M.H.A.S

LINKING the SOUTH

Route to Economic Cooperation.

LIVING WITHIN OUR MEANS

...to Democracy in the Third World
...the Secretary General 1988-89
...and South Africa
...the old order
...of the continent
...and resolution in the Third World
...a Third World strategy of development
...and development in the Third World
...of the continent
...of the continent

DECOLONISATION & AFTER
THE FUTURE OF THE THIRD WORLD

MONEY AND SOUTH-SOUTH COOPERATION

this period, and particularly intra-regional trade to which these schemes (together with trading agreements) have been directed.

South-South trade grew rapidly over the 1960s and 1970s, with the share of manufactures in the total growing from about 5 per cent of all South-South exports in the early 1960s to 30 per cent by 1980. (See Tables 2 and 3.)

Table 2: Growth in export volume, % p.a.

	1962-73	1973-80
All exports
South to South	9.0	4.3
South to North	11.0	-1.4
North to South	7.1	10.2
North to North	11.1	3.6
Manufactures
South to South	17.6	20.7
South to North	21.2	10.2
North to South	6.9	10.1
North to North	12.4	3.9

Source: Newson and Wall, op. cit.

Table 3: % of total exports going to developing countries

From	1960	1984
Low-income (excluding China and India)	29	30
China and India	25	44
Lower middle-income	25	32
Upper middle-income	17	33

Source: World Bank, World Development Report, 1984 and 1986, Washington DC.

From 1973 to 1980, South-South trade in manufactures grew faster than any other category of trade, growing at a rate of 20.7 per cent per annum, compared with 10.2 per cent (South-North), 10.1 per cent (North-South) and 4.1 per cent (North-North). But in the 1980s, the cutbacks in imports into Third World countries necessitated by the crisis have hit South-South trade more heavily than other forms of trade, and

South-South trade has fallen as a percentage of world trade and as a percentage of Southern exports.⁷

South-South trade is concentrated within regions. For example, one quarter of Latin America's exports went to other developing countries in 1980; of those exports going to developing countries, four-fifths went to other Latin American countries, and one-fifth to Asia and Africa. Similar ratios apply to Asia. Africa has a much lower proportion of exports going to developing countries (7 per cent in 1980), and a lower share of these are intra-regional (under 30 per cent). However, the rate of expansion in South-South trade in manufactures from 1965 to 1980 was roughly the same for intra and inter-regional exports. This was presumably the outcome of two opposing tendencies: on the one hand, rising income within OPEC countries led to growth in inter-regional trade; on the other, the various monetary and trade arrangements promoted intra-regional trade.

Evidence on the combined effect of specific monetary and trade agreements shows that, in general, intra-regional trade rose as a proportion of the total trade of the region in areas with agreements.⁸ For example, among LAFTA countries, trade among members grew six-fold and in manufactures twenty-fold between 1961 and 1974. The Andean Pact liberalisation efforts were found to have increased intra-regional trade, especially in non-traditional exports. The rate of increase of trade among countries of the Central American Common Market rose by over half following its establishment, with an increasing share taken by manufactures. Positive effects on intra-regional trade have also been found for the CARICOM countries, the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) and the Central African Customs and Economic Union.

Each of the cases which have succeeded in increasing intra-regional trade has combined monetary and trade arrangements. This is what one would expect, since monetary arrangements will have little effect unless accompanied by tariff and non-tariff liberalisation. Their prime role—from the perspective of increasing intra-regional trade—is to permit such liberalisation to take place at less risk of causing monetary problems. In addition, such arrangements permit economy of foreign exchange reserves which should have a generally beneficial effect on levels of income among members, as well as reducing the need to seek outside help (e.g. from the IMF).

⁷ M Newson and D Wall, 'Policy and institutional obstacles to South-South trade in manufactures', UNIDO/IS. 584, 1985.

⁸ Ibid.

MONEY AND SOUTH-SOUTH COOPERATION

However, in the 1980s there has been a dramatic fall in intra-regional trade in Latin America. Trade within the region (excluding fuel) fell from a peak of 18.8 per cent of total trade in 1979 (rising from 11.6 per cent in 1970) to 9.3 per cent in 1984, the major fall occurring in 1982-83.⁹ This huge fall reveals the weakness of the monetary schemes during crisis. In principle, this was a time when there was special advantage to intra-regional trade, which could compensate for declining world trade, and could potentially provide a trade which made minimum use of the increasingly scarce 'hard' currency needed for debt servicing. Two factors explain the decline. The most important was the collapse in incomes and imports that occurred at this time in Latin America. Latin American imports as a whole fell by considerably more than those of any other region—with a drop of 17.7 per cent in 1982 and of 22.3 per cent in 1983, compared with a fall of 0.4 per cent and a rise of 4.6 per cent for all industrialised countries, and a fall of 3.7 per cent in US imports in 1982 and a rise of 13.0 per cent in 1983. This collapse in imports in Latin America, which was due to the stringencies of the debt crisis, meant that countries within the region found the markets of other countries sharply reduced, and this had little to do with monetary arrangements. The monetary arrangements, however, proved inadequate to offset these forces. This was due to the fact that for the most part imbalances in payments in the region were financed with hard currencies, so that countries were as cautious in restricting purchases from each other as from other sources, while some forms of credit that were not on offer in intra-regional trade were available in trade with the North. If regional payment arrangements are to protect intra-regional trade at times of general foreign exchange crisis, then it is essential that the imbalances within the region are not financed by dollars or other hard currency, but by credit with the payments union, or a non-convertible Latin American currency, a 'Peso'. (The Andean Reserve Fund has already issued such an 'Andean Peso', but on a limited scale, and with quite tight restrictions on its use.)

Broadly then, in the 1960s and 1970s the regional monetary arrangements within the South can be regarded as a significant achievement, in complete contradiction to the widely-propagated myth that unity among the South is all talk and no action. While the experience of the 1980s has revealed problems, countries in Latin America are now beginning to consider some strengthening of arrangements in response to these problems. There is considerable potential for further developments in regional payment arrangements—with respect to country coverage, and the content of the agreements. In particular, clearing house arrangements need to place much greater emphasis on credit creation for trade between members while mutual balance-of-payments support schemes could be extended in country coverage and in the quality of assistance provided.

⁹ J A Ocampo, 'Financial aspects of intra-regional trade in Latin America', Fedesarrollo, February 1987.

Some of the schemes aim eventually at monetary union. While this has major benefits in extending the size of the market, reducing transactions costs, and economising on foreign exchange reserve (especially if trade restrictions are simultaneously abolished within the union), it can also create serious problems for weaker partners, which are not only bad in themselves, but may also prevent the realisation of the union or lead to its break-up. Consequently, monetary union should only be pursued if (i) a system can feasibly be introduced for protecting the weaker partners; and (ii) there is full political support for such close relationships, and for the limitations on sovereignty implied. In the absence of these conditions, less ambitious types of cooperation can be extremely fruitful and are likely to have greater long-term viability.

While there has been progress in regional arrangements, almost nothing has been achieved in the monetary area in terms of Third World countries as a whole. Yet all South monetary arrangements could be of tremendous benefit. In the first place, inter-regional trade is still very small.

The possibilities of developing dynamic export markets among fast-growing countries in different regions are great. An enormous variety of goods is produced within the South, so much so that the less developed countries could get everything they need from other Southern countries. Secondly, developing viable alternative technologies over a wide range of products requires a collective effort across regions. Thirdly, with the debt-led foreign exchange crisis which is so pervasive, South-South trade across regions, making little or no use of Northern currencies, could permit higher growth of output and employment and a higher level of investment. Finally, if the South is to counter the current Northern domination of financial institutions and monetary decisions, effective Southern institutions are needed. The rest of this article describes some possibilities. Each would not only provide direct benefits to most countries, but would also improve Southern bargaining power on monetary matters.

Monetary arrangements for the South as a whole

Monetary and financial institutions for the South as a whole have been proposed in four areas: the institution of a South Currency or a Payments Union; the development of Commodity Reserves to act as foreign exchange reserves for the South; the institution of a Southern IMF; and a South Bank. There is some potential overlap between the proposals, and any new institution could in principle perform more than one of the proposed functions.

1) A South Currency or Payments Union: the proposal for a South currency is for Third World countries to issue their own currency—Rocnabs—for part payment for goods and services exchanged among themselves.¹⁰ By issuing their own currency, liquidity and purchasing power within the South would be increased. Countries' ability to buy imports from other Third World countries would increase, as would the markets for their products in other countries. The financial restraint on trade would be relaxed. The proposal would be equivalent to a Payments Union or Clearing House which offered mutual credit among members. But unlike existing clearing house arrangements it would cover all the South, or as many countries as wished to join, and would involve less administration than a clearing house, which generally requires all transactions among members to be cleared at the centre. The size of the Rocnab issue could be determined accordingly to the liquidity needs and trade potential of the South. The currency would thus permit Southern levels of liquidity and demand to be partially independent of Northern decisions.

The most frequently raised objection to this scheme is that some countries would accumulate Rocnabs—countries in permanent surplus with other countries in the South—while others countries, in chronic deficit with other Third World countries, would soon run out of Rocnabs. To avoid this, there would need to be incentives and penalties designed to encourage long-run balance. To some extent the scheme itself would automatically generate its own incentives, since those accumulated Rocnabs would be wasting purchasing power unless they switched their purchases to the South. But in addition, it would be possible to attach special penalties to the accumulation of Rocnabs over a prolonged period, e.g. by charging interest on them. In Keynes' proposals for a world clearing union, which he put forward at Bretton Woods, he devised a set of five penalties for persistent creditors.¹¹ While something similar would be appropriate here, there is a major difference between a world payments union and one that involves only a subset of countries; in the latter case, countries have the option of withdrawing from the Union and trading with other partners, whereas with a world system there is no alternative. However, given the strong mutual advantages to be gained from an operational system, many countries would be likely to opt in.

¹⁰ F Stewart, and M Stewart 'A new currency for trade among developing countries', Trade and Development (2) 1980.

It must be emphasised that the same advantages would be achieved with a Southern payments union, which offered mutual credit. This credit would be like a Southern currency.

There have been some attempts to link existing clearing arrangements, and a Coordination Committee was established by UNCTAD to help develop such links. Linking existing arrangements could represent a first step towards a Southern payments union. However, the current arrangements cover only about half the countries in the Third World, and in general, credit forms a minor aspect. Establishing a new payments union—to which existing clearing arrangements could be linked—seems likely to be more effective both in terms of creating credit, and in establishing links between current arrangements.

2) Commodities as foreign exchange reserves: non-oil developing countries hold about US$75 billion in reserves, consisting of gold and currencies of developed countries (dollars, chiefly, but also yen, sterling etc.). They use their own exports (of which a large proportion is commodities) to finance these reserves, thereby strengthening the currencies of the countries whose money is held as foreign exchange reserves, and the economies of gold producers. If they replaced foreign exchange reserves by stocks of commodities, their reserve accumulation would instead strengthen commodity prices and their own economies (see Gulati where this proposal is advanced).¹² This could be achieved by purchasing and storing commodities produced in the South. There is a variety of ways in which such a store could be financed. The initial build-up could be financed by contributions of commodities, by the use of Southern currencies and/or any Southern currencies and/or an Southern credit arrangement (as discussed above), or by using 'hard' currency from existing foreign exchange reserves. The commodity reserves could then be used as existing foreign exchange reserves selling them when countries needed foreign exchange, or borrowing against the security of the commodity stocks. Countries would need to make contributions to finance the storage costs in proportion to the quantity of reserves held.

¹¹ R F Kahn, 'Historical origins of the International Monetary Fund' in A P Thirlwall (ed), Keynes and International Monetary Arrangements, Macmillan: London, 1976.

¹² I Gulati, 'Co-operative monetary action: a few suggestions for the developing countries' in B Paulic, R Uranga, B Cizelj and M Svetlicic (eds), The Challenges of South-South Cooperation, Boulder, Colorado: Westview, 1983.

Commodities would be more inflation-proof than currency reserves, but they would not earn interest. Therefore, at times of positive real interest rates, there would be a cost to countries of holding such reserves, which would include the cost of handling the stocks of commodities plus the real interest foregone. But at times of rapid inflation and negative real interest rates, countries holding commodities would gain as compared with holding dollars. There could also be cyclical problems. Countries are liable to need to run down reserves when commodity prices are low and accumulate them when prices are high. Consequently, not only would this tendency cause them to buy and sell at the wrong time, from the point of view of commodity prices, but also their actions would accentuate commodity price fluctuations. This represents a serious defect in the proposal. It would suggest that commodities should only form some proportion of total reserves, so that big losses could be avoided by using a combination of foreign exchange and commodity reserves. This cyclical problem could be countered if industrialised countries were also persuaded to hold commodities as reserves.¹³ But the latter proposal has not found support among the industrialised countries. While some of the problems noted suggest that commodities should not entirely replace existing reserves, there is a strong case for further exploration of the possibilities of diversifying Third World reserves into commodities and Third World currencies, taking on more of the responsibility for liquidity creation and commodity price stabilisation, and reducing dependence on the North.

3) A Southern IMF: This would represent an extension of the mutual balance-of-payments schemes, currently in use in some regions, to the whole of the South, so that countries in payments difficulties in one part of the Third World could get some financial support (and policy advice) from other parts. It would have considerable advantages compared with regional arrangements, since regional payments problems tend to occur more or less simultaneously in all countries in the region, while there is much greater variation across regions, as for example with the OPEC surplus in the 1970s, and the Asian surpluses in the mid-1980s. A Southern IMF could not replace the present IMF, but could give countries some alternative source of finance and policy advice. The policy-formulation could turn out to be one of the most important aspects of a Southern IMF, as Third World countries would have the opportunity to develop their own conditionality, more in accordance with their objectives and philosophy, which could also prove extremely useful in negotiations with the 'real' IMF.

¹³ A G Hart, N Kaldor and J Tinbergen, 'The case for a international commodity reserve currency', Geneva: UNCTAD, 1964.

4) A South Bank: This was first suggested at a meeting of the Group of 77 in 1982, and UNCTAD produced a feasibility study in 1983.¹⁴ The bank would be financed by subscriptions from member-countries. As outlined, the bank would include some of the functions of a Southern IMF, providing balance-of-payments support to countries in difficulties, using its own conditionality. Other functions included provision of export credit, or export credit guarantees, finance for commodity price stabilisation and support for regional payments and credit arrangements. As developed, the proposal was probably over-ambitious, in covering so many functions, although there is considerable merit in each of the proposals considered separately. No real progress has been made in instituting such a bank.

Conclusions

Southern monetary arrangements can play a vital role in supporting Third World countries' trade and incomes, and offsetting the balkanisation that followed the previous imperial currency areas. Not only are Southern arrangements valuable for their immediate effects, but they can also strengthen Southern bargaining capacity and strength. Their role is particularly important at times of world economic crisis when North-South trade and financial arrangements falter. Over the past twenty-five years progress has been made in developing and expanding regional payments arrangements in the Third World. But these have proved rather ineffective during the crisis of the 1980s, and there have been no arrangements made at the level of the South as a whole. There are very great potential gains from schemes for the South as a whole, but also, obviously, many political obstacles to agreement. From a pragmatic point of view, more progress may be made by improving, extending and linking regional arrangements, than by grand new Southern schemes. But there is no reason why efforts should not be made in both directions. Third World countries could have much more control over economic and financial developments than they are currently exerting. Third World arguments for international monetary reform and a new Bretton Woods have had little response from the North. They could initiate their own South Bretton Woods as a step on the way to realising the international monetary reform which is within the reach of the Third World.

¹⁴ UNCTAD, 'The study of the feasibility of a bank for developing countries', UNCTAD, May 1983.

MONEY AND SOUTH-SOUTH COOPERATION

'Khalistan': India's Punjab problem

On 12 May 1987 the Government of India initiated a fresh approach to the escalating problem of terrorism and religious fundamentalism in the state of Punjab. The matter in issue was the creation of 'Khalistan', a Sikh theocratic homeland. On the advice of the Prime Minister, the Indian President dismissed the elected state government led by the Sikh political party, the Akali Dal, and brought the provincial administration directly under central authority. For some months the demand for central rule in the state had been evident within the ruling Congress party of Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, and several national opposition parties had also repeatedly pressed for firm action. The proclamation of Presidential rule in Punjab was, however, linked directly to an appeal from the state's Governor, Siddhartha Shankar Ray.

After an appraisal of the situation in the state, Ray wrote to the President on 11 May 1987

'It is quite clear that the ruling party and its government have no political will to combat truly and seriously either the fundamentalist movement or the growing and unabated terrorism and extremism and have become quite incapable of even assuring effectively, far less safeguarding, the basic fundamental rights guaranteed under our Constitution . . .'¹

The Governor reported that the provincial administration had ceased to exercise any authority in the rural areas of the Punjab and that a parallel authority was functioning in the province under the leadership of extremist Sikh leaders. He charged that some ministers in the provincial Cabinet were deeply involved with terrorist and extremist activity and that they interfered in the functioning of the police. Such activities had lowered the morale of the Punjab police to a 'near dangerous level', while 'corruption has also become rampant and money is being taken for the passing of a number of orders . . . by some of the ministers and their relations . . .'.² The escalating lawlessness and killing of innocent people was confirmed by official figures. While 517 persons were killed in the Punjab in 1986, over 200 had died in the first four months of 1987.³

¹ Text of a letter from Siddhartha Shankar Ray, Governor of Punjab state, to the President of India, dated 11 May 1987, reproduced in Times of India (Delhi) 17 May 1987, p 5.

² ibid.

'KHALISTAN': INDIA'S PUNJAB PROBLEM

This acknowledged failure of a political solution to the Punjab problem could not have come at a worse time for the central government. In 1985, Rajiv Gandhi's Congress party, riding a wave of popular sympathy following his mother's assassination, had emerged with a formidable mandate in the national elections. It had won an absolute majority in parliament and control over eighteen state governments. In recent months, however, a combination of factional in-fighting within the party and political mismanagement has led to a serious erosion of its political credibility. Recent elections to state legislatures in two provinces were a clear indication of this. In the southern state of Kerala, the Congress-led alliance secured only sixty-one seats in a 140-member state assembly. With this defeat the Congress party lost control over all four southern states of the country for the first time in the history of independent India. In the eastern state of West Bengal the Congress party was also badly defeated in the state elections with twenty-one Congress state legislators losing their seats. The party's opposition role in the state assembly was reduced significantly from a strength of fifty-four to a mere forty members in a 240-member legislative council. Moreover, these electoral setbacks reflected directly on the popular appeal of the Prime Minister, who campaigned extensively for these elections, addressing almost 200 meetings in the two states.

Despite these electoral defeats, the Congress party continues to command massive strength in Parliament and in the state legislatures as a whole, with no real opposition threat to contend with at the national level. However, a series of controversies in recent months have seriously affected the credibility of the party and of the Prime Minister himself.

Since the election of Rajiv Gandhi, relations between the Prime Minister and the President have steadily deteriorated to a state of open acrimony and conflict. The President has repeatedly complained of a lack of consultation with him by the Congress government and alleged that he has not been informed of important matters of State. While the central government maintains that it has fulfilled its constitutional obligations towards the Head of State, the President has chosen to assert his authority over a number of issues. Since January 1987, he has publicly refused to approve a controversial amendment to the Indian postal bill which authorised the government to screen private mail; has sought an explanation on the appointment of judges to the Supreme Court; and has demanded an elucidation of government policy on television coverage. While few dispute either the right of the President to be consulted and informed on matters of national importance, or the ultimate authority of a popularly-elected government, the controversy between them has deteriorated into a public examination of the constitutional authority of the Head of State to dismiss the Prime Minister. The Congress government for its part has reacted to this debate with thinly-veiled attacks on the Presidency. The authority and prestige of the central government has suffered as a result of these events.

³ Figures quoted in Ajoy Bose and Harinder Baweja, 'Are we back to square one in Punjab?', The Sunday Observer, 17-23 May 1987, pp 4-5.

Equally damaging for the Congress party have been allegations concerning serious irregularities in two major contracts involving the purchase of defence equipment, with reports of payments into secret Indian bank accounts abroad leading to intense speculation. Shortly after the institution of a commission of inquiry into one such contract, by the Defence Minister, V P Singh, in April 1987, he was dismissed from his ministerial post. A few months earlier, Singh had been moved from the Finance Ministry to the defence portfolio after he had initiated a strenuous campaign against tax evasion by big business. The ousting of V P Singh, widely regarded as a man of integrity, was seen by many as proof of the corruption of the Congress government.

With the recent damage to the credibility of the central government, and a growing conviction that its primary interest is in playing party politics, it is not surprising that the dismissal of the Sikh-led government of Punjab has been regarded with suspicion. It has been viewed as a ploy to win votes in the forthcoming state elections in the neighbouring Hindu majority state of Haryana. The situation in the Punjab is inevitably a major issue in Haryana and the state elections are regarded as a crucial test of the Congress party's support in the vast Hindi-speaking, Hindu majority area, comprising the states of Rajasthan, Haryana, Uttar Pradesh and Bihar; without support in these states no government of India can survive. Whatever the motivations for the proclamation of central rule in Punjab, the situation in the state has certainly deteriorated rapidly and the central government shares responsibility for failing to come to grips with this complex political problem.

The unrest in Punjab and the growth of Sikh fundamentalism and separatism are closely linked to the nature of contemporary Sikh political organisation and communal consciousness. The agitation itself is centred around two Sikh bodies, the Sikh political party, the Akali Dal, and the Shiromani Gurdwara Prabhandak Committee (SGPC), a central committee for the management of Sikh shrines. Both these organisations have their origins in a Sikh social and religious reform movement, which had culminated in the institutionalisation of a distinct Sikh identity through the passage of the Sikh Gurdwaras (Temples) Act of 1925. Prior to this Act, the Sikhs did not consider themselves as a separate group or community outside the larger Hindu framework. The militant Khalsa (pure) brotherhood shared a set of common symbols, rituals and practices which superficially set them apart from the Hindus, but Khalsa Sikh numbers were fluid. Their numerical strength derived from converts from the Hindu community, and they relapsed into the Hindu community from time to time. Moreover, even as members of the Khalsa, they followed many of the practices, customs and traditions of the Hindus, and continued to be bound to the Hindus by ties of kinship and marriage. It was also common for one member of a Hindu family to adopt the garb of the Khalsa without being seen by the Hindus at large to have become a lesser Hindu in the process.

The 1925 Act, by defining the Sikhs as separate from the Hindus, provided a legal and institutional basis for Sikh communal separatism. Yet, even since then, Akali leaders have remained acutely aware that once a Sikh sheds the symbols of the Khalsa he becomes indistinguishable from the large body of Punjabi Hindus. Since its inception, the Akali Dal's persistent concern has therefore been the maintenance of Sikh communal distinctiveness, by means of preserving and developing communal boundaries with the Hindu community. While the source of the Akali leaders' commitment to the maintenance of Sikh distinctiveness remains ideological, it has been reinforced by the political dependence of their party on the existence and political position of the Sikh community as a separate entity. Sikh communal separatism has provided a political base and an appeal for the Akali Dal. Akali leaders believe that without political power in the hands of the Sikhs collectively, the disintegration of an independent Sikh community and its absorption into the mass of Hinduism is inevitable. The Akali Dal's primary political objective has thus been the pursuit of greater political leverage for the Sikh community and a political base in which the Sikhs would be secure as a separate people.

Since its inception the Akali Dal has controlled the SGPC, and its domination of this body for over sixty years has made it a formidable force in Sikh politics. By virtue of its control over a large number of locally-elected committees for the management of Sikh shrines, the SGPC has served as an arena and a base for Sikh politics. Its control over Sikh shrines has provided it with access to the enormous resources of these shrines derived from religious property and daily offerings. Indeed, the annual budget of the SGPC from these sources amounted to more than US$12 million in 1986. The utilisation of these funds for non-political purposes, and the distribution of patronage in the form of a variety of jobs required for the management of Sikh shrines, has enabled the SGPC, and through it the Akali Dal, to gather and maintain support from strategic groups within the Sikh community. The SGPC also administers a fund for the propagation of the Sikh religion through which an army of wandering preachers, missionary workers and folk musicians are recruited to tour the rural areas and spread its ideology. The Akali Dals's use of these preachers for political purposes has provided it with substantial support in its political campaigns. Further, control over all Sikh religious institutions has given the SGPC a quasi-religious authority and the Akali Dal has occasionally used this power to excommunicate its opponents from the Sikh community. Finally, the Akali Dal's domination of the SGPC has enabled it to claim to be the sole representative of the Sikh panth or community as a whole, made supreme in all temporal matters by the last Sikh guru. The Akalis have made use of this appeal for political purposes with considerable effect. In electoral politics the Akalis have presented their candidates as 'panthic' candidates, and opponents of the Akali Dal have been labelled as traitors to the panth. The Akali Dal has thus consistently used an essentially religious platform and appeal in non-religious contests. Each Akali political campaign has been based on the holding of hundreds of ostensibly religious gatherings, often in the precincts of Sikh temples. The campaigns themselves have been conducted in a context of powerful religious and historical symbolism and ritual, casting the whole issue into the guise of a sacred function in the cause of the Sikh brotherhood.

In independent India, the Akali Dal first raised a demand for the formation of a Sikh majority state in 1948 in a memorandum to the Constituent Assembly, then engaged in framing the Constitution of India. They demanded special communal representation for the Sikhs in the Punjab legislature and in appointments to government services in the province. More importantly, the memorandum stressed that if these demands were not acceptable, the Sikhs should be permitted to form a separate province comprising the districts in which they formed a majority. The Constituent Assembly refused to accept either of the Akali demands, on the grounds that they were contrary to the spirit of a secular India.

The first general election in India, held in 1952, provided the Akali Dal with an opportunity to resurrect the issue. However, Akali leaders had realised that a division of the country along communal lines would be totally unacceptable to the government. Since a demand for a reorganisation of Indian states along linguistic lines had been raised in other parts of the country, they now cloaked their demand for a Sikh majority state in linguistic terms. As the Punjabi language was the mother tongue of all Sikhs, while Hindi was the first language of a large body of Punjabi Hindus, a demand for a 'Punjabi Suba' or Punjabi-speaking state coincided with the demand for a Sikh majority state. Between 1952 and 1966 the Akali Dal launched a series of sporadic agitations aimed at enhancing Sikh communal solidarity and putting pressure on the government to concede their demands. To rally the Sikh community, a spate of charges were made of discrimination against Sikhs in government service and of official interference in Sikh religious affairs. From the sanctuary of the premier Sikh shrine, the Golden Temple in Amritsar, the Akali Dal waged a campaign of political demonstrations and civil disobedience by large volunteer groups, and Sikhs were urged to participate in this dharam yudh or religious war. Each government action against the demonstrators was successfully portrayed as an action against the Sikh religion and further strengthened the Akali campaign in which 26,000 Sikhs courted arrest. In 1966, the central government gave in. The Punjab State Reorganisation Act was passed authorising the trifurcation of the state. The southern, predominantly Hindi-speaking Hindu areas were formed into a new state of Haryana, and other Hindi-speaking parts of Punjab detached and merged with the neighbouring state of Himachal Pradesh. The new state of Punjab thus created had a population which was 54 per cent Sikh and 44 per cent Hindu.

The Akali Dal had achieved its long cherished goal of a Sikh majority state and through the party's strong support from the Sikh community had been amply demonstrated in its various agitational campaigns, Akali leaders found to their chagrin that in electoral politics, Sikhs did not vote exclusively along communal lines. The Congress party, with its cross-communal following, had always had enough Sikhs in positions of leadership to make it a powerful contender for Sikh electoral support.

Thus, in the five elections to the Punjab legislative assembly held between 1967 and 1980, the Congress party was able to command support from a significant body of Sikh voters and, as a result, the Akali Dal was unable to get more than 30 per cent of the vote. In elections to the lower house of Parliament held in 1980, the Congress won twelve out of thirteen seats from the Punjab, vividly demonstrating its political appeal to both Hindu and Sikh voters.

Between 1981 and 1984 the Akali Dal again launched a series of agitations against the central government. The initial motivation for Akali unrest was a desire to reassert its leadership of the Sikh community, following its defeat in the state elections. However, in 1980 the Akali Dal had split into two principal factions, a dominant group led by the Akali Dal's president, Harchand Singh Longowal, and the other led by a former president of the party, Jagdev Singh Talwandi. The two groups joined forces in the campaign at times, but there was also rivalry between them which led to a spate of escalating and contradictory demands, as each faction sought to assert its dominance.

The core of the Akali demand derived from a resolution adopted by the party in 1973 at Anandpur Sahib. The Anandpur Sahib resolution stated that one of the principal objectives of the Akali Dal was to strive 'to preserve and keep alive the concept of distinct and independent identity of the panth and to create an environment in which national sentiments and aspirations of the Sikh panth will find full expression, satisfaction and growth'. The primary political goal of the Akali Dal, the resolution further stated, was the 'pre-eminence of the Khalsa through creation of a congenial environment and a political set up'.⁴ To achieve this the resolution outlined seven basic objectives, the more important of which were that Punjab's capital city of Chandigarh, which it shared with neighbouring Haryana State, and certain Sikh population Punjabi-speaking areas presently outside and contiguous to Punjab, be merged with it; that in the new Punjab thus formed, the interests of the Sikhs and Sikhism be specifically protected; that the new Punjab and other Indian states be granted a degree of provincial autonomy beyond that governing relations between state and central governments under the existing Indian Constitution; and that the Akali Dal strive for legislation which would extend the authority of the SGPC to Sikh shrines all over the country.

The Anandpur Sahib resolution reflected the basic political philosophy of the Akali Dal in seeking greater political influence for the Sikh community. In addition, the demand for the enacting of legislation to bring all Sikh shrines in the country under the authority of the SGPC, was intended to extend the Akali Dal's reach to the Sikh population spread throughout the country, which now constitutes one-third of the total Sikh population of India. The passage of such legislation would vastly increase the SGPC's network of patronage and its annual income would more than double. In addition, the Akali Dal demanded a reapportionment of river waters between Punjab and Haryana states.

⁴ The Anandpur Sahib resolution is reproduced in Chand Joshi, Bhindranwale: Myth and Reality. New Delhi: Vikas, 1984, pp 45-6.

'KHALISTAN': INDIA'S PUNJAB PROBLEM

The Akali Dal was a coalition partner with the Janata party in the Punjab government between 1977 and 1980, but despite its affinity with the Janata party government at the centre, it did little to bring forward demands based on the Anandpur Sahib resolution to the attention of the central government. An Akali meeting in 1978 endorsed the principal and objectives of the 1973 resolution and in September 1981 a meeting of the dominant group of the party, the Longowal group, again confirmed that the implementation of the Anandpur Sahib resolution was its long-term objective. In response, a prominent member of the rival Talwandi group asserted that since the Sikhs were a nation, there should be a sovereign state of Khalistan—the land of the Khalsa. Later, at an annual meeting of the SGPC, a resolution stating that the Sikhs were a separate nation, and calling for the implementation of the Anandpur Sahib resolution, was adopted with the support of the Longowal group of the party.

Akali leaders now launched an intensive publicity campaign alleging discrimination against Sikhs by the government and official interference in Sikh religious affairs. Akali volunteers toured the rural areas to educate the people against this discrimination and the SGPC's vast network of preachers and folk musicians were employed to spread the message. A list of forty-five grievances was drawn up, combining the core objectives of the Anandpur Sahib resolution, grievances obviously intended to appeal to various segments of the Sikh community and others intended simply to lend credence to Akali allegations, and to reinforce Sikh communal solidarity. The central government's failure to settle the grievances was portrayed as indifference and discrimination towards the Sikh community. Thus the list stated that the government had kept the city of Chandigarh and certain Punjabi-speaking areas outside Punjab, denied internal autonomy to the state and failed to enact an all-India Sikh Temples Act. The government was further accused of discrimination against Sikhs for reducing the number of Sikhs in the army, for being responsible for the paucity of heavy industry in the Punjab, for the denial of loans to farmers at advantageous rates and for the non-renumerative prices of agricultural produce. Moreover, the government had failed to designate any railway train as the Golden Temple Express, had not granted holy city status to Amritsar, had not installed a radio transmitter in the Golden Temple for broadcasting Sikh religious hymns, had not recognised a separate Sikh personal law, had projected Sikhs in an improper way in films, had violated the sanctity of Sikh traditions and had encourage anti-Sikh literature.

In October 1981, the central government began discussion with the Akalis over their demands.

At the outset of these negotiations the Akalis withdrew their forty-five grievances in favour of fifteen demands which largely reflected the core objectives of the Anandpur Sahib resolution.

These discussions continued intermittently for two and a half years, with each side repeatedly accusing the other of intransigence, bad faith and deliberate delaying tactics. Certainly the government of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi appeared to be content to let the Akali campaign run out of steam. Akali allegations aside, the central government appeared to have little to be concerned about. The Sikhs in India are a relatively secure community. They have a higher per capita income and a higher life expectancy than the national average. The Sikhs represent about 2 per cent of the population of the country but they constitute a considerably higher proportion of the Indian army and of all central government employees. Besides, in the 1980 parliamentary elections the Congress party had received strong support from the Sikh community in the Punjab. The central government, however, underestimated the ability of the Akalis to rally the Sikh community. Moreover, the Green Revolution which had brought unprecedented prosperity to the Punjab, and transformed the state into the 'wheat bowl' of India, had stabilised. A previous pattern of increasing prosperity for the predominantly agriculturalist Sikh community in the province had slowed, while increased mechanisation of agriculture and the lack of a proportionate increase in non-agricultural employment had contributed to a growth in unemployment for the educated rural young. Ironically, the economic success of agriculture in the Punjab was itself contributing to disaffection among Sikhs.

The inability of Punjab's economy to sustain the aspirations of the Sikh community provided a ready constituency for the Akali Dal's propaganda. Akali leaders were quick to harness popular disquiet. While Akali negotiations with the central government continued, a campaign of civil disobedience was launched to demonstrate their following. The construction of a canal linking the Sutlej and Yamuna rivers which would carry water to the neighbouring state of Haryana became the initial focus of attention. Akali leaders alleged that the canal would deprive the Sikh peasantry of vital water resources. Though no evidence was presented to substantiate this, the allegation struck a popular chord, and an Akali campaign to obstruct the digging of the canal found ready volunteers. The Akali Dal also resorted to familiar tactics of charges of religious discrimination to intensify their agitation. Since smoking is taboo for Sikhs, the presence of tobacco merchants outside the Golden Temple was cited as an insult to the Sikh faith, and a series of demonstrations for a ban on smoking in the city of Amritsar were held. Counter-demonstrations by Hindu merchants forced the government to ban such gatherings, but this merely provided an opportunity for the Akalis to defy the ban, and the subsequent arrest of demonstrators lent a sharper edge to Akali propaganda.

The central government moved slowly in its efforts to counter the Akali campaign. It was a year after the initiation of mass agitation before it attempted to appease Sikh religious sentiment by announcing its willingness to accept some minor Akali demands. The more substantial issues such as the question of greater autonomy for the state of Punjab and the enactment of an all-India Sikh Temples Act were referred to official committees for deliberation. While this policy failed to wrest the initiative from the Akalis for leadership of the Sikhs, it also made little attempt to counter a further escalation of Akali agitation in a concerted manner. The government continued to deal with the campaign piecemeal, arresting Akali volunteers when they broke the law and releasing them shortly afterwards as an act of conciliation. In October 1983, in an apparently fresh initiative to deal with Sikh unrest, the central government dismissed the state's Congress party government and imposed central rule in the province. In substance, however, no new policy towards Sikh unrest emerged.

As the Akali Dal's campaign intensified, the rise of a young militant and fundamentalist Sikh preacher, Jarnail Singh Bhindranwale, added a further dimension to Sikh unrest. Bhindranwale toured Sikh villages, baptised hundreds of people and exhorted his congregation not to discard Sikh symbols. An essential feature of his preachings was that, in keeping with Sikh traditions, all Sikhs should bear weapons. Bhindranwale's crusade for Sikh orthodoxy initially focused on the Nirankari Sikhs, a Sikh sect that worshipped a living guru in violation of orthodox Sikh teaching. His followers began clashing violently with Nirankari groups and in 1980 the Nirankari guru was assassinated. In September 1981, a new chapter of Sikh extremism began, with the murder of a prominent Hindu editor who had been critical of the new Sikh fundamentalism. Bhindranwale was arrested for his alleged involvement; though his complicity in the murder could not be proved, he had publicly applauded the killers. Shortly afterwards, Bhindranwale moved into the sanctuary of the Golden Temple and launched an intense campaign for the formation of a Sikh theocratic state of Khalistan with open incitements to violence against the government and the Hindu community. A well-conceived wave of terrorist activity in the Punjab began. Selective killings of Nirankari Sikhs and minor government officials and random bomb explosions were followed by the indiscriminate killing of Hindus. The intention of this terrorist activity was clearly to trigger an exodus of Hindus from the province. If such violence would prompt reprisals against Sikhs outside the Punjab, this in turn would only lead to Sikh emigration to the Punjab from other parts of India. By this process, the Punjab would become a Sikh state.

While Bhindranwale's terrorist campaign grew, drawing support from young unemployed Sikhs and from the radical All-India Sikh Students' Federation, the central government continued to deal with Sikh unrest in a haphazard manner. It did little to counter Akali propaganda or to deal decisively with Bhindranwale and his followers. In effect, government inaction served to embolden Sikh militants and enhance the myth of their invulnerability. The leaders of the Akali Dal, for their part, were caught in a game of their own making. Since Bhindranwale's allegations against the government were similar to their own, they chose to intensify their own rhetoric rather than to condemn the methods he advocated. Each new Akali initiative was followed by a fresh outburst of terrorist activity and each government action against Sikh extremists became another reason for the Akalis to agitate.

By April 1984 it had become apparent that Sikh extremists were using some Sikh temples as a secure base and there were clear indications that the Golden Temple was being fortified. The Akali Dal meanwhile announced that a new campaign of non-cooperation would begin in June 1984. At last, the central government acted decisively. The Punjab was sealed off from the rest of the country and after two days of intense military activity the Indian army took control of the Golden Temple on 7 June. The Akali leaders inside surrendered but not before Bhindranwale and many of his followers were killed. The SGPC for its part excommunicated from the faith the Sikh Home Minister of India for his responsibility in the desecration of the Golden Temple.

Three years of growing unrest in the Punjab had had an enormous impact on Sikh communal perception. A concerted Akali propaganda campaign, official action against Akali agitations and the intransigence of the government in meeting apparently legitimate Sikh demands had won the Akalis the tacit support of a broad cross-section of the community. As Sikh communal solidarity with the Akali campaign grew, escalation competition for leadership among Sikh politicians and a multiplication of grievances and demands espoused by them had rapidly radicalised Sikh unrest. The emergence of Sikh extremism had also brought little condemnation from Sikhs in general. While few Sikhs publicly supported the terrorist campaign, the ambiguity and constant shifting of Akali demands prevented opposition to them from crystallising. Moderate and extremist Sikh activists used the same idiom to enlist support and made similar allegations. The assault on the Golden Temple was thus widely regarded as a deliberate attempt to humiliate the Sikhs. Substantial damage to sacred Sikh property became a powerful symbol of official repression. In October 1984, after extensive repairs, the Golden Temple was handed back to the SGPC. In the same month, Indira Gandhi was assassinated by two of her Sikh bodyguards.

The crisis in the Indian government was quickly resolved by the unanimous selection of Rajiv Gandhi as leader of the Congress party and the new Prime Minister. For the Sikh community, however, their sense of alienation was dramatically compounded by the outbreak of anti-Sikh riots in several parts of the country. For three days, until the Indian army imposed control, Sikhs in Delhi and some other areas became the target of unchecked mob violence. Sikh individuals were singled out and lynched and Sikh property destroyed. Over 2,000 Sikhs were killed and some 10,000 rendered homeless in Delhi and its suburbs, according to official estimates.

For the Sikh community, the situation was worsened by the civil authority's inability to control the situation quickly, and the general belief that violence directed at Sikhs was not merely an outburst of popular anger at the assassination of Mrs Gandhi. The Indian press published a series of allegations charging the administration and the Congress party with complicity in the violence and a widely-publicised report by two local human rights organisations concluded that the attacks on members of the Sikh community in Delhi . . . far from being spontaneous expressions of 'madness' and of popular 'grief and anger' at Mrs Gandhi's assassination as made out by the authorities, were the outcome of a well-organised plan marked by acts of both deliberate commission and omission by important politicians of the Congress . . . and by authorities in the administration.⁵

As Sikh leaders cried out for justice, the central government refused to order an investigation into the violence on the grounds that such an inquiry would only inflame communal passions further. For many Sikhs, the government's attitude was confirmation of their worst fears.

Meanwhile, in January 1985 the new Prime Minister moved to consolidate his position by calling general elections. He vigorously attacked the Anandpur Sahib resolution as secessionist, and maintained that a dialogue with the Akali Dal was only possible if its leadership unequivocally disowned the extremists. The Akali Dal for its part refused to hold discussions with the government until its leaders were released. Once the election rhetoric had subsided, however, it was apparent that there could be no peace in the Punjab without a settlement with the Akali Dal. The central government consequently moved to break the stalemate through a carefully coordinated series of actions. The Akali leaders were unconditionally released and a package of economic assistance for the Punjab was announced. The Prime Minister muted his criticism of the Anandpur Sahib resolution and declared his willingness to hold discussions with Akali leaders, provided their demands were within the framework of the Indian Constitution. Close aides of the Prime Minister were given a specific mandate to prepare the groundwork for negotiations with the Akalis. The central government also ordered a judicial inquiry into the anti-Sikh riots in Delhi.

The release of Akali leaders inaugurated a renewed and intensified phase of competition between them, and a dramatic revival of terrorist activity. Violence against Hindus was now beginning to provoke a reaction. Hindu communal organisations were becoming active and terrorist violence against Hindus had brought a violent reaction against innocent Sikhs on several occasions. Thus, despite the militant postures, the president of the Akali Dal, Harchand Singh Longowal, seemed to realise that there was a strong possibility of mass communal violence between Hindus and Sikhs if Akali agitation was revived. A continued radicalisation of Sikh politics might also overwhelm the leadership role of the Akali Dal and have serious consequences for the future of the Sikh community in India. The central government's conciliatory stance paved the way for secret negotiations between Longowal and Rajiv Gandhi's closest aides. After a brief period of intense secret discussions in July 1985, it was announced that the central government and the Akali Dal had agreed to a memorandum of settlement which signalled the close of the confrontation between them.

⁵ Peoples Union For Democratic Rights and Peoples Union for Civil Liberties, 'Who are the Guilty? Report of a Joint Inquiry into the Causes and Impact of the Riots in Delhi from 31 October to 10 November, Delhi, 1984, p i.

'KHALISTAN' INDIA'S PUNJAB PROBLEM

The memorandum of settlement was aimed at beginning the process of negotiations. It conceded the basis of some of the demands which the Akali Dal deemed essential prerequisites for discussions, and set the parameters for addressing other demands. Thus the agreement stipulated that the central government would pay compensation to the families of innocent people killed in agitations or actions which had taken place since August 1982, as well as compensation for damage to property. However, the modalities for determining the extent of the compensation and to whom it was to be paid were not spelt out. It was further agreed that the city of Chandigarh, the shared capital of Punjab and Haryana, would be transferred to the Punjab; however a commission would be established to determine what territory Punjab would transfer to Haryana in return. Other territorial claims between Punjab and Haryana states would be referred to a boundary commission whose decision would be binding. The Akali Dal's demand for a reapportionment of river waters was similarly addressed. In addition, the central government reiterated its commitment to consider the formulation of legislation for the management of all Sikh shrines in consultation with the Akali Dal.

The question of greater autonomy for the Punjab and the controversial Anandpur Sahib resolution were dealt with in a similar spirit of compromise. The memorandum declared that the Akali Dal 'states that the Anandpur Sahib resolution is entirely within the framework of the Indian Constitution', and 'that the purpose of the resolution is to provide greater autonomy to the states with a view to strengthening the unity and integrity of the country . . .'.⁶ The portion dealing with centre-state relations in the resolution would be referred to an independent commission which was to make recommendations to the central government on the question.

⁶ Text of the Memorandum of Settlement agreed to between the Indian Prime Minister and the President of the Akali Dal, reproduced in Indian Express (Delhi) 25 July 1985, p 2.

Predictably, the announcement of a settlement between Longowal and Rajiv Gandhi brought a storm of protest from other Akali leaders who had not been consulted, and they promised to scuttle the accord through intensified agitation. Sikh extremists, too, demonstrated their disagreement by a further escalation of terrorist activity. As a means of consolidating the peace process, the central government announced its intention to call early elections in the Punjab and to permit the formation of a representative government. This strategy proved to be correct. While more extremist Sikhs who had formed themselves into a new political party (the United Akali Dal) called for a boycott of the elections, intensive discussions began among rival Akali leaders in an effort to form a common electoral platform. By 20 August 1985 Longowal had succeeded in convincing the majority of moderate Akali leadership to participate jointly in the elections. That same day he was assassinated by Sikh extremists.

The assassination of Longowal created a wave of sympathy for his party and reinforced the fragile unity in Akali ranks. Moreover, both Punjabis—Sikh and Hindu—demonstrated their faith in the electoral process by participating in the state elections in large numbers despite the militants' campaign to boycott them and the ever-present threat of terrorist violence. The Akali Dal emerged as the clear victor in the elections, securing an absolute majority in the state assembly for the first time in its history.

Initially, the euphoria of victory overcame differences among Akali leaders and resulted in the unanimous selection of Surjit Singh Barnala, a confidant of Longowal, as the leader of the new provincial government. However, negotiations over the nature and level of representation in the state government for each of the principal factions in the party brought internal rivalry to the forefront. Prakash Singh Badal, a powerful Sikh leader and former Akali Chief Minister of Punjab, and his supporters, refused to serve in the Akali Dal government formed in September 1985. From the outset, Barnala was faced with a serious threat of dissension within the Akali Dal. His problems were compounded by the election of a rival Akali leader, Gurcharan Singh Tohra, as president of the SGPC in November 1985. Bhindranwale's use of Sikh temples as a base had considerably weakened the Akali Dal's control over the SGPC, but now the Akali government had to contend with an independent SGPC whose hostility to the administration grew rapidly.

Soon after assuming office, the Barnala government sought to appease Sikh extremists by the release of many gaol'd activists. Many of those released, however, immediately resumed their demand for the formation of Khalistan. The new government was also faced with another spurt in terrorist activity and it became clear that extremists were regrouping inside the Golden Temple. Barnala was left with no choice but to continue police action against Sikh extremists. In this, he was strongly supported by the central government. In March 1986, at the insistence of the central government, Julio Francis Ribeiro, a distinguished police officer known for his tough methods, was appointed Director-General of Police in Punjab. Ribeiro's appointment brought an immediate change in anti-terrorist operations. He announced that in countering terrorist violence, bullets would be met with bullets, and the number of Sikh extremists arrested or killed by the police increased sharply. By the end of 1986 almost 1600 Sikh extremists had been arrested and 80 had been killed in encounters with the police.

The increased repression of extremist activity inevitably brought increased protests from leaders of the United Akali Dal and the All-India Sikh Students Federation. They charged that the Barnala government had done little to address basic Sikh demands and had unleashed a campaign of terror against innocent Sikhs through false encounters organised by the police. The state government's lack of control over the SGPC constituted a serious handicap in organising a counter-propaganda campaign, while the SGPC's vast network was increasingly used to espouse the extremist cause. Moreover, when Barnala did attempt to refute allegations against his government, he chose to appeal to popular sympathy in the same communal idiom as his detractors. Thus he repeatedly charged that rival Sikh leaders who were denigrating his government were themselves responsible for the loss of innocent Sikh lives. The end result of such allegations and counter-allegations was a further strengthening of Sikh communal solidarity and the almost complete alienation of the community from the mainstream of political life.

By the beginning of 1987, the Sikh extremists were ready to tackle the Akali Dal government directly. Following the formation of a new SGPC executive under Gurcharan Singh Tohra, the five head priests of the Golden Temple were dismissed by the SGPC and Sikh religious militants appointed in their stead. The new priests issued a religious edict dissolving all factions of the Akali Dal on the grounds that the formation of a common platform was the only way to make the central government concede Sikh demands. The United Akali Dal and Prakash Singh Badal and his supporters in the Akali Dal immediately pledged the allegiance to the head priests. The remaining members of the ruling Akali party were given two days to resign from office or face excommunication from the faith. Barnala refused to comply, and after intense discussions within his party, managed to carry a majority of the Akali Dal's legislators with him. To demonstrate support, a large political gathering was organised in Longowal's home village which condemned the high priests for such interference in political matters.

Barnala was excommunicated from the Sikh faith by the head priest but the Badal group of Akali legislators was also disqualified from participation in the state legislature by its Speaker, on the grounds that its members had left the political party on whose programme they had been elected. While this represented a momentary political victory for Barnala, it also meant that his party could not command a majority in the state assembly except with the support of the Congress party members. Within the party, too, Barnala had to contend with the constant threat of further defection and was compelled to weaken his position by appointing virtually all the Akali legislators to ministerial or other important posts. With the government in a state of siege, the provincial administration deteriorated rapidly.

If the singular success of the Barnala government was its survival, the central government, too, did little to assist in isolating Sikh extremists and facilitating the return of peace to the Punjab. The political initiatives which led to the accord with the Akali Dal, and the calling of state elections in the Punjab when they would inevitably result in defeat for the Congress party, were positive acts of statesmanship on the part of the central government. However, once the Akali government had been installed, the central government reverted to the pursuit of a 'law and order' solution in the Punjab rather than a political one. It repeatedly urged the Barnala administration to take firm action against Sikh extremists but made no concessions from which the former could draw political mileage and strengthen its support within the Sikh community. Several important issues addressed in the accord were complex problems with a bearing far beyond the Punjab, but other issues, relatively unimportant in themselves, upon which popular Sikh resentment had focused could have been addressed. During the army assault on the Golden Temple, some 370 persons were arrested within the complex and charged with waging war against the country. The detention without trial of these persons continued. The Prime Minister had made a commitment to have their cases reviewed during the accord with the Akali Dal and a commission to do so had been appointed. However, the central government did little to expedite its findings or to counter charges that the persons under detention included both women and innocent worshippers. Similarly, although it had been agreed that the city of Chandigarh would be transferred to the Punjab and appropriate compensation to Haryana state would be determined, the question of the transfer was allowed to drag on until the extent of the compensation had been worked out. When the commission charged with this question finally delivered its report, it recommended a transfer of 70,000 acres of land from Punjab to Haryana. The arithmetic of this compensation may well have been correct, but to implement it would have been political suicide for the government in the Punjab. The report of another commission to settle territorial disputes between the two states was similarly impracticable.

Perhaps the best example of political mismanagement by the central government was the saga of the judicial commission which investigated the anti-Sikh violence in Delhi. Having been eventually appointed (after an initial refusal to do so) by the central government, this commission was tainted from the outset. During its deliberations, several human rights organisations charged it with disregarding the evidence they presented but the commission continued its deliberations with scant regard for the popular feeling it was appointed to placate. When its report did appear, it exonerated the Congress party from complicity in the violence and lent credence to those who believed that the nature of its findings was a foregone conclusion.

Having given little political support to the Barnala government, the central government finally succumbed to the harsh realities of increased terrorism in the Punjab and to political pressures for action from within the party. Yet the state elections of 1985 and the gathering at Longowal village showed that when issues were clearly defined, the bulk of the Sikh community was not averse to firm action against the extremists. Certainly, Siddhartha Shankar Ray, the Governor of Punjab and his police chief, Julio Francis Ribiero, who now lead the Punjab's administration, appear to have no illusions as to the nature of the task ahead of them. In a recent interview, Ray, commenting on the Punjab problem, noted, 'It is not a pure law and order problem, it is a political, emotional, psychological and economic problem,'⁷ and Ribiero commented, 'No terrorism can be fought unless you win the hearts and mind of the people . . . And when I say people, I mean the Sikhs. They have to come to our side . . . Otherwise we can go on fighting.'⁸

However, Ray's success in the Punjab will ultimately be decided by the political support provided to him by the central government. But, if the central government's policy towards Sikh unrest has hitherto been guided with an eye on the vast Hindu majority of India, the results of recent elections in Haryana will only reinforce this concern. These elections have resulted in a crushing defeat for the ruling Congress party which won only some five seats in a ninety-member legislature as compared to the sixty seats it controlled before the elections. Fifteen of sixteen Congress ministers in the state lost their seats. The new government of Haryana can also be counted upon to be more energetic in pursuing rival claims with Punjab and more difficult to placate in accepting political concessions for Punjab. In finding a political solution to Sikh unrest, the central government now has its back to the wall. Yet a durable solution to Sikh unrest can only emerge if the government realises that its present policy can eliminate terrorists but not terrorism in the Punjab and that there can no longer be an early solution to the demand for Khalistan.

⁷ The Sunday Observer, pp 4-5.

⁸ Quoted in India Today 12(9) 1-15 May 1987, pp 126-7.

Can the rest of Asia emulate the NICs?*

The high growth rates of the East Asian newly industrialised countries (NICs)—Taiwan, South Korea, Singapore and Hong Kong—have made the economic performances of many other countries, including advanced ones, appear poor by comparison. Sustained real growth rates of 8 or 9 per cent have expanded the limits of the possible well beyond the expectations of the 1950s and 1960s. Never before had countries been transformed so quickly from poor, underdeveloped economies into middle-income, industrial economies. The question naturally arises as to whether other countries can emulate the NICs, or, to pose the question quite differently, whether other countries are likely to adopt the strategies of South Korea and Taiwan in particular. Posing the question in these two ways raises a fundamental issue that will underlie the present discussion, that of whether economic success is principally due to the actions of governments in finding and applying the right policies.

This article focuses on four countries of Southeast Asia—Indonesia, the Philippines, Malaysia and Thailand—and four countries of South Asia—Nepal, Bangladesh, Pakistan and India—and discusses their prospects for industrial growth over the next twenty-years. While it is possible to analyse current conditions and growth prospects, history is notoriously unpredictable, forever throwing up combinations of circumstances that no one can foresee. The present stage of Philippine history is an excellent example of this difficulty.

It needs to be asked at the outset what it is about the NICs that others want to emulate. The most remarkable aspect of the NICs' performance is their sustained high real growth rates of GDP (see Table 1). It is necessary to distinguish fast growth from the more general concept of development, although the two are clearly related. 'Development' is taken here to mean the general improvement in human living conditions, including access to more consumption goods, better health care, greater job security, and better working hours and conditions.

* I would like to acknowledge the valuable comments of Sisira Jayasuriya, Hal Hill, Jamie Mackie and Colin Barlow, all of the Research School of Pacific Studies, Australian National University. The conclusions reached are my own.

Table 1: Comparing sizes and growth rates

	Gross Domestic Product $bn		Annual growth rate of GDP 1973-84	GNP per capita $ 1984	Annual growth rate of GNP per capita 1965-84	Share of GDI in GDP 1984
	1965	1984
South Korea	3	83	7.2	2110	6.6	29
Taiwan	3	57	8.5 ^a	2794 ^b	6.7 ^c	21 ^d
Hong Kong	2	30	9.1	6330	6.2	24
Singapore	1	18	8.2	7260	7.8	47
Indonesia	4	80	6.8	540	4.9	21
Philippines	6	33	4.8	660	2.6	18
Malaysia	3	29	7.3	1980	4.5	31
Thailand	4	42	6.8	860	4.2	23
Nepal	1	2	3.1	160	0.2	19
Bangladesh	4	12	5.0	130	0.6	16
Pakistan	5	28	5.6	380	2.5	17
India	46	162	4.1	260	1.6	24

^a 1971-85. ^b National income per capita. ^c 1966-85 GDP per capita. ^d Share of gross fixed capital formation.

Sources: World Bank, World Development Report 1986, Washington DC; Taiwan, Statistical Yearbook 1986, Taipei.

There are various quantitative indicators of these which are commonly used—per capita income and its distribution, the level of employment, life expectancy and so on. These indicators of development do not cover the broader social changes that characterise the process. We will ignore development and concentrate on growth, although development does not necessarily follow growth.

Growth itself does not tell us anything about the process through which it occurs. Many forms of economic change involve fast growth. The dominant force behind rapid growth in the countries with which we are concerned here can be defined as the accumulation of industrial capital involving the expansion of investment in productive activities.

Accumulation of industrial capital can occur in various forms. The ownership of capital can be in domestic or foreign hands; the markets served by industrial firms may be at home or abroad; ownership may be private or public. We are concerned here with capitalist development, that is, the accumulation of capital in private hands. Some countries may have more state or collective enterprises than others, but in the NICs which are being emulated and the countries which are attempting to emulate them, it is private capital that is the principal dynamic force behind economic growth. As will become apparent in the discussion below, growth and development in socialist countries require a different mode of analysis.

It should also be stated at the outset that we are not arguing that industry is the only source of growth. The agricultural, mining and service sectors are also of central importance. But the developed countries and the NICs have, uniformly, become advanced through the development of industry.¹ Other sectors, especially services and mining, may come to be the most dynamic sectors, but it is industry that leads most countries from underdeveloped to developed status.

What is it about industry that gives it this special status? Three factors can be identified. Firstly, industry takes a leading role partly because of its technological character, in particular its amenability to the investment of capital (mechanisation) and its proneness to technical advance. Secondly, as income rises, consumption preferences shift to industrial products. Thirdly and most importantly, industry has proven to be the principal bearer of capitalist social relations. Capitalism—the relationship between private ownership of the means of production and wage labour—has been and remains the central dynamic force for accumulation, the expansion of the means of production.

The question of the prospects for growth in Asia may not be expressed in this form: What are the prospects for the rapid and sustained accumulation of industrial capital? The conditions which permit sustained accumulation are both economic and political. First international economic conditions will be considered, then internal economic conditions and, finally, the amenability of domestic power structures to accumulation.

Notice first, however, that considering the prospects for growth and development in Asia, or in the Third World generally, implies that the conditions facing each country are shared. This inevitably puts a great deal of stress on the importance of international economic conditions in determining the rate of growth. International economic conditions may be very important, especially for a small country, but they may also be irrelevant if the internal conditions are not conducive to growth. These include the internal political conditions, which vary enormously and are particular to each country's history.

¹ Clive Hamilton, 'Price formation and class relations in the development process', Journal of Contemporary Asia (forthcoming in 1987).

Moreover, the question of emulating the NICs often implicitly assumes that the starting position of the rest of Asia is that of the NICs in the 1950s or early 1960s. In fact, circumstances have changed dramatically. Internationally, world markets are much tighter; there is increased competition between less developed countries. National economies have also changed very substantially; indicators of structural change in our sample of countries are included in Table 2.

Table 2: Changes in economic structure

	Share of agriculture in GDP		Share of industry in GDP		Growth rate of industry	Labour force in agriculture (per cent) 1980
	1965	1984	1965	1984	1973-84
South Korea	38	14	25	40	10.9	36
Taiwan	24	6	30	46	10.5 ^a	20
Hong Kong	2	1	40	22	8.0	2
Singapore	3	1	24	39	8.6	2
Indonesia	59	26	12	40	8.3	57
Philippines	26	25	28	34	5.3	52
Malaysia	30	21	24	35	8.7	42
Thailand	35	20	23	28	8.7	70
Nepal	65	56	11	12	—	93
Bangladesh	53	48	11	12	7.6	75
Pakistan	40	24	20	29	7.6	55
India	47	35	22	27	4.4	70

^a 1971-85.

Sources: World Bank, World Development Report 1986, Washington DC; Taiwan, Statistical Yearbook 1986, Taipei.

International Factors

The foremost common factor influencing the growth prospects of developing countries is the growth of the world economy. The growth of markets for exports depends on the general buoyancy of the world economy and changes in levels of protection aimed at products from developing countries. With the rapid growth in world trade over the last twenty-five years, the potential trading opportunities for South and Southeast Asia are greater than they were for the NICs in the early 1960s. Continued growth of South-South trade and the opening of the People's Republic of China to imports provide further opportunities.

While recent increases in protection by some industrial countries have been most detrimental to labour-intensive exports from developing countries, this protectionism is unlikely to be extended, given the political dominance of free trade ideology, and may be wound back. Nevertheless, the region is now crowded with NICs, near-NICs and aspiring-NICs so that the competition for markets between exporters has become intense. This is reflected in the attempts by various countries in the region to attract foreign export-producing capital by means of ever more tempting subsidies.

The World Bank² predicts a growth rate of per capita GDP in developing countries of between 2.0 and 3.9 per cent for the decade 1985-95, with exports growing at a rate of between 3.2 and 7.1 per cent. The influence of the growth of the world economy on each country will clearly depend on its degree of integration into world markets. An indication of the degree of integration of our selected countries is the share of exports in GDP which appears in column 1 of Table 3. According to World Bank projections, middle-income oil importers such as Thailand will perform particularly well, especially if they are exporters of manufactures, whereas oil exporters such as Indonesia and Malaysia will find it more difficult in an era of lower oil prices. Low-income Asian countries—including those in South Asia—have quite good prospects despite, or perhaps because of, their low dependence on the world economy. However, it is difficult to see good prospects for the stagnant economies of Nepal and Bangladesh which are barely managing to grow in per capita terms (see column 5 of Table 1).

Those countries which have a high dependence on exports of commodities are likely to have difficulty with the volatility that this dependence imparts to their economies. Sustained growth is based on sustained investment and the latter requires a degree of stability and certainty about the future. Indonesia, Malaysia and Bangladesh are more likely to suffer (see column 6 of Table 3), although Bangladesh is not heavily dependent on exports. It is not possible to predict changes in prices of primary commodities on world markets.

A few other features of the world economy have changed substantially since the early 1960s when the NICs entered their periods of ² World Bank, World Development Report 1986, Washington DC, 1986.

Table 3: Features of the trade regime

	Share of exports in GDP 1984	Growth rate of exports 1973-84	Shares in 1983 exports of Fuels, minerals etc	Other primary	Other	Commodity concentration ^b 1985
South Korea	37	15.1	3	6	91	26
Taiwan	57	14.4 ^a	2	8	90	11
Hong Kong	107	12.9	2	6	92	—
Singapore	—	7.1	31	13	56	32
Indonesia	23	1.4	80	12	8	64 ^c
Philippines	21	5.6	13	36	51	14
Malaysia	56	7.5	35	43	22	45 ^c
Thailand	24	10.4	6	62	32	26
Nepal	11	—	5	43	52	20
Bangladesh	8	2.9	4	35	61	66
Pakistan	11	7.4	2	34	64	36 ^c
India	6	3.3	18	29	53	—

^a 1971-85. ^b Percentage contribution of three major commodities or items in total merchandise exports. ^c 1984.

Sources: World Bank, World Development Report 1986, Washington DC; Taiwan, Statistical Yearbook 1986, Taipei; Column 6—Asian Development Bank, Key Indicators of Developing Member Countries of ADB, July 1986.

rapid industrialisation. Firstly, there is much greater international trade in technology. It is now technically easier to set up factories and to introduce new production processes than it was twenty-five years ago, so that the logistical difficulties of establishing a new industry are much reduced. On the other hand, access to some of the more sophisticated technology is much more expensive. Secondly, the growth of international banking now provides much easier access to credit for financing industrial investments. This will be discussed in more detail in the next section, but it is worth noting here that the greater availability of finance is, like technology, offset by its much greater cost.

Domestic economic conditions

Within each country various economic factors contribute to or detract from the overall rate of growth. These factors can be roughly divided into those which contribute to the availability of savings and those which influence the productiveness or efficiency of potential investments.

They are not sufficient in themselves to ensure high levels of productive and self-sustaining investment; several political conditions, to be discussed in the next section, are required to ensure that high savings are transformed into productive investments, but the savings and investment criteria can be thought of as necessary conditions.

The principal factors which ensure the availability of savings to investors are a high domestic savings rate, the absence of serious foreign drains on domestic resources through debt burdens, the associated access to foreign credit, and financial institutions sufficiently developed to permit savers and industrial investors to come together. This last factor should not be overemphasised, however, because while the existence of sound institutions can encourage additional savings, in the absence of official institutions, informal lending in kerb markets will always spring up to satisfy the needs of at least some savers and investors. For example, South Korea has long been held up as an example of the problems of financial disintermediation, but in practice, flourishing kerb markets have satisfied most commercial needs.

Some indicators of these principal factors appear in Table 4. The savings rates for the NICs in columns 1 and 2 indicate the levels required for sustained growth. The Southeast Asian countries more or less satisfy this domestic savings condition, but among the countries of South Asia only India has been able to attain a savings rate of 20 per cent. A high level of foreign debt may be indicative of the confidence international lenders have in the growth prospects of the country concerned; more often, high levels of debt have not been covered by a compensatory expansion of productive capacity. In these circumstances, the significance of accumulated debt lies in the drain it represents on for resources for potential investment. When export revenues fail to grow the debt provides a very serious strain on the economy. Debt-service ratios for 1984 are recorded in the fourth column of Table 4. Note that these ratios refer to long-term debt only, so that in practice a substantially greater proportion of annual export revenue is being spent on debt servicing. Those countries that have substantial debts and are unlikely to be able to expand export revenues rapidly, such as the Philippines, Indonesia, Thailand and Pakistan, are likely to experience problems. The credit ratings of column 5 are indicative of the ease with which each country will be able to obtain foreign loans. The Philippines among the Southeast Asian countries will have difficulties, and only India among the South Asian countries will have easy access to foreign funds.

Table 4: Factors contributing to the availability of savings

	Domestic savings rate		Long-term debt service in 1984 as percentage of		Credit rating ^f 1987	M2/GDP 1983
	1970-81	1982-84	GNP	Exports
South Korea	24	27	6.6	15.8	59.9	38
Taiwan	32	24	—	—	74.5	56 ^a
Hong Kong	28 ^a	26	—	—	69.3	110 ^a
Singapore	29	42	—	—	74.8	73
Indonesia	20	20	5.5	19.0	45.5	21
Philippines	25	20	4.5	17.9	22.1	25
Malaysia	25	29	—	—	57.0	61
Thailand	21	20	5.4	21.5	53.6	48
Nepal	15 ^b	9	0.4	3.4	—	29
Bangladesh	9 ^c	1	1.3	14.2	19.2	26
Pakistan	13 ^d	6	2.8	27.1	30.4	44
India	20 ^e	22	1.1	13.8	50.6	42

^a Savings exclude net current transfers from abroad; elsewhere these are included.

^b 1976-81. ^c 1973-81. ^d 1972-81. ^e 1970-79. ^f Country credit ratings provided by leading international banks. ^g 1977. ^h 1980.

Sources: Columns 1 & 2—World Bank, World Tables 3rd edition, Washington DC; World Bank, World Development Reports 1984-86, Washington DC; Taiwan, Statistical Yearbook 1986, Taipei. Columns 3 & 4—World Bank, World Development Report 1986. Column 5—Institutional Investor, March 1987. Column 6—IMF, International Financial Statistics 1985.

Since the mid-1970s a great literature has burgeoned on the growth-inhibiting effects of financial repression. Too much has been made of this; both South Korea and Taiwan maintained very fast growth for years while their financial systems were severely repressed by tight government control. Informal markets are impossible to suppress, although the high interest rates they charge can deter potentially productive investments, especially by small farmers. This is why governments committed to both high growth and financial regulation always need to provide public loans at low rates to industrial and other ventures. In column 6 of Table 4 we record the ratio of M2 (money and quasi-money) to GDP which provides a rough indication of levels of financial development. It is apparent that only Indonesia and the Philippines among the Southeast Asian countries may run into problems in supplying private savings to investors, while the ratios of Nepal and Bangladesh, though low, are probably adequate for their stages of development.

The conditions that are required to translate a high volume of savings into a high volume of productive investment are in large measure political and will be discussed in the next section. For the present it is important to attempt to get some idea of how productive these investments might be. It is very difficult to determine this in advance even for a single project, but there are some features of the economic environment which are prima facie conducive to greater productiveness of invested resources. One of these is the quality of the workforce. Some indicators of the quality of the workforce for the eight countries under study are provided in Table 5. Note that there is a strong relationship between income levels on the one hand and school enrolments and literacy rates on the other. While causation clearly runs more strongly from income levels to educational levels, countries which start out with higher quality workforces will, ceteris paribus, have an advantage. India and the Philippines stand out from their groups in this regard.

Notice also that investment in improving the quality of the workforce overall is undermined by rapid population growth (column 3 of Table 5). Nepal, Bangladesh and Pakistan will find it difficult to raise the quality of labour, while high educational levels in the Philippines will be eroded if population continues to grow at the present rate.

A further dimension of the workforce environment of investments is the level of application of labour, including the number of hours worked. Comparative data on this is patchy.³ The degree of control by management over the labour force depends on both political factors such as repression of trade unions and economic factors such as the level of unemployment and alternative sources of income. Data on these are notoriously unreliable, but it would seem that most of the countries in question provide conditions amenable to stern control over industrial labour, with possible exceptions being provided by the Philippines, Malaysia and India where trade union movements are relatively strong.

Some of these factors are expressed in the labour costs which industry faces but not always in a direct way. It may be that countries with stern control over labour have higher levels and growth rates of wages. Nevertheless, other things being equal, lower labour costs are important for the productiveness of investments principally in the case

³ ILO, Yearbook of Labour Statistics, Geneva 1985.

Table 5: Factors contributing to the productivity of investments

	Secondary school enrolments as percentage of age group 1983	Literacy rate 1980	Population growth rate 1980- 2000	Annual growth rate of real wages in manu- facturing in the 1970s	Average monthly salaries of industrial workers US$ 1978
South Korea	89	96	1.4	9.0	312
Taiwan	56 ^a	90	1.3 ^b	7.2	165
Hong Kong	68	90	1.2	2.4	254
Singapore	69	84	1.0	6.5	198
Indonesia	37	62	1.9	—	130
Philippines	63	83	2.2	-6.6	75
Malaysia	49	60	2.1	1.4	150
Thailand	29	86	1.7	5.9	126
Nepal	22	19	2.6	—	—
Bangladesh	19	26	2.4	1.4	—
Pakistan	16	24	2.6	4.2	—
India	34	36	1.9	2.0	—

^a Estimate only. ^b 1985 growth rate only.

Sources: Column 1—World Bank, World Development Report 1986; Taiwan, Statistical Yearbook 1986. Column 2—ADB, Key Indicators 1986. Column 3—as for column 1. Column 4—ESCAP, Economic and Social Survey of Asia and the Pacific 1985, Table I.29 (The years of coverage vary; see the source for details); Taiwan, Statistical Yearbook, 1986. Column 5—Limquenco (1983, p 291).

of traded goods. Once again reliable comparative data are scarce, particularly as wage rates within a country are not uniformly high or low but vary between markets for different types of labour. However, one can determine in general whether a country's wage levels are appropriate for its level of development and for a given level of reliance on international trade. High wage growth in Pakistan and Thailand may present difficulties, while falling real wages in the Philippines would be favourable to further industrial growth.

A second set of factors influencing the potential productivity of investments relates to the appropriateness of the technology employed and the efficiency with which machinery and equipment are used. These are management decisions and reflect the quality of management of industrial enterprises. The determinants of the quality of management are probably more difficult to isolate and quantify than the determinants of the quality of labour, but this factor can be of crucial importance. Long experience in a commercial environment is undoubtedly important; industrialists in Korea and Taiwan could draw on their experience in the industries that grew up in the period of Japanese occupation. Exposure to the management practices of foreign companies can help in principle, but many countries have complained of the unwillingness of foreign companies to pass on their managerial skills. Within our group of countries, India and Pakistan, with longer histories of industrial production, have a natural advantage, while the bumiputra policies of Malaysia are likely to expand rapidly the cadre of effective managers. Indonesia, per contra, lacks a broad, high-quality management base and will take many years to acquire it.

A further significant factor in creating a favourable economic environment for investments is the development of physical infrastructure. A rough indication of the infrastructural development effort is contained in columns 1 and 2 of Table 6. Among the Southeast Asian countries, Indonesia and Malaysia appear to spend much more of their GDP on economic services than the Philippines and Thailand, while among the South Asian countries, India lags well behind the others possibly because of its relatively well-developed base. In the case of Nepal, and less so Bangladesh, geological instability and the very underdeveloped infrastructural base necessitate the channelling of a great proportion of government spending into building basic transport and power systems.

High levels of military expenditure can be a serious drain on resources which would otherwise be available for productive investments. Indications of levels of military spending appear in the third column of Table 6. In Southeast Asia, the Thai military extract a high price for staying out of government while in South Asia tension between Pakistan and India imposes serious burdens on their economies.

A final key factor affecting the general efficiency of investments is the influence which tariffs, subsidies and other measures that affect relative prices have upon resource allocation. Inefficient tariffs, for instance, can direct investments into areas of production which will not be internationally competitive and will therefore require continued protection. On the other hand, judicious use of tariffs can permit the establishment of new industries which may form the backbone of sustained development. The Korean government and Taiwanese authorities were unhesitating in their use of protection to foster local industry. Despite the recent, ideologically motivated clamour for liberalisation, no valid general statement about the merits or demerits of protection as such can be made.

The focus of this article has been on factors which directly influence industrial development rather than the agricultural sector. In fact, sustained urban industrial growth needs to be preceded or accompanied by a transformation of traditional agrarian social structures and production techniques. If this does not occur, the rural sector will impose an intolerable drain on industrial production, on account of:

- 1) the failure of the farming majority to provide a market for manufactured consumer goods. Even under export-oriented industrialisation, the bulk of demand for industrial output remains domestic;
- 2) continuing high agricultural terms of trade resulting in high food prices and thus high wages in the cities;
- 3) the obligation for governments to divert substantial resources into agriculture without significant productivity increases resulting;
- 4) the burden of the traditional social relationships rooted in agricultural systems which work against the dynamic social instability that is characteristic of periods of rapid economic change.

Agriculture will provide a sympathetic environment for rapid industrial development if it has been shaken out of its fixed ways and is amenable to penetration by new relationships and technologies. Taiwan and Korea started out after the Second World War with a natural advantage in this regard. Japanese colonialism had thoroughly transformed traditional agrarian social relations and revolutionised methods of agricultural production, the former especially in Korea and the latter especially in Taiwan.⁴ Land reform in the 1950s grew out of the rural turmoil left by the Japanese and took the process of agricultural transformation further. Not only did land reform destroy the rural power base of the landlord classes, but owner-cultivation was a means of improving agricultural productivity when combined with sympathetic state policies.

Elsewhere, the development of capitalism in agriculture has been a powerful force in destroying old social relations and the dead weight of custom, as well as providing a means for rapid improvement in productivity. Of the three principal forms of agricultural production relations—landlord-tenant, owner-cultivator and capitalist—the first has tended to be associated with rural stagnation and political opposition to industrialisation policies, while the last, capitalism, has tended in recent times to be a dynamic force for growth. However, the relevance of the forms of agricultural production relations for industrial development lies not so much in the form or forms which dominate agriculture but in the transition from one form to another or others. It is the process of change itself that has been seen to be historically important.

⁴ Clive Hamilton, 'Capitalist industrialisation in East Asia's Four Little Tigers', Journal of Contemporary Asia 13(1) 1983.

It should be made clear that the sorts of agrarian revolutions we are talking about generally leave a large part of the rural population pauperised and starving for long periods, perhaps several decades. They are the casualties of social and economic transition; capitalist growth generally entails the impoverishment for long periods of large sections of the population.

In Southeast Asia, the Malaysian system of large plantations combined with small cash-crop farming has provided the necessary level of unsettlement in the rural sector. Less than half of Malaysian farmers own land,⁵ and wage labour is very prevalent. While share-cropping is also widespread, capitalist farming is the dynamic mode. Indications of the prevalence of tenancy and the development of capitalist agriculture elsewhere can be found in Table 6. It is worth noting that tenancy is not nearly as widespread in South and Southeast Asia as it was in Northeast Asia (Japan, Korea, Taiwan) before the Second World War.⁶ On the one hand, this frees South and Southeast Asia from some of the restraints on generalised growth and development imposed by traditional landlord-based agriculture; on the other hand, these countries are less able to benefit from the liberating effects of the overthrow of these traditional systems.

In India and Indonesia tenancy is relatively uncommon while wage-labour in agriculture is widespread. In Indonesia over recent decades, tenancy has been declining while wage labour has been growing, especially in Java. The technology of the Green Revolution and associated state policies, particularly in India, have strengthened the tendency towards capitalist farming. In India this was given an initial impetus by land reforms in the 1950s. In Thailand, tenancy is fairly ⁵ F Halim, 'Rural labour force and industrial conflict in West Malaysia', Journal of Contemporary Asia 11(3) 1981.

⁶ Anne Booth, and R M Sundrum, Labour Absorption in Agriculture, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Table 6: Factors contributing to the productivity of investments

	Share of government expenditure in GDP 1984	Proportion of government spending on economic services 1972-1984	Share of defence in central government expenditure 1983
South Korea	17	24	32
Taiwan	14	20	—
Hong Kong	15	22	—
Singapore	34	18	19
Indonesia	23	62 ^b	12
Philippines	11	36	14
Malaysia	35	26	—
Thailand	18	19	20
Nepal	19	52	5 ^c
Bangladesh	14	51 ^c	—
Pakistan	25 ^a	32 ^d	35
India	15	24 ^d	20

^a 1983. ^b 1975-84. ^c 1973-84. ^d 1975-80. ^e 1982.

Sources: Column 1—ADB, Key Indicators 1986. Column 2—ADB, Key Indicators 1986; World Bank, World Tables, 3rd edition. Column 3—World Bank, World Development Report 1986.

uncommon but so is agricultural wage-labour, which suggests a predominance of family farms of sufficient size to provide a living. This helps explain the low level of fertiliser application in Thailand (see column 4 of Table 7). However, wage labour in agriculture has been rising rapidly since the early seventies,⁷ suggesting significant change in traditional systems.

In the Philippines, the figures misleadingly indicate a relatively low level of use of wage-labour and a predominance of owner-cultivation. The capitalist plantation sector is more important than the figures suggest. The degree of landlessness and the prevalence of wage-labour have been rising in recent years. The instability of the agricultural sector in recent times, apart from the political difficulties it creates, is likely to stimulate the industrialisation process. Land reform, if it is significant, is likely to raise levels of output, reinvigorate the rural economy, and ⁷ ibid.

CAN THE REST OF ASIA EMULATE THE NICs?

Table 7: Characteristics of agriculture

	Percentage of holdings wholly owned ^a	Percentage of farms hiring in labour ^a	Growth rate of agriculture 1972-85	Fertiliser consumption per hectare 1983
South Korea	—	—	7.7 ^b	3311
Taiwan	—	—	1.5	—
Hong Kong	—	—	—	—
Singapore	—	—	-2.6 ^b	7833
Indonesia	74	70	4.0 ^c	745
Philippines	58	24	3.8	320
Malaysia	—	—	4.7	1115
Thailand	85 ^d	29	4.5 ^d	240
Nepal	—	—	1.7 ^e	137
Bangladesh	58	45	1.7 ^f	596
Pakistan	42	37	3.0	586
India	92	89	2.4 ^c	394

^a Figures are for the years, in order of appearance in the table, 1973, 1971, 1978, 1977, 1972, and 1970-71. ^b 1981-85. ^c 1972-84. ^d 1973-85. ^e 1976-85. ^f 1979-1985. ^g South, September 1986 reports that in some areas 40 per cent of farmers were renting all or part of their land.

Sources: Columns 1 and 2—Booth and Sundrum (1985), Tables 6.6 and 1.7. Column 3—ADB, Key Indicators 1986. Column 4—World Bank, World Development Report 1986.

weaken the power of big landowners who resist the policies and changes necessary for rapid industrial growth. However, significant land reform in the Philippines is very unlikely.

In Bangladesh and Pakistan the use of wage-labour is common and so is tenancy. The situation is similar in Nepal. However, Bangladesh and Pakistan have experienced rises in landlessness (about a third of households were landless in Bangladesh in 1977) and a concomitant rise in the use of wage labour. In Pakistan particularly there has been a significant trend towards tenant evictions and a shift in power to middle-level farmers.⁸ In Bangladesh and Nepal the patterns of farm ownership and production are settled and rigid and will not lend themselves easily to the upheavals that inevitably accompany industrial transformation. Where possible, the introduction of Green Revolution technology can help to transform these old patterns, though at the expense of the landless and owners of miniature farms. This has been true in Pakistan where capitalist farming has been replacing tenancy since the 1960s.

⁸ ibid.

Domestic political conditions

The availability of adequate savings and opportunities for productive investment do not ensure that productive investments will actually occur. The transition from adequate savings to productive investment depends on political conditions broadly conceived. It has been argued that growth means that circumstances are favourable for the accumulation of industrial capital. These circumstances are complex products of diverse historical processes and generally involve the absence of political dominance by classes which derive wealth from unproductive, or zero-sum, activities. In order to encourage growth, political power must be in the hands of people at least sympathetic towards industrial development and perhaps under the influence of 'growth coalitions'⁹ made up of a nascent class of industrialists, technocrats committed to 'modernisation', a 'progressive' military and possibly foreign capital. A growth coalition may ride on the back of popular political movements motivated by nationalism or by revolt against old exploitative relationships.

There are various sources of wealth accumulation which limit the scope for industrial accumulation and which lie at the root of low growth and underdevelopment. The traditionally most widespread form of holding wealth in underdeveloped countries is land ownership, and in many countries, as we will see, this remains the source of economic and political power of the ruling elites. It is important to distinguish landlords who derive income from renting out land to tenants, and capitalist farmers who employ wage-labour and gain income from the sale of agricultural products.

The second principal form of unproductive wealth accumulation lies in merchant activities. Commercial or merchant capital derives profit from trade, including international trade, without adding value to goods. Revenue is often derived through some sort of monopoly position and the ability to engage in speculation. While wholesale and retail activities are essential to industrial production and are in these circumstances productive, these services can contribute to overall economic growth only up to a point, a point beyond which they result only in redistribution. Another source of wealth often closely associated with commercial capital is financial capital, which often appears as informal lending and borrowing in both urban and rural areas. While financial capital may, like commercial capital, be subordinated to the needs of industrial capital, the dangers are that usury will become more attractive than productive investment and that the indebtedness of industrial firms may lead to asset stripping by creditors.

⁹ J A C Mackie, 'Economic growth in the ASEAN region: the political underpinnings', Paper prepared for the Industrialisation Workshop, NCDS, Australian National University, Canberra ACT.

A third form of zero-sum activity covers a range of activities that might be summed up as profiteering and corruption, and includes profiteering from government contracts and aid monies. In some countries this form of wealth accumulation is extremely well developed and dominates the business activities of the urban propertied classes especially. It may result in the syphoning-off for consumption purposes of the bulk of the resources available for investment.

The fourth major form of unproductive wealth is represented by foreign capital flows. This may take the form of monies being deposited abroad by local wealthy elites, or it may be in the form of profit-taking by transnational corporations operating within one's borders. It is quite possible for outflows of funds overseas to diminish dramatically the resources available for productive investments at home, just as it is possible for capital inflows to add to domestic productive investments.

The last important drain on potentially productive resources is the state. Bloated, inefficient bureaucracies can soak up huge amounts of revenue, while military spending to maintain unstable or unpopular regimes can absorb vital development resources.

The distinction between productive and unproductive investments corresponds to the distinction between social and private profitability. An investment is socially profitable if it mobilises national resources in a way that expands national output. Such a project may also be privately profitable, but an investment which is privately profitable may not necessarily generate social profits. Private profits in such circumstances result from redistribution rather than efficient resource mobilisation and these investments are unproductive.

The importance of each of the above forms of asset accumulation is that they give control over potentially productive resources to groups which are likely to invest them in unproductive activities such as land ownership for rental purposes, usury, commodity speculation, extravagant consumption, military expansion and overseas bank accounts. One of the essential thrusts of economic policymaking in the NICs, especially Taiwan and South Korea, was to limit severely, and in some cases to eliminate, opportunities for zero-sum activities. Landlordism was abolished, corruption was largely eliminated, speculation and usury were controlled and foreign exchange flows were wholly regulated.

The difficulty all of this raises for the prospects of growth is that nascent industrial capital generally lacks the political as well as the economic power to impose on the economy and society the conditions it needs for rapid accumulation. One historically proven method is the industrial capital to accumulate gradually—in favourable economic conditions—until it can gain political power through economic strength. This was the case in Britain. If there is entrenched resistance from the old ruling class the supremacy of industrial capital may be attained through violent revolutions which sweep away the old social forces, such as in France, the USA and most recently perhaps the Philippines.

In the Third World today, to achieve political power or at least to gain significant power over policy, industrial capital needs an ally. Sometimes, it seeks such an ally in military regimes, which may appear committed to economic development, to breaking the power of the landlords and promoting business. South Korea and Taiwan may seem to provide examples of this though detailed analysis of these situations reveals greater complexity.¹⁰ Often, however, military regimes are aligned with reactionary social forces, especially landlords (such as in Latin America) or they may be wholly committed to their own enrichment and military adventure.

Sometimes, foreign powers see some advantage in encouraging development in their colonies or spheres of influence. They then give support to burgeoning business interests to ensure that they gain political power. This was the case in Singapore, for example.

Workers and peasants may align themselves with business classes under a nationalist banner in order to expel a common foreign enemy or a landlord-dominated or corrupt regime. These sorts of alliances sometimes back-fire on the bourgeois classes since the suitability of political conditions to capitalist hegemony may also make a country suitable for a revolution from below. In addition to the lower classes, intermediate classes including powerful bureaucracies, the police and the petty bourgeoisie, as well as professionals, may be brought together in the cause of nationalism.

¹⁰ Hamilton, 'Capitalist industrialisation . . .'

The essential political condition for capitalist industrial growth was defined above as the absence of the political dominance of classes which derive wealth from unproductive activities or which are otherwise hostile to industrial development. This implies that the state should be free from the overwhelming, if not the total, influence of these classes—landlords, speculators, money-lenders, the military and foreign interests inimical to industrial development.

It would be a mistake, however, to believe that the dominance of the state directly by industrial capital will bring about ideal conditions for industrial accumulation. The business class collectively may need protection from itself. Unconstrained, it may well create economic conditions which are comfortable for existing businesses but inimical to continued growth, for example and in particular, through protection from foreign competition. The transition from import-substituting industrialisation to a more open industrial economy needs to occur at a point where domestic business is strong enough to withstand international competition but not so well established as to be able to protect itself indefinitely.¹¹ Businesses need to be allowed to fail in order for the economy to continue to be efficient. This defines a further political condition necessary for sustained accumulation: economic policy needs to be aimed at economic growth through private accumulation rather than at simply protecting private capital. That is, it is necessary to have a state that is capable of taking hard decisions which are contrary to the interests of sections of the business class.

These carry with them a further implied political condition, namely that the state is both sufficiently strong and sufficiently independent from particular class interests to implement policies that will promote accumulation at the expense of other interests. Four of the most important of these sorts of policies are land reform, suppression of corruption, regulation of finance capital, and the control of labour. State power may be democratically or undemocratically based.

The next task is to apply these general statements to the particular histories and class structures of the eight countries selected for study. The purpose is to look very briefly at the social parameters that determine whether industrial capital can become the dynamic economic force within each country. In such brief reviews are lost.

¹¹ Mackie, 'Economic growth . . .'

Indonesia

In Indonesia, the landlord class, such as it is, has not in recent times held the position of political authority that it has in countries like Malaysia and the Philippines. On the other hand, the Chinese who have dominated business in Indonesia have not been powerful enough in the face of ethnic and class hostilities to form political organisations to dominate the state. Some years after the fall of Sukarno in 1965, a very powerful bureaucratic-military elite emerged and remains the source of political power today.

The political power of the military-bureaucratic elite has been translated into economic power, so that powerful military or ex-military families now form the main focus of wealth accumulation in Indonesia. This wealth accumulation, however, is not based directly on productive activities, but takes the form of 'tributes' extracted from the productive and unproductive activities of others. The dominant sources of government wealth have been oil sales, foreign investments and foreign aid and the spending of this revenue has been the making of fortunes for favoured businessmen and others connected to the government. Generals and important military families take a share of most foreign ventures permitted to operate in the country, and the government allocates lucrative contracts and franchises to favoured families including, and especially, the family of Suharto. Nevertheless, a substantial portion of oil revenues in the boom years did go into building infrastructure and agricultural improvement.

The scale of corruption is unusual: it is so deep-rooted in the present political structure that it almost forms a mode of economic reproduction of its own. But even corruption needs to be based on some form of productive activity, and these are the businesses run by foreign and local, mostly Chinese, companies. The military-bureaucratic elite has largely stayed out of managing and furthering productive activities, relying on its partnership with these business groups. Moreover, this relationship and the continued viability of the regime has required that from time to time the more extreme abuses of political power be controlled, as in the case of the reform of the customs service in 1985.

While corruption has imposed a massive burden on the economy, by the end of the boom years of the 1970s a substantial class of domestic capitalist class emerged,¹² or rather, had been established, since its expansion had been very much a product of the economic activities of the state. This capitalist class has limited political power and is not so much the ally of the state as its prisoner. While the economy was flushed with oil revenue, the government could afford to be serious about building an industrial economy based on indigenous capital accumulation. The drastic decline in oil revenues has demonstrated that the state's commitment to growth and development is constrained. To pursue industrialisation, Indonesia would now need seriously to attack corruption and to expose much of domestic business to the cold winds of international competition as the economy can ill afford to featherbed domestic industry. The close ties between senior members of the government and some key business interests make this unlikely.

The economic self-interest of the ruling group will prevent it from ending the corruption and protection of local business that would be necessary for sustained growth. If we compare the present Indonesian military regime with that of South Korea in the 1950s and 1960s, the striking difference is how little the South Korean officers became directly involved in business and how ruthless they were in suppressing corruption. Both regimes were strong enough to take the necessary measures, but only the South Koreans have been willing to take them.

Philippines

Under Marcos in the Philippines, the principal sources of wealth for the ruling classes were rents and profits from land ownership, including the sugar and coconut plantations, and the profits to be had from corruption, speculation and government favour. Some of the foreign loans accumulated in the Marcos era were used to finance property deals and to expand personal bank accounts (especially of political friends and relations of the President) rather than to finance productive enterprise. While the ruling class has since the 1950s diversified into industry and commerce, the foundations of the wealth and power of many families remain in the provinces. The Aquino family falls into this category. Nevertheless, within the propertied classes a new group has emerged whose interests are tied directly to industrial accumulation.

The downfall of the Marcos regime was a product, as much as anything else, of the disaffection of major segments of the business class whose interests were being seriously harmed by the economic decline brought on by government mismanagement. But the bourgeois revolution of 1986 was directed much more against the close associates of the former President than at the old oligarchy itself.

¹² Richard Robison, Indonesia: The Rise of Capital, Sydney: Allen and Unwin, 1986.

The old oligarchy remains very much in place (as do many of the cronies) although there is no doubt that, for the time being, many forms of zero-sum activity associated with the Marcos regime are now more difficult. Rapid industrial development now depends on whether the new government has the political will to weaken drastically the power of the old landed oligarchy while maintaining an independence from the new business class. While land reform is a real possibility, it is going to be neither far-reaching nor confiscatory, so that the mass of workers and peasants will have to pay off the loans made to compensate the landowners. Nor will there be moves to turn landowners into industrial-capitalists, a scheme which had some success in South Korea, Taiwan and Japan.¹³

Under present conditions, the political power of the old oligarchy, backed by powerful sections of the military, is too strong to permit the unleashing of industrial progress. The government remains heavily under the influence of classes whose interests lie other than in rapid industrial expansion, and is not in a position to take the harsh measures necessary for industrialisation to become the principal economic force.

Malaysia

In Malaysia, plantation wealth was mostly in the hands of foreign companies until taken over by the state in the 1970s. This means that the powerful landlord class that industrial capital has had to contend with elsewhere has been less influential. Nevertheless, landed interests are a significant force within the United Malay National Organisation (UMNO), the dominant political party. The political influence of the landlords is partly neutralised, however, by that of the Malay peasantry, whose welfare is important to the political leadership.

The traditional centres of economic power in Malaysia have been the foreign, especially British, companies based on the plantations, and Chinese businesses engaged in commerce and some industrial processing. While there is no clearly dominant political class, the state has weakened the power of these groups firstly by acquiring ownership of the largest parts of the plantation, mining and banking sectors, and secondly by giving preference to ethnic Malays over Chinese in encouraging new ventures. The New Economic Policy (NEP) set out explicitly to create a class of Malay capitalists, not so much in place of but complementary to the Chinese businesses. The strategy of state acquisitions followed by divestment to Malays (in the 1990s) could be quite successful. Certainly in South Korea, the government had success in creating a class of indigenous capitalists by handing over state property formerly owned by the Japanese.

¹³ Hamilton, 'Capitalist industrialisation . . .'

Industrial growth will depend largely on the ability of the state to limit zero-sum activities. This may prove difficult. While heavily involved in the economy, the government is firmly committed to seeing private capital as the motor of industrial development. On the other hand, the governing class's commitment to growth is tempered by its need to keep various class interests satisfied, including those of the Malay working and peasant classes. At present the state is required to respond to strong demands from various segments of society and relies to some extent on broad support. This makes it difficult to take severe measures which will cause some to suffer. In the years ahead, the state will become increasingly dominated by the class of wealthy Malays it is now creating. The scope for corruption and nepotism—which is already significant in the NEP—will expand and industrial growth will be more difficult. Nor is there a politically powerful, cohesive, technocratic bureaucracy, as in Thailand, which can act as a counter to sectional interests.

The military is not politically important, but any dramatic decline in economic fortunes, as occurred for instance in the Philippines, could precipitate military involvement in politics. The economic structure of the country—with its very heavy reliance on exports of few primary commodities—makes it prone to this. The danger in Malaysia is not a lack of allies for the industrial bourgeoisie, but a lack of a countervailing force to restrain it.

Thailand

Thailand is unusual in that there is not a wealthy class of landowners with the political power to match its counterparts in other countries. The centre of economic power in Thailand lies with large business groupings some of which are centred on banking. This financial-industrial bourgeoisie continues to be family-based although in recent years attempts have been made to encourage public incorporation. The banks do not simply control the formal financial market but extend their influence through ownership of industrial and commercial enterprises. This business class is a post-war phenomenon stimulated further by the Vietnam War and US aid, much as the Korean War was important in giving prominence to business interests in South Korea.

Although by no means as thoroughly as in South Korea, successive Thai governments have attempted to eliminate the less socially desirable forms of wealth accumulation including corruption and the suppression of informal money markets. For instance, the government engineered the collapse of the wealthy chit funds. Nevertheless, foreign loans have been pumped into unproductive investments such as urban property development and, in particular, military spending.

The political power of the financed-based bourgeoisie does not match its economic power. Political power is held by generally pro-business parties backed by sections of the military and middle classes, in addition to the bureaucracy which has provided administrative stability at a time of rapid changes in political leadership. On the one hand, this means that the government is reluctant to make any move that will upset the military leadership. On the other hand, the military is professional in the sense that it confines itself to military and political affairs rather than taking on commercial and speculative and corrupt economic ventures, as in some countries of the region. This is connected to the parliamentary form of political power in Thailand.

While a system of corruption and patronage dominated leading circles in the 1950s and 1960s, the emergence of the industrial bourgeoisie and professional classes, including the influential technocrats in government, has ensured that economic growth and development have become dominant government objectives. The independence of the state from particular economic interests, apart from the military and bureaucracy whose interests are not primarily economic, has enabled it to take some of the difficult decisions that are necessary for industrial growth. However, the relatively pluralistic nature of state power weakens the ability of government to unbalance economic power relations as industrialisation commonly requires.

Nepal

In Nepal, the wealth of the dominant classes comes first of all from land ownership. While not as widespread as in other countries, tenancy and sharecropping operate at a sufficiently broad level to provide large incomes to local elite families. As in the Philippines, provincial wealth forms the basis of political power in the capital. In addition to landed wealth, there is a powerful class of merchants who dominate the foreign trade on which the economy wholly depends.

Political power is wielded principally by the royal family and the nobility, with the Palace Secretariat being the senior partner in an 'alliance' with the official parliamentary government. Economic and political power coalesce in an alliance of the landlord and commercial classes with the ruling nobility; indeed, individuals generally are members of more than one of these groups. Landlords are often engaged in commerce. The royal family has a stake in most of the largest commercial activities including the airline, hotels and trading companies. Foreign aid, which in comparative terms is very great, also provides a major source of income for the dominant classes.

The principal sources of wealth accumulation, then, are land ownership, foreign trade, and local businesses based on tourism and foreign aid. There is no significant industrial capitalist class and only minor industrial output of jute goods, cement and iron products. Industrial expansion is severely constrained by the stranglehold on the economy held by Indian manufacturers and trading houses, and a reluctance by Nepalese commercial interests to jeopardise their own trading revenues by encouraging possibly independent domestic producers. On the other hand, there is emerging an increasingly influential cadre of 'modern' bureaucrats mostly with overseas education who, despite being drawn predominantly from the ruling classes, have a stronger commitment to economic development. These technocrats are in a better position to understand the precarious future of the present structure, but are not powerful.

While the state may be strong enough to take measures to create an industrial bourgeoisie, it shows little willingness to do so since it serves so assiduously the interest of the aristocratic landowning and commercial classes. Land reform, which would be only a very first step in breaking the power of the land-based oligarchy and expanding agricultural productivity, is not on the agenda. There is no significant class of capitalist farmers that could spearhead moves for rural transformation. Nepal's extraordinary level of dependence on foreign powers—India for trade, and aid donors for revenue, military support and basic infrastructure—also works against major economic reform.

Bangladesh

In Bangladesh, despite legislative attacks on the landlord-tenant relationship there has been no widespread development of capitalist agriculture. Landlords remain the dominant economic class in the countryside, especially in the north and west of the country. While landownership is the principal form of wealth, the limited prospects for productive accumulation have led rural wealth into a variety of unproductive activities in addition to further land purchases and sharecropping. These include usury and mortgages on land, petty commodity trading and conspicuous consumption.

The industrial-commercial classes are very weak in Bangladesh. The political power of the landlord and business classes was seriously weakened after separation from West Pakistan in 1971 since these classes were closely associated with West Pakistani dominance of East Bengal. With the taint of collaboration, these interests could have little influence in nationalist political parties. Some redistribution of land occurred after independence but the landlord class, while shaken, retained its economic power under the rule of the Awami League.

The industrial-commercial capitalist class suffered through large scale expropriations. The state took over banking, insurance, transport and large industries, mostly owned by non-Bengalis, but big Bengali-owned companies were nationalised too. The 'socialism' of the Awami League weighed most heavily on the class of industrial-commercial capitalists. The shift to a policy of economic liberalisation after 1975 has, however, included some serious attempts to revive private investment through incentives and disinvestment by the state. The Ershad government is particularly keen to promote manufacturing and has pursued policies reminiscent of early South Korea and Taiwan. Growth of manufacturing has been at the reasonable annual rate of about 4 per cent since the late 1970s, but by starting at such a low base and with a high population growth rate, significant progress will be slow.

While the industrial capitalist class in Bangladesh remains small, its lack of political influence on a government that is nevertheless seriously committed to promoting industry is potentially conducive to industrial growth. However, the repression dealt out by the present regime is a reflection of its weak position rather than its strength. While political parties wrangle over the transition to civilian rule, the military remains the basis of political power. In these circumstances, it is likely that the centre of wealth accumulation in Bangladesh will remain land ownership, usury and the profits from foreign aid.

Pakistan

In Pakistan, land reform has failed to bring about significant transfers of land to the poorest farm workers. Nevertheless, the various attempts at land reform in the 1970s reflect the conflict in the countryside between landlords, tenants and a newly-emergent class of capitalist farmers responding to the Green Revolution. While this conflict found expression in the populist Bhutto years in attempts at land reform, the Zia regime since 1977 has seen the dominance of a military-bureaucratic apparatus that has been largely independent of particular sections of the propertied classes both rural and urban yet not sufficiently strong to override them. The regime has, however, continued to encourage the spread of capitalist farming.

The principal sources of wealth accumulation are in agriculture—both in land ownership and through capitalist production—and industry-commerce, with a strengthening class of manufacturing capitalists particularly in food processing and textiles. These manufacturers received a serious blow with partition of the country in 1971, as not only were their assets in East Pakistan seized but the lucrative flow of export revenues, from jute products especially, was cut off. However, industrial-commercial capital has received important support from the Zia regime through disinvestment in public enterprises and tax reductions. This class has not acquired sufficient size and economic power for it to become a major political influence on the government, but it is viewed sympathetically by the new technocrats in the bureaucracy.

In addition to these relatively productive sources of wealth, many fortunes have been made and reproduced through illegal and speculative activities, some connected with the war in Afghanistan, the spoils of which are the objects of conspicuous consumption. The prevalence of illegal activities and the degree of violence on the streets are indicative of the current regime's lack of control over the country. Despite the large commitment of resources to the military, the state is not strong. The government has difficulty maintaining civil order and cannot wholly suppress organised political opposition.

The military-turned-civilian regime draws some support from right-wing, urban petty bourgeois elements and claims the allegiance of Islamic fundamentalists. However, the loyalty of these groups is by no means uncritical. The Zia regime has also alienated big landlords, particularly in provinces other than Punjab, so that its social foundations appear quite unstable. This is compounded by serious regional conflicts which destabilise the whole country. US support has been very important in propping up the military and funding the rapid growth rates of recent years.

India

The economically dominant classes in India today are the industrial and commercial capitalists and wealthy capitalist farmers. A sizeable industrial bourgeoisie grew up in the period of import-substituting industrialisation in the 1950s and 1960s, although many industrial and commercial sectors are controlled by state enterprises. Capitalist farmers now dominate the countryside with the decline of landlordism under the pressures of land reform and the Green Revolution. This locates the predominant forms of wealth accumulation in industrial and commercial as well as agricultural production. In the absence of the more prominent forms of zero-sum activity found in other countries, these factors would suggest that India has good prospects for rapid industrial advance. However, this is not the case.

Political power is shared principally by industrial-commercial capital and wealthy capitalist farmers in conjunction with a class of bureaucrats which administers government and government enterprise. This is an uneasy alliance since there are serious structural conflicts between them. Note, however, that capitalist farmers tend to wield their political power in state governments, where most agricultural policy is made, rather than centrally. They come into conflict with industrial capital over matters such as the agriculture-industry terms of trade. Bureaucrats see their role as one of regulating and constraining industrial-commercial capital in particular. In practice, industrial-commercial capital is not strong enough to dominate state policy but it is strong enough to avoid most of the impact of the bureaucracy's regulatory measures.

This power-sharing arrangement, operating within parliamentary democratic forms, means that the state is not sufficiently powerful and independent to enforce the difficult measures that rapid industrial development requires. While the principal sources of wealth accumulation outside agriculture are in private and public industrial and commercial enterprises, neither of these is very efficient. Public enterprises generally do not generate a reinvestible surplus and thereby impose a drain on the economy. This is partly because they provide subsidised inputs, including finance, to private businesses. Private businesses are not rapid accumulators on the whole because they have been able to protect themselves from the competitive forces that would make them more efficient.

If the private sector were more dynamic and productive it would make sense, in terms of developing a more powerful class of industrial capitalists, to hand over public enterprises to private business as in South Korea and Taiwan. The important factor is not the level of state intervention and control but the degree of effectiveness it is permitted. South Korea and India have similar levels of state participation in national economies. The difference is that in South Korea, government intervention is used to discipline private businesses, whereas in India government economic management is not insulated from particular sectional interests and serves to cosset domestic industry rather than forcing it to be efficient. As long as the government accurately reflects the interests of the dominant classes, the hard decisions necessary for rapid industrialisation will not be taken. The recent liberalisations are unlikely to have a significant impact on this situation.

Conclusions

One of the important analytical points to emerge from this study is the error of 'policy voluntarism'. It is correct to conceive of the problem of growth in capitalist societies as one of choosing the correct set of government policies. Economic (and other) policies arise out of particular social conditions. This is a trite statement, but it is extraordinary to find large numbers of economists who make policy prescriptions that are doomed to failure from the beginning because they are not consistent with the pattern of class dominance. The fundamental thrust towards industrial growth and development grows out of the impersonal and largely uncontrollable social forces that make up history. Within these constraints economic policies can make a difference, sometimes an important difference, and as hinted in the country case studies above, the state can help to create the classes that will carry out industrialisation. But this leaves us with the questions of the sort of state that will be interested in such acts of creation, why they are interested, and whether they can be successful. In this light it is little wonder that the simple-minded World Bank formula of 'get the prices right' has more often than not foundered on the rock of hostile class interests.

The error of policy voluntarism is allied with another error of received economic opinion of the World Bank variety, that of the negative influence on growth of government involvement in the economy. The simple data of Table 6, column 1 and a wealth of further evidence demonstrate that economic growth is not necessarily inhibited by government involvement. We have previously pointed to the case of South Korea where the extent of government ownership and regulation at detailed levels of the economy have been used to maximise the efficient growth of the economy. It is not the quantity of government intervention and planning that matters but its quality. In the successful NICs the quality has been consistently high while the quantity has varied considerably. The quality of government intervention and planning is less a product of the educational levels of government officials than of the independence of these officials and their political masters from sectional influences. Corruption, nepotism, undue outside influence, the lack of an overall vision and motivation, bureaucratic parochialism, officiousness and political weakness all contribute to low quality planning.

The present study has had two purposes. The first has been to lay down an analytical framework for making sensible assessments of the growth prospects of nations. The second has been to apply this framework to the eight selected countries. A summary of the arguments for each country can be found in Table 8, where each factor is denoted favourable (F) or unfavourable (U) in its likely impact on future growth. An overall assessment of future prospects on a scale of 1 to 5, from 'poor' to 'good', appears for each country at the foot of the table.

Both Indonesia and the Philippines have poor overall growth prospects, principally because of the economic and political dominance of classes which derive wealth from unproductive activities and the structural unwillingness of their governments to attack these classes. The growth prospects of Nepal are poor for similar reasons, although there the problem is compounded by the relative absence of opportunities for productive investments.

In Bangladesh, while faced with economic difficulties similar to Nepal's, including the unsympathetic character of agriculture, the prospects are a little better in so far as the state is more independent of the interests of unproductive classes. India has fewer of the political advantages of Bangladesh but has improved chances due to high availability of savings and productive investment opportunities, and an agricultural system that is more amenable to the rapid structural changes that industrialisation brings about.

Pakistan has overall prospects similar to India's but for different reasons. Agriculture is sympathetic to industrial development, and recent industrial and infrastructural growth provide a foundation for future growth. While the government is relatively independent of wealthy interests it does not have firm control over civil order and

CAN THE REST OF ASIA EMULATE THE NICs?

Table 8: Summary of economic and political conditions

	Indonesia	Philippines	Malaysia	Thailand	Nepal	Bangladesh	Pakistan	India
1. State of world economy	U	—	U	F	—	U	F	F
2. Availability of savings
Domestic savings rate	F	F	F	F	U	U	U	F
Access to foreign loans	F	U	F	—	U	—	U	F
Financial intermediation	U	U	F	F	F	F	F	F
3. Productiveness of investments
Quality of workforce	—	F	F	—	U	U	U	F
Control of workforce	F	U	U	F	F	F	F	U
Labour costs	U	F	U	U	F	F	U	F
Quality of management	U	F	F	—	U	U	F	F
Infrastructure	F	U	F	U	U	—	F	—
4. Sympathy of agriculture	F	F	F	F	U	U	F	F
5. Political conditions
Dominance of unproductive classes	U	U	F	F	U	F	F	F
Independence of state	U	U	F	—	U	F	F	U
Strength of state	F	U	U	F	F	U	U	U
Proven commitment to growth	U	U	U	F	U	F	U	U
Overall growth prospects	2	1	4	5	1	2	3	3

U=unfavourable, F=favourable
1=poor, 3=doubtful, 5=good economic policy. As a result, sufficient savings to finance industrial expansion are likely to be increasingly difficult to obtain.

Malaysia is rated as having better prospects. It has a political system that is relatively independent of the influence of unproductive classes, although there remains doubt over whether the government is sufficiently strong to take the steps necessary to restrain the emergent Malay capitalist class. The agricultural system has the required flexibility but the degree of control over labour is questionable.

Thailand appears to have the best prospects of the eight countries surveyed, with a strong political structure and a demonstrated willingness to make hard decisions. There remains some danger that finance capital may, in times of difficulty, withdraw from industrial investments, particularly since there is some doubt about available investment opportunities. While the flexibility of agriculture and current debt problems raise further doubts, the quality of Thai planning should see it through.

The arms trade: changing patterns in the 1980s

Since 1965, Third World countries have jointly comprised the world's leading market for conventional weapons, accounting for as much as three-quarters of the international trade in military systems. Between 1978 and 1985 alone, the less-developed countries (LDCs) ordered an estimated $258 billion worth of arms and ammunition (in current dollars) from foreign suppliers, and actually took delivery of $220 billion worth of such equipment. Included in these transactions were some 13,960 tanks and self-propelled cannon, 27,605 armoured personnel carriers, 4,005 supersonic combat aircraft, and 34,948 surface-to-air missiles.¹ These transfers have resulted in a significant shift in military resources from the industrialised 'North' to the underdeveloped 'South,' producing new configurations of power and contributing to the intensity and duration of regional conflicts.²

The flow of modern arms from North to South has long been of interest to political analysts, and has been the subject of several major studies.³ As a result, many of the basic parameters of this trade are now familiar to students of international relations. It is important to note, however, that many of these parameters were established during the 1970s and early 1980s, and have since experienced considerable flux. Indeed, there have been a number of significant changes in the character of the international arms flow—changes that are likely to become increasingly pronounced.⁴ In this essay, I will attempt to

¹ Richard F Grimmett, Trends in Conventional Arms Transfers to the Third World by Major Supplier, 1978–1985, Washington DC: Congressional Research Service, 1986, pp 30, 36; and earlier editions. (Hereinafter cited as: CRS, Trends 1978–1985.)

² For discussion, see: Michael T Klare, American Arms Supermarket, Austin: University of Texas Press, 1984, ch. 5, 7, 10 and 11; Andrew J Pierre, The Global Politics of Arms Sales, Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1982, Pt 3.

³ See, for instance: Philip J Farley, Stephen S Kaplan, and William H Lewis, Arms Across the Sea, Washington DC: Brookings Institution, 1978; Klare, American Arms Supermarket; Stephanie G Neuman and Robert E Harkavy (eds), Arms Transfers in the Modern World, New York: Praeger, 1979; Pierre, The Global Politics of Arms Sales; Uri Ra'anani, Robert L Pfaltzgraff, Jr, and Geoffrey Kemp (eds), Arms Transfers to the Third World, Boulder, Colorado: Westview Press, 1978; and Stockholm International Peace Research Institute (SIPRI), The Arms Trade with the Third World Stockholm: Almqvist and Wiksell, 1971.

⁴ The author first discussed these changes in 'The state of the trade', Journal of International Affairs 40(1) Summer 1986, pp 1–21.

identify and assess these changes, particularly their impact on the Third World.

By far the most pronounced change has been the apparent decline in arms purchases by the LDCs. From a high point of $43.6 billion in 1982, Third World orders for new weapons dropped to $28.2 billion in 1983, $32.2 billion in 1984, and $29.9 billion in 1985 (in current dollars).⁵ This decline has generally been attributed to the global economic slump of 1982-85 and to the 'saturation' of Third World arsenals with sophisticated arms purchased in the 1970s and early 1980s.⁶ Presumably, this assessment leads to the supposition that international arms trafficking will revert to earlier patterns when these conditions no longer prevail. However, deeper analysis suggests that this decline in Third World arms purchases reflects other important factors, which are unlikely to disappear with the restoration of pre-1982 economic conditions.

To appreciate the nature and significance of these structural changes, it is useful to begin with a brief survey of the basic arms transfer patterns of the past fifteen years. In conducting this survey, I will employ the standard statistical sources covering international arms transfers: World Military Expenditures and Arms Transfers, published annually by the US Arms Control and Disarmament Agency (ACDA); the SIPRI Yearbook, published annually by the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute (SIPRI); and the annual report on conventional arms transfers published by the Congressional Research Service (CRS) of the US Library of Congress. Each of these sources provides useful statistics on various arms export patterns; they do not employ the same definitions or accounting methods, however, so they cannot be used interchangeably.⁷

Prior to 1970, world military exports rarely exceeded $5 billion per year, and Third World countries accounted for less than half this amount. In 1972, however, the arms trade began to experience a sharp upward thrust, with Third World countries generating the bulk of new orders. According to the ACDA, total world arms transfers jumped from $6.4 billion in 1971 to $36.4 billion in 1981, while imports by the LDCs

⁵ CRS, Trends 1978-1985, p. 30.

⁶ See: Michael Isikoff, 'US manufacturers and dealers are struggling to hold their market share', The Washington Post (National Weekly Edition) 12 January 1987, p. 8.

⁷ For a discussion of the methodological problems associated with arms transfer data, see: Frank Blackaby and Thomas Ohlson, 'Military Expenditures and the Arms Trade: Problems of Data', Bulletin of Peace Proposals (13) 1982, pp. 291-308.

THE ARMS TRADE: CHANGING PATTERNS IN THE 1980s

Table 1: Conventional arms transfers to the Third World as tallied by various sources

Year:	(In billions of US dollars)
	CRS: Orders (current dollars)	CRS: Deliveries (current dollars)	ACDA: Deliveries: (current dollars)	Deliveries: (1982 constant dollars)	SIPRI: Deliveries (1975 dollars)
1970	n.a.	n.a.	4.15	n.a.	2.94
1971	n.a.	n.a.	4.72	n.a.	3.71
1972	n.a.	n.a.	7.42	n.a.	3.47
1973	10.45	6.67	10.26	20.12	3.63
1974	20.26	7.26	8.86	15.97	5.06
1975	19.72	8.04	9.25	15.30	6.30
1976	24.26	12.01	12.35	19.32	7.31
1977	23.28	16.05	15.35	22.68	9.70
1978	19.92	20.54	18.61	25.61	11.15
1979	29.32	23.86	22.62	28.69	9.60
1980	40.88	24.92	23.75	27.65	10.45
1981	33.67	30.42	29.66	31.59	8.45
1982	43.60	33.87	32.08	32.08	9.18
1983	28.17	32.57	28.67	27.50	8.56
1984	33.15	32.67	n.a.	n.a.	9.20
1985	29.94	21.52	n.a.	n.a.	7.13

Source: CRS=Congressional Research Service, US Library of Congress, Trends in Conventional Arms Transfers to the Third World, 1978-85 (1986) and earlier editions; ACDA=US Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, World Military Expenditures and Arms Transfers, 1985 (1985) and earlier editions; SIPRI=Stockholm International Peace Research Institute, SIPRI Yearbook 1986 (1986).

n.a.=not available.

rose from $1.7 billion to $29.7 billion (in current dollars)⁸ (See Table 1).

Not only did the LDCs obtain greater quantities of weapons in the 1970s, but they also acquired arms of enhanced quality. Prior to 1970, Third World countries were generally obliged to make do with the obsolete and unsophisticated arms that were supplied at little or no cost by the major powers. By the early 1970s, however, many Third World buyers had accumulated sufficient political and economic leverage to seek and obtain the most sophisticated weapons available. This shift first became apparent in 1972, when the USA agreed to sell 80 ultra-sophisticated F-14 Tomcat jet fighters to the Shah of Iran, and it was confirmed in succeeding years by sales of late-model US, Soviet, and French aircraft to other countries in the Middle East. As a result of these and other sales of high-performance systems, the inventories of many Middle Eastern states have come to resemble those of the front-line states in NATO and the Warsaw Pact.⁹

⁸ US Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, World Military Expenditures and Arms Transfers, 1970-1979, Washington DC: Government Printing Office, 1982, p 85. (Hereinafter cited as: ACDA, WMEAT 1970-79.)

Despite this increase in both the quantity and quality of arms sold to the LDCs, the Third World market has remained, until very recently, the exclusive preserve of a relatively small number of major suppliers. According to the CRS, just six nations—the USA, the Soviet Union, France, Britain, West Germany and Italy—together accounted for 91 per cent of all military sales to Third World countries between 1973 and 1980. Even among these six, the military traffic was highly concentrated, with the two superpowers jointly supplying two-thirds of all the arms imported by the LDCs.¹⁰

These general trends persisted into the early 1980s, with 1982 setting a record of $43.6 billion in Third World arms orders.¹¹ In 1983, however, these trade patterns began to exhibit a number of important shifts.

The most dramatic shift was, of course, the sharp decline in new military orders—from $43.6 billion in 1982 to $28.2 billion in 1983. (Arms deliveries have not declined this sharply, due to the large backlog of high-technology arms ordered prior to 1983 and still in the process of manufacture.) The principal cause of this decline, in the view of most analysts, was the worldwide economic recession of the early 1980s and the mammoth debt burden carried by many Third World countries. 'This downward trend has been largely determined by economic factors,' Michael Brzoska and Thomas Ohlson wrote in the 1985 SIPRI Yearbook. 'Many countries are facing budget constraints, and many countries, particularly in the Third World, are burdened by debts and can no longer allocate so much funding to armaments.'¹² This assessment is confirmed by the fact that several of the USA's major

⁹ The growing sophistication of the arms inventories of Third World countries can be charted by consulting the listings in successive editions of The Military Balance, published annually by the International Institute for Strategic Studies (IISS) in London. For discussion, see Leslie Gelb, 'The Mideast arms race: new weapons, old fears', The New York Times, 24 January 1982; and Celeb S Rossiter, US Arms Transfers to the Third World: The Implications of Sophistication, Washington DC: Congressional Research Service, Library of Congress, 1982.

¹⁰ Congressional Research Service, Library of Congress, Changing Perspectives on Arms Transfer Policy, Report Prepared for the Subcommittee on International Security and Scientific Affairs of the House Committee on Foreign Relations, Washington DC: Government Printing Office, 1981, p. 13.

¹¹ ibid., Trends 1978-1985, p. 30.

¹² SIPRI, World Armaments and Disarmament: SIPRI Yearbook 1985, London and Philadelphia: Taylor and Francis, 1985, p. 345. (Hereinafter cited as SIPRI Yearbook 1985.)

arms customers, including Egypt, Morocco, the Sudan, Turkey and Zaire, have fallen behind in their payments on US Government-guaranteed military loans or have had to have such payments rescheduled.¹³

Another factor underlying the decline in new military orders is the temporary saturation of many Third World arms inventories. As the large quantities of sophisticated arms ordered in the 1977-82 period began arriving in the LDCs' arsenals their military personnel had to be trained in the operation, repair and maintenance of all these new and complex weapons. This process ordinarily takes several years, thus inhibiting—for a time—the demand for additional weapons.¹⁴

These economic and institutional factors may begin to ease in the years ahead, producing a renewed demand for imported arms. However, while the current slump in military orders may prove temporary, some of the changes now taking place in the weapons trade may not. Indeed, the available statistical data reveals some important—and probably durable—shifts in the underlying structure of the international arms traffic.

To begin with, we can detect a substantial long-term decline in the relative market share retained by the traditional arms suppliers, and a corresponding growth in sales by smaller and less familiar suppliers—including several Third World countries which have only recently begun producing for the international arms market.

As noted earlier, six major suppliers—the two superpowers plus the 'big four' Western European suppliers—have long dominated the international trade in armaments. While these primary suppliers still account for a large proportion of international sales, their total market share has been declining since the late 1970s. This shift is particularly noticeable in the CRS data on new military purchases. Whereas the six 'majors' accounted for 90 per cent of Third World orders in the 1970s, their total share dropped to 75 per cent in 1981-85.¹⁵

Accompanying this contraction in the total market share of the six majors have been some important shifts in the relative market dominance of the individual suppliers. Most noticeable in this regard is ¹³ See US General Accounting Office, Military Loans: Repayment Problems Mount as Debt Increases, Washington DC: Government Printing Office, 1985.

¹⁴ For discussion, see Michael Brzoska and Thomas Ohlson, 'The future of arms transfers: the changing pattern', Bulletin of Peace Proposals (16) 1985, p 131; and Lawrence Ingrassia, 'World weapons sales slow, and competition by suppliers heats up', The Wall Street Journal, 30 May 1984.

¹⁵ CRS, Trends 1978-1985, p 30 and earlier editions.

a shift in the respective shares of the two superpowers on one hand and the four European suppliers on the other. Between 1973 and 1980, the USA and the Soviet Union jointly received 66 per cent of all Third World military orders while the Europeans received 25 per cent; in 1984, however, the superpowers' share had dropped to 55 per cent while the Europeans' share has risen to 32 per cent.¹⁶ This shift appears to reflect more vigorous marketing efforts on the part of the Europeans—particularly France and Britain—as well as efforts by some Third World buyers to diminish their military dependency on one or the other of the superpowers by turning to European sources of supply. (Between the USA and the Soviet Union, however, we can detect little change in status: both countries have jockeyed in and out of first place over the past few years, with neither gaining a long-term lead over the other.)¹⁷

Perhaps the most striking phenomenon of the recent period is the steady growth in military sales by the 'second tier' producers—nations which lack the extensive productive capabilities of the six majors, but which have nonetheless succeeded in staking out a significant market niche as suppliers of inexpensive or specialised equipment. Included in this category are Australia and Canada, as well as a number of smaller countries in East and West Europe. Also included are several Third World suppliers, the most prominent of which are Brazil, China, Egypt, India, Israel,* Singapore, North Korea and South Korea. (See Table 2). Ten years ago, these LDC suppliers hardly figured in the standard statistical data on arms exports; today they loom as significant actors in the international marketplace.¹⁸

The emergence of these second-tier suppliers is clearly documented in the statistics compiled by the CRS. From 1973 to 1980, the six majors accounted for 90 per cent of all shares to the Third World, while all other suppliers shared the remaining 10 per cent. From 1981 to 1984, however, the 'other' category jumped to one-quarter of all new ¹⁶ CRS, Trends 1977-1984, p 24 and earlier editions.

¹⁷ For discussion and statistical data, see Klare, 'The state of the trade', pp 7-8.

* Third World Quarterly does not consider Israel to be a Third World country. However, for the purposes of this article, Israel is categorised by the author as a part of the Third World. This classification follows the conventions of the statistical sources used by the author. (Editor)

¹⁸ For discussion of this phenomenon, see Jean Klein, 'Arms sales, development, disarmament', Bulletin of Peace Proposals, 14(2) 1983, pp 157-9; Stephanie G Neuman, 'International stratification and Third World military industries', International Organization 38(1) Winter 1984, pp 167-97; Stephanie G Neuman, 'The arms trade and American national interests', in Vojtech Mastny (ed), Power and Policy in Transition, Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1984, pp 155-8; and Miguel S Wionczek, 'Growth in military industries in developing countries', Bulletin of Peace Proposals, 17(1) 1986, pp 47-58.

THE ARMS TRADE: CHANGING PATTERNS IN THE 1980s

Table 2: Major second-tier suppliers of conventional arms transfers to all countries, 1979-83

Country:	(Current US dollars in billions)
	Value of Transfers	Percentage of World Total
Czechoslovakia	3,950	2.3
China	3,320	2.0
Poland	3,100	1.8
Switzerland	2,030	1.2
Korea, South	2,010	1.2
Romania	1,980	1.2
Korea, North	1,805	1.1
Israel	1,360	0.8
Yugoslavia	1,340	0.8
Spain	1,115	0.7
Netherlands	920	0.5
Belgium	890	0.5
Bulgaria	840	0.5
Brazil	830	0.5
Canada	800	0.5

Source: US Arms Control & Disarmament Agency, World Military Expenditures and Arms Transfers, 1985. Represents value of arms exports by top 15 suppliers after the USA, USSR, France, Britain, Italy, and West Germany.

orders.¹⁹ Unfortunately, the CRS figures do not provide a breakdown between European and non-European suppliers in the 'other' category. From different sources, however, we know that arms sales by Third World countries have risen dramatically in recent years. According to the ACDA, military exports by Third World suppliers grew by 543 per cent between 1973 and 1983 (from $600 million to $4.05 billion, in constant 1982 dollars), while exports by the developed countries increased by only 33 per cent. As a result of this surge, Third World exports represented 11 per cent of all world arms transfers in 1983, compared to 2 per cent in 1973.²⁰

¹⁹ CRS, Trends 1977-1984, p 24 and earlier editions.

²⁰ US Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, World Military Expenditures and Arms Transfers, 1985, Washington DC: Government Printing Office, 1985, p 89. (Hereinafter cited as ACDA, WMEAT 1985.)

Third World arms suppliers

Further examination of the ACDA data suggests that the surge in Third World arms exports is substantially due to the efforts of a relatively small number of countries to become major military suppliers. Of the $16.1 billion in arms exports posted by Third World countries in 1979-83 (in current dollars), nearly three-quarters (11.6 billion) were supplied by nine countries: Brazil, China, Egypt, Israel, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Turkey and North and South Korea.²¹ In some cases (e.g. Saudi Arabia), these sales represent the re-export of arms previously acquired from the major industrialised powers; in others, however, they represent the export of indigenously designed and produced systems. For the most part, these suppliers have focused their arms marketing on other Third World countries, although a number of them have succeeded in finding buyers among the advanced industrialised nations.²²

The potential of these new trade patterns was first demonstrated in the war between Iran and Iraq, which has been waged since 1980. Although both belligerents have continued to receive some arms and equipment from their traditional suppliers (France and the Soviet Union in the case of Iraq, the USA in the case of Iran), they have become highly dependent on imports from the second-tier suppliers to make up for losses in ammunition and equipment. While there are no reliable figures on the extent of these transactions, SIPRI reports that both belligerents have purchased billions of dollars worth of arms and equipment from other Third World countries, including Argentina, Brazil, China, Egypt, Israel, and North and South Korea.²³

The Iran-Iraq experience has drawn particular attention to Brazil, which has supplied both sides in the Persian Gulf conflict while at the same time increasing its sales to other Third World countries. By concentrating on the lower end of the technology scale, the Brazilians have found a ready overseas market for a wide variety of their military products, including the EE-9 Cascavel armoured car, the EE-11 Urutu armoured personnel carrier, the EMB-312 Tucano trainer aircraft, the EMB-110 Bandeirante light transport and the EMB-326 Xavante counter-insurgency aircraft.²⁴ A similar strategy has been pursued by Israel (which also produces a wide variety of arms and equipment for the Third World market), and is being emulated by such aspiring producers as Egypt, India, Singapore and South Korea.²⁵

²¹ ibid., pp 94-130. For profiles of the major Third World arms producers, see Michael Brzoska and Thomas Ohlson, Arms Production in the Third World, London and Philadelphia: Taylor and Francis, 1986, pp 35-250.

²² Brazil, for instance, has sold significant numbers of its EMB-312 Tucano trainer aircraft to Canada and the United Kingdom (see SIPRI Yearbook 1985, p 376). For discussion of these emerging trade patterns, see Neuman, 'International stratification', pp 187-97 and Neuman, 'The arms trade . . .', pp 155-58. For a comprehensive register of arms exports by Third World producers, see Brzoska and Ohlson, Arms Production in the Third World, pp 351-60.

²³ SIPRI Yearbook 1984, pp 195-201. See also: Michael Brzoska, 'Profiteering on the Iran-Iraq War', Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, June 1987, pp 42-5. Leslie H Gelb, 'Iran said to get large-scale arms from Israel, Soviet and Europeans', The New York Times, 8 March 1982; Elaine Sciolino, 'Iran, in 6-year search for arms, finds world of willing suppliers', The New York Times, 25 November, 1986; and David K Shipler, 'Level of world arms sales to Iran regarded as largely unchanged', The New York Times, 11 April 1987.

The emergence of Third World arms suppliers has many important implications for our assessment of the global arms trade. Not only have these producers begun to offer significant competition to the traditional suppliers, but they have also introduced some new South-to-South to South-to-North trade patterns into what has hitherto been an exclusively North-to-South traffic. As we shall see, this phenomenon also calls into question the accuracy of the standard statistical sources on international arms trafficking.

Since a number of the more affluent and developed nations of the Third World (i.e. those nations which have in the past accounted for a substantial share of the world's arms imports) are now producing weapons themselves, it is likely that a certain segment of the global military market has been permanently closed to the traditional suppliers. Although these Third World producers continue to rely on the major industrial powers for high-performance jet aircraft and other sophisticated systems which exceed their domestic manufacturing capabilities, they have become relatively self-sufficient in the production of small arms, artillery, trainer and counter-insurgency aircraft, and other basic items.²⁶ According to SIPRI, twelve Third World countries now produce combat aircraft, thirteen produce trainers and ²⁴ See the 'Register of arms transfers' in SIPRI Yearbook 1985, pp 389-439, and in earlier editions of the Yearbook. On the Brazilian arms industry, see Clovis Brigagao, 'The Brazilian arms industry', Journal of International Affairs 40(1) spring 1986, pp 101-14; Brzoska and Ohlson, Arms Production in the Third World, pp 79-104 and 352-55; Everett G Martin, 'Brazil's fledgling arms industry making a hit with weapons-hungry Third World armies', Wall Street Journal, 4 January 1985; John Hoyt Williams, 'Brazil's arms industry on the move', Armed Forces Journal, December 1984, pp 106-12; and John Hoyt Williams, 'Brazilian weapons', National Defense, September 1986, pp 57-64.

²⁵ For discussion, see: SIPRI Yearbook 1985, pp 329-39; Geoffrey Aronson, 'The Third World's booming new industry: weapons', The Washington Post, 16 June, 1985; Brzoska and Ohlson, Arms Production . . . especially pp 35-77 and 105-231; Aaron S Klieman, 'Middle-range arms suppliers: the Israeli case', Journal of International Affairs 40(1) Summer 1986, pp 115-28; and Wionczek, 'Growth of military industries', pp 51-4.

²⁶ Brzoska and Ohlson, Arms Production . . . pp 7-32.

transport aircraft, twelve produce major fighting ships, eleven more produce armoured vehicles of some sort, and ten produce artillery systems; in addition, a much larger number produce small arms and ammunition.²⁷

In most cases, these domestic production efforts are motivated by a desire to reduce dependency on foreign arms suppliers and to diminish hard currency transmittals. Some countries, including Brazil, Egypt, Israel, Singapore and South Korea, also view the establishment of domestic arms industries as a means to spur the development of 'high-tech' civilian industries, and/or to enhancing their international trade position. In addition, there are the so-called 'pariah' countries—Chile, Israel, Taiwan, and South Africa—that have developed indigenous military industries in order to circumvent arms embargoes and other trade restrictions.²⁸

From an economic point of view, Third World arms producers can be divided up into a number of basic categories. To begin with, there are a handful of relatively developed countries which possess sufficient technical and industrial capacity to undertake the development of a relatively elaborate arms-production infrastructure. These countries, which at present are limited to Argentina, Brazil, China, Egypt, India, Israel, North Korea, South Africa, South Korea and Taiwan, produce a wide variety of weapons types (including aircraft, armoured vehicles and ships), and have begun to manufacture indigenously-designed systems. These countries can be further divided into those which produce arms principally to satisfy their own military requirements (as in the case of Argentina, China, India, North Korea, South Africa and Taiwan), and those which place equal stress on production for the international market (as in the case of Brazil, Egypt, Israel and South Korea).²⁹

Many more Third World countries produce arms of some type, but lack the broad-based infrastructure of the ten producers listed above. Some of these other countries have expressed the intention to establish an elaborate military infrastructure of their own, but very few possess the necessary combination of national income (or borrowing power), ²⁷ SIPRI Yearbook 1985, pp 331-3.

²⁸ For discussion, see Brzoska and Ohlson, Arms Production . . . Klare, American Arms Supermarket, pp 173-76; and Wionczek, 'Growth of military industries', pp 47-58. On the 'pariah' countries, see Raimo Vayrynen, 'Semiperipheral countries in the global economic and military order', in Helena Tuomi and Raimo Vayrynen (eds), Militarization and Arms Production, London: Croom Helm, 1982, pp 163-92.

²⁹ See Brzoska and Ohlson, Arms Production . . .

industrial capacity and technological expertise to undertake such an effort. Of those nations with the necessary resources, perhaps five or six—among them Chile, Indonesia, Pakistan, Turkey and Saudi Arabia—are likely to become major military producers by the year 2000.³⁰

Clearly, domestic arms ventures of this sort consume at least some of the funds that were previously spent on imported weapons. Exactly how much is consumed this way cannot, however, be readily calculated. Michael Brzoska and Thomas Ohlson of SIPRI have estimated that the total value of all major weapons produced by Third World countries between 1980 and 1984 amounted to $8.5 billion (in constant 1975 dollars), but this figure excludes small arms, ammunition, and other 'low-tech' items which constitute the bulk of Third World military production.³¹ On the other hand, many of these enterprises have been undertaken for nationalistic or developmental reasons (for example, to spur the growth of modern industrial enterprises), and so we cannot be certain that all of that $8.5 billion would actually have been spent on imported arms in the absence of these domestic programmes. Nevertheless, it seems reasonable to conclude that at least some of the decline in North-to-South arms trafficking that has occurred since 1983 can be attributed to rising military production in the Third World.

There is, however, another side to this equation that we must consider. Despite their quest for self-sufficiency, most Third World producers are generally dependent to a greater or lesser degree on imports of technology—in the form of blueprints, technical assistance, specialised machinery and parts, and so forth—from the major industrial powers. Indeed, many of the major weapons produced in Third World arms factories incorporate components or sub-systems that have been acquired from the older industrial powers. Most of the combat planes produced in the Third World, for example, are powered by jet engines manufactured in Europe or the USA.³² As a result, 'the Third World remains heavily dependent on the developed countries,' Stephanie Neuman observed in 1984, even those countries with indigenous arms industries. 'The more complex components are often beyond prevailing [Third World] technical skill levels or prove to be uneconomical to produce domestically.' As a result, 'natural resources, ³⁰ ibid., pp 7–34, 251–88. On the obstacles to the development of a broad-based arms-making infrastructure, see Neuman, 'International stratification', pp 169–87.

³¹ Brzoska and Ohlson, Arms Production . . . p 8.

³² See SIPRI Yearbook 1985, pp 336–41. For discussion, see Klare, American Arms Supermarket, pp 175–6 and Neuman, 'International stratification', pp 175–81.

production equipment, designers, technicians, and sometimes managers and labour are provided from abroad.³³

This dependency on imported skills and technology has become a significant—if hard to measure—factor in the global military trade. For the most part, sales of technical data, blueprints, production equipment and raw materials are not incorporated into the statistical data compiled by the ACDA, SIPRI, and the CRS. These sources also tend to exclude data on the export of kits for the repair, modification and modernisation of imported weapons already in the inventories of the LDCs. While no one has yet attempted to put a dollar value on all of these technology and equipment flows, there is no doubt that they are compensating to some degree for the decline in exports of finished military systems. As noted by SIPRI, there is 'an increasing flow to recipient countries of weapons-related items, such as spare parts, components, upgrading and modification kits, and so on. These items are imported instead of ready weapons systems and are omitted from SIPRI's and most other estimates of the size of the global arms trade.'³⁴

Despite this omission, and the relative scarcity of data on military exports by Third World producers, it is clear that these activities have come to play an important—and durable—role in the international arms traffic. While it is obvious that the traditional suppliers are not likely to lose their dominant positions in the immediate future, it is also obvious that Third World suppliers have become significant actors in the international arms market. Whether foreign military sales of this sort will actually provide Third World producers with significant economic benefits is, however, still open to question. While the establishment of a domestic arms industry may generate considerable export earnings, it also requires a very substantial level of investment (both of capital and of skilled personnel) and thus can result, as we have seen, in continued dependence on the major industrial powers for specialised technical products and services.

Lessons from war

There is another aspect of the current arms traffic that is inadequately expressed in the standard reference data: the growing emphasis being placed by many Third World buyers on procurement of small arms, ³³ Neuman, 'The Arms Trade . . . ' p 162.

³⁴ SIPRI Yearbook 1985, p 345.

ammunition, supply vehicles, communications equipment, and other low-technology systems of little apparent glamour.

In the boom years of the 1970s and early 1980s, many Third World countries made significant purchases of high-performance jet fighters, guided missiles, and armoured vehicles. These were the 'big ticket' items whose sale drove up the export tallies and produced so many newspaper headlines. Since 1983, however, there have been far fewer reports of such transactions, reflecting the decline in Third World purchases of costly, 'high-tech' weapons. But while there appears to be a decline in the demand for sophisticated arms, we can see a growing market for less-sophisticated weapons and support systems, and for spare parts, ammunition and upgrade kits for existing systems.³⁵

To some extent, this shift in priorities reflects the lack of cash or credit with which to buy large quantities of high-performance weapons, along with the 'saturation' factor noted earlier. At the same time, however, it appears to reflect a number of other critical factors: the growing incidence of insurgency and 'low-intensity warfare' in the Third World; the need for fresh supplies of guns and ammunition to replace losses from the Iran-Iraq conflict and other conflicts of the 1980s; and, perhaps most significant, a widespread sense of disenchantment regarding the combat utility of many high-performance weapons.

While terrorism, insurgency, counter-insurgency, and small-scale conflicts have always been important features of the global military landscape, these elements of what is now called 'low-intensity conflict' have become, in the mid-1980s, a major strategic concern. 'Today one out of every four countries around the globe is at war', the US Under-Secretary of Defence, Fred C Ikle, observed in 1986. 'These are not wars . . . where armies roll across borders, [or] where hundreds of aircraft fight for control of the skies.' Rather, they are insurgent and local conflicts in which 'people get killed . . . by grenades, bullets, mines [and] bombs dropped from aircraft.'³⁶ Such strife, the US Secretary of Defence Caspar Weinberger wrote in 1985, 'will likely remain the most immediate threat to free world security for the rest of this century.'³⁷

While not all military leaders would agree with this assessment, there is no doubt that many nations are worried about the growing incidence of low-level conflict—and are managing their weapons allocations accordingly. Hence, in a place of the jet fighters and modern tanks that figured so prominently in the arms transfers of the 1970s and early 1980s, many Third World governments now emphasise purchases of small arms, helicopters, counter-insurgency aircraft, off-road vehicles, and other items suitable for operations in remote areas against guerrillas and other lightly-armed forces. In the Philippines, for instance, President Corazon Aquino has eschewed the 'high-tech' arms purchases of her predecessor, Ferdinand Marcos, and instead has sought large quantities of small arms and other counter-insurgency systems needed for the struggle against the insurgent New Peoples' Army.³⁸ Similar priorities appear to govern the arms buying of Angola, Colombia, Guatemala, Indonesia, Morocco, Nicaragua, Peru, Thailand, and other nations threatened by insurgent or low-level conflict.³⁹

³⁵ See Wayne Biddle, 'The big business in arms and add-ons', The New York Times, 29 September 1985.

³⁶ Fred C Ikle, 'Taking sides in small wars', Defense 86, March-April 1986, p 7.

³⁷ Caspar Weinberger, Report of the Secretary of Defense, Fiscal Year 1986, Washington DC: US Department of Defense, 1985, p 41.

Many governments have also studied the lessons of the Iran–Iraq war, and, as a result, have ordered large supplies of ammunition, spare parts, and basic combat systems. Because modern warfare can consume vast quantities of bullets, shells and weapons in a very short period of time, and because it is not always easy to obtain replacement matériel from foreign suppliers in time of war, countries with large stockpiles of such matériel are likely to enjoy a significant advantage over those with much smaller supplies. Thus Iran, which lacks spare parts for its US-supplied aircraft, tanks and helicopters, suffered enormous losses in the early stages of the conflict with Iraq, and has since relied on 'human wave attacks' and First World War tactics in order to overcome the numerically smaller but better equipped Iraqi army.⁴⁰

Heavy procurements of basic combat equipment are a natural concomitant of high levels of international tension and conflict. There is, however, another factor at work here. Many of the belligerents in recent conflicts have discovered that their 'high-tech' weapons have not always performed as reliably in wartime as they did under benign peacetime conditions. In many cases, these weapons were also found to require elaborate maintenance work of a sort that is not possible in the chaos of war. The Iranians, in particular, have suffered the recurring ³⁸ See Jim Hoagland, 'Aquino is having more success than Marcos against the rebels', The Washington Post (National Weekly Edition) 9 March 1987.

³⁹ See the 'Register of arms transfers' in SIPRI Yearbook 1985, pp 389–439, and in earlier editions of the Yearbook.

⁴⁰ See Efraim Karsh, The Iran–Iraq War: A Military Analysis, Adelphi Papers No 220, London: International Institute for Strategic Studies, 1987.

incapacitation of many of the 'high-tech' US arms purchased by the Shah in the 1970s.⁴¹ As a result of such experiences, many Third World governments have come to place greater reliance on their older, simpler, and more easily repairable weapons. Similarly, the 1982 conflicts in Lebanon and the Falklands/Malvinas have demonstrated the importance of such non-combat systems as transport planes and logistical vehicles, modern communications equipment and electronic devices for the detection, tracking, and disablement of enemy combat systems.⁴²

These experiences, all of which have been the subject of much discussion in the military press, have led many Third World governments to place a premium on the acquisition of basic combat systems, along with the large quantities of spare parts and supplies needed to operate these weapons under the demanding conditions of protracted warfare. Similarly, many countries have chosen to upgrade existing equipment with modern engines and electronics rather than to invest in entirely new and unfamiliar systems.⁴³ Acquisitions of this sort are generally much less costly than the more sophisticated items favoured in earlier transactions, so that heavy purchases of such hardware may not be reflected in the CRS data on the dollar value of new military purchases. Some of the non-combat systems being acquired, moreover, are excluded from the basic statistical sources cited in this essay, thus further explaining the apparent decline in military purchases by Third World countries.

It is possible, of course, that many recipients will again place orders for 'high-tech' weapons when economic conditions prove more favourable. Given the lessons learned in recent conflicts, however, it is likely that Third World buyers will approach future purchases of sophisticated combat systems with somewhat more caution and scepticism than they did during the 1972-82 period. If there is a compelling need for such weapons, and if the funds are available, these countries are likely to go ahead and procure late-model equipment; if, however, the same mission can be performed almost as well by a less advanced model (or by an upgraded version of an existing product), they may opt for the less costly option.

⁴¹ ibid., pp 36-40. See also William S Lind, 'Simple tanks would suffice', Harper's, September 1982, pp 22-4.

⁴² For discussion, see Robert E Harkavy and Stephanie G Neuman (eds), The Lessons of Recent Wars in the Third World, vol I, Lexington, Massachusetts: Lexington Books, 1985.

⁴³ For discussion, see Gerald M Steinberg, 'Recycled weapons', Technology Review, April 1985, pp 28-38.

Black and grey market sales

Accompanying the trends noted above has been a significant increase in the sale of black- and grey-market munitions to Third World buyers. Given the persistence of revolt and upheaval in the Third World, there has always been some demand for illicit supplies of firearms; today, with the protracted conflicts in Central America, Lebanon, Southern Africa and the Persian Gulf, the demand for such arms has multiplied many times over. Moreover, as a result of the US-Iran-‘Contra’ arms scandal of 1986–87, we now know that major governments have also turned to the clandestine arms market when overt transactions were proscribed for one reason or another.

Illicit arms transactions of this sort require some explanation. Black-market sales generally entail illegal sales of military hardware stolen or misappropriated from government stockpiles, and then shipped via devious and clandestine routes to their ultimate destination. Grey-market sales generally entail the transfer of ‘dual-use’ systems (i.e. helicopters, communications systems, computers, and other products that can be used for both military and civilian purposes) to military users through legitimate export channels, usually on the pretext that they are intended for civilian rather than military use. Typically, black market transfers are conducted by criminal bands or underground organisations operating in contravention of established government authorities; grey-area transfers, on the other hand, usually involve established companies that use commercial export channels—often with the tacit approval of their governments—to ship dual-use equipment to military users in Iran, Libya, South Africa or other countries that have been subjected to an international arms embargo.⁴⁴

None of the established research organisations provides systematic data on illegal military shipments as they do for official government-to-government transactions. Nevertheless, it is possible to gain an awareness of the scope and magnitude of this trade from some of the more significant arms-smuggling schemes that have recently come to light in the USA. In February 1985, for instance, the US Commerce Department revealed that up to 80 US military helicopters, worth a total of some $2 billion, had been illegally diverted to North Korea after being shipped to West Germany with US government approval.⁴⁵ Five months later, in July 1985, seven persons—including several US Navy supply officers—were indicted for conspiring to ship an estimated $75 million worth of F-14 aircraft parts to Iran.⁴⁶ Then, in April 1986, a retired Israeli general and sixteen other suspects were arrested for plotting to sell an estimated $2 billion worth of American aircraft, tanks and missiles to Iran.⁴⁷ Then, of course, there was the Iran-‘Contra’ arms scheme of 1985–86, which involved the Central Intelligence Agency, the Department of State, and the National Security Council, as well as a clandestine network of private arms dealers, professional gun-runners, and international financiers.⁴⁸

⁴⁴ For background on black- and grey-market sales, see the two-part series on clandestine arms exports by Joel Brinkley and Jeff Gerth in The New York Times, 25 and 26 September 1985. See also Gaylord Shaw and William C Rempel, ‘Billion-dollar Iran arms search spans US, globe’, The Los Angeles Times, 4 August 1985; William C Rempel and Larry Green, ‘London center of Iran arms smuggling’, The Los Angeles Times, 3 September 1985; Caryle Murphy, ‘Papers, testimony shed light on murky world of arms ring’, The Washington Post, 21 August 1985; Elaine Sciolino, ‘The arms market: shadowy world’, The New York Times, 4 December 1986; and Michael T Klare, ‘Weapons market employs a multitude of channels’, Baltimore Sun, 14 December 1986.

Even these few examples—and they represent but a small fraction of the major smuggling cases exposed in the USA in recent years—suggest that we are looking at a very significant flow of advanced military hardware.⁴⁹ Nor is the USA the only source of black-market arms. Articles in the international press suggest that certain firms and dealers in West and East Europe have also contributed to the clandestine arms traffic. Thus, there have been several recent reports of illicit West German sales to South Africa and the Middle East.⁵⁰

For obvious reasons, it is impossible to put an exact dollar figure on the total volume of this traffic. Some analysts believe, however, that it amounts to many billions of dollars per year.⁵¹ Much of this traffic can be attributed to purchases by Iran and Iraq, both of which reportedly are spending as much as $1 billion per month to obtain arms and spare

⁴⁵ See The Wall Street Journal, 4 February 1985; The Washington Post, 4 February 1985; and The New York Times, 22 January 1987.

⁴⁶ See The New York Times, 15 and 23 July 1985; and The Washington Post, 16 July 1985.

⁴⁷ See The New York Times, 2 and 3 August 1985 and The Washington Post, 2 August 1985.

⁴⁸ See The Tower Commission Report, New York: Bantam and Times Books, 1987 and The National Security Archive, The Chronology: The Documented Day-by-Day Account of the Secret Military Assistance to Iran and the Contras, New York: Warner Books, 1987.

⁴⁹ The breadth and scale of this trade is suggested by ‘Significant export control cases, January 1981 to June 1985’, a list of illegal arms and technology transfer cases under investigation by the US Department of Justice (supplied to the author by the US Customs Service).

⁵⁰ See Rempel and Green, ‘London center of Iran arms smuggling’; Paul A Chadwell, ‘Illegal arms exports’, National Defense, January 1984, pp 13–14; Paul A Chadwell, ‘Alleged illegal arms exports’, National Defense, April 1986, p 8; Paul A Chadwell, ‘Sub designs for South Africa’, National Defense, March 1987, p 13; Herbert H Denton, ‘Arms sellers get rich on Gulf war’, The Washington Post, 13 July 1984; and John M Goshko, ‘US Allies selling arms to S Africa’, The Washington Post, 27 March 1987.

⁵¹ An estimate of $9 billion per year was provided by an unidentified US Government analyst cited by Wayne Biddle in The New York Times, 29 September 1985.

parts for their continuing conflict.⁵² Other major customers for such arms include Libya; South Africa, the sectarian militias in Lebanon, and the various guerrilla forces in Central America.⁵³

Although black and grey market transactions do not approach the official arms traffic in total dollar terms (after all, a few planeloads of spare parts and ammunition cost considerably less than one new jet fighter), they probably have an equal impact on political and military developments in the Third World. This is because many of the recipients of such arms are engaged in struggles to overthrow duly constituted governments (as in the case of the 'Contras' in Nicaragua and the UNITA forces in Angola), or because there are sensitive political and moral issues involved (as in the case of secret US arms shipments to Iran and South Africa). Black market transfers are also helping to sustain many of the conflicts currently continuing in the Third World—including the bloody fighting in Lebanon and the Persian Gulf.

The changing market-place: prospects and consequences

These findings on technology transfers, arms stockpiling, and black-market transactions suggest that the basic data sources on international military sales may be significantly misrepresenting the true 'state of the trade'. Black-market sales of $5 to $10 billion per year, coupled with a substantial trade in arms-making technology, could—if factored into the standard export tallies—eliminate much of the statistical decline in Third World military imports observed since 1983. While the accurate measurement of such supplementary transactions is probably beyond the capacity of researchers operating outside the intelligence community, it is obvious that more analytical attention needs to be addressed to these phenomena.

This shift in trading patterns is producing a significant and permanent restructuring of the international arms traffic. In all probability, we shall be seeing fewer of the large, multi-billion dollar transfers of high-performance aircraft and missiles from North to South that were so common in the late 1970s and early 1980s. Instead, we are likely to see a larger trade in infantry weapons, electronic and communications equipment, and combat-support matériel of all sorts. Supplying these weapons, moreover, will be a more diverse group of First, Second, and Third World producers, as well as a very active crew of black-market suppliers.

⁵² The $1 billion per month estimate was provided by an unidentified government sources cited by Herbert H Denton in The Washington Post, 13 July 1984.

⁵³ On illicit US sales to South Africa, see Thomas Conrad, 'South Africa circumvents embargo', Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, March 1986, pp 8-13; and Michael T Klare, 'Evading the embargo, illicit US arms transfers to South Africa', Journal of International Affairs 35(1) Spring/Summer 1981, pp 15-28.

This restructuring of the international arms traffic has many significant repercussions. One of the more obvious consequences is a sharp increase in the intensity of supply-side competition. The major producers are placing far more emphasis on marketing and advertising, and are vigorously courting potential Third World buyers. There has also been an increase in the number and frequency of military trade fairs (or 'arms bazaars', as they are sometimes called), with more and more companies renting exhibit space at such events.⁵⁴ Even if the demand for high-performance arms expands in the late 1980s, this competitive climate is unlikely to recede much, because yet more new suppliers are now entering the marketplace.

With the increase in competition, many of the restrictions on arms exports once imposed by some Western European governments have been significantly diluted. Thus France, which played down the military side of its aerospace trade when the Socialist President, François Mitterrand, took office in 1981, has since lifted its restrictions on military sales to all countries save Chile and South Africa.⁵⁵ Similarly, West Germany—which previously maintained tight controls on the sale of military matériel to Third World combat zones—significantly relaxed its export controls in 1982.⁵⁶ Despite considerable domestic opposition, Britain has relaxed its restrictions on military sales to Chile and other countries cited for human rights violations.⁵⁷

Increased competition among the suppliers has also had an effect on recipient behaviour in the international market-place. As noted by Brzoska and Ohlson in the 1985 SIPRI Yearbook, 'Today the arms market is a buyers' market', which endows recipients with greater leverage when negotiating terms for new purchases. This leverage has been used in several significant ways: to secure concessions in price and credit terms; to obtain 'offset' and barter agreements; and to gain access to advanced military production technologies.⁵⁸

⁵⁴ On the increase in 'arms bazaars', see: SIPRI Yearbook 1984, pp 205–6. See also Ingrassia, 'World weapons sales slow'; and Rick Atkinson and Fred Hiatt, 'Arms merchants' shrinking market', The Washington Post, 23 June 1985.

⁵⁵ See Klein, 'Arms sales, development, disarmament', p 160; and Roger Ricklefs, 'France, a big exporter of weapons, is hurt by a decline in volume', The Wall Street Journal, 20 July 1984.

⁵⁶ Klein, 'Arms sales . . .' p 161.

⁵⁷ See SIPRI Yearbook 1984, pp 188–90.

⁵⁸ SIPRI Yearbook 1985, pp 363–4.

Given the enormous debt burden carried by many Third World countries, it is hardly surprising that credit allowances of various sorts have figured in recent arms transactions. Nations that previously were obliged to pay cash for their purchases, or to borrow the funds at regular market rates, are now able to buy on long-term credit—often at concessionary interest rates. To ease further the credit problems of favoured customers, the USA agreed in 1986 to defer interest payments on arms-related loans.⁵⁹

Offset and barter agreements have become a prominent feature of the arms trade. Through such agreements, the arms supplier agrees to accept partial payment in the form of raw materials produced by the recipient, or to purchase a certain quantity of other goods in the recipient country and market them elsewhere, or to award sub-contracts to the recipient for the production of certain components or to help modernise the recipient's industrial infrastructure.⁶⁰ Although such agreements impose a significant burden on the recipient, they have reportedly become a 'fact of life' in the international market-place as recipients gain more leverage. According to one report, US arms exports of $22.4 billion in 1980–84 generated an estimated $12.3 billion in offset commitments.⁶¹

One of the most common forms of offset is the transfer of military technology from supplier to recipient. Specifically, the buyer may insist that the weapon in question be partly manufactured or assembled in its own factories, or that it serve as a subcontractor to the original supplier by producing certain key parts. (In this manner, the recipient gains access to modern production techniques and establishes a base for the manufacture of indigenously-designed weapons.) Such 'co-production' and licensing arrangements now figure in most major military sales to Brazil, Egypt, India, Israel, South Korea and Taiwan, and are increasingly setting the pattern for sales to other Third World countries with an indigenous arms-production capability.⁶²

Accompanying these features of a buyers' market is the growing tendency for recipients to diversify their sources of arms, rather than to depend on one or two main suppliers.

⁵⁹ See Brzoska and Ohlson, 'The future of arms transfers', p 135 and The New York Times, 25 December 1986.

⁶⁰ For a discussion of this phenomenon, see Thomas Friedman, 'Defense sales offsets', National Defense, March 1987, pp 28–33 and Stephanie Neuman, 'Coproduction, barter, and countertrade: offsets in the international arms market', Orbis 29(1) spring 1985, pp 165–213.

⁶¹ Friedman, 'Defense sales offsets', p 28.

⁶² For discussion, see Klare, American Arms Supermarket, pp 173–80 and Neuman, 'The arms trade . . .', pp 164–5.

This pattern first became evident in the 1960s, when some of the major Latin American countries began buying European arms in order to signal their independence from Washington, and has since become the pattern throughout the Third World.⁶³ Many nations in the Middle East, for instance, have chosen to turn increasingly to France and Great Britain for their major equipment, rather than to remain dependent on one or other of the two superpowers (which tend to exact a higher price in terms of political subservience than do the European suppliers). Thus, Saudi Arabia decided in 1985 to acquire 72 Tornado combat planes from Britain, rather than continue an uphill battle to gain US Congressional approval for the purchase of additional F-15 fighters.⁶⁴ A similar pattern can be seen in such countries as Libya, Algeria and Iraq, which have turned to French and Italian suppliers rather than maintaining a sole-source relationship with the Soviet Union.⁶⁵ This trend towards diversification is clearly evident in the statistical data: according to Stephanie Neuman, the number of LDCs receiving arms from four or more suppliers tripled between 1972-73 and 1981-82 (from ten to thirty-two), while the number buying from only one or two primary suppliers declined.⁶⁶

The process of diversification has, of course been aided by the entry of more and more suppliers into the world arms market. Although production of supersonic aircraft and other 'high-tech' systems is still limited to a handful of countries, many other weapons are available from a wide range of suppliers.⁶⁷ Because the newer suppliers tend to offer more attractive economic terms (ie, lower prices, easier credit terms or superior offsets) than the traditional suppliers, it is not surprising that many Third World buyers are increasingly turning to these secondary suppliers—including other Third World countries—when acquiring less sophisticated equipment.⁶⁸

⁶³ On Latin American buying patterns, see Klare, American Arms Supermarket, pp 77-107; Luigi Einaudi, Hans Heymann Jr, David Ronfeldt and Caesar Sereseres, Arms Transfers to Latin America, Santa Monica, California: RAND Corporation, 1973; and US Department of State, Bureau of Intelligence and Research, Arms Sales in Latin America, Washington DC: Government Printing Office, 1973.

⁶⁴ See The Washington Post, 10, 17, and 27 September 1985.

⁶⁵ See SIPRI Yearbook 1984, p 188.

⁶⁶ Neuman, 'International stratification', p 195.

⁶⁷ For a register of the indigenous and licensed production of arms in Third World countries, see Brzoska and Ohlson, Arms Production in the Third World, pp 305-50.

⁶⁸ Customers for Brazilian arms, for instance, have included Algeria, Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Egypt, Gabon, Guyana, Honduras, Iran, Iraq, Libya, Nigeria, Paraguay, Saudi Arabia, Suriname, Uruguay, Venezuela and Zimbabwe. See: SIPRI Yearbook 1985, pp 389-423.

These trade developments—the proliferation of arms suppliers, the diversification of acquisition patterns, and the breakdown of established trading patterns—are also likely to have an impact on political and military developments in the Third World.

To begin with, it is apparent that the strong patron-client relationships forged between the major arms suppliers and their Third World customers in the 1960s and 1970s are progressively weakening as recipients diversify their sources of supply. Until fairly recently, Third World countries tending to obtain the bulk of their military equipment from a single supplier—usually one or the other of the two superpowers—were in a majority. Today, most Third World countries buy from a variety of sources, and some, as we have seen, have established their own indigenous arms industries. In many cases, this has resulted in a greater degree of political autonomy on the part of Third World countries—often at the expense of the two superpowers, which have both suffered dramatic political reversals in recent years (the United States in Iran, Nicaragua, and the Sudan; the Soviet Union in Egypt, Somalia, and Iraq).⁶⁹

This same process of diversification has also made it easier for belligerents to obtain the arms and equipment needed to sustain high levels of combat—even in the face of an embargo imposed by the major suppliers. This is perhaps the outstanding lesson of the Iran-Iraq conflict, which has continued for seven gruelling years despite the nominal efforts of both superpowers to limit arms transfers to the protagonists. A similar pattern can be seen in the continuing struggles in Central America, Lebanon and Southern Africa.

The growing emphasis on purchases of basic combat equipment, spare parts, and ammunition is also ominous in this regard. While many of the high-performance jets acquired in the 1970s are likely to spend much of the time during future conflicts on the ground (because of the difficulties encountered in maintaining them under wartime conditions), the large quantities of less-capable systems now being stockpiled are not likely to sit idle. Indeed, the whole emphasis on such hardware suggests conscious planning for sustained, high-intensity conflict on the part of many Third World governments. This is particularly evident in the Middle East, where both Israel and Syria have stockpiled vast quantities of combat equipment in anticipation of another conflict in Lebanon.⁷⁰

⁶⁹ For discussion, see Klare, American Arms Supermarket, chs 6, 7 and 10. On the Soviet experience with arms sales, see Pierre, The Global Politics of Arms Sales, pp 73–82; and Rajan Menon, Soviet Power and the Third World, New Haven: Yale University Press, ch 4.

It would be foolish to argue that increased arms transfers automatically increase the risk of war—the decision to wage war is determined by numerous factors, and it is almost impossible to calculate the relative importance of any single one. Nevertheless, there is no doubt that the widespread availability of modern arms has made it easier for potential belligerents to choose the military rather than the diplomatic option when seeking to resolve local disputes. Stark examples of this phenomenon include Argentina's decision in 1982 to occupy the Falklands/Malvinas, Israel's decision in 1982 to invade southern Lebanon, Libya's decision in 1983 to intervene in the Chadian civil war, and, most notably, Iraq's decision in 1980 to invade Iran. Similarly, the widespread availability of black-market arms has made it easier for insurgents in a score of countries to sustain protracted hostilities against the existing government.

Arms transfers have also contributed to the destructive intensity of many recent conflicts, particularly those fought with large numbers of modern munitions. The war in the South Atlantic, for instance, entailed relatively high levels of destruction (12 ships sunk or damaged, 124 planes shot down) despite the limited nature of the conflict, while the 1982 conflict in Lebanon produced an estimated 50,000 casualties in just one month of fighting. This trend toward increased combat intensity is additionally disturbing because it increases the likelihood that future Third World conflicts will escalate to the point where they threaten the geo-strategic interests of the USA and/or the Soviet Union, thus inviting intervention by the superpowers and risking even higher levels of escalation.

Even in the absence of significant military activity, arms transfers are contributing to instability in the Third World by absorbing vast sums needed for famine relief and economic development. At a time of economic austerity and scarce credit, excessive spending on imported arms exacerbates debt problems and precludes investment in non-military development programmes. 'Arms imports soaks up foreign-exchange loans that could otherwise finance purchases of capital goods', Professor Lance Taylor of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology noted in 1981. 'Econometric studies suggest that each extra dollar spent on arms reduces domestic investment by 25 cents and agricultural output by 20 cents.⁷¹ Also disturbing is the fact that African countries spent some $20.4 billion on imported arms in 1981-84,⁷² just at the moment when the continent's fragile agricultural infrastructure was about to come under severe strain.

⁷⁰ See Charlotte Salkowski, 'Arms buildup, raid on PLO threaten Mideast', The New York Times, 2 October 1985.

All of this suggests a pressing need for fresh consideration of proposals for curbing the global traffic in conventional arms. Without some international cooperation in controlling the flow of weapons, we can expect no mitigation of the dangers described above. Unfortunately, such cooperation has few precedents and is unlikely to occur easily or swiftly. It is important, therefore, that we consider any preparatory work that has been done in this area.

By far the most ambitious initiative in this field was the draft agreement forged by US and Soviet negotiators during the Conventional Arms Transfer (CAT) talks of 1977-78. Although these talks failed to produce a formal treaty before being suspended by President Carter, they did produce agreement on many terms and protocols for such a concord—particularly as relate to the control of high-tech arms transfers to overseas conflict zones.⁷³ It is to be hoped that this earlier effort will facilitate the adoption of US-Soviet agreements if the two superpowers can agree to resume their negotiations on this issue.

Even if the CAT talks are resumed, however, it is obvious that the other major suppliers—particularly France and Britain—will have to be included in any future arms control arrangement if such initiatives are to have significant impact. As noted above, Western European countries now account for as much as one-third of the military trade with the Third World, and it is likely that these producers could further expand their output if excluded from a US-Soviet accord on conventional arms transfers.

Even more important is the need for recipient cooperation in conventional arms control. So long as recipients are willing to turn to secondary suppliers and/or their own industrial capabilities to procure arms unavailable from the major producers, mutual restraint by the superpowers and the West Europeans will have limited impact. Thus, if ⁷¹ Lance Taylor, 'The costly arms trade', The New York Times, 22 December 1981. See also Wassily Leontieff and Faye Duchin, Military Spending: Facts and Figures, Worldwide Implications and Future Outlook, New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1983.

⁷² ACDA, WMEAT 1985, p. 43.

⁷³ For discussion, see Klare, American Arms Supermarket, pp. 94-95 and 230-31; Pierre, The Global Politics of Arms Sales, pp. 285-90; and US Congress, Senate, Committee on Foreign Relations, Prospects for Multilateral Arms Export Restraints, Staff Report, 96th Congress, 1st Session, 1979, pp. 19-24.

Third World countries are to diminish the risks posed by regional conflicts and to channel more of their funds into domestic economic development, they must work together in curbing arms imports into their areas.

While undeniably difficult to attain, such agreement among recipients does not lie entirely outside the bounds of possibility. Particularly encouraging are the recent efforts of the 'Contadora' countries (Colombia, Mexico, Panama and Venezuela) to construct—and then seek regional support for—a treaty limiting arms imports into Central America.⁷⁴ Similar agreements have also been discussed in other regions of the Third World. Ultimately, such cooperative measures offer the only hope that Third World countries will be able to exercise some control over the international traffic in conventional arms.

⁷⁴ For text and discussion, see Jim Morrell, 'Contadora: the Treaty on balance', International Policy Report, June 1985, pp 1–8.

Populations on the move¹

During the last two decades the distribution of population and the movements which alter it have increasingly occupied the attention of those concerned with problems of population and resources in the Third World. These issues are of concern both to those who make and implement policy, and to social scientists whose work may influence policy. There are a variety of reasons for this concern.

The 1950s and 1960s witnessed the drive to reduce fertility in Third World countries to complement reductions in mortality and thus to limit rates of population growth. Though significant progress was achieved, success was by no means complete.² For the foreseeable future, the pressure of population and consequent demands on scarce resources will continue to present major problems, including those arising from the unequal distribution of resources and of people. These inequalities are attributable to the influence both of long-term factors such as the physical environment (which while not immutable is capable of relatively modest change through human intervention) and of shorter-term factors such as the political and economic decisions taken by former colonial powers and their independent successors. All of these factors are enmeshed within an extending and increasingly complex global economic system.³ In parts of the Third World, and particularly in Africa, environmental, political and economic factors have combined over the last twenty years to produce conditions of drought, food shortages and famine in which longer-term population pressures on

¹ The migration literature is multidisciplinary and diverse in nature and therefore immense in volume. In this paper it has been possible to do no more than list examples to illustrate the major concepts and features which are considered.

² L Tabah, 'World population trends: a stocktaking', Population and Development Review 6(3) 1980, pp 353-89.

N Eberstadt (ed), Fertility decline in developing countries, New York: Praeger, 1981.

J C Caldwell, Theory of fertility decline, New York: Academic Press, 1982.

T E Dow Jr and L H Werner, 'Prospects for fertility decline in rural Kenya', Population and Development Review 9(1) 1983, pp 77-97.

³ H C Brookfield, Interdependent development, London: Methuen, 1975.

M M Kritz et al, Global trends in migration, New York: Center for Migration Studies, 1981.

R H Balance et al, International economy and industrial development, Brighton: Harvester Press, 1982.

R Sabot, Migration and the labour market in developing countries, Boulder, Colorado: Westview Press, 1982.

A L Mabogunje, The development process: a spatial perspective, London: Hutchinson, 1980.

resources have been exacerbated to the point of social and economic breakdown.

Inter-regional and international movements of people have been viewed as both resulting from inequalities in income and wealth, and contributing to such inequalities. Possible means of controlling population distribution and movements are subject to a wide divergence of opinion. There is, however, certainly a recognised need for changes in population distribution. Many governments are now more concerned with problems of distribution than with problems of fertility, and surveys by the UN have shown that existing distributions of urban and rural populations are thought to be unsatisfactory by many governments in Third World countries.⁴

This article sets out the broad nature of population movements and changes in distribution which are taking place in the major continental areas of the Third World, while making comparisons and contrasts. It outlines the differing approaches to these movements, and the interpretations of varying ideological and disciplinary points of view. It describes contemporary practical problems and indicates possible future developments.

Population movements are currently occurring within and among countries of the Third World and between the Third World and countries with more developed economies.⁵ Within the Third World, and particularly in tropical Africa, movements many not always be clearly distinguishable as internal or international. The major concern here is with movements which are essentially 'internal' in nature even ⁴ UN, World Population trends and monitoring report. Vol. 2. Population policies, New York: UN Population Division, 1978. Of 116 governments of less-developed countries, 53 reported satisfaction with fertility rates, only six were satisfied with their distribution of population.

S I Abumere, 'Population distribution policies and measures in Africa south of the Sahara', Population and Development Review 7(3) 1981, pp 421-433.

R J Fuchs, Population distribution policies in Asia and the Pacific: current status and future prospects, Paper No. 83 Honolulu: East-West Population Institute, 1983.

J I Clarke and L A Kosinski (eds), Redistribution of population in Africa, London: Heinemann, 1982.

L A Kosinski and K M Elahi (eds), Population redistribution and development in South Asia, Dordrecht: Reidel, 1985.

A L Mabogunje, 'Objectives and rationales for regional population redistribution in developing countries', in Population distribution policies in development planning, UN Department of International Economic and Social Affairs, New York: UN 1981, pp 19-29.

⁵ F Frobel et al, The new international division of labour, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1980.

W Bohning, Studies in international labour migration, New York: St. Martin's Press, 1984.

J H Bradbury, 'Regional and industrial restructuring processes in the new international division of labour', Progress in Human Geography (5) 1985, pp 35-63.

J R Lewis, 'International labour migration and uneven regional development in labour exporting countries' Tijdschrift voor Economische en Sociale Geografie 77(1) 1986, pp 27-41.

if not strictly so by definition. No specific attention is given to international movements such as those from South and Southeast Asia to the petroleum-producing countries of the Middle East or those between the Third World and more developed countries.⁶ This focus is intended to make more manageable a theme which is complex and unwieldy.

General considerations

In global terms there have been greater movements of population during the present century than at any time in the past. With an expanding world population, to which the Third World is making the major contribution, there are more people to move, and the means for them to do so have been much improved by progressively developing transportation networks. Even for those for whom the most sophisticated forms of transport are not available, there are now means of relatively easy movement which did not exist even two or three decades ago.

Many countries in the Third World record high rates of natural increase which are producing pressures upon resources in a variety of ways; these pressures in turn influence major redistributions. There are major movements of people within rural areas and from rural areas into towns.⁷ High rates of urban growth (from continuing high rates of natural increase among urban populations as well as from rural-urban movement) are far in excess of those experienced by expanding towns

⁶ I Serageldin et al, Manpower and international migration in the Middle East and North Africa, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1983.

F Arnold and N M Shah, Asian labour migration to the Middle East, Honolulu: East-West Population Institute, 1984.

J Conde et al, International south-north migration: a case study of migrants from the Senegal River Valley in Mali, Mauritania and Senegal, Paris: OECD, 1986.

⁷ J Abu-Lughod and R Hay (eds), Third World urbanization, London: Methuen, 1977.

B du Toit and H I Safa (eds), Migration and urbanization, The Hague: Mouton, 1975.

R N Thomas and J M Hunter (eds), Internal migration systems in the developing world, with special reference to Latin America, Boston: G K Hall, 1980.

L Yap, 'The attraction of cities: a review of the migration literature', Journal of Development Economics (4) 1977, pp 239-64.

P A Morrison (ed), Population movements: their form and functions in urbanization and development, Liège Ordina Editions, 1982.

Migration, population and development, Population Information Program, The Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Population Reports Series M, No. 7, September-October 1983.

J Connell, 'Islands under pressure: population growth and urbanization in the South Pacific', Ambio (12) 1984, pp 306-12.

G Swamy, Population and internal migration, World Bank Staff Working Paper No 689, Washington DC, 1985.

in the now developed world in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. There is urbanisation without complementary economic development, industrial or otherwise. Large numbers of new town dwellers find that the means of economic support are limited and many are initially 'migrating to unemployment'. Urban growth is also occurring without complementary expansion in urban services. Administratively, socially and economically, large towns and cities in the Third World experience great stresses in coping with their increasing populations. There are shortages and low standards of housing, and inadequate water supply, sewerage and waste disposal. The combined effects of these traumatic conditions on physical and mental well-being are considerable.

With increased populations, man-made and natural disasters are promoting population movements in much greater volumes than in the past.⁸ Africa has now more refugees who have fled from war and political disruption than any other continent, but refugee numbers are also considerable in parts of Latin America and Asia. Africa is widely prone to natural disaster, particularly drought, and though the numbers affected are difficult to ascertain, a large proportion are forced to move in order to survive. There is no such widespread environmental devastation in Latin America and in Asia.

Political refugees and those moving because of natural disasters fall within a category of being forced to move.⁹ In a second broad category are those who may be described as economic migrants. They may be under varying degrees of pressure to move but they have the expectation and hope of improving their circumstances by doing so. Those in the first category are unable to plan their movements, while there is some element of planning for those in the second. A classification of this order is for convenience only and in reality is not always a clear dichotomy between 'forced' or 'involuntary' and 'unforced' or 'voluntary' or between 'non-economic' and 'economic' in describing the motivation for movements. The UN High Commission

⁸ See Disasters (The International Journal of Disaster Studies and Practice), Relief and Development Institute, London.

⁹ See various publications of the UN High Commission for Refugees.

A Hansen and A Oliver-Smith (eds), Involuntary migration and resettlement: the problems and responses of dislocated people, Boulder, Colorado: Westview Press, 1982.

E Meng-Try, 'Kampuchea: a country adrift', Population and Development Review 7(2) 1981, pp 209-28.

J Rogge, Too many, too long: Sudan's twenty-year refugee dilemma, New Jersey: Rowman and Allenheld, 1985.

for Refugees estimates a total of 10 million refugees in the Third World, but this figure does not include persons displaced by environmental catastrophe. 'Economically active migrants' are said by the International Labour Office to number between 20 and 22 million, but this can be no more than a vague estimate, given the problems of defining a migrant and of determining migrant status.¹⁰ Many movements are made illegally, and these, together with many legal movements, go unrecorded.

The emphasis in this article is on people who may be influenced by factors which are primarily economic, though perhaps in conjunction with political, social and psychological factors.¹¹ They are able to exercise some choice as to whether to move or not, and in the kinds of movements which they make. Their movements are not uniform in character and there are important differences among these which need to be recognised.

Movement types

The many different types of movement vary in their causes, manifestations and implications. They may be comprehended initially in terms of their spatial and temporal characteristics.¹²

Distinctions may be made between origins and destinations of movements, according to which are rural and which are urban, and movements defined which are rural/rural, rural/urban, urban/rural and urban/urban (intra-urban and inter-urban). In general in the Third World the majority of people are still located in rural areas, increasing numbers are moving to urban places, and large numbers move between rural and urban locations. There is also increasing movement between and within urban places.

Relatively little attention has been given to the distinction which should be made between migration (mobility involving permanent change of residence) and circulation (mobility away from place of residence but with eventual return to it). Circulation has long been ¹⁰ ILO, World labour report, Geneva: International Labour Office, 1984.

¹¹ J Balan, Why people move, Paris: UNESCO Press, 1981.

G E de Yong and R W Gardner (eds), Migration decision-making multi-disciplinary approaches to micro-level studies in developed and developing countries, New York: Pergamon Press, 1981.

¹² W T S Gould and R M Prothero, 'Space and time in African Population mobility', in People on the move: studies on internal migration, L A Kosinski and R M Prothero (eds), London: Methuen, 1975, pp 39-49.

recognised as of great importance in tropical Africa, and increasing attention has been directed to it in other parts of the developing world.¹³

Two types of migration may be distinguished. Regular migration involves a permanent change in place of residence in which the decision to move has been taken in circumstances offering the migrant relatively free choice. Irregular migration involves a change of residence under pressure, which may therefore not be wholly permanent but may involve further movement, whose timing and direction are uncertain.

Circulation away from a recognised permanent place of residence may be classified according to varying periods of time: daily (away for up to twenty-four hours); periodic (away for more than twenty-four hours but less than twelve months); seasonal (similar to periodic but where the time absent is related to the span of one or more seasons); long-term (away for more than twelve months and possibly extending over years). These time distinctions are inevitably arbitrary and other time criteria have been used.¹⁴

When these spatial and temporal dimensions are combined in an attempt to comprehend the totality of mobility they provide a typology in which twenty-four different types of population movement may be identified. There are many more types than are commonly recognised and increased awareness of them can contribute to a better understanding of the nature, causes and consequences of movements. However, it is important at the same time to appreciate that in reality, among specific groups of people or among populations in specified areas, only rarely is one type of mobility practised. Types, which are distinctive in their spatial and temporal characteristics and in their causes and consequences, occur in varied associations with one another. People may be involved concurrently in more than one type of ¹³ M Chapman, 'Circulation', in International Encyclopaedia of Population Vol 1, J A Ross (ed), New York: Free Press, 1982, pp 93-98.

M Chapman and R M Prothero, 'Themes on circulation in the Third World', International Migration Review 17(4) 1983, pp 597-632.

R M Prothero and M Chapman (eds), Circulation in Third World Countries, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1985.

G Standing (ed), Labour circulation and the labour process, London: Croom Helm, 1985.

¹⁴ R D Bedford, 'A transition in circular mobility: population movement in the New Hebrides 1800-1970', in H C Brookfield (ed), The Pacific in Transition, Canberra: Australian National University, 1973, pp 187-227.

G W Jones and H V Richter (eds), Population mobility and development: South East Asia and the Pacific, Development Studies Monograph No. 27, Canberra: Australian National University.

G J Hugo, 'Circular migration in Indonesia', Population and Development Review 8(1) 1982, pp 59-83.

M Chapman and R M Prothero, op. cit., 1983.

movement and possibly in several types. This complexity has been inadequately recognised in emergencies, when providing for people moving under stress (through political disruption or environmental disaster), or in planning for those who are moving under pressure, albeit of a less urgent nature. Movements primarily influenced by economic factors need to be considered in ways additional to the spatial/temporal dimensions which have been outlined. While economic factors may be predominant they are unlikely to operate to the exclusion of political, social and psychological factors. These factors will operate differentially at a variety of scales—ranging from individuals to variously sized collectivities of movers. While a combination of economic and/or political factors may predominate in determining rates of movement (the proportion of a population which moves), the incidence of movement (those persons in a population who move) will be influenced much more by social and psychological factors associated with kin groups, household, families and individuals.¹⁵

There are circumstances in which the whole population moves (for example groups of hunter-gatherers or nomadic pastoralists or shifting cultivators) and does so in order to survive, by exploiting and conserving scarce resources which are dispersed and variable in their distribution in space and in time. These movements are delicately balanced, based on an assessment of the availability and potential of resources, and a judgment on the basis of accumulated experience as to how these should be best used. Such groups of 'ecological migrants' have been able to survive, if not always to thrive, in the most extreme environments in which life is possible. The numbers of people now involved in activities which require total movement are relatively small and the ecological niches which they inhabit have become progressively more restricted. They are frequently under great pressure, often requiring support for subsistence let alone for the survival of their traditional ways of life. The intense pressures come from the degradation of already marginal environments through natural and man-induced changes (for example, nomadic pastoralists in the West African Sahel) and through political and economic disruption (for example, Indian tribes in Amazonia), and sometimes from a combination of these. Traditional nomadic pastoral life for many Somali people in the Horn of Africa has to a very large extent been disrupted. For some, it has been totally destroyed during the recent period of unsettled Somali-Ethiopian political relations coupled with adverse environmental conditions, particularly drought.

¹⁵ J.C. Mitelman, 'The causes of labour migration', Bulletin, Inter-African Labour Institute (6) 1959, pp 12-13. Reprinted in J Middleton (ed), Black Africa: its Peoples and Culture Today, New York: Macmillan, 1970, pp 257-69.

Unlike the above groups whose movements are severely constrained, those who move in the expectation and hope of achieving economic improvement constitute a minority of the populations from which they originate. They are able to exercise some degree of choice as to whether or not they move, though the extent to which they are constrained in their choices is of course one of opinion and interpretation. These interpretations differ sharply, depending on disciplinary and ideological biases which produce a range of varied reasons for movement. These differences are evident in several explanatory frameworks which have been applied to both migration and circulation. They are illustrated with particular reference to work in sub-Saharan Africa.

Explanations of movements

Neo-classical economic explanations of movement have tended to be mechanistic in their approach and macro in scale. They stress 'economic man', concentrate on sectoral differences and under-emphasise regional differences, and exaggerate the permanence of rural-urban migration to the neglect of other movements.¹⁶ In general they have underplayed the importance of social and psychological factors in influencing movement. Work on migration in tropical Africa and more widely in Third World countries has emphasised econometric models which 'integrate the two-way relationship between migration and population distribution on the one hand and economic variables on the other, into a more comprehensive analytical framework designed to improve development policy'.¹⁷

This work has been premised on the capability of economic research methodologies, econometric techniques and data analysis to produce 'a steadily increasing volume of new insights' at macro- and micro-levels. Non-economic factors are acknowledged to have some relevance but the emphasis is on migration being explained primarily by economic factors, with the dismissive and arrogant comment that '... "non-economic" social science migration models offer little practical policy guidance for decision makers in developing countries'. The essentials of the model are that migration is a response to urban-rural differences in expected rates of actual earnings; that migrants consider the various labour market opportunities available and select the one which will maximise the expected gain from migration, as measured by the differences in real incomes between urban and rural job opportunities and the probability of a new migrant obtaining an urban job. The original model and many of its revisions have little to say about circulatory movements of people and why they continue, and on the function of the informal sector in urban economies, though some recent work (eg on internal migration in Mexico) has considered job prospects and earnings in the informal sector.¹⁸

¹⁶ M P Todaro, Internal Migration in Developing Countries: A Review of Theory, Evidence, Methodology and Research Priorities, Geneva: International Labour Office, 1976.

¹⁷ ibid.

A sociological/social anthropological explanation of the movement of labour is less mechanistic and less singularly focused, and has recognised that different factors operate on different scales.¹⁹ In the pluralistic colonial economy and society of South-Central Africa, labour movement involved a continuing dialectic between modern needs and traditional demands. On the one hand there were the centrifugal attractions of wage employment in more economically advanced places (e.g. mines and towns), and on the other the centripetal attractions of ties, relationships and obligations in home places. This approach distinguishes between 'necessary' conditions (macro and mainly economic) and 'sufficient' conditions (macro/personal and mainly social) which influence decisions to move, and which influence the 'rate' and 'incidence' of movement. It concludes that the causal factors in labour migration can be appreciated only by trying to see town and country as one social field and to analyse the forces operating within it, but doubts that social science is yet in a position to be able to do this. Further work has viewed this total field of 'social and economic relationships involving both town and country', within which the decisions of potential movers are constrained through time, as composed of 'setting' (macro in scale and involving economic, political and administrative factors) and 'situation' (micro in scale and involving individual and personal circumstances).²⁰

¹⁸ H Garrison, 'Internal migration in Mexico: a test of the Todaro model', Food Research Institute Studies 18(2) 1982, pp 197-214.

¹⁹ J C Mitchell, op. cit. 1959, and 'Structural plurality, urbanization and labour circulation in Southern Rhodesia', in J A Jackson (ed), Migration, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 1969, pp 156-80.

J Gugler, in J A Jackson (ed), 'On the theory of rural-urban migration: the case of Sub-Saharan Africa', op. cit., pp 134-55.

²⁰ J C Mitchell, 'Towards a situational sociology of wage-labour circulation', in R M Prothero and M Chapman (eds), op. cit., pp 3-53.

Explanations of movement by neo-Marxist political economists, and those of similar persuasion in other disciplines, have strongly advanced the view that too little attention has been paid to the externally determined political and economic structures within which movements occur.²¹ They maintain that traditional societies in the Third World were penetrated in the colonial period by capitalism which expropriated their surpluses for its growth and continuation. By increasing local need for cash (e.g. by introducing new currencies, taxes and consumer goods) capitalism has forced people in peripheral rural societies to move to satisfy their needs to areas of more precocious economic development where there are demands for wage labour. Consequently, regional differences and inequalities are intensified; village economies are impoverished and those who remain in them have to subsidise absent members who will return to be supported when their labour is not required elsewhere (e.g. during economic recessions and in old age). The stratification of rural societies is either initiated or enhanced. Samir Amin, among the most forthright in advancing structural explanations, has written of the draining of the human resources of the interior of West Africa to promote developments on the coast and in the coastal hinterland; he argues that movement is not a consequence of unequal development due to the varying potential of different regions, but that it is an element in promoting unequal development.²²

Structural explanations are criticised for being strong on theory but having limited supporting empirical evidence, and this criticism is borne out in Amin's work. His analyses are at macro scale, with sparse supporting evidence that can be refuted on several grounds. The explanations are based on an over-simplified dichotomy of West Africa into major regions (the sources and destinations of movements), with inadequate attention paid to significant variations within these regions, relating to the physical environment and to ethnic and social factors. Amin ignores the fact that only a minority of the total population has ²¹ C Meillassoux, 'From production to reproduction: a Marxist approach to economic anthropology', Economy and Society (1) 1972, pp 93-105.

T J F A Gerold-Scheepers and W M J van Binsbergen, 'Marxist and non-marxist approaches to migration in tropical Africa', and others papers in T J F A Gerold-Scheepers and W M J van Binsbergen (eds), Migration and the transformation of modern African society, Leiden: Afrike-Studiecentrum, University of Leiden, 1978, pp 21-35.

L Cliffe, 'Labour migration and peasant differentiation: Zambian experience', Journal of Peasant Studies (5) 1977, pp 326-46.

K Swindell, 'Labour migration in underdeveloped countries: the case of Sub-Saharan Africa', Progress in Human Geography (3) 1979, pp 241-59.

²² S Amin, 'Introduction', in Modern Migrations in Western Africa, S Amin (ed), London: Oxford University Press for the International African Institute.

been involved in movement, notwithstanding the macro-political-economic system within which people are supposedly locked and over which they are said to have little control. Structuralist interpretations, involving the interdependence of traditional and capitalist modes of production, would imply continuing movement of a circular character, yet Amin's analysis of West Africa in this century is that after an initial phase of temporary seasonal (circular) movement there was permanent movement of the population from the interior to the coast and the coastal hinterland. He dates what he terms 'modern migrations' in West Africa from about 1920, with a major hiatus in the development of movements consequent on the impact of exploitative colonialism and capitalism; antecedent conditions are ignored and no consideration given to elements of historical continuity in movements, for which there is evidence. However, neo-Marxist structuralists are not alone in neglecting historical perspective; sociologists and neo-classical economists are also guilty.

There has been some recognition of the value of this perspective and of its potential for better explaining movement. A review of regional mobility and resource development in West Africa has adopted a realistically historical view of movements which have had positive effects both on those who have moved and for their communities of origin and destination.²³ This work comments on how attention has been diverted away from movements which are historically established as well as continuing, diverse and directionally complex (e.g. associated with trading and land colonisation). It argues that seasonal contrasts in the environment in the interior of West Africa were used positively by people in the economically marginal northern areas, to integrate agricultural production there in the wet season with other ways of earning income during the dry season, either at home or by moving elsewhere. All of these aspects of movement may be viewed as helping positively to spread those values which have been vital in stimulating development in many parts of West Africa.

Movements can thus be seen as phenomena with roots in traditional custom and practice, which change and develop according to challenges, potential and opportunities. From time immemorial, people have been redistributing themselves, temporarily and permanently, voluntarily and under some degree of pressure. Circumstances change, new opportunities are presented, some constraints are removed and new ones introduced. The human capacity to adjust to change is based very much on experience from the past; people are not inexorably constrained by systems over which they have no influence, they do have some control, and respond by literally 'voting with their feet'.²⁴

²³ A L Mabogunje, Regional Mobility and Resource Development in West Africa, Toronto and London: McGill and Queen's University Press, 1972.

It is clear from the above examples that explanations of the causes, nature and consequences of movements are widely divergent. Evaluation and direct comparison of these differences are difficult to make since each explanation is concerned with a particular type of mobility, and often with mobility in a particular area. For example, circulation in South-Central Africa developed within a pluralistic colonial administrative and economic system, and was thus much more controlled than the traditional forms of circulation in West Africa which accommodated themselves to economic developments attendant on colonial/capitalist contact. These various approaches to and explanations of movement influence the nature of research, the results obtained, and the conclusions drawn for policy. Any study must face problems of objectivity, with constraints from ideological, disciplinary and personal biases, but there is a need to find ways through the present maze of conflicting viewpoints on movements. Otherwise, as has been said of theories of development and underdevelopment, there is the risk of being lost '... in a never-never land of ideological polarisation, conceptual sterility and empirical ignorance'.

A wide diversity of opinions is intellectually stimulating but can also be confusing, and this confusion does little to help those who have to make and implement practical policy.²⁵

Features of movement

Long-standing views that the majority of societies in the Third World were traditionally relatively static and immobile have been countered by recent evidence. This has emphasised considerable fluidity and movement, as already mentioned in relation to West Africa, of both spontaneous and an involuntary nature. These movements may be both advantageous and disadvantageous, but with the balance in favour of the former. Contemporary movements need to be understood in the broad context of evolution over time. Movements in the past were predominantly within rural areas; the high volume of movement from rural to urban areas is comparatively recent in most parts of the Third World.²⁶

²⁴ K Swindell, 'Family farms and migrant labour: the Strange Farmers of the Gambia', Canadian Journal of African Studies (12) 1978, pp 3-17, and 'Seasonal agricultural circulation: the Strange Farmers of the Gambia', in R M Prothero and M Chapman (eds), op. cit., pp 178-204.

²⁵ J K Hart, 'Migration and the opportunity structure: a Ghanaian case study', in S Amin (ed), op. cit., pp 321-24.

In both rural and urban areas, populations continue to grow through substantial rates of natural increase. Despite out-movements from the former, rural depopulation is occurring only in very limited areas. While inflows of people contribute substantially to urban growth, this contribution is less than that from natural increase; the large proportions of urban populations in the younger reproductive age groups produce rates of fertility much in excess of those of mortality. Efforts to control the growth of urban populations must thus concentrate on this natural element as well as on in-movement from rural areas.

In Latin America, Asia and Africa the volume of movements of rural people is large, within rural areas as well as from them to the towns. Rural-rural movements are influenced by the negative pressures of land shortages and of poor quality land, and by the positive attractions of more and better quality land or by the possibilities of higher wages in areas of more advanced rural development. In some instances movement involves individual or small-scale pioneer colonisation of unoccupied or sparsely populated lands; as in the dry zone of Sri Lanka where population growth since 1945 has been twice that for the whole country. In others, people are moved to government-organised settlement/colonisation schemes in which varying amounts of infrastructure and support are provided (in Amazonia, peninsular Malaysia, Indonesia and the Philippines).²⁷ In general those who move are among the more enterprising and sometimes have experience outside rural areas; those who move to colonisation schemes in Latin America, while having a rural background, are not always peasants.

Apart from movements which result in permanent rural resettlement there are many rural-rural movements which comprise seasonal or periodic circulation and supply labour requirements at times of ²⁶ W H McNeill, 'Human migration in historical perspective', Population and Development Review 10(1) 1984, pp 1-18.

²⁷ R J Pryor (ed), Migration and development in South-East Asia: a demographic perspective, Kuala Lumpur: Oxford University Press, 1979.

G W Jones and H V Richter (eds) op. cit.

L J A Mougeot, Alternative migration targets and Brazilian Amazonia's closing frontier, Centre for Development Studies, University College of Swansea, No. 18, Norwich Geobooks, 1984.

J Hardjono, 'Transmigration: looking to the future', Bulletin of Indonesian Economic Studies (22) 1986, pp 28-53.

POPULATIONS ON THE MOVE

maximum demand in areas of more advanced agricultural development. Relatively little is known about such mobility in Latin America but it would seem to be quantitatively important in Central America, the Caribbean, Brazil, Colombia and parts of Argentina. It has been increasingly revealed in parts of South and Southeast Asia and in the Pacific.²⁸ In Africa seasonal labour movements have been most distinctive in West Africa. There, the east-west orientation of regions of contrasting environment, with various kinds and levels of agricultural development and varying labour demands, has predisposed the area to north-south movements between them. They also occur in other parts of the continent.²⁹ Sometimes they involve the crossing of international boundaries, especially in West Africa, exposing those who move to increased pressures and risks of exploitation since their movements may be considered as illegal.

The major focus of attention in recent decades has been on rural-urban movements, to the detriment of investigation and understanding of movements in rural areas. Rural-urban movements are much more visible, contributing to high rates of urban growth and with their consequent impact on employment and the demands they make on urban services. The urban proportion of populations is increasing. In Latin American countries it is generally more than 50 per cent, higher than in Asia (25 per cent) and much higher than for most countries in Africa south of the Sahara (generally less than 20 per cent). The earlier and longer colonial experience in Latin America partly accounts for this distinction. Urban places were established as centres of colonial administration, commerce and religion from the earlier parts of the sixteenth century. The rural areas were subject to major land expropriation into large estates, for the production of crops for markets controlled by the colonial powers. Colonial capitalism was firmly established and those dispossessed of their land moved to expanding urban places. Though colonial rule came to an end a century or more ago, and despite various land reform measures, land alienation in large holdings continues and land scarcity and landlessness are still endemic. In many of these large holdings productivity is low, and often when ²⁸ R D Bedford, 'The variety and forms of population mobility in Southeast Asia and Melanesia', and other papers in G W Jones and H V Richter (eds) op. cit., pp 17-50.

S Goldstein, 'Circulation in Southeast Asia', in M Chapman and R M Prothero (eds), Circulation in Population Movement: Substance and Concepts from the Melanesian Case, London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1985, pp 377-406.

²⁹ R M Prothero, 'The context of circulation in West Africa', in M Chapman and R M Prothero (eds), 1985, op. cit., pp 407-28.

improvements are made to raise productivity they result in reduced requirements for agricultural labour. Some of these longer-term socio-economic-political factors are enhanced in certain areas in the shorter term by environmental pressures (in the drought areas of north-east Brazil), and in others by political instability (in Nicaragua and El Salvador). Rural-urban flows continue, most of them involving permanent migration.³⁰

Compared with Latin America the colonial experience in Africa was more recent and of shorter duration. African countries are still in the process of adjustment to political independence and related socio-economic changes which have not been experienced in any of these countries for more than three decades. Colonial impacts in Africa were politically and economically varied with large land expropriations and settlement by Europeans in some countries and not in others. Land shortages and landlessness have been less immediate factors influencing rural-urban movements in Africa than in Latin America. With the notable exceptions of indigenous urbanism in some parts of North and West Africa, African urban centres were recent creations for colonial administrative and commercial purposes.³¹ Colonial conditions influenced rural-urban movements more in some parts than in others. In South-Central Africa the economic and administrative requirements of European settler populations promoted the development of 'Africans for towns rather than towns for Africans'. In these circumstances a sharp dichotomy was established between rural and urban areas; people came from the former for limited periods to work in the latter and then were obliged to return. This situation has continued until recently in South Africa under the system of influx control, while the relaxation of control with independence in Zimbabwe has led to a sharp increase in the population of its capital, Harare. In those parts of West Africa with indigenous urbanism there is not the same sharp dichotomy between rural and urban areas; one is seen in continuum with or as an extension of the other people move with ease in both directions.

The intermediary position of South and Southeast Asia in the proportion of the population which is urban reflects both traditional ³⁰ R. W. Fox, Urban growth trends in Latin America, Inter-American Development Bank, Washington DC, 1975.

R. Skeldon, 'The evolution of migration patterns during urbanization in Peru', Geographical Review (67) 1977, pp 394-411.

D. Bitterwort and J. K. Chance, Latin American Urbanization, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1981.

³¹ A. G. Connor, The African City, London: Hutchinson, 1983.

POPULATIONS ON THE MOVE

urbanism and the colonial experience. There is a diversity of circumstances which makes generalisation difficult. In Southeast Asia there is evidence of a spectrum of movements from circulation to permanent migration in both rural and urban areas and between them. Movements were in the past perceived largely as migration and only recently has research identified commuting and circulation which are similar to those in Africa.³² In India, with a relatively well-developed urban system, the dominance of rural-urban movements has been replaced by urban-urban movements. Cities of regional and national importance have markedly more extensive fields from which migrants are drawn.³³

Movements from rural areas into towns are accomplished through a variety of complex processes. Where the urban hierarchy is well-developed, movement may be of a step or stage nature, migrants progressing from rural areas through smaller to larger towns and possibly ultimately to the larger cities. These step or stage processes have positive advantages since they provide opportunities for the progressive acquisition of skills which are required for urban employment and for adjusting to life in urban places. They may be inter-generational in their time sequence. They would seem to have been identified most clearly in Latin America and Asia where urban systems are more developed than in Africa. However, studies in several large cities in Latin America (Monterrey, Bogotá and Santiago) and Asia (Bombay, Bangkok) have shown that moves to them may be direct, often by people from nearby areas, which fact is indicative of the distance factor which is available in its effect but may be a deterrent to movement. On the whole, in Latin America, Africa and Asia little is known about movements to small and intermediate-sized cities or their functions in migration systems.³⁴

Migrants to towns are generally in the younger active age groups and have higher levels of education and skills than those who remain in rural areas. There is some evidence of a positive relationship between levels of education within areas of origin and the amount of out-movement which occurs.³⁵ Those in rural areas with higher standards of education are generally economically better off, they can afford to move and their skills, though limited, offer some prospect of employment in urban areas. The poorest cannot afford to move. These relationships are more clearly demonstrated where literacy and educational levels have been more advanced, as for example in Latin America as compared with Africa where until recent times many of those involved in rural-urban movements are contributing strength rather than skill in their areas of destination.

³² S Goldstein, Circulation in the context of total mobility in Southeast Asia, Paper No. 53, Honolulu: East-West Population Institute, 1978.

³³ M K Prem and J A I Tom, City characteristics, migration and urban development policies in India, Paper No. 92, Honolulu: East-West Population Institute.

³⁴ D A Rondinelli, 'Intermediate cities in developing countries: a comparative analysis of their demographic and socio-economic characteristics', Third World Planning Review 4(4) 1982, pp 357-86.

The selection of those who move operates naturally to discriminate in favour of the younger, the more active, the more educationally advanced and the more economically advantaged. However, discrimination may also be an artefact of investigations. Past attention to those who move has been directed at males, and heads of households who are usually male, and little has been given to women other than as dependents of men. Within the last two decades women have been identified as important in movements in their own right and they have been studied more specifically.³⁶ In Africa movement has been male-dominated, but women migrants have been important for some time in Latin America and they are of increasing importance in Asia. These changes are associated with the enhancement of the status of women, particularly through the advancement of female education. Women are coming to play an increasingly important role in the service, manufacturing and informal sectors in urban centres of the Third World. Their movements have causes and consequences which differ from those of men, owing to differences in women's social and economic roles in the family and the household, and within the economies of their areas of origin and destination.

Evidence from most parts of the Third World indicates that both women and men have distinct preferences for urban as against rural life, notwithstanding the problems that have to be faced in towns. In Latin America, Asia and Africa they are not deterred by high levels of urban ³⁵ H N Barnum and R H Sabot, 'Education, employment probabilities and rural-urban migration in Tanzania', Oxford Bulletin of Economics and Statistics 39(2) 1977, pp 109-26.

W T S Gould, 'Migration and development in Western Kenya 1971-82: a retrospective analysis of primary school leavers', Africa 55(3) 1985, pp 262-85.

³⁶ E Boserup, Women's role in economic development, London: Allen and Unwin, 1970.

J A Herold, 'Female migration in Chile: types of moves and socio-economic characteristics', Demography (16) 1978, pp 257-58.

'Women in migration', Special issue International Migration Review 18(1) 1984.

W Ezzard, 'Migrants and mothers: case studies from Botswana', Journal of South African Studies (11) 1985, pp 258-80.

POPULATIONS ON THE MOVE

unemployment and underemployment. The disadvantages are outweighed by prospective opportunities for improved incomes which may be realised only in the long-term, together with the advantages of urban services and amenities. Although it may take time to achieve improved incomes there are shorter-term means of support for newcomers to towns, through relatives and kinsmen who are already established there and through employment in informal sectors of the urban economy. Services and amenities are under great strain, with demand greatly in excess of supply, but nonetheless there is better access to them than there would be in rural areas.

Apart from the difficulties of finding employment, housing is the most acute problem for migrants arriving in towns and particularly in the larger cities. The basic nature of these problems is common to all Third World countries, but they have received more attention in Latin America where they have been recognised for longer. Migrants to Latin American cities have tended to concentrate in the central areas and in squatter and shanty settlements occupying interstitial and peripheral locations. Though previously viewed in a negative fashion, more positive attitudes have recently been taken of these settlements in Latin America and elsewhere; they help to meet immediate pressing needs for shelter and can be progressively improved through self-help schemes with basic services being provided.³⁷

Urban areas in the Third World certainly display a great capacity to absorb and support newcomers for rural areas. Where rural-urban relationships are close and long-standing, as in parts of West Africa, they assist those who come to cities for short stays and those intending long-term stays in the early stages after first arrival. Towns in the West African Sahel have demonstrated this absorptive capacity for people forced out of rural areas by drought in the last decades.

Particular ethnic and regional groups may be significant in their propensity to move, and members of these groups sometimes follow particular occupations in the places to which they move. Relationships based on ethnicity, regional identity, family and kinship are important in assisting in adjustments to urban life. Ethnic and regional enclaves, where people of similar origins and characteristics concentrate, have been features of urban places in Latin America, Africa and Asia, ³⁷ J F C Turner, Housing by People, New York: 1977.

D Drakakis-Smith, Urban Housing and the Development Process, New York: St. Martin's Press, 1980.

P Ward (ed), Self-help Housing: A Critique, London: Mansell, 1982.

though their distinctiveness is probably not now as strong as it was in the past.³⁸ They have provided new urban migrants with an environment in which their economic and socio-psychological problems could be mitigated. Information is received from relatives and friends and perceptions of urban life are formed before moves are made, and from them come economic and moral support during periods of initial adjustment. These adjustment mechanisms are often formalised in ethnic and 'home-place' unions which migrants join when they move to towns.³⁹ Migrants to towns have been identified as economically and psychologically unstable and sources of social and political disruption. However, the evidence on the whole does not support these stereotypes. The positive contributions that squatter settlements and mechanisms for socio-economic adjustment make for migrants are now recognised. Some evidence points to the possession by those who move, whether in rural areas or to urban places, of the capacity for self-improvement, and suggests that such movements may contribute in the longer-term to upward social mobility through economic advancement. Whether these improvements occur at the expense of non-migrants or of the total socio-economic system is debatable.

The nature of the impact of rural-urban movements on rural areas of origin may be both positive and negative and is by no means always clear. Movements may remove surplus population and relieve limited resources but, in selecting the better, more active and more enterprising elements, may have detrimental effects. Evidence from Africa, India, Southeast Asia and the Pacific shows that migrants remit substantial proportions of incomes and other resources to their places of origin, and that these will vary with the types of movement which have taken place.⁴⁰ Interpretations vary as to whether remittances change income ³⁸ B du Toit and H I Safa, Migration and Identity: Implications for Ethnic Development and Political Conflict, The Hague: Mouton, 1975.

E Schildkrout, People of the Zongo: the transformation of urban identities in Ghana, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1978.

M Chapman (ed), Mobility and identity in the Island Pacific, Special issue, Pacific Viewpoint 26(1) 1985.

³⁹ K Little, West African urbanization: a study of voluntary associations in social change, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 1965.

J Gugler and W G Flanagan, Urbanization and social change in West Africa, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1978.

G Krause, 'Economic adjustment of migrants in the city: the Jakarta experience', International Migration Review 13(1) 1979, pp 46-70.

G Martine, 'Adaptation of migrants or survival of the fittest: a Brazilian case', Journal of Developing Areas 14(1) 1979, pp 23-41.

⁴⁰ M Lipton, 'Migration from rural areas of poor countries: the impact on rural productivity and income distribution', World Development, 1980, pp 1-24.

distribution patterns in places of origin. They may be used largely for conspicuous expenditure and not for investment. In the Caribbean, they are said to undermine commitments to agriculture in some of the islands.⁴¹ Conversely, 'migrant unions' in Nigerian towns and elsewhere subscribe to improvements in their rural home places, and migrants returning to rural areas either temporarily or permanently may contribute positive feedback in the effecting of socio-economic change. In West Java it has been found that village households with members who had moved out had higher incomes than households without migrants. The short and long-term impacts of remittances are probably different and an understanding of these will come only with long-term studies of comparable empirical information, which have not yet been undertaken.

Clearly the flows of people, money and goods indicate the importance of the continuous interaction between places of migrant origin and destination. These links need to be taken into account in approaching the investigation of movement. An increasing number of studies, mainly at small scale for the data available do not permit otherwise, are documenting links between communities of origin and destination, and indicate the bi- and multi-local nature of the socio-economic structures which encompass them. The destinations to which people move become in part extensions of their places of origin, whatever the cultural-social-political circumstances of these destinations may be.⁴² Links continue to exist not only when there is circulation but also when permanent migration may seem to have taken place.

These views run counter to ideas which have been expressed on the likely evolution of movements over time. One explanation of labour

J Connell et al, Migration From Rural Areas: The Evidence From Village Studies, New Delhi: Oxford University Press, 1976.

A S Oberai and H K M Singh, 'Migrant remittances and rural development', International Labour Review (119) 1980, pp 229-41.

G J Hugo, Population mobility and wealth transfers in Indonesia and other Third World countries, Paper No. 87, Honolulu: East-West Population Institute, 1983.

J Connell, Remittances and rural development: migration, dependence and inequality in the South Pacific, Development Studies Centre, Canberra: Australian National University.

⁴¹ R A Pastor (ed), Migration and Development in the Caribbean: The Unexplored Connection, Boulder, Colorado: Westview Press, 1986.

J D Momsen, 'Migration and rural development in the Caribbean', Tijdschrift voor Economische en Sociale Geografie 77(1) 1986, pp 52-8.

⁴² D Ryan, 'Bi-locality and movement between village and town: Toaripi, Papua New Guinea', in M. Chapman and R. M. Prothero (eds), 1985 op. cit., pp. 251-68.

S J Watts, 'A model of the rural settlement process, the community and population mobility in the Ilorin area of Nigeria', Tijdschrift voor Economische en Sociale Geografie (76) 1985, pp 213-22.

circulation has implied that it will cease when there is a balance between counterpoised sets of influences which are operating centripetally and centrifugally, in the transition between a basically rural and a predominantly urban society.⁴³ A similar view of the transitory nature of circulatory movements has been set out in a hypothesis which views circulation as occurring in the process of modernisation.⁴⁴ This hypothesis assumes that the experience of the developed countries will be repeated in the Third World; that societies evolve through four phases of mobility which are characterised by decreasing circulation and increasing migration. It takes little account of circulatory movements and related linkages which existed before the onset of modernisation processes in the developing countries coincident with the colonial and post-colonial/independence periods. Nor does it consider the fact that different types of movement are occurring coincidentally and not discretely in either time or place.

There is evidence to suggest that bi- and multi-local structures and the processes associated with them have traditional indigenous roots and that they will continue into the future. A theoretical model of the circular process in rural-urban movements, applied to case studies in South-East Asia, has suggested that urbanisation in the Third World will take much longer than might have been anticipated from the experience of the developed countries.⁴⁵ Evidence from Nairobi has shown that increasing periods of urban residence are not necessarily accompanied by the emergence of an urban proletariat, which depends entirely on urban wages and which has increasingly tenuous links with rural areas of origin. A common pattern is that of 'one family, two households', one in the rural home area and the other in an urban place. By working diligently in the latter but at the same time retaining a place in the former, it is possible for families to maximise their incomes and their welfare and to avert or minimise risk. The employment of such a general strategy of risk avoidance has been noted to occur widely—in the South Pacific, in Central America and elsewhere in tropical Africa. People involved in inter-island movement in the Pacific maintain rights to land in their home islands, and a Mexican study has shown recently how peasant households survive through 'relay migration', in which the father and, later, the children leave to obtain employment in towns in order to enable the family to continue in agriculture and to reproduce itself.⁴⁶ In Northern Nigeria a systems approach to population movement examined the responses of farmers to drought in the 1970s and showed that their goals—to survive in the face of risk, to accumulate wealth and to achieve status—were sought and attained through structuring and maximising various opportunities in home places and elsewhere. Movement was one of the options available, and the study concluded that 'The spatial fragmentation of this opportunity structure, and the nature of the risks involved, lies at the root of the bi-local lifestyle which is becoming common among African populations'.⁴⁷

⁴³ J C Mitchell, op. cit. 1959 and op. cit. 1985.

⁴⁴ W Zelinsky, 'The hypothesis of the mobility transition', Geographical Review (61): 1971, pp 219-49, and 'The demographic transition: changing patterns of migration', in International Union for the Scientific Study of Population, Population science in the service of mankind, Liège: 1979, pp 165-189.

⁴⁵ B G McGee, 'Rural-urban mobility in South and Southeast Asia: different formulations, different answers', in W. H. McNeill and R S Adams (eds), Human Migration Patterns and Policies, Bloomington and London: Indiana University Press, 1979, pp 199-224.

Money earned away from rural home places, and particularly in urban areas, confers benefit on recipient households in the former, ensuring not only their basic needs but sometimes their very survival.

Spatial fragmentation and bi-locality continue even when migration and a permanent change of residence occurs. The pivot of circulation can shift from a rural to an urban location, from which movements are made periodically back to a rural home place. The purpose of these movements may be primarily social, but it may also be economic and even political as when town-dwellers return to be counted in a census or to register their voice in the places from which they originate.

Futures for migrants

Movements may be viewed positively, as responding to regional disparities with the more enterprising people improving themselves by moving to more dynamic regions; or negatively, as emphasising regional disparities with bias in favour of urban areas, and with little investment in rural areas resulting in low agricultural productivity, insufficient food production and the need to import food, even though there is enough land to grow the food required. Whatever view is held there are no simple policy solutions, and policies which are available are limited in their effectiveness. Taking the varying viewpoints into account it has been suggested that policies may be either directly intentional in their ⁴⁶ L. Arizpe, 'Relay migration and the survival of the peasant household', in J. Balau (ed), Why People Move, Paris, UNESCO Press, 1981, pp 187-210.

⁴⁷ M. J. Mortimore, 'Framework for population mobility: the perception of opportunities in Nigeria', in J. I. Clarke and L. A. Kosinska (eds), op. cit., 1982, pp 50-57.

influence on movement or may influence it in a less direct fashion. The following are major strategies which may be employed:⁴⁸

- 1) Stop movements out of rural areas.
- 2) Redirect movements within rural areas, particularly to 'frontier' areas which require people for their development.
- 3) Redirect urban migrants from large cities to intermediate-size urban 'growth poles'.
- 4) Prevent migrants from entering large cities or discourage them from staying.
- 5) Accept what is happening and accommodate to it in both rural and urban areas.

Measures which relate to these strategies in the rural areas include land reform, measures to increase income, and community development to improve service manufacturers. Experience indicates that there have been limited successes and many failures. The 'green revolution' in India has benefited those of the farmers who were already better off and able to acquire the inputs which enhanced their economic status. In Africa the experience of Tanzania and Mozambique in reorganising and redistributing their rural populations has been variable. The ujamaa villageisation policies in the former have improved and extended rural infrastructures but have done little if anything to improve agricultural productivity and rural incomes.⁴⁹

Colonisation and resettlement schemes involve fundamental changes in both social and economic life-styles and therefore make great demands upon settlers and those organising them. These are evident in a range of schemes in different countries—in West Malaysia, in the terai of Nepal and in the Mahaweli project in Sri Lanka. The Malaysian ⁴⁸ A B Simmons et al, Social change and internal migration: a review of research findings from Africa, Asia and Latin America, Ottawa: International Development Research Centre, 1977.

S Findley, Planning for internal migration: a review of issues and policies in developing countries, Bureau of Census, Washington DC, 1977.

S A Abumere op. cit. 1981, pp 421–33.

A S Oberai, 'State policies and internal migration in Asia', International Labour Review 120(2) 1981, pp 231–44.

P Peek and G Standing (eds), State policies and migration studies in Latin America and the Caribbean, London: Croom Helm, 1982.

A S Oberai (ed), State policies and internal migration, London: Croom Helm, 1983.

R J Fuchs, op. cit. 1983.

⁴⁹ P Collier et al, Labour and poverty in rural Tanzania: ujamaa and rural development in the United Republic of Tanzania, Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1986.

MGM da Araujo, 'Communal villages and the distribution of rural population in the People's Republic of Mozambique', in J. I Clarke et al., (eds), Population and Development Projects in Africa, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press 1985.

POPULATIONS ON THE MOVE

experience shows that land needs may be met at the time of resettlement, but that landlessness may occur subsequently for members of succeeding generations. The prospects for successful 'frontier' or 'pioneer' settlement are limited not only by the availability and suitability of land. Transmigration in Indonesia, from densely populated Java to sparsely populated Sumatra and other islands, has presented those who move with a range of health hazards which they have not had to face previously, and settlement in Amazonia involves conflicts of interest with existing sparse aboriginal populations. In Ethiopia the forced resettlement of large numbers of people has still to be assessed but in its progress has caused considerable infringements of human rights.

All rural development schemes will be costly if they are to provide both economic incentives and a social infrastructure which will retain people on the land, as are schemes to provide the same facilities in small and intermediate size towns and cities. Much attention has recently been devoted to smaller towns as alternative destinations to metropolises for migrant flows from rural areas, but relatively little is known about their functions in systems of movement. Sri Lanka is an unusual example, displaying a pattern of decentralised urbanisation with the highest rates of growth of urban population occurring in the small towns during the greater part of this century. This has resulted from a continuing encouragement of peasant agriculture and of small urban centres based on commerce and trade, with an accompanying policy of decentralised industrialisation. These measures have limited differences between rural and urban areas, and checked the development of extreme urban primacy in the capital city, Colombo.⁵⁰ In contrast, India, which in planning in the first two decades after independence concentrated on the industrial development of large cities, has now recognised the need for a better balance and greater complementarity between rural and urban areas, and for smaller towns to be geared to the needs of their rural hinterlands.⁵¹

Attempts to develop disincentives to urban living, by removing shanty towns and squatter settlements in Latin American and African cities, have met with opposition, with reoccupation and rebuilding after forced expulsion and demolition, and with eventual acceptance by urban authorities that they should remain and be upgraded. Attempts to return urban migrants from metropolises and from large cities to smaller urban places and rural areas have had little success other than by the exercise of considerable duress.

⁵⁰ D Abeysekera, Urbanization and the Growth of Small Towns in Sri Lanka 1901-1971, Paper No 67, Honolulu: East-West Population Institute, 1980.

⁵¹ India Planning Commission, Sixth Five-Year Plan 1980-85, New Delhi: Planning Commission, 1981.

In the 1960s Cuba successfully redirected population away from Havana, but such measures require the exercise of considerable coordination and control which Tanzania, for example, has been unable to achieve in the case of its main city, Dar es Salaam. De-urbanisation of the most extreme kind was undertaken in the south of Vietnam in the second half of the 1970s, with the reduction of the population of Ho Chi-Minh City (formerly Saigon) from three million to one million. However, it is unlikely that many countries would wish to resort to comparable coercive measures.⁵²

In any discussion of population distribution and movement and measures for their control and the integration of rural and urban areas, China is a special case in many respects and requires consideration for the lessons which she may provide for other developing countries. It is special in its size and diversity and in its political ideology and related economic structures—a population of over 1000 million, ethnically varied and distributed over a great range of contrasting environments, subject to a strict regime which is committed to development that will in principle reduce if not eradicate socio-economic inequalities. At the time of the 1982 census four-fifths of China's population were rural and 200 million were urban, with major differences in their respective qualities of life. There is great potential for massive urban growth and therefore concern that this should not be too rapid and that it should be controlled in quantity and in distribution.⁵³

In the rural areas development to increase agricultural production and income is based on 'the responsibility system'. Established in 1979, this system involves contracts between the state, the communes and individual households to meet production quotas with improved efficiency. A consequence of this system is to create surplus rural ⁵² A B Simmons, 'Slowing metropolitan growth in Asia: policies, programs and results', Population and Development Review 5(1) 1979, pp 87-104, and A review and evaluation of attempts to contain migration to selected urban centers and regions, in UN Department of International Economic and Social Affairs, 'Population distribution policies in development planning' Population Studies No. 75, New York: United Nations, 1981, pp. 87-100. N Thrift and D Forbes, The price of war: urbanization in Vietnam 1954-1985, London: Allen and Unwin, 1986.

⁵³ This section China is based with acknowledgement on S and A Goldstein, Population mobility in the People's Republic of China, Paper No 95, Honolulu: East-West Population Institute, 1985.

population. Policies are thus directed to ensure that this surplus should not flood into the larger cities and that population movements and urbanisation should effectively complement one another. There are restrictions on movements into the larger cities from rural areas and from small towns; but at the same time there is relative freedom of movement between places of similar size and the encouragement of movement leading to the growth of towns and small cities, including the development of new towns. Small urban places oriented to their adjacent areas are seen as having an important function in the promotion of modernisation.

China possesses means of implementing policies formulated to achieve the above goals. Through the Chinese household registration system, which records vital events, education and employment, there is control over people's access to grain rations, jobs and housing. A permit is required for a permanent change of place of residence. Notwithstanding this control there is considerable movement; although no question was asked in the 1982 census that would determine this, there is indirect evidence of there being more than 100 million mobile persons. Despite restrictions on permanent migration, there has been a great increase in temporary mobility (which may vary in length of stay from days to years) which is specifically recognised and encouraged in planning policies. It has been described as a 'flexible adjustment mechanism' which confers benefits without imposing undue burdens.

Some of the surplus rural population becomes engaged in non-agricultural activities in urban places other than large cities; it is employed in construction, service provision and the sale of agricultural produce and rural crafts in relatively free market conditions in smaller towns. The latter develop positive rural-urban linkages which are neither pressured nor parasitic. Without controls, the amount of movement would be much greater, but with some degree of freedom the controls have permitted movements to take place which can contribute to the achievement of integrated national goals.

The Chinese experience is unique and not readily transferable in total, even to other centrally planned economies. In the absence of central planning of population movements and population distribution or the means to implement policy relating to them, what may be said for a strategy which would largely accept the existing circumstances and attempt to accommodate to them in the future? It could not be a laissez-faire approach which would leave the future entirely to the operation of free market forces. There is the need for a variety of active and positive measures which can be taken to improve the conditions of people who move both in rural and in urban areas. They are at a variety of scales, ranging from global to individual, and would involve official, international, intercontinental, national, regional and local bodies, together with non-governmental organisations which also range from international to local in their scope.

However, the prospects for improvements at these various scales are not particularly encouraging. Major structural changes can be conceived at the international level which would fundamentally alter patterns of economic development to better meet the needs and improve the prospects of migrants. Along these lines it is possible to think of changes which could affect the present massive outflow of migrants from Mexico who enter the USA for the most part illegally. However, the reality of effecting such changes is another matter. At a sub-continental scale, where there are groupings of states to facilitate political and economic developments, the results have not been strikingly successful. The Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) has done little to alter and ameliorate the circumstances of migrants moving between the member states. Rather there has been deterioration, with major expulsions of alien migrants from Ghana and Nigeria in particular, but also from other countries, during the last decade.⁵⁴ In Southern Africa the Frontline States, despite their opposition to the apartheid policies of the Republic of South Africa, have reduced but failed to stop the movement of their citizens, illegally and otherwise, to the employment opportunities which are available in the Republic.⁵⁵

Changes within countries require the will and determination of governments to redress imbalances between rural and urban areas which are largely to the detriment of the former.⁵⁶ The decline of investment in agriculture and in rural infrastructure is common in the economies not only of less well-endowed countries in the Third World

⁵⁴ O O Fafowura, 'On the expulsion of illegal migrants from Nigeria', Population and Development Review 9(2) 1983, pp 391-92.

A Adebayo, 'Ghanaian migrants to Nigeria: causes and consequences', Migration Today (13) 1985, pp 29-32.

⁵⁵ F Wilson, Migrant labour in South Africa, Johannesburg: South African Council of Churches, 1972.

C Colclough, 'Some aspects of labour use in Southern Africa', Institute of Development Studies Bulletin 12(4) 1980, pp 29-39.

F de Vries, 'Recent trends of black migration to South Africa', Journal of Modern African Studies (23) 1985, pp 667-702.

⁵⁶ M Lippin, Why poor people stay poor: urban bias in developing countries, London: Temple Smith, 1977.

POPULATIONS ON THE MOVE

but also of those with significant economic resources. In Nigeria during the oil boom of the 1970s the neglect of rural interests and of support for agricultural production was so great that despite ample reserves of land the country has become a net importer of food and has lost its previously important revenues from agricultural exports. Urban bias has accelerated rural-urban movements and those who remain in the countryside produce largely for their own needs.

When there is the will to change, the nature of that change is of major importance. Experience in many countries has shown that when there is investment in prestigious and costly large-scale agricultural projects they often function inefficiently. Only limited numbers of people benefit from them and they may have detrimental effects on large numbers of people who are not directly involved. Consequent on these negative experiences has been an increasing concern to develop smaller-scale projects which spread the resources available for investment, are more labour intensive and involve within their organisation the small groups and individuals which they affect.⁵⁷

The need to reduce urban bias and to benefit rural areas must be balanced so as not to lead to the neglect of towns. Continuing improvement in urban economic opportunities and social infrastructure is of paramount importance for existing urban populations and for the additions to them which will come from natural increase as well as from further in-movements of people. Investment in alternative growth poles through the development and expansion of smaller urban centres needs to be organised so that they integrate in national and regional contexts, as in China.

There is great virtue in small-scale approaches to the problems of migrants. Notwithstanding the indigenous support systems for newcomers, there are circumstances in which small groups and individuals find themselves in difficult if not desperate circumstances, comparable to those of people fleeing from political disruption and environmental catastrophe. In general, these circumstances are much less obvious than they are among people affected by disaster. To establish real need would be much more difficult. Where such need does exist it should be met with relief measures which are not only immediate and short-term but which also provide for the future through longer-term investment for self-sustaining economic development. Such assistance might be channelled through existing support systems—self-help groups and ethnic unions—likely to increase its efficacy. These systems may also be helped to maintain and develop contacts between the places of origin and the destinations of those who move, thus conferring mutual socio-economic-psychological benefits.

⁵⁷ P Richards, Indigenous agricultural revolution: ecology and food production in West Africa, London: Hutchinson, 1965.

While those who move primarily for economic reasons face similar problems to those faced by political and environmental 'refugees', the pressures which produce these problems operate on different time-scales. For the former they tend to be cumulative rather than immediately catastrophic and are thus likely to be less obvious and obtrusive and more insidious. Economic migrants are enormously resourceful in coping with the difficulties associated with their moves and the problems which they have to confront at their destinations. They cope positively and often ingeniously through individual and group efforts. Any assistance for them should be very carefully devised in form and application so as to enhance these positive efforts rather than stifling or attempting to replace them.

Why 'Third World'?: origin, definition and usage

The aim of this article is limited; namely, a general consideration of the term 'Third World' in its early and current usage and an attempt to discover the origin and authorship of the term. I first tried to do this in an article in the inaugural issue of Third World Quarterly in January 1979 and the discussion was then taken up by four other academic writers. An immediate and critical response came from Peter Worsley (University of Manchester) in 'How many worlds?' (Third World Quarterly I(2) April 1979) and this, in turn, encouraged S D Muni (Jawaharlal Nehru University, New Delhi) to submit a third contribution, 'The Third World: concept and controversy' (Third World Quarterly I(3) July 1979). Joseph Love (University of Illinois) then took Worsley to task in his article, "'Third World': a response to Professor Worsley' (Third World Quarterly 2(2) April 1980), and the discussion was concluded by Grant McCall (University of New South Wales) in 'Four worlds of experience and action' (Third World Quarterly 2(3) October 1980).

The first matter to be settled by the discussion was the origin of the term 'Third World'. I had suggested that it appeared to have originated with Alfred Sauvy in 1952, but Worsley brushed this aside: 'In the second edition of my The Third World (1967), I pointed out (p 302) that Claude Bourdet had used the term at least as early as April 1949 (citing John T Marcus' Neutralism and Nationalism in France. New York: Bookman Associates, 1958, p 33). Hence, Mr Wolf-Phillips' statement that Alfred Sauvy 'coined' the term in 1952 is incorrect. Who actually first coined and used it might be discoverable in Paris.' Muni did not contest the attribution to Sauvy, but Joseph Love firmly supports it: 'Alfred Sauvy, the French demographer and economic historian, did coin the term "Third World". Contrary to the assertions in Peter Worsley's article . . . John Marcus . . . does not say that Claude Bourdet originated the phrase, nor does Worsley himself even say this in the second edition of his The Third World . . .' Love gives the source of the term as in an article 'Trois Mondes, une planète' in L'Observateur (Paris) 14 August 1952, and draws attention to the book published by Sauvy's colleagues at the Institut National des Etudes Démographiques in 1956—Le Tiers Monde: Sous-développement et développement—which is dedicated to Sauvy and which credits Sauvy with introducing the term 'Third World' (p 369). My own investigations since the 1979–80 Third World Quarterly series of articles support the original attribution to Sauvy and the exact dating by Love.

In the first of three volumes titled Unité et diversité du tiers monde (Paris, 1980), Yves Lacoste gives an account of his correspondence with Sauvy concerning the origin of the term in Chapter I, 'Une Unité fondée sur quoi?', and in the section 'Le jeu de mots de Alfred Sauvy' says quite firmly: 'Tiers monde, ce fut d'abord en 1952 une formule imaginée par Alfred Sauvy', and discusses, as did Love, the August 1952 article in L'Observateur. That seems to be that, unless other candidates present themselves with as yet undiscovered conclusive evidence in their favour?

Leaving the provenance of 'Third World' as reasonably well established, what of its usage in the 1950s? The original analogy used by Sauvy was to the Tiers État and, as both Lacoste and Love point out, he was alluding to the 1789 oratory of the Abbé Sieyès—'What is the Third Estate? Everything. What has it been till now in the political order? Nothing. What does it want to be? Something.' The use of Tiers Monde in this analogical context would express ideas of 'neglect, exploitation and revolutionary potential' (Love). However, there was a second idea expressed in 'Third World'—that of 'non-alignment'.

As late as 1972, the term 'Third World' is not included in William Safire's The New Language of Politics among his dictionary-type entries. It does appear in the text, but under the entry 'Third Force': 'Strictly speaking, the phrase in English should be "Third World" following the French tiers monde, but "Third Force" is used more frequently.' Safire argues that tiers monde was originally popularised in France during 1947–49 to describe the parties that took their stance between the Gaullist Rassemblement du Peuple Français and the regime of the Fourth Republic (1946–58). During his presidency of the Fifth Republic, Charles de Gaulle used the phrase tiers monde to describe the role of a France independent of US foreign policy alliances. Safire also quotes a usage from the 1960s attributed to Max Frankel in the New York Times; writing about the involvement of the USA, Frankel commented, '... there is simply no meaningful Third Force around which to build. The United States' answer has been to encourage the transformation of the present military government ... into a regime that might eventually come to resemble a "Third Force".'

Safire offers as a working definition of tiers monde, 'Third Force . . . a weight added at the fulcrum of the balance of power; a group of nations, or an ideology, between the communist and the Western camps.' In this sense of political non-alignment, tiers monde was used by the leaders of the newly-independent nations in the 1950s—such as Kwame Nkrumah—when they called for the establishment of a bloc of uncommitted nations as a 'non-nuclear Third Force' between the East–West confrontation of the 'Cold War' period. Worsley and I are in agreement when he says: 'What the Third World originally was, then, is clear; it was the non-aligned world. It was also a world of poor countries . . .' and his The Third World (2nd edn 1967) and Three Worlds of Development by Irving Louis Horowitz (1966) should be consulted on this aspect of interpretation.

With the lessening of the tensions of the Cold War period and the creation of scores of new and independent sovereign states in the 1960s and early 1970s, the term 'Third Force' both takes on a new meaning and becomes less used; the term 'Third World'—going back to Love's interpretation of Sauvy's original usage—becomes more strongly associated with 'neglect, exploitation and revolutionary potential' than 'non-alignment'. Indeed, it is the very condition that the developing countries find themselves in that separates them from the former colonial powers. 'Non-alignment' becomes a positive force for the unity of the poor countries of the world, despite Lacoste's query 'Une Unité fondée sur quoi?'

The change in the use of 'Third Force' has four aspects: first, the confrontation was seen in the 1960s as between the 'rich countries' and the 'poor countries', the former also being referred to as 'industrialised' or 'developed'; second, the East–West confrontation was supplemented by a 'North–South' confrontation, the great majority of the poor countries lying in the southern hemisphere; third, the original East–West confrontation was retained in the gradual adoption of the term 'First World' to denote the industrialised developed market-economy countries (the 'capitalist countries' or 'the Western world') and the term 'Second World' to indicate the industrialised or industrialising centrally-directed economies (the 'socialist camp' or 'the Communist bloc'); and, fourth, the rather later introduction of the term 'Fourth World' to denote the least developed and chronically poor countries; this categorisation was perhaps encouraged by the World Bank economists who distinguished between 'low income developing countries' and 'middle income developing countries' in the early World

Bank World Development Reports (published annually since 1978). In 1979, this distinction would have placed Bangladesh (with an estimated GNP per capita of US$90, a life expectancy of forty-seven for the newly-born, an undocumented literacy rate, a 17.4 per cent annual inflation rate, and with 47 per cent of the population without access to a safe water supply) among the worst affected in the 'Fourth World'. Those in the 'Third World' would probably not feel over-privileged for that category was reserved for those with a GNP per capita of more than US$300 (for comparison, the GNP figure for the USA in 1979 was US$8520); Ghana, for example, had a 1979 GNP figure of US$380, a life expectancy of forty-eight, a literacy rate of 30 per cent, an inflation rate of 30.9 per cent, and 65 per cent of the population were without access to a safe water supply. The 1987 World Development Report has six categories: 'Low income economies' (where the GNP figures range from US$110-US$400); 'Lower middle-income economies' (US$401-US$1570); 'Upper middle-income economies' (US$1640-US$7420); 'High-income oil exporters' (US$7170-US$19,270); 'Industrial market economies' (US$4290-US$16,690); and 'Non-reporting non-member economies' (Albania, Angola, Bulgaria, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, German Democratic Republic, Korean Democratic Republic, Mongolia, USSR). Despite these euphemistic categorisations, the Report reveals that 86 countries have GNP figures of less than US$2000, that there are at least ninety-five countries worse off than Mexico, that Spain is twice as well off—in terms of GNP—than at least ninety-six other countries, and that the GNP of the United Arab Emirates is about 175 times that of Ethiopia (US$19,270 compared to US$110). The 1987 GNP figure for the USA is US$16,690.*

There is the obvious criticism that the 'Four Worlds' classifications are too crude when they are based solely on GNP relativities and such criteria (to select a few currently used) as 'least developed', 'developing', 'developed', 'non-industrialised', 'newly-industrialising', 'industrialised'. This point is taken up by Worsley, Muni and McCall in their Third World Quarterly articles and is a common enough observation. Few, however, would go so far as Shiva Naipaul in his article 'The myth of the Third World: a thousand million invisible men' (The Spectator (London) 18 May 1985):

The Third World is a form of bloodless universality that robs individuals and societies of their particularity . . . Blandly, to subsume, say, Ethiopia, India and Brazil under the one banner of Third Worldhood is absurd and denigrating as the old assertion that all Chinese look alike. People only look alike when you can't be bothered to look at them closely . . . It is a flabby Western concept lacking the flesh and blood of the actual . . . a Third World does not exist as such . . . it has no collective and consistent identity except in the newspapers and amid the pomp and splendour of international conferences . . . The idea of a Third World, despite its congenial simplicity, is too shadowy to be of any use . . .

* See statistical tables in Appendix to this article.

Like much polemical writing, the attraction of this article lies in its over-exaggeration and I tried to put another point of view to Naipaul in a brief and friendly correspondence which was abruptly terminated by his untimely death in July 1985. His long and detailed article should be read for its uncomfortable honesty, if for no other reason.

Now that we have some idea of how the term 'Third World' and its siblings 'First', 'Second' and 'Fourth' came into being, it might be useful to sketch out its general acceptance in developmental literature. Raúl Prebisch in his The Economic Development of Latin America and its Principal Problems (1950) was writing in pre-Sauvy days and the nearest he came to this kind of expression was when he spoke of ' . . . the industrialisation of the new countries' (p 2). Samir Amin presented his doctoral thesis on 20 June 1957 and, in discussing the term 'les pays sous-développés', observed that 'La définition généralement admise est que les économies sous-développées sont des économies de "misère", incapables d'assurer les "coûts de l'homme".' The term 'Third World', though probably known to Amin by then, would not have been well regarded in the austere circles of French scholarship. 'Under-developed' was a term used in the 1940s and Love points out that the UN study, Relative Prices of Exports and Imports of Underdeveloped Countries (1949), provided the empirical base for the 1950 work by Prebisch cited previously and H W Singer's theories of 'unequal exchange' published in the American Economic Review 40(2) May 1950. The next year, the UN document E/1986ST/ECA/10 of 3 May 1951 was titled Measures for the Economic Development of Under-Developed Countries, but as the UN membership expanded with the addition of 'under-developed' countries the term began to be regarded as derogatory and was gradually dropped in favour of 'less-developed' or 'developing'. This move led Gunnar Myrdal to refer to 'diplomacy by terminology' in his Asian Drama (1968).

French writers were more familiar with tiers monde in the early 1960s; M Allais in Le Tiers Monde au Carrefour (1963) uses the term confidently and interchangeably for 'developing countries', but, in the same year, the term 'Third World' is used in C Geertz's Agricultural Innovation: The Process of Ecological Change in Indonesia (1963) as though it were not yet generally accepted—in the lower case and quotation marks—when he writes of the need for 'an adequate understanding of the new countries of the "third world"' (p xviii). Michael Brecher reported on a conversation he had with Jawaharlal Nehru in his The New States of Asia (1963); Brecher and Nehru discussed the meaning of 'non-alignment' and when Brecher asked if it was akin to the concept of 'Third Force', Nehru reacted characteristically to the use of the word 'force' by repudiating the suggestion, and, apparently misunderstanding Brecher's question, did not offer 'Third World' as a substitute term. The transcript of this conversation (p 206) suggests that 'Third World' was not a term that Nehru yet used. A little later, Peter Worsley published The Third World (1964) which concerned itself with 'the political sociology of the under-developed countries' but unlike Allais (1963) did define his use of the term (see pp ix–x, xii). Another French author, Pierre Jalée, uses the term in a book title, The Pillage of the Third World (translated by Mary Kloppe, 1968; first French edition 1965): 'This expression apparently came into use in 1956 and implies that the countries covered by it depend neither on the capitalist nor the socialist system, that they belong to neither of the other two "worlds".' There is still the stress on the earlier 'non-alignment' interpretation here and his list of the membership of the 'Third World' is specific: Latin America (excluding socialist Cuba); the whole of Africa; Asia (excluding Israel and Japan and the socialist countries); and Oceania (excluding Australia and New Zealand). Jalée makes a similar distinction in his Le Tiers Monde dans l'économie mondiale published in 1968. Irma Adelman and Cynthia Taft Morris use the earlier expression 'under-developed' in their Society, Politics and Economic Development (1967) when they describe their work as 'a systematic analysis of social, political and economic characteristics of nations at varying stages of economic development'. They classify seventy-four as 'under-developed' and follow Jalée in excluding Israel but not in also specifically excluding Southern Rhodesia and South Africa. In the same year, Sanwar Ali published his Economic Planning in Developing Countries (1967) and felt obliged to justify his choice of title: 'The term "developing nation" is a euphemistic name given to an under-developed or relatively poor country . . . which is increasingly in vogue.' This is the same point ('diplomacy by terminology') that Myrdal made the following year; there is no mention or even hint of the term 'Third World' in Sanwar Ali's book. The Pearson Commission Report Partners in Development (1969) spends some time in discussing terminological problems; they stressed that there was 'no firm line between developed and developing countries' and that 'the developing countries number more than one hundred' (two years earlier Adelman and Morris had put the number as seventy-four). After considering 'rich-poor', 'advanced-backward', 'highly developed-underdeveloped' and even 'donor-recipient', the Commission decided to adopt the dichotomies 'developed-developing' when they wished to indicate the difference between industrialised countries and those with weaker or poorer economies.

Paul Bairoch is quite specific in his use of the term 'Third World'; in Diagnostic de L'Evolution Economique de Tiers-Monde 1900-1968 (1969; English translation by Cynthia Postan, The Economic Development of the Third World since 1900 (1975)). He explains 'Nous voulons simplement préciser que dans la présente étude nous utilisons les termes de "sous-développé", de "non-développé" et "tiers-monde" en tant que synonymes . . .'. In her translation, six years later, Postan inserts the words 'non-industrialised' as an additional synonym.

There are many examples of the increasing acceptance of 'Third World' in the early 1970s. Dudley Seers and Leonard Joy edited Development in a Divided World (1971) and commented ' . . . we can take the "poor" countries of the world as broadly those of Africa, Asia and Latin America. A phrase that is convenient to cover all of them is the "Third World".' Two years later, Matthew McQueen, Paul Alpert and Ernst Schumacher all showed an easy familiarity with the term. McQueen in The Economics of Development (1973) makes the point that ' . . . the multitude of terms . . . ranging from the older ones of "under-developed" and "poor" countries to the more modern ones of "the third world", "developing" and "less developed" countries are . . . essentially interchangeable'; Alpert in Partnership or Confrontation (1973) writes of 'The Third World—that is, the developing countries'; Schumacher titled Part 3 of his influential Small is Beautiful (1973) 'The Third World', clearly referring to the developing countries. George Dalton in his Economic Systems and Society: Capitalism, Communism and the Third World (1974) considers the situations of 'The Third World of African and Asian nations (and) . . . the capitalist and communist nations', and later implicitly equates 'Third World' with 'under-developed' nations in general (see pp 200 and 202); in the earlier part of his work, Dalton had pointed out that 'Before the Second World War we had two models of industrialisation; the capitalist model . . . and the communist model . . . what we could now call the Third World did not exist as a set of national economies or as a subject in economics.' (p 21). Although Charles Elliott and Françoise de Morsier use the title Patterns of Poverty in the Third World: A Study of Social and Economic Stratification for their 1975 publication, they call their areas of study 'the so-called Third World'. Peter Odell has no such doubts in the fourth edition of his Oil and World Power (1975): '. . . India, Guinea and Brazil (to give but one example from each of the continents constituting the Third World)' (pp 59, 96), and his continental definition is paralleled by Mahbub ul-Haq ('The definition of Third World as used in this book covers all the developing countries of Asia, Africa, the Middle East and Latin America . . .', in The Poverty Curtain: Choices for the Third World (1976)) and Gerald Meier ('. . . two-thirds of the world's population—the poverty-ridden peoples in the less developed countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America', in Leading Issues in Economic Development (1976)). Maxine Rodinson again implies a wide acceptance of the term 'Third World': '. . . the prosperous and sated world of the industrialised communities and the hungry universe in which the remainder of mankind struggles for life . . . this Third World as it is called', in Islam and Capitalism (1977).

Michael Todaro in his widely-used text-book Economics for a Developing World (1977) spends more time than most writers in defining his terms and indicating his purpose:

The 97 African, Asian and Latin American member-countries of the United Nations often collectively refer to themselves as the 'Third World'. They do this primarily to distinguish themselves from the economically-advanced 'capitalist' ('First World') and 'socialist' ('Second World') countries . . . (it) is widely used among developing nations in a concerted effort to generate and represent a new sense of common identity and a growing unity of purpose . . . 'Third World' economics . . . is concerned with the economic and political processes necessary for effecting rapid structural and institutional transformations of entire societies in a manner that will most efficiently bring the fruits of economic progress to the broadest segments of their populations . . . (pp xix, 2, 7 and 10).

From about the mid-1970s onwards the term 'Third World' passes from the realms of academic debate and student texts into general everyday use in the popular and periodical press and news broadcasts.

Authors using the term in their titles no longer explain their choice, or if they do it is to refine the normally-accepted usage. The collection of essays published by József Nyilas in Budapest in 1978 (The Changing Face of the Third World: Regional and National Studies) does not define the term and it would appear that in this part of the 'Second World' at least the general usage was accepted. Paul Harrison's titles Inside the Third World: The Anatomy of Poverty (1979) and The Third World Tomorrow (1980) needed no explanation for the thousands of general readers who bought the Penguin paperback edition, and a series of books in the early 1980s similarly employ the title without further thought: Elbaki Hermassi, The Third World Reassessed (1980), André Gunder Frank, Crisis in the Third World (1981), Paul Hallwood and Stuart Sinclair, Oil, Debt and Development: OPEC in the Third World (1981), Jacques Loup, Can the Third World Survive? (1983), Daniel Chudnovsky and Masafumi Nagao, Capital Goods Production in the Third World (1983) are but a few examples. Eamonn Butler and Madsen Pirie use 'Third World' and 'developing countries' interchangeably in their Aid by Enterprise: Market Solutions to the Problems of Development (1984), and Attila Ágh in his National Development in the Third World (Budapest, 1984) is amongst those who begin to talk of 'the emerging "Fourth World" . . . these poorest countries'.

The final acceptance of 'Third World' both into the English language and as the brain-child of Alfred Sauvy surely comes with the following entry in Volume 4 of A Supplement to the Oxford English Dictionary (1986)?:

Third World The countries of the world, especially those of Africa and Asia, which are aligned with neither the Communist nor the non-Communist bloc; hence, the under-developed or poorer countries of the world, usually those of Africa, Asia and Latin America. (1956 G BALANDIER Le Tiers Monde: Sous-développement et développement, 369.

La conférence tenue à Bandeong en avril 1955, par les délégués de vingt-neuf nations asiatiques et africaines . . . manifeste l'accès, au premier plan de la scène politique internationale, de ces peuples qui constituent un 'Tiers Monde' entre les deux blocs, selon l'expression d' A. Sauvy.)

AppendixThe 'Four Worlds': basic statistical data

The arrangement of the national statistics of 162 countries under the categories 'Fourth World', 'Third World', 'Second World' and 'First World' differs from the categories used in the World Development Report 1987 ('Low income economies'; 'Middle-income economies', divided into 'Lower middle-income economies' and 'Upper middle-income economies'; 'High income oil exporters'; 'Industrial market economies'; and 'Non-reporting non-member economies') but draws on the same data—see 'World Development Indicators', Table 1, World Development Report 1987 pp 202–3, and 'Basic Indicators for UN and World Bank member countries with populations of less than 1 million', World Development Report 1987, p 269.

The World Development Report 1987 was published on 1 July 1987 by the Oxford University Press for The World Bank, Washington DC.

1) Population (millions) mid-1985

The estimates of population for mid-1985 are based on data from the UN Population Division or from World Bank data files.

2) Area (thousands of square kilometres)

The data on area are derived from Food and Agricultural Organisation (FAO), Production Yearbook 1985, Rome: 1986. Areas of less than one thousand square kilometres are indicated by (.).

3) GNP, per capita, US dollars, 1985

4) GNP, per capita, US dollars; average annual growth rate (per cent), 1965–85.

A detailed explanation of the World Bank Atlas method of calculating GNP per capita figures is presented in World Development Report 1987, pp 268–71. It is conceded that 'perfect cross-comparability of GNP per capita estimates cannot be achieved'. Information is not given for 'non-reporting non-market economies' (Albania, Angola, Bulgaria, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, German Democratic Republic, Korean Democratic Republic, Mongolia, and the USSR), because of difficulties associated with the availability of data and the determination of conversion factors.

5) Inflation: average annual rate (per cent) 1965–80.

WHY 'THIRD WORLD'?

6) Inflation: average annual rate (per cent) 1980-85

The average annual rate of inflation is that measured by the growth rate of the GDP implicit deflator; the GDP deflator is calculated by dividing (for each year of the period) the value of GDP at current purchaser values by the value of GDP at constant purchaser values (both in national currency). The 'least squares' method is then used to calculate the growth rate of the GDP deflator for the period. See World Development Report 1987, p 271.

7) Life expectancy at birth (years), 1985

These calculations are based on data from the UN Population Division, supplemented by World Bank data files; they indicate for each country the number of years a new-born infant would live if patterns of mortality prevailing for all the people at the time of its birth were to remain the same throughout its life. See World Development Report 1987, p 271.

Lack of appropriate data in the statistical tables below is indicated by '..'; for more detailed information, see Technical Notes (pp 268-83) and Bibliography (pp 284-5) in World Development Report 1987.

Table 1: Least developed countries—'Fourth World'

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7
1. Ethiopia	42.3	1,222	110	0.2	3.3	2.6	45
2. Bangladesh	100.6	144	150	0.4	14.9	11.5	51
3. Burkina Faso	7.9	274	150	1.3	6.5	7.2	45
4. Mali	7.5	1,240	150	1.4	..	7.4	46
5. Bhutan	1.2	47	160	..	..	..	44
6. Nepal	16.5	141	160	0.1	7.8	8.4	47
7. Malawi	7.0	118	170	1.5	7.3	11.4	45
8. Zaire	30.6	2,345	170	-2.1	24.5	55.3	51
9. Guinea-Bissau	0.9	36	180	-1.5	..	30.4	39
10. Burma	36.9	677	190	2.4	8.7	2.6	59
11. Burundi	4.7	28	230	1.9	8.4	6.6	48
12. Togo	3.0	57	230	0.3	7.1	6.9	51
13. The Gambia	0.7	11	230	1.1	8.3	8.8	43
14. Comoros	0.4	2	240	-0.3	..	..	55

THIRD WORLD QUARTERLY

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7
15. Madagascar	10.2	587	240	-1.9	7.7	19.4	52
16. Niger	6.4	1,267	250	-2.1	7.5	8.5	44
17. Benin	4.0	113	260	0.2	7.4	9.7	49
18. Central African Republic	2.6	623	260	-0.2	8.4	10.8	49
19. India	765.1	3,288	270	1.7	7.4	7.8	56
20. Rwanda	6.0	26	280	1.8	12.5	7.6	48
21. Somalia	5.4	638	280	-0.7	10.1	45.4	46
22. Kenya	20.4	583	290	1.9	7.3	10.0	54
23. Maldives	0.2	(.)	290	1.9	..	..	53
24. Tanzania	22.2	945	290	..	9.6	19.6	52
25. Sudan	21.9	2,506	300	..	11.5	31.7	48
26. Haiti	5.9	28	310	0.7	7.3	7.0	54
27. Guinea	6.2	246	320	0.8	2.8	8.3	40
28. São Tomé and Príncipe	0.1	1	320	0.8	..	5.8	65
29. Sierra Leone	3.7	72	350	1.1	7.8	25.0	40
30. Senegal	6.6	196	370	-0.6	6.5	9.7	47
31. Ghana	12.7	239	380	-2.2	22.8	57.0	53
32. Sri Lanka	15.8	66	380	2.9	9.5	14.7	70
33. Pakistan	96.2	804	380	2.6	10.2	8.1	51
34. Zambia	6.7	753	390	-1.6	6.4	14.7	52
35. Afghanistan	17.2	648	..	..	4.9	..	36
36. Chad	5.0	1,284	..	-2.3	6.2	..	45
37. Uganda	14.7	236	..	-2.6	23.8	..	49

Table 2: Developing countries—'Third World'

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7
38. Mauritania	1.7	1,031	420	0.1	7.5	8.1	47
39. Cape Verde	0.3	4	430	5.0	..	17.6	63
40. Bolivia	6.4	1,099	470	-0.2	15.7	569.1	53

WHY "THIRD WORLD"?

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7
41. Lesotho	1.5	30	470	6.5	8.6	11.4	54
42. Liberia	2.2	111	470	-1.4	6.5	1.6	50
43. Guyana	0.8	215	500	-0.2	8.0	9.4	65
44. Solomon Islands	0.3	28	510	3.5	7.1	10.9	58
45. Indonesia	162.2	1,919	530	4.8	34.3	10.7	55
46. Yemen Arab Republic	8.0	195	550	5.3	..	9.7	45
47. Morocco	21.9	447	560	2.2	5.8	7.8	59
48. Philippines	54.7	300	580	2.3	11.8	19.3	63
49. Egypt (EAR)	48.5	1,001	610	3.1	7.5	11.0	61
50. Ivory Coast	10.1	322	660	0.9	9.2	10.0	53
51. Western Samoa	0.2	3	660	..	..	15.9	65
52. Swaziland	0.7	17	670	2.7	9.1	9.6	54
53. Papua New Guinea	3.5	462	680	0.4	8.1	5.5	52
54. Zimbabwe	8.4	31	680	1.6	5.7	13.2	57
55. Honduras	4.4	112	720	0.4	6.3	5.4	62
56. Tonga	0.1	1	730	..	..	..	64
57. Nicaragua	3.3	130	770	-2.1	8.9	33.8	59
58. Dominican Republic	6.4	49	790	2.9	6.6	14.6	64
59. Nigeria	99.7	924	800	2.2	14.5	11.4	50
60. Thailand	51.7	514	800	4.0	6.8	3.2	64
61. Cameroon	10.2	475	810	3.6	9.0	11.8	55
62. El Salvador	4.8	21	820	-0.2	7.0	11.6	64
63. Botswana	1.1	600	840	8.3	8.0	5.2	57
64. St. Vincent	0.1	(.)	850	1.2	10.8	5.9	69
65. Paraguay	3.7	407	860	3.9	9.2	15.8	66
66. Vanuatu	0.1	0.01	880	..	..	..	56
67. Jamaica	2.2	11	940	-0.7	12.6	18.3	73
68. Grenada	0.1	(.)	970	-0.1	11.2	6.6	68
69. Peru	18.6	1,285	1,010	0.2	20.5	98.6	59
70. Turkey	50.2	781	1,080	2.6	20.8	37.1	64

THIRD WORLD QUARTERLY

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7
71. Mauritius	1.0	2	1,090	2.7	11.8	8.5	66
72. Dominica	0.08	1	1,150	0.4	12.7	4.8	75
73. Ecuador	9.4	284	1,160	3.5	11.3	29.7	66
74. Belize	0.01	23	1,190	2.7	7.2	1.2	66
75. Tunisia	7.1	164	1,190	4.0	6.7	10.0	63
76. St. Lucia	0.01	1	1,240	2.8	9.3	3.8	70
77. Guatemala	8.0	109	1,250	1.7	7.1	7.4	60
78. Costa Rica	2.6	51	1,300	1.4	11.2	36.4	74
79. Colombia	28.4	1,139	1,320	2.9	17.5	22.5	65
80. Chile	12.1	757	1,430	-0.2	129.9	19.3	70
81. St. Kitts- Nevis	0.04	(.)	1,550	2.4	9.8	5.0	64
82. Jordan	3.5	98	1,560	5.8	..	3.9	65
83. Syria (SAR)	10.5	185	1,570	4.0	8.4	6.1	64
84. Brazil	135.6	8,512	1,640	4.3	31.6	147.7	65
85. Uruguay	3.0	176	1,650	1.4	57.5	44.6	72
86. Fiji	0.7	18	1,710	2.9	10.4	5.2	65
87. Malaysia	15.6	330	2,000	4.4	4.9	3.1	68
88. Antigua	0.08	(.)	2,020	0.2	9.1	4.0	73
89. Mexico	78.8	1,973	2,080	2.7	13.2	62.2	67
90. Panama	2.2	77	2,100	2.5	5.5	3.7	72
91. Argentina	30.5	2,767	2,130	0.2	78.5	342.8	70
92. Republic of Korea	41.1	98	2,150	6.6	18.7	6.0	69
93. Algeria	21.9	2,382	2,550	3.6	9.9	6.9	61
94. Suriname	0.4	163	2,580	3.4	11.8	4.2	66
95. Venezuela	17.3	912	3,080	0.5	8.7	9.2	70
96. Malta	0.3	(.)	3,310	8.1	3.5	1.7	73
97. Gabon	0.9	268	3,670	1.5	12.7	10.1	51
98. Cyprus	0.7	9	3,790	..	-2.1	8.1	74
99. Barbados	0.2	(.)	4,630	2.3	11.3	8.4	73
100. Trinidad and Tobago	1.2	5	6,020	2.3	14.2	7.6	69
101. Oman	1.2	300	6,730	5.7	20.5	4.9	54
102. Bahamas	0.2	14	7,070	-0.5	6.4	5.2	70

WHY 'THIRD WORLD'?

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7
103. Libya	3.8	1,760	7,170	-1.3	15.4	-0.3	60
104. Singapore	2.6	1	7,420	7.6	4.8	3.1	73
105. Saudi Arabia	11.5	2,150	8,850	5.3	17.6	-3.2	62
106. Bahrain	0.4	1	9,420	..	..	0.2	69
107. Kuwait	1.7	18	14,480	-0.3	14.1	-3.6	72
108. Qatar	0.3	11	16,270	-7.0	..	..	72
109. Brunei	0.2	6	17,570	-1.2	..	-2.7	74
110. United Arab Emirates	1.4	84	19,270	..	..	-1.4	70
111. Djibouti	0.4	22	..	..	..	..	48
112. Equatorial Guinea	0.4	28	..	..	..	..	45
113. Iran	44.6	1,648	..	..	15.2	..	60
114. Iraq	15.9	435	..	..	..	..	61
115. Kiribati	0.06	1	..	..	..	6.9	53
116. Lebanon	..	10	..	..	9.3	..	..
117. Seychelles	0.06	(.)	..	..	12.1	..	69

Table 3: Centrally planned economies—'Second World'

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7
118. Mozambique	13.8	802	160	..	..	25.8	47
119. China (PRC)	1,040.3	9,561	310	4.8	..	2.4	69
120. Yemen (PDRY)	2.0	333	530	..	..	5.7	46
121. Congo (PRC)	1.9	342	1,110	3.8	7.1	12.6	58
122. Hungary	10.6	93	1,950	5.8	2.7	5.6	71
123. Poland	37.2	313	2,050	..	..	35.2	72
124. Yugoslavia	23.1	256	2,070	4.1	15.2	45.1	72
125. Albania	3.0	2	..	..	..	..	70
126. Angola	8.8	1,247	..	..	..	..	44
127. Bulgaria	9.0	111	..	..	..	..	71
128. Cuba	10.1	115	..	..	..	..	77
129. Czechoslovakia	15.5	128	..	..	..	..	70

THIRD WORLD QUARTERLY

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7
130. German Democratic Republic	16.6	108	..	..	..	..	59
131. Kampuchea	..	181	..	..	..	..	..
132. Korea (KDR)	20.4	121	..	..	..	..	68
133. Laos (LPDR)	3.6	237	..	..	..	..	45
134. Mongolia	1.9	1,565	..	..	..	..	63
135. Romania	22.7	238	..	..	..	..	72
136. USSR	277.4	22,402	..	..	..	..	70
137. Vietnam	61.7	330	..	..	..	..	65

Table 4: Industrialised market economies—'First World'

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7
138. Portugal	10.2	92	1,970	3.3	11.7	22.7	74
139. South Africa	32.4	1,221	2,010	1.1	9.9	13.0	55
140. Greece	9.9	132	3,550	3.6	10.3	20.6	68
141. Spain	38.6	505	4,290	2.6	12.2	12.6	77
142. Ireland	3.6	70	4,850	2.2	11.9	10.8	74
143. Israel	4.2	21	4,990	2.5	25.2	196.3	75
144. Italy	57.1	301	6,250	2.6	11.2	14.2	77
145. New Zealand	3.3	269	7,010	1.4	10.1	9.8	74
146. Belgium	9.9	31	8,280	2.8	6.5	5.9	75
147. United Kingdom	56.5	245	8,460	1.6	11.2	6.4	75
148. Austria	7.6	84	9,120	3.5	5.7	4.9	74
149. The Netherlands	14.5	41	9,290	2.0	7.5	3.5	77
150. France	55.2	547	9,540	2.8	8.0	9.5	78
151. Iceland	0.2	103	10,710	2.4	27.1	49.2	77
152. Australia	15.8	7,687	10,830	2.0	8.8	9.1	78
153. Finland	4.9	337	10,890	3.3	10.5	8.6	76

WHY 'THIRD WORLD'?

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7
154. German Federal Republic	61.0	249	10,940	2.7	5.1	3.2	75
155. Denmark	5.1	43	11,200	1.8	9.2	8.1	75
156. Japan	120.8	372	11,300	4.7	7.5	1.2	77
157. Sweden	8.4	450	11,890	1.8	8.0	8.6	77
158. Canada	25.4	9,976	13,680	2.4	7.4	6.3	76
159. Luxembourg	0.4	3	14,260	4.0	6.3	10.0	74
160. Norway	4.2	324	14,370	3.3	7.7	8.5	77
161. Switzerland	6.5	41	16,370	1.4	5.3	4.5	77
162. United States of America	239.3	9,363	16,690	1.7	6.1	5.3	76

Hans Zell Publishers
Some new and forthcoming titles for 1987

Jean E. Meeh Gosebrink

African Studies Information Resources Directory

686pp. 1986 £65.00/$80.00 casebound ISBN 0-905450-30-2

Published for the (US) African Studies Association

James Gibbs

A Handbook for African Writers

226pp. 1986 £25.00/$39.00 casebound ISBN 01-905450-23-X

Philip Baker, comp.

International Guide to African Studies Research/

Etudes Africaines. Guide International de Recherches

2nd completely revised and substantially expanded edition

ca.280pp ca.May 1987 ca.£45.00/$72.00 casebound ISBN 0-905450-25-6

Published for the International African Institute

Michael Mann & David Dalby, eds.

A Thesaurus of African Languages. A classified and annotated inventory of the spoken languages of Africa, with an appendix on their orthographic representation

ca.400pp. ca.May 1987 ca.£48.00/$76.00 casebound ISBN 0-905450-24-8

Published for the International African Institute

Berth Verstappen, ed.

Human Rights Reports: an annotated bibliography of fact-finding missions ca.400pp. ca.April 1987 ca.£45.00/$72.00 casebound ISBN 0-905450-35-3

Published for the Netherlands Institute of Human Rights

Yvette Scheven

Bibliographies for African Studies, 1970-1986 (Cumulative volume)

ca.500pp. ca.October 1987 ca.£55.00/$80.00 casebound ISBN 0-905450-33-7

Nancy Schmidt

Sub-Saharan African Films & Filmmakers: an annotated bibliography

ca.400pp. late 1987 ca.£45.00/$72.00 casebound ISBN 0-905450-32-9

For descriptive leaflets on any of the above titles, or for a copy of the complete catalogue of Hans Zell Publishers, write to any of the K. G. Saur offices listed below

Orders to: Hans Zell Publishers, an imprint of K. G. Saur Ltd
Shropshire House, 2-10 Capper Street, London WC1E 6JA
Telephone: (01) 637 1571

or to:

K. G. Saur Verlag KG, Heilmannstrasse 17,
Postfach 71 10 09, D-8000 München 71, Fed. Rep. of Germany
Telephone: (089) 791040

In the United States and Canada order from:

K. G. Saur Inc., 175 Fifth Avenue, New York, NY 10010
Telephone: (212) 475-5101

Hans Zell Publishers

an imprint of

K. G. Saur · London
München · New York · Paris

FEATURE REVIEWS

Perspectives on the Philippines

Walden Bello

Crisis in the Philippines: The Marcos Era and Beyond

John Bresnan

Princeton, New Jersey: Princeton University Press. 1986. 284pp. n/p

The Philippines Reader: A History of Colonialism, Neocolonialism, Dictatorship and Resistance

Daniel B Schirmer and Stephen Roskam Shalom

Boston, Massachusetts: South End Press. 1987. 425pp. $11.00hb

The Philippines After Marcos

R J May and Francisco Nemenzo

London: Croom Helm. 1985. 239pp. £19.95hb

Touching Ground, Taking Root: Theological and Political Reflections on the Philippine Struggle

London: Catholic Institute for International Relations. 1986. 214pp. £5.75pb

Like the escalating Vietnam conflict in the early 1960s, the continuing Philippine crisis is now the subject of intense scrutiny by Western officials, specialists, and journalists. What led to the rise and fall of Ferdinand Marcos? How does one explain the Cory Aquino phenomenon? What role has the USA played in the Philippine drama?

Crisis in the Philippines, edited by John Bresnan, provides the liberal establishment's responses to queries such as these. Theodore Friend's essay, which attempts to provide the broader historical context for recent events, strikes the note for the rest of the book by painting US colonialism and post-colonial US policy as benign and well-intentioned. Even when Friend concedes that there is something unfair about arrangements like a military bases agreement with a 99-year rent-free lease, he puts the onus of responsibility on the Filipinos because of 'Filipino assent to these developments'.

Marcos and other Philippine problems are indigenous in origin, and when America is abused by Filipino critics, this is largely because, like Mount Everest, it's there:

The fact remains that the United States, with a gross domestic product more than eighty times as great as that of the Philippines, and with a trade volume forty times as great, will influence the Philippines heavily without planning, without trying, without even wanting to do so. (Theodore Friend, 'Philippine-American tensions in history' in Crisis in the Philippines: The Marcos Era and Beyond.)

Critics who attempt to pierce through the colonial apologia are subjected by Friend to a most unfriendly sort of labelling. Thus, Renato Constantino, unquestionably the most influential historian in Philippine studies, is dismissed for his 'battering-ram style humourless neo-Marxist didacticism'.

Though suffused with the same American paternalism, David Steinberg's 'Tradition and Response' is a less unbalanced piece which acknowledges that American colonial policy did encourage placing political and social power in the hands of the local oligarchy or ilustrados ('enlightened ones'). However, it fails to explore the more important questions. In the real world, arrangements governing the exercise of power very seldom spring from good intention and very often from self-interest. What benefits did the colonial power derive from its sanctioning (some scholars would say, strengthening) continued oligarchical domination of the Philippines? How did the various permutations of elite rule—from the appointed elite of the Commonwealth period to the elected elite of the neo-colonial period to the authoritarian elite of the martial law period—serve US interests?

Exploring these avenues would probably have led to a more sophisticated understanding of the US response to its status of being, unlike Britain and France, a late colonial and imperial power. The US rise to world dominance came at a time—the first half of the twentieth century—that traditional forms of colonial rule were being challenged throughout the world. Moreover, it was unique in that it was an imperial power with anti-colonial pretensions.

Thus, in contrast to the British and the French, the USA pioneered in forms of indirect rule more appropriate to an era of decolonisation by cultivating a reliable indigenous stratum. This elite was handed control of the political administration, and it readily adapted elections and other institutions of US-style representative democracy to the realities of a semi-feudal social structure: patron-client relations, kinship, bribery and coercion were the operative principles in electoral contests between competing elite factions.

The elite also received economic pay-offs in line with the colonial strategy of making the Philippines an exporter of primary commodities to the USA and an importer of US manufactured goods. Thus, the duty-free entry of sugar into the US market gave the sugar barons, perhaps the most powerful section of the oligarchy, a strong stake in the colonial division of labour. By allowing the local elite to participate in the fruits of empire under conditions of seeming sovereignty and democracy, the USA was, in effect, laying a more solid basis for the continuation of the essence of imperial rule than the French and British efforts to monopolise power and maintain the visible emblems of empire. Mass education stressing the anti-colonial, democratic spirit and values of the American Revolution and Civil War counteracted the other, dominant side of this imperial democratic republic. And 'preparing the islands for independence' was the rationale which gained for the Americans the time necessary for an orderly transition from colonialism to neo-colonialism.

The failure of Friend and Steinberg to explore the symbiotic relationship between US colonial and neo-colonial rule and the local oligarchical order is paralleled in the essays on contemporary politics by the omission of any discussion of the role of the USA in facilitating the rise and downfall of Marcos.

While one can understand why Carl Lande, a favourite adviser to the State Department might overlook the US hand in recent political developments, it is surprising in the case of two usually perceptive students of the Philippine political scene: Lela Garner Noble, a leading specialist in Muslim affairs, and Carolina Hernandez, who is admired for her expertise on the Philippine military.

Neither Lande, Noble nor Hernandez mention the significant increases in military assistance to Marcos in the period from the declaration of martial law in 1972 to 1983 which played such a key role in consolidating the regime. By the early 1980s, US military assistance comprised 10.5 per cent of the military budget and financed most of the Armed Forces of the Philippines force modernisation programmes.¹ Equally crucial to Marcos' staying power was the political and ideological support he received from the USA. 'We found few if any Americans who took the position that the demise of individual rights would adversely affect US institutions,' asserted the staff of the US Senate Foreign Relations Committee after surveying the attitudes of key American officials shortly after the imposition of martial law:²

US officials appear prepared to accept that the strengthening of presidential authority . . . will enable President Marcos to introduce needed stability; that these objectives are in our interest; and that military bases and a familiar government are more important than the preservation of democratic institutions, which were imperfect at best.

And, of course, during the Reagan period, Marcos' form of authoritarian rule received not only ringing endorsement from Vice-President George Bush ('We love you, sir. We love your adherence to democratic rights and processes') but also ideological justification from influential conservative theorists such as the US Ambassador to the UN, Jeane Kirkpatrick, who may very well have had Marcos in mind when she wrote:

The fabric of authority unravels quickly when the power and status of the man at the top are undermined or eliminated. The longer the autocrat has held power, and the more pervasive his influence, the more dependent a nation's institutions will be on him.

¹ US Defense Department, 'Answers to Questions on Defense Issues Posed in the August 20, 1984 Letter of the House of Representatives Subcommittee on Asia-Pacific Affairs', Washington, DC, 1984, pp 12-13.

² US Senate Foreign Relations Committee Staff, The Philippines and Korea, Washington DC: US Government Printing Office, 1973.

Without him, the organized life of society will collapse, like an arch from which the keystone has been removed.³

Similarly, the erosion of US support for Marcos and US pressure on him to open up the political system by holding elections are also, curiously, ignored by all three writers in explaining the triumph of Aquino. How can one ignore the decisive role of US pressure in Marcos' fateful decision to call for snap elections in November 1985, which sparked the chain reaction that led to his overthrow?

The record of US intervention in the Philippine political process is clear, even to non-specialists exposed to extensive media coverage of recent years—which makes the absence of any reference to it all the more disconcerting.

A possible explanation is a theoretical framework that assigns primacy to internal factors in explaining change and considers US influence to be both secondary and external. Such a narrow, unsophisticated framework, however, immediately excludes from one's purview developments pregnant not only with political significance but with theoretical meaning. Is it purely a matter of coincidence that around the same time period—the early 1960s to the mid-1970s—civilian oligarchical systems in US-dominated or allied states like South Korea, Chile, Brazil, Uruguay, and the Philippines were wracked by deep crises which led to the establishment of authoritarian military or civilian-military regimes? Is it pure coincidence that these regimes had similar features, including a strong pro-US stance, violent repression of the left, technocratic-led 'development from above' based on attracting foreign capital and exploitation of cheap, unorganised labour? Was there a correlation between the rise of authoritarian regimes in US-allied states and the disillusionment with liberal democracy as a form of political stabilisation in the Third World and the more overt justification of repressive rule by US policy-makers? In this context, the 'US factor' assumes a significance which not only cannot be dismissed or ignored, but bids fair to be a leading variable in explaining regime changes.

Similarly, it is not possible, in my view, to understand US encouragement of political decompression in Haiti, the Philippines, and South America without taking into account the failure of the authoritarian model it had formerly sponsored as a mechanism of political containment of revolutionary pressures and agent of economic growth. It had the character of a desperate manoeuvre to cut one's losses—ie, prevent further radicalisation of oppressed populations—after years of being identified with the dictatorship in the popular mind.

The Cory Aquino phenomenon thus cannot be viewed simply as an expression of the Filipino people's yearning for democracy. It is certainly this. But it has other, less endearing dimensions. It is also a 'Third Force'—a movement encouraged by the US in order to take the wind out of the sails of what was a surging left in the last years of the Marcos dictatorship. The authors would do well to listen to the words of the US Under-Secretary of State, Michael Armacost, the key architect of policy toward the Philippines during Marcos' twilight years, when he spoke to American foreign service officers two months after the February 1986 Revolution that 'Our objective was to capture . . . to encourage the democratic forces of the center, then consolidate control by the middle and also win away the soft support of the NPA [New People's Army].'⁴

³ Jeane Kirkpatrick, 'Dictatorships and double standards', Commentary, July 1979, p 37.

The pieces on the economy and US-Philippine economic relations by Bernardo Villegas and Jesus Estanislao have an analytical sophistication missing in most of the other essays. Both are, in fact, very cogent and masterfully argued presentation of the neo-classical perspective on what went wrong with the Marcos economy and what needs to be done to resume growth. The neo-classical International Monetary Fund-World Bank critique runs as follows: External forces were not responsible for failure of the Marcos economy. The causes of the economic disaster were local in origin. One was the increase in state intervention in the economy. A second was 'crony capitalism', or the monopolisation of the economy by Marcos cronies, which led to a massive theft and squandering of resources and to inefficiency. But most important was Marcos' failure to dismantle the protectionist, import-substitution policies which prevented the efficient integration of the economy to the international market. The way forward, Estanislao declares, with a fervour reminiscent of partisans of Reaganomics in the early 1980s, lies in much greater reliance on the market, as opposed to administrative 'tinkering', and on 'liberalisation', which represents 'a decisive internationalism, a wholehearted acceptance of international economic rules, as they are, and a confident positioning for exports and economic growth within these rules'.

But the same wrong premiss that undermines the historical and political essays in this volume also gravely weakens Villegas' and Estanislao's analysis and policy prescriptions. To discount the role of external forces in contributing to the technocratic state economic structure is simply wrong. With its drive to coordinate an ambitious, massive, and diverse country programme, the World Bank, which poured in US$3 billion through Philippine government agencies between 1973 and 1983, helped to create the bloated Marcos economic state apparatus. The Bank's philosophy of development from above not only sanctioned but encouraged technocratic centralisation and intervention. Distrustful of the 'irrational' conflicts spawned by parliamentary democracy, the technocrats of the World Bank were attracted to Marcos' early martial law rhetoric about breaking the 'democratic deadlock'. The Philippines was designated a 'country of concentration', and the enormous resources of the agency was placed behind a centralised development programme administratively controlled by an authoritarian-technocratic elite.

⁴ Speech at Foreign Service Institute, Rosslyn, Virginia, 23 April, 1986.

A key confidential World Bank policy statement noted approvingly in 1976, 'The proclamation of martial law in 1972 and the abolition of Congress provided the government with almost absolute power in the field of economic development.'⁵ Indeed, the Bank went beyond sanctioning the regime's technocratic initiatives and even rationalised its political initiatives. Thus, at a time that agencies such as Amnesty International were already documenting massive abuses of human, political, and labour rights, Michael Gould, head of the Philippine programme office at the World Bank, stated in 1976: 'While the country is formally under martial law, the basic strategy of government is to resort as little as possible to outright coercion and to broaden popular support through the development of effective economic and social programs.'⁶

Similarly, one cannot understand the rise of 'crony capitalism' by attributing it merely to the greed of Marcos and his associates. While Marcos' friends might have outdone others in plunder, similar capitalist cliques tied to ruling regimes were found in Brazil, Chile and other countries that enjoyed a privileged relationship with international banks. Even before the accumulation of petrodollar deposits after the OPEC oil price rise in 1973, foreign lenders were aggressively pushing loans on to favoured clients in the Third World. These favourites included countries such as the Philippines, Chile and Brazil, which were deemed good credit risks because of their conservative, pro-Western economic policies and the surface stability produced by their authoritarian governments. Massive loans coursed through government agencies found their way into the hands of favoured capitalists who used them to buy up and corner key industries or shunted the capital into their private accounts in Geneva or New York. Serving as important intermediaries in this multi-billion dollar swindle were the very pillars of Western financial rectitude—the World Bank and the IMF. In the mid-1970s the World Bank assessed the Philippines as having 'a great absorptive capacity for foreign capital', and up until 1982, both the Bank and the IMF continued to give the Marcos regime an A-1 credit rating, despite all indications that loans were being squandered in unproductive projects, corrupt deals and capital flight. 'Crony capitalism' existed in a symbiotic relationship with international finance capital; one cannot be fully explained without the other.

Villegas and Estanislao's main thesis is that the martial law economy failed because of its imperfect integration into the international capitalist order. In fact, one can make the opposite case that it was precisely too much integration that torpedoed the economy. On the import side, the dizzying rise in the price of oil after 1973. On the export side, the collapse in the international prices of sugar and coconut, traditionally the Philippines' leading foreign exchange earners. The ultimately disastrous results of the Philippines' colonial integration into the capitalist world economy are exemplified in the wreck that is the Philippine sugar industry. The international price of sugar is four cents a pound while the cost of production comes to 14 cents a pound, forcing hundreds of thousands of acres out of production and threatening 350,000 workers and their families with starvation.

⁵ World Bank, 'Priorities and prospects for development', Vol. 1. Confidential Draft, Washington DC, 1976, p 8.

⁶ World Bank, 'Philippines: country program paper', Memo from Michael Gould, Washington DC, 26 March, 1976, p 7.7.

Contrary to Villegas' and Estanislao's interpretation, Marcos followed World Bank-IMF advice to move the economy into greater dependence on export markets. He might have hesitated to radically dismantle the protectionist barriers surrounding industry, but he and his technocrats did push export-oriented industrialisation, as recommended by the World Bank and the IMF, in the process building up a number of 'export processing zones' and making Philippine labour among the cheapest in Southeast Asia.

Labour-intensive manufactured exports—mainly electronics and garments—registered great advances to become the country's biggest export earner by 1982. But they too ran aground by 1984, not because of an overvalued exchange rate or other 'penalties' imposed by local protectionism but on account of the stagnation in world trade and protectionist measures against Third World manufactures in the USA and other advanced capitalist markets.

It is stagnating world trade and rising protectionism that would make it not only ill-advised but suicidal for the Aquino government to follow the path of export-oriented growth charted by the so-called New Industrialising Countries (NICs) in the 1960s and early 1970s. The international conditions just are not the same, but somehow what Susan Strange terms the 'bondage of liberal economics' continues to lead otherwise sensible people like Villegas and Estanislao to paint rosy, unrealistic scenarios of the prospects for Philippine export manufactures. The Aquino government would do well to listen instead to a hardnosed, realistic appraisal of the chances of new NICs, even if it comes from the CIA:

We believe, then, that the NICs are unlikely to be joined by an equally dynamic second tier of LDCs. New LDC sources of manufactures will surely appear, with some achieving rapid export growth. However, in our judgement, the number of NICs will be limited to four to six countries with the country composition changing over time. We believe many of the factors inhibiting the future growth of some of the second-tier LDCs' manufactures exports—a slowly expanding world market for manufactures, mounting protectionism, and heightened competition in trade—will constrain the growth of the NICs' manufactures exports. As a consequence, the change in the composition of the NICs will more likely be the result of a country falling from its ranks rather than advancing to the status of industrial country.⁷

⁷ Gregory Moulton, 'Future newly industrializing countries: more competition?', Research Paper, Mclean, Virginia, Central Intelligence Agency, Office of Global Issues, March 1984, p 8. Confidential.

There is, in other words, no substitute for the development of a vibrant domestic market as the anchor of one's economy. And, contrary to neo-classical doctrine, this will require a reasonable degree of protectionism, government intervention and planning, and massive income redistribution to create a viable market for an integrated industrial structure. Unfortunately, with the levers of economic policy now in the hands of Villegas, Estanislao and like minds, the Aquino government is likely to pursue the neo-classical utopia, with predictable results.

In summary, Crisis in the Philippines, with its failure to examine the relation of developments in the Philippines to the very strong influence and impact of the USA, international economic institutions, and trends in the world economy, is of limited value in providing an understanding of the Philippine crisis that goes beyond the superficial.

A good antidote to this limited perspective is The Philippines Reader, edited by Daniel B Schirmer and Stephen Shalom, two of the foremost historians on US-Philippine relations. The volume brings together some of the most significant documents and writings on the US-Philippine 'special relationship' from the time of US aggression in 1898 to Aquino, with concise introductions provided for each piece. While explicitly acknowledging their progressive sympathies, Schirmer and Shalom strive for fairness in their selections, and include State Department analyses, Pentagon position papers, an interview with a member of the rightist Reform the Armed Forces Movement (RAM) that launched the military uprising against Marcos, and even a piece from the ultra-rightist Heritage Foundation. Of special value to scholars and the general public are the confidential US government policy documents, which provide a ringside view of Washington's imperial decision-makers grappling with the periodic crises that threatened to unravel the special relationship.

In so far as this volume has a problem, it is one of form rather than content; it should probably have been conceived as a two-volume work. Because of the one-volume constraint, many pieces are abbreviated, sometimes too much. Or, perhaps, fewer pieces might have been chosen and placed in toto in one volume to allow the reader not only the key points of each text but also to appreciate its context.

Form is also the main problem with The Philippines After Marcos, edited by R J May and Francisco Nemenzo. The type is so small as to make reading difficult and of such quality as to give one the feeling that he is reading a typed draft rather than the finished product. But, despite this drawback and the fact that the contributions were written in 1984, prior to Marcos' departure, most of the essays are quite stimulating and a few are excellent.

Brian Fegan's 'Rural Philippines: Central Luzon' gives us provocative insights into the political and social consequences of the internal differentiation of the peasantry created by the limited land reform efforts which took place in Central Luzon during the Marcos period. (Central Luzon was the showcase of the Marcos land reform effort.) Al McCoy's contribution, 'Rural Philippines: Technological Change in the Sugar Industry', is a fine, admirably researched essay on the relationship between market crisis, technological innovation, and labour displacement that is indispensable for understanding why the once powerful sugar industry is now dying, with immense consequences for the whole economy.

Francisco Nemenzo's essay, 'The Left and the Traditional Opposition', confirms what many consider to be his status as the leading political scientist in Philippine studies. Despite the fact that the essay was written a year and a half before the February 1986 uprising, one of the post-Marcos scenarios he laid out ('Constitutional Democracy Restored'), uncannily projects much of what later transpired. Of special interest is the accuracy of his prediction of the response of the Philippine left to a constitutional democratic outcome:

Since this arrangement conforms to popular sentiments, it would be foolhardy for the Left to oppose it. The Left will probably reciprocate the gestures of reconciliation, even as it remains vigilant knowing that the military is lurking in the shadow of the provisional government. The NPA [New People's Army] will refuse to disarm but agree to a truce. The NDF [National Democratic Front] will also preserve its clandestine network while taking advantage of every occasion for propaganda and organising work. While abstaining from outright attacks on the provisional government, the CPP [Communist Party of the Philippines] and its associated organisations will keep a political distance. (The Philippines After Marcos, p 66)

At a time when most of the Philippine left (and indeed practically everybody else) viewed the restoration of constitutional democracy as a remote possibility, Nemenzo, a committed progressive, posed the question which now constitutes the central issue of debates within the progressive movement:

The prospects for a national democratic revolution in the 1990s depend to a large extent on how correctly the Left analyses and responds to the fluid situation in the next seven years. Imbued with an overwhelming self-confidence that borders on arrogance, some CPP leaders are not beyond committing fatal errors that could wipe out their phenomenal gains during the Marcos years. It is interesting to observe if the CPP leadership can transcend its dogmatic tendencies and execute a strategic switch should scenario no. 2 ['modified authoritarian rule'] or scenario no. 3 ['constitutional democracy'] materialise. What happened in the 1950s (when the PKP [old Communist Party] plunged the Huk movement into a colossal débâcle) may happen again if at a critical juncture in the immediate post-Marcos period the CPP misjudges the real situation and drives the movement along a disastrous line of march.

Edicio de la Torre is one of the influential figures in this debate within the Philippine progressive movement. Currently one of the leaders of the Volunteers for Popular Democracy (VPPD), de la Torre spent nine years in jail during the Marcos period. The reason de la Torre was feared so much then and continues to be feared by the military lies in the key role he has played in effecting a powerful alliance between the secular left and progressive Christianity. Touching Ground, Taking Root brings together a number of his most significant articles, speeches, letters and poems from 1968 to 1985. The result is a fascinating chronicle of a brilliant activist evolving from a reformist Christian confronted by the Marxist challenge to a revolutionary attempting to fuse the best of the two traditions.

There is an immediacy in this volume that is not found in the other books under review. The sights, sounds, heat, terrors, and rewards of the fourteen-year struggle against the dictatorship come through in the poems and letters, and the essays are grounded not in abstract questions but in the burning issues of the day. Touching Ground, Taking Root not only offers insights into the extremely creative union of Christianity and Marxism in the Philippines but also allows the reader to come in touch with the dynamism of the progressive movement that played such a vital role in ousting the Marcos regime and which now challenges the Aquino government to deliver on its promises of effective social and economic reforms.

Winds of change in Moscow

Stephen White

The Sixth Continent: Russia and Mikhail Gorbachev

Mary Frankland

London: Hamish Hamilton. 1987. 292pp. £12.95hb

The Waking Giant. The Soviet Union under Gorbachev

Martin Walker

London: Michael Joseph. 1986. 282pp. £14.95hb

The Soviet Paradox: External Expansion, Internal Decline

Seweryn Bialer

London: I B Tauris. 1986. 391pp. £19.50hb

The Soviet Union under Gorbachev

Edited by Martin McCauley

London: Macmillan. 1987. 247pp. £29.50hb/£9.95pb

It is still hard to believe that it is scarcely more than two years since Mikhail

Gorbachev was elected General Secretary of the Soviet Union's ruling party. Scholarly as well as popular consensus had on the whole inclined to the view that the Soviet Union was a country that changed slowly, if at all (one of the themes that emerged most clearly from the academic work of the 1970s on Soviet political culture was the striking continuities between the contemporary and the pre-revolutionary systems). At the same time it has been widely accepted that the Soviet Communist Party holds an exceptionally high degree of centralised power within that country, and that the General Secretary of the Party tends in turn to become exceptionally powerful within the party's leadership. At least part of the fascination of the early years of Gorbachev's secretaryship has been to see which of these two elements will prove stronger: or in other words, to find out the extent to which the Soviet system is capable of reforming and renewing itself. If a single theme emerges from the four very varied volumes under review it is that it would probably be premature to attempt to answer such questions, and that an unqualified answer would certainly be inappropriate.

The four volumes under consideration provide two different kinds of answers to the questions that arise in connection with the new regime in the USSR: two are by journalists (Frankland and Walker), and two by academics (Bialer and McCauley in association with other contributors). Perhaps surprisingly, given the lively and topical nature of the material with which they are dealing, it is the books by academics that provide the greater degree of satisfaction. Frankland and Walker are two British representatives of the long succession of foreign correspondents based in Moscow who write up their experiences. They invite comparison with the books by Hedrick Smith and Robert Kaiser which appeared during the later Brezhnev years, as well as with more recent offerings by Michael Binyon, Richard Owen, Kevin Klose and others. Mark Frankland, in his study, adopts a chronological approach, following Soviet developments from the death of Brezhnev up to the end of 1986; Martin Walker, by contrast, adopts a thematic approach, which avoids the danger that his account will be overtaken by events by the time it appears. Both books, in fact, have much of interest.

Mark Frankland, who has worked for many years for the Observer (London) and has taken a long-standing interest in Soviet affairs, has the better credentials of the two journalists, but has not necessarily produced the better book. His chronological account is nicely written, full of pen-portraits and illustrative anecdotes, and supported by copious references to the Soviet press and scholarly literature. Yet the story is in most respects a familiar one, not least to those who have read Frankland's Observer despatches over the period with which it deals. There is a curiously dated feel to the accounts of corruption in the later Brezhnev years, and little of great novelty that he can contribute to the early Gorbachev years, which have been covered with great intensity by the Western press as a whole as well as by knowledgeable insiders such as Zhores Medvedev. Particularly regrettable, to this reviewer, is the lack of a considered verdict on the new regime and on the degree of success that the reforming leadership of Gorbachev is likely to enjoy. The final chapter deals almost exclusively with foreign affairs; the last paragraph (ending 'Only when the Soviet Union at last knew what it wanted to be itself would it also know the terms on which it wanted to live with the rest of the world.') is almost studiously noncommittal. 'What', as Americans would ask, 'is the bottom line?'

Martin Walker's book, by contrast, succeeds better because it does advance an overall thesis (broadly speaking, that this new regime is 'transforming Russia and the world we live in'), and does so by considering a variety of aspects of Soviet life rather than following political developments at the centre in chronological sequence. Martin Walker became the Guardian's Moscow correspondent in 1984, only the third resident Soviet correspondent in the paper's history (his predecessors were Arthur Ransome and Malcolm Muggeridge, surely a hard act to follow). Walker's enthusiasm for the changes that are currently taking place in the USSR have made him a mildly controversial figure within the journalistic community. There can, however, be little doubt that his sympathy with the Gorbachev regime and the privileged access to information that this has brought him have allowed him an unusually good opportunity to write about the changes that are taking place in the USSR. His book discusses the position of women, economic reform, the armed forces and many other aspects of current Soviet life. Perhaps best of all, for this reviewer, is his sympathetic treatment of the attempts that are being made to restore parts of historic Moscow, an effort which has recently found favour at the highest levels of the Soviet leadership.

Seweryn Bialer's book is essentially a product of the Andropov-Chernenko years, but it also includes a preliminary assessment of the first few months of Gorbachev's secretaryship. For the student of Soviet domestic politics the two most interesting chapters are those in which he deals with the early Gorbachev regime and then with the 'politics of reform' more generally. The account presented is a broadly 'pessimistic' one, while still sympathetic to the objectives of the new leadership. Bialer does not expect Stalinist forms of economic management to be replaced, at least within the current decade, and yet, 'without major reforms, the slide of the Soviet economy will not be arrested, and its effectiveness will decline further'. The vested interests that oppose change are still strong and will remain so, and in any case it is not yet clear (in Bialer's view) that Gorbachev and his associates are seeking more than marginal changes. He remarks upon the superficial character of their diagnosis of the faults of the Soviet system, and describes their governing style as 'managerial-reformist'. A year or more later, and notwithstanding the January plenum and cautious moves towards the legalisation of individual economic activity, it is not yet clear that this is a mistaken (though it may be an ungenerous) assessment.

Martin McCauley's symposium also predates the January plenum, but it does take into account the 27th Party Congress of early 1986 and the new Party Programme, Party Rules and Five Year Plan. This is a book of eleven brief chapters, with no conclusion and no agreed overall assessment of the new Soviet administration. It does, however, contain some useful pointers. Ronald J Hill, for instance, in his chapter on state and ideology, notes the reconsideration that is now in progress of Brezhnev's notion of 'developed socialism', and points to the possibility of the extension of electoral choice (as duly occurred in the June 1987 local elections) and the use of the referendum as a device for popular consultation. Philip Hanson, in a solid chapter on the economy, points out that the main emphasis is still on streamlining a centralised system, and argues that there is less than total unanimity within the leadership about the pace and nature of further change. The final chapter, by Margot Light, provides a brief but useful tour d'horizon of Gorbachev's emerging foreign policy.

Are any more general conclusions in order? It is, of course, still early days; some may recall the Chinese philosopher, quoted in E H Carr's What is History?, who was asked for his assessment of the French Revolution and replied that it was 'too soon to offer an opinion on so recent an event'. Two main themes, however, have emerged still more starkly since these books were written. The first is the far-reaching ambitions of the Gorbachev leadership, extending into social statistics, history and literature as well as the areas considered in these volumes. The second, however, is the deep-seated resistance to change that has become apparent not only within official circles but also at the level of the ordinary population (perestroika, as Gorbachev complained at the January plenum, always seemed to be someone else's business, and the campaign against alcoholism has not been popular or even—it appears—particularly effective). The nature of change in the USSR has in a sense always depended upon these two rival tendencies; two years or more into a new leadership committed to a programme of far-reaching change, it is still far from clear that the forces of reform will ultimately prevail.

The future of China

Shaun Breslin

China—Politics, Economics and Society: Iconoclasm and Innovation in a Revolutionary Socialist Country

Marc Blecher

London: Frances Pinter, Boulder, Colorado: Lynne Rienner. 1986. 232pp.
£22.50hb/£6.95pb

The China Challenge: Adjustment and Reform

David S G Goodman, Martin Lockett and Gerald Segal

London: Routledge and Kegan Paul (for Royal Institute of International Affairs). 1986. 86pp. £5.95pb

The Political Economy of Reform in Post-Mao China

Edited by Elizabeth J Perry and Christine Wong

Cambridge, Massachusetts: Harvard University Press. 1985. 331pp. £11.95pb

The confirmation of Deng Xiaoping as de facto leader of China at the third plenum of the Twelfth Chinese Communist Party (ccp) Central Committee in December 1978 marked the beginning of a new era in Chinese politics. Under the banner of achieving 'The Four Modernisations', the post-Mao leadership has implemented a series of reforms intended to restore stability and order to society and legitimacy to the party after the tumultuous years of the Cultural Revolution. There has been much debate recently within the Chinese leadership about the success or otherwise of the reforms to date, and how far and in what direction they should be pursued in the future. Those discussions have been echoed by Western sinologists and are at the core of these three very different books on China.

Of the three books, The China Challenge and The Political Economy of Reform in Post-Mao China both had their origins in academic research papers. The former is the result of a study group on China for the Royal Institute of International Affairs, and the latter started life as a workshop on 'Recent Reforms in China' at Harvard University. Blecher's work, however, is part of the Marxist Regimes series, and as such has different obligations placed on its content matter. While The China Challenge and The Political Economy of Reform in Post-Mao China deal specifically with the post-1978 period, China—Politics, Economics and Society is designed as a textbook on China under ccp rule, and as such spends a lot of its time dealing with the pre-1978 period. Obviously, The China Challenge and The Political Economy of Reform in Post-Mao China refer to what came before in order to place the present reforms in context, and particularly in The China Challenge, knowledge of Chinese politics and history is often assumed. Blecher, however, starts with the decline of the empire and the ineptitude and corruption of the Guomindang and works his way through to the present day. It differs from other textbooks on China because its analytical framework is a study of the class nature of social relationships in China at any one time since the turn of the century. He therefore has to spend quite some time explaining how class relations and bases pre-1949 were important insofar as they effected, through broad class coalitions, the ability and willingness of the party to undertake reforms that would lead to the transition to socialism once they came to power. Although the book occasionally becomes rather overburdened by narrative, it contains a thorough examination of the importance of class relationships and inequality in China, and the lessons that can be learnt from this regarding the more general study of the dialectics of socialism. Because the meat of this argument is contained in one short and intense chapter, the book becomes slightly unbalanced, and was also spoilt by occasional outbreaks of epidemics of parentheses that break the flow of the arguments being presented. Not surprisingly, Blecher does not appear to be over-enamoured by the effect of the Dengist reforms on the social and political order in China. He accuses the party of virtually abandoning Marxist theory, and creating structural inequality with policies such as the introduction of key-point schools, policies that may have a profound effect on the future of socialism if the post-Mao experiments become a blueprint for reform in other socialist countries.

The China Challenge concerns itself specifically with an appraisal of the reforms implemented in China up to the first half of 1986, and engages in the always uncertain task of assessing the prospects for China in the future. The book is split into a study of the effects and reasons for the reforms in three key areas: 'Power and Policy' by David Goodman, 'Economic Growth and Development' by Martin Lockett, and 'Modernising Foreign Policy' by Gerry Segal, although it is accepted that all three areas are inextricably linked. Goodman assesses the question of leadership and stresses the importance of the role of collective leadership in post-Mao China, notably playing down the role of Deng Xiaoping and showing the importance of other figures, such as the veteran economist, Chen Yun. For Goodman, the key factor has been the search for stability, which can be seen in the way that despite the fact that differences of opinion still occur, they are now freely aired and discussed and do not prevent leaders working together. This has led to China being politically more stable now than at any time since 1949, but the dangers for the future lie in a generation of leaders who are all growing old with no younger generation waiting to take their places. With regards to the economy, Lockett discusses the extent to which the changes that have been made are real reforms, or merely readjustments made to the present system. His conclusion is less than optimistic, as he suggests that there is a lack of coordination in the economy and that the reforms are limited and uneven and, as such, only partially deal with the real problems in the economy, thus implying that the successes seen since 1978 will not be sustained in the future. The state of the economy is seen by Segal as being closely linked with the attempts by the present leadership to overcome the failures of the foreign policy pursued by Zhou Enlai and Mao Zedong. He suggests that in this area at least, there have been dramatic reforms rather than just readjustments and cites the move away from giving aid to states to further the cause of socialism (with a few exceptions) to a desire to emphasise the importance of the economic rather than the military and ideological imperatives of foreign policy. He also plays down the relationship between China and the USA, saying that the honeymoon of the 1970s is over as the decline of the Soviet threat has led to a more balanced approach to relations with the superpowers. As far as the future is concerned, he shows a reluctance to speculate, emphasising that foreign policy depends upon political stability which, in turn, depends on successes, or otherwise, in the economic sector. Each section of The China Challenge is well written, informative and thought-provoking, which makes the whole an excellent handbook for those interested in the present and future of China.

The Political Economy of Reform in Post-Mao China is a series of ten essays by political scientists and political economists ranging in subject matter from the effects of reform on socialist agriculture through the single child family policy to the financial reforms in the industrial system. Its aims are similar to those of The China Challenge, but it differs insofar as it goes into much more detail about the actual mechanics of the reforms and, in many cases, is much more technical. For example, Louis Putterman examines in his chapter on 'The Restoration of the Peasant Household as Farm Production Unit in China', the differences between the economic theory of incentives and the Chinese explanation of their use of incentives. A further difference between The China Challenge and The Political Economy of Reform in Post-Mao China is the way in which the latter's authors use personal interviews, statistics and comments from the Chinese press to back up their arguments. There are times, notably in Terry Sicular's chapter on rural marketing and exchange, where the number of figures being quoted almost reaches saturation point and tends to overshadow the general argument. However, the contrast of Elizabeth Perry's chapter on rural collective violence highlights the vast variety of topics included in this volume. If a recurring theme can be found, it is that the reforms may be producing good results at present, but that lack of coordination has meant that some reforms, such as agricultural restructuring, have not gone far enough, and others, such as the decentralisation of investment and spending powers to production units, have gone too far. Christine Wong sums up this basic underlying theme in her chapter on industrial reform and the local sector when she says, 'Serious problems loom on the horizon.' Other chapters deal with the effect of the reforms on peasant income, the politics of industrial reform and the changing role for grass-roots cadres. It is hard to judge a book like this as a whole and the diversity of the subjects studied, together with the editor's professed wish that the volume will be used for classroom work, leads me to the conclusion that, unlike The China Challenge, it is not a good idea to read this book from cover to cover, but merely to refer to relevant chapters individually. Unfortunately, as the information for the book was collected in April 1983, it is perhaps not as up to date as it might be; this does not prevent it from being, on the whole, a more than useful insight into the mechanics of the post-Mao reforms in China.

Apartheid observed

Donald Woods

Move Your Shadow: South Africa, Black and White

Joseph Lelyveld

London: Sphere Books. 1987. 390pp. £3.95pb

Black and Gold: Tycoons, Revolutionaries and Apartheid

Anthony Sampson

London: Hodder and Stoughton. 1987. 280pp. £12.95hb

The Sanctions Handbook

Joseph Hanlon and Roger Omond

Harmondsworth: Penguin. 1987. 389pp. £4.95pb

South Africa: No Easy Path to Peace

Graham Leach

London: Methuen. 1986. 312pp. £2.95pb

King Solomon's Mines Revisited: Western Interests and the Burdened History of Southern Africa

William Minter

New York: Basic Books. 1986. 401pp. n/p

It is ironical that the period of intensification of censorship in South Africa has coincided with the richest yield in valuable books about that country, and five of the best among these are the above titles.

Move Your Shadow is, to me, the best book about South Africa by a non-South African. Joseph Lelyveld had been expelled from South Africa more than a decade ago as New York Times representative, and when, during its brief period of 'reformist' zeal, the South African government approached the newspaper about opening up an office there again during the era of 'Constructive Engagement', the New York Times said the first person it would send would be Lelyveld. Someone present at the discussion recorded that Pretoria's Foreign Minister Roelof 'Pik' Botha clutched his head at the thought as he reluctantly agreed. Botha must have clutched his head again on reading Move Your Shadow, because it records in the most damning way the collision course mentality of South Africa's whites. The title comes from the only Fanagalo or pidgin-Nguni ever learned by most whites, and is used by golfers to their caddies as they are about to putt. The phrase is, of course, also an apt reflection of how white South Africans regard blacks, how insubstantial they really wish blacks were, and how easily they would like them to be wished away like the shadows of the golf caddies.

For me the most memorable part of the book is where Lelyveld records how he rode the early-morning commuter buses which so many blacks have to use, rising long before dawn and returning home as late as ten o'clock at night because the places of work are so far from the areas in which blacks are allowed to live. On reading this I wondered why it had first to be done by an American, and why we South African journalists hadn't thought of doing this sort of thing before Lelyveld did.

His brief word-sketches of whites in authority are all the more damning because he simply records their words and lets them hang themselves on their own evidence. He also turns the spotlight on the black 'homelands' leaders and, by a similar process, illuminates the extent of their collaboration and corruption. His descriptions of Ciskei's Lennox Sebe and his brother Charles are gems of journalistic annihilation.

This is a brilliant book, which will surely continue for years to be one of the classics on South Africa as observed by a foreigner who clearly cares deeply for the country and its people.

Black and Gold is in the same league, and has special authority because it is by the most respected writer on the two subjects of South Africa and international finance. Anthony Sampson has unique credibility and credentials. When he writes on Tambo and Mandela he is writing not only of political figures but of close personal friends in the Johannesburg of the 1950s, and when he advises a Rockefeller in New York or an Astor in London he is talking of respected friends to respected friends.

In this case his message is that the West should disengage from the economic underpinnings of apartheid and throw its influence and power behind the movement for liberation of the majority in South Africa. Though the message is nothing new—Sampson has been advocating this for more than a generation—what is new is the readiness of Western power-brokers to listen to him on the subject. The difference is that they are at last getting the message that their best interests are not compatible with a close identification with Pretoria.

Sampson traces the history of British and American financial involvement in South Africa and its various stages of intensification, and concludes that the time for the final choice of sides by the West in South Africa is now, and that if the right choice is not made or is delayed the West will have reason to regret it.

The Sanctions Handbook is unique. Here, for the first time, the facts for and against sanctions in regard to South Africa are laid out without the weighting of special pleading in their enumeration, though the authors are anything but vague as to their own sympathies and preferences. Joseph Hanlon has become an authority on the economics of the Southern African sub-continent during South Africa's drive for destabilisation of the region, and Roger Omond has long been one of the most reliable writers on the subject of apartheid and its statutory machinery. The great value of writers like Omond is that while his innermost passion in opposing apartheid is no less than that of any other writer, his brand of professional integrity makes him unable to bend or suppress any relevant truth in the assembling of his information, so that he can be trusted utterly on issues of fact. This book is crammed with the kinds of facts which all persons concerned with the South African issue need to know. Being largely a book of facts, it will no doubt be quoted, sometimes out of context, by those who oppose sanctions. But as one of those who support sanctions I find it an invaluable reference, and one that can be used to outquote the opposition.

South Africa: No Easy Path To Peace is, like Move Your Shadow, a book by a foreign journalist who has developed a deep affection for South Africans and South Africa and its particular value lies in the vivid descriptions by its author, Graham Leach, of the 'aboveground' politics and politicians of the country as he has met and interviewed them. Understandably some of his historical references are open to challenge, as when he describes Botha as the first South African leader since the early part of the century to tour Europe. Jan Smuts and even D F Malan had far warmer welcomes to Europe during their premierships. He also gives the impression that the first demolition raids on Crossroads near Cape Town were in 1978, whereas they started in August 1975 and were the subject of controversial debates in 1976 and 1977 when Minister Steyn after denying that shacks were levelled by bulldozers was forced to concede that his denial rested on the fact that the bulldozers were more correctly termed 'front-end loaders'.

But what Graham Leach does so usefully for us is to relate his own valuable experiences as an observer at Crossroads, Soweto and Sharpeville and to bear out yet again the validity in some circumstances of the old saying: 'The onlooker sees most of the game.' His professionalism as BBC correspondent in Southern Africa enables him to take the wide view while bringing us up to date on some of the personalities who are central players in the Southern African drama. It is his kind of trained observance that will be most missed as censorship bites increasingly in South Africa.

King Solomon's Mines Revisited is in many ways a companion piece to Anthony Sampson's Black and Gold, with essentially the same message—that time is running out for the West in its relations with the majority who will inevitably govern post-apartheid South Africa.

This is a powerful book, hard-hitting, in the sense that it leaves the West no excuses for the sordid support of successive repressive regimes in South Africa for material gain, and it deals mercilessly and appropriately with the most sordid chapters of all in this long history of support—the Republican years of Nixon, Kissinger, Reagan and Crocker culminating in the infamy of ‘Constructive Engagement’. William Minter has performed an invaluable service with this volume. It is compulsory reading for anyone seriously interested in South Africa.

Environmental warfare

Alastair Hay

Herbicides in War: The Long-Term Ecological and Human Consequences

Edited by Arthur H Westing

London: Taylor and Francis. 1984. 210pp. £15.00hb

Environmental Warfare: A Technical, Legal and Policy Appraisal

Edited by Arthur H Westing

London: Taylor and Francis. 1984. 107pp. £12.00hb

Environmental issues are on the political agenda once more. Public concern about the threat to forests and inland waterways from acid rain is forcing governments in Europe and North America to take steps, albeit hesitant, to control it. Pollution, like disease, has no frontiers and is at last being seen for what it is, a threat to us all.

Twenty-five years ago, we were not so aware. When the US started to use herbicides in Vietnam to defoliate the forests there was no public outcry. The Kennedy Administration expected one and at first only agreed to a limited herbicide spraying programme, until it could assess public reaction. Anticipating accusations that the United States was waging chemical warfare, Kennedy was reassured when none were made.

Pressed by his military to allow increasing use of herbicides, Kennedy agreed. With no evidence to suggest that the chemicals presented any health hazard, and with reports from commanders in the field that the denuded trees reduced enemy cover and, with it, the risk of ambush, Kennedy had little choice but to agree. But there was a health risk. It was made public seven years later in a report leaked from the US Department of Health. The report showed that Agent Orange, one of the herbicides in use in Vietnam, caused birth deformities when tested in animals. This laboratory study implied that the herbicide could have the same effect in man, and it undermined the Pentagon's case that the herbicides were safe; clearly they were not.

The new evidence about birth deformities—suppressed for eighteen months until the report was leaked—and growing public protest about the Vietnam war in general and herbicide use in particular, forced the Pentagon to stop the defoliation programme. The day of reckoning had arrived. Since then a growing appreciation of the damage caused by the defoliation has led many people to the conclusion that this sort of warfare must be stopped.

Herbicides in War and Environmental Warfare, both volumes emanating from the Stockholm International Peace Research Institute (SIPRI) help to make the case for stopping. The former volume is the published proceedings of a conference held in Ho Chi Minh City (formerly Saigon) in January 1983 to assess the long-term effects of the defoliation programme. It is made abundantly clear that those effects were devastating. Between 1962–1971 the US sprayed some 19 million gallons of herbicide over 10.3 per cent of Vietnam's inland forests, 36 per cent of mangrove forests, 3 per cent of cultivated land and 5 per cent of other land. Most of the herbicide used was Agent Orange, although others, Agents Blue and White—so called because of the painted bands on the drums in which the herbicides were shipped to Vietnam—helped to make up the total.

Convened, in the main, to review the work of Vietnamese scientists, the Ho Chi Minh Conference brought together scientists from many countries with expertise on environmental issues. Herbicides in War contains the reports of their working groups which evaluated the impact of the defoliants on Vietnam's ecology and on the health of the population. Chemists addressed the problem of how to measure the concentration of the toxic contaminant dioxin (2,3,7,8-tetrachlorodibenzodioxin) present in Agent Orange—and responsible for the birth deformities in the animal tests—in the environment.

Background to these subject areas is provided, in the main, by Vietnamese scientists, while the overall findings are set in context by reviews written by American, Swedish and British scientists. Their conclusions are that Vietnam's inland and mangrove forests suffered immediate and extensive damage as a result of the spraying and that the effects persist. Only a massive replanting programme—already started by the Vietnamese—will heal the scars of war. For this work to succeed international aid will be essential. Sadly this has not come to pass. Help on the scale envisaged by the conference has not materialised. Vietnam is being left to replant her own mangrove forests with seeds imported from the south of the country. Drawing on the expertise of her own scientists, Vietnam is slowly but surely replacing these coastal forests.

The picture is far grimmer inland. Repeated spraying of the forests during the war and the felling of sprayed timber by villagers has denuded large tracts of once thickly afforested land. With the trees gone, the fertility of the soil has fallen, assisting low-grade bamboo and elephant grass to recolonise the area.

Replanting has become a major problem and some of the mistakes that have been made were perhaps inevitable, as the Vietnamese tried different approaches to stitch up the wounds to the countryside. It is not something they should have to do on their own.

The USA is still blocking attempts by UN agencies to provide funds and expertise to help with the problem. The Reagan Administration even attempted to stop the agencies sending representatives to the Ho Chi Minh Conference. Some were pressed to stay away, but others such as UNESCO, and the Food and Agriculture Organisation and the UN Environment Programme sent officers. Any help they have been able to provide since then has been trivial.

While the damage to the environment is clear-cut, assessing the effects of the various chemicals on the health of the population is more difficult. Vietnamese scientists believe that the herbicides are responsible for an increase in liver cancer and in the number of children born physically handicapped. Regrettably, the evidence to assess both claims is far from complete and the conference recommended further work to gather more information.

With former US veterans of the war having successfully sued the chemical companies that supplied the herbicides for compensation, for injuries they alleged were caused by exposure to the chemicals, the Vietnamese are more convinced than ever that their health has suffered. Many international scientists are of the same opinion, and are currently helping to collect evidence to prove it.

It is small consolation for Vietnam that the havoc visited on her has led to moves to prevent the same thing happening again elsewhere. Attempts to manipulate the environment of Indochina also included seeding clouds with silver iodide to increase rainfall, and breaching reservoirs to cause flooding. Outrage at these practices, amongst others, led to the enactment of the Environmental Modification (ENMOD) Convention in 1977. Designed to prohibit acts of war intended to change the natural environment, the Convention still fell short of what was needed.

Environmental Warfare is written with the object of filling in the gaps. Drawing on other historical incidents such as the dynamiting of the Huayuankow dyke on the Yellow River by Chinese forces in 1938 to block the advance of Japanese soldiers, this book drives home the point that environmental warfare is indiscriminate in its effects. When the dyke broke, the subsequent flood drowned several thousand Japanese soldiers and removed the immediate threat to the Chinese army. But it was not only the Emperor's forces who perished; several hundred thousand Chinese also drowned and millions were made homeless as the Yellow River burst its banks.

Non-combatants bear the brunt of any act of environmental warfare and in Vietnam it was the civilians who were the real victims. Something is needed to remedy the situation. Environmental Warfare makes suggestions on how this might be done. The book reviews the ENMOD Convention and suggests tightening the text to exclude any manipulation of the environment—as some is still permitted—by armed forces, and the outlawing of research on methods of manipulation for hostile purposes.

FEATURE REVIEWS

In the light of the evidence, few would cavil at these recommendations; we will all benefit from them. The three years since these books were published have witnessed growing concern about the fragility of our environment. A disaster such as the Chernobyl nuclear reactor explosion has had effects far beyond the Soviet border. Chernobyl, acid rain, damage to the ozone layer and the felling of tropical rainforest help to ram home the message that we live in an interdependent environment. These two publications also remind us of this and show how devastating environmental warfare can be, and why it has to stop.

LITERARY PROFILE

Searching for a centre: the writing of V S Naipaul

John Thieme

Few writers arouse more controversy than V S Naipaul. Comments he has made for his disaffected reports on the Third World, such as 'Africa has no future',¹ 'It was on Mauritius that the dodo forgot how to fly',² and 'Muslim fundamentalism has no intellectual substance to it, therefore it must collapse',³ have stirred up considerable animosity towards him in many of the countries he has visited. His dismissal of his native Trinidad as 'unimportant, uncreative, cynical'⁴ and of the West Indies as the 'Third World's third world'⁵ has elicited a similar response in the Caribbean, while his two books about his ancestral homeland of India, An Area of Darkness (1964) and India: A Wounded Civilization (1977), which dwell on the outdoor defecating habits of Indians and the way in which the Hindu doctrine of karma has enmeshed the populace in a quietism tantamount to psychic paralysis, have brought his name into fairly general disrepute among intellectuals on the sub-continent.

His most serious criticisms of the Third World, which have guaranteed that the critical response to his work has seldom been lukewarm, have mainly appeared in his non-fiction. In his novels and short stories there is a more oblique approach to the malaise that he finds endemic in colonial and post-colonial societies, and social themes are subsumed in narratives which focus primarily on the psychology of trapped and displaced individuals. Non-fiction works such as An Area of Darkness and India: A Wounded Civilisation, which initially appear to be social diatribes, can be read as intensely personal documents dramatising the author's own sense of deracination. Similarly, novels such as A House for Mr Biswas (1961), Guerrillas (1975) and A Bend in the River (1979), which initially appear to be concerned with specific inter-personal relationships, can be read as allegories of colonial and post-colonial experience. It is his continuing concern with the consequences of imperialism and its aftermath—particularly the psychological consequences—which makes Naipaul difficult to ignore, despite his many dismissive remarks about the Third World.

Naipaul's origins cast considerable light on the theme of personal

¹ 'Meeting V S Naipaul', Naipaul interviewed by Elizabeth Hardwick, New York Times Book Review, 13 May 1979, p 36.

² The Overcrowded Barracoon, London: André Deutsch, 1972, p 256.

³ Naipaul interviewed by Edward Behr, Newsweek, 18 August 1980, p 38.

⁴ The Middle Passage, Harmondsworth: Penguin, 1969, p 43.

⁵ The Overcrowded Barracoon, p 250.

displacement which looms so large in his work. Although his subsequent absorption into the English tradition has tended to obscure his West Indian East Indianness, his early life and the family structure into which he was born prove to have been crucial determinants of his personality and writings. His grandparents migrated to Trinidad from India under the system of indentureship, but both the Naipauls and the Capildeos (Naipaul's maternal ancestors) were untypical of the majority of Trinidad's East Indian population in that they were brahmins, and both sides of the family could boast pundits (who ministered to the spiritual needs of the new agricultural work-force) among their members.

To be a high-caste Hindu in Trinidad was to be something of a contradiction in terms, since, as Naipaul's younger brother Shiva points out in his African travel journal North of South, 'Our ancestors, when they crossed the black water (the kala pani), lost caste. Complex purification rituals would have to be performed if they were to be cleansed of their defilement and restored to the fold.'⁶ Naipaul frequently illustrates the problematic situation of the high-caste East Indian West Indian and provides extended commentary on it in A House for Mr Biswas, where the Tulsi family, closely modelled on the Capildeos, are depicted as a bastion of the old India in Trinidad, fighting a losing rearguard action against the encroachments of the larger Creole society of the West Indian melting-pot.

Yet displaced Hinduism is only one aspect of the sense of deracination that pervades Naipaul's early fiction. In The Mimic Men (1967) the narrator/protagonist, Ralph Singh, says this of the history of Empire he once dreamed of writing:

It was my hope to give expression to the restlessness, the deep disorder, which the great explorations, the overthrow in three continents of established social organizations, the unnatural bringing together of peoples who could achieve fulfilment only within the security of their own societies and the landscapes hymned by their ancestors, it was my hope to give partial expression to the restlessness which this great upheaval has brought about.⁷

And, while Singh's narrative persona should not simply be identified with Naipaul, these sentiments provide a useful summary of both this novel's larger concerns and those of Naipaul's writing more generally. The disharmony engendered by the sundering of supposedly organic links with ancestral landscapes lies at the heart of his view of the colonial predicament.

On a more personal level, his father, Seepersad (1906-53), proved a crucial formative influence, as Naipaul makes clear in his Foreword to The Adventures of Gurudeva (1976),⁸ the revised British edition of a volume of short stories which Seepersad Naipaul had originally published in Trinidad in the early ⁶ North of South, London: André Deutsch, 1978, p 73.

⁷ The Mimic Men, London: André Deutsch, 1967, p 38.

⁸ The Adventures of Gurudeva, London: André Deutsch, 1976, pp 7-23.

1940s.⁹ Seepersad was for many years a journalist on the Trinidad Guardian, the island's leading newspaper, and both his journalism and his fiction provided an inspiration for the young Naipaul. This is particularly evident in A House for Mr Biswas, where, following his father's advice to take him for a subject,¹⁰ he wrote a fictionalised version of Seepersad's life-story, based on aspects of his fiction and journalism and details from his life, particularly his response to the practices of Hinduism.

Naipaul was born in Chaguanas in central Trinidad in 1932. His actual birthplace was the 'Lion House', an imposing building in the town's main street with a unique Indian design. The house provided the original on which Hanuman House in A House for Mr Biswas was based and it was here that Naipaul spent his earliest years until his family moved, in 1938, to Port of Spain. In 1942, like Anand in A House for Mr Biswas, he came third in the island's exhibition exam (from which free secondary school places could be gained) and won a place at Queen's Royal College, Trinidad's leading secondary school. Naipaul attended the school from 1943 to 1949, specialising in French and Spanish in the upper forms. During these years, in a manner akin to the nomadic wanderings of Mr Biswas and his family, the Naipauls moved several times, before eventually settling, in 1947, in a house in the St James area of Port of Spain. This house was the original for the final house in Mr Biswas.

In 1949 Naipaul was awarded a Trinidad government scholarship to study abroad and the following year left Trinidad to take up a place at University College, Oxford. It was a wish come true. In an oft-quoted passage he records his desire to escape from his colonial homeland:

When I was in the fourth form I wrote a vow on the endpaper of my Kennedy's Revised Latin Primer to leave within five years. I left after six; and for many years afterwards in England, falling asleep in bedsitters with the electric fire on, I had been awakened by the nightmare that I was back in tropical Trinidad.¹¹

So, like the unnamed boy narrator of Miguel Street (1959), Naipaul was able to leave Trinidad through the escape route offered by a metropolitan education. Yet the island society and, more specifically, his Hindu origins had left an indelible mark on him.

At Oxford Naipaul read English, but was disappointed to find himself studying a syllabus 'seemingly aimed at juvenile antiquarians'.¹² Although he distinguished himself at Oxford—J R R Tolkien, who was one of his examiners, rated his Anglo-Saxon translation the best of his year¹³—he was disenchanted with the academic curriculum and already determined to become ⁹ Gurudeva and other Indian Tales, Port of Spain: Trinidad Publications, n.d. (1943?).

¹⁰ The Adventures of Gurudeva, Foreword, p 17.

¹¹ The Middle Passage, p 43.

¹² 'An Area of Brilliance', The Observer (London) 28 November 1971, p 8.

¹³ ibid.

LITERARY PROFILE

a writer. While still at Oxford, he completed a long novel, which was not published.

After coming down from Oxford in 1954, Naipaul worked briefly in the Cataloguing Department of the National Portrait Gallery, London. Apart from part-time jobs in Trinidad while waiting to take up his scholarship, and a period of ten weeks writing advertising copy after reading an unfavourable review of his first novel, this is the only non-literary work Naipaul has ever undertaken and it is one of his proudest boasts that he has known no other profession than that of writer. During his early years in London, he lived in several areas. After initially staying with relatives in Paddington, where he suffered from asthma attacks for four months, he subsequently lived in Kilburn, Muswell Hill and Streatham. It was in Streatham that A House for Mr Biswas, a novel which he has referred to as 'very much a South London book'¹⁴ was written. His experience of living there also clearly lies behind his one 'English' novel, Mr Stone and the Knights Companion (1963). In 1955 Naipaul married Patricia Anne Hale, an English woman he had met at Oxford.

From 1954 to 1956 Naipaul worked for the BBC's Caribbean Voices, a programme of which he became editor. It was broadcast weekly from London to the West Indies and had already built up a considerable reputation as a showcase for new Caribbean writing; it had provided several of the important generation of West Indian writers who came to the fore in the 1950s with an invaluable early outlet for their work. It was while he was working for the BBC that Naipaul began to write stories for what was eventually to take shape as Miguel Street (1959).¹⁵ The book was written quickly in a period of six weeks, at the end of which time Naipaul felt he had found himself as a writer. A publisher was not, however, immediately forthcoming and it was only after the publication of his first two novels, The Mystic Masseur (1957) and The Suffrage of Elvira (1958) that Miguel Street found its way into print.

In these early books the colonial situation of the characters is for the most part implicit, but it is nevertheless central to an understanding of their predicament. In Miguel Street the inhabitants of the fictional Port of Spain street which gives the book its title either imitate foreign role models or strive to find a sense of identity through a macho ethic similar to that embodied in calypso, Trinidad's most important folk narrative medium. Yet they was not, however, immediately forthcoming and it was only after the their quest for self-fulfilment. In The Mystic Masseur the narrative takes the form of a rogue's progress, as the picaroon hero gradually rises to the top of the society. In The Suffrage of Elvira the formula is reversed: the action focuses not on a trickster, as in The Mystic Masseur, but on a protagonist who is the victim of trickery, a candidate from Port of Spain who comes to the rottener-than-rotten constituency of Elvira in South Trinidad to buy himself a seat in Trinidad's second election under universal suffrage, and finds himself no match for the locals' sharp practice as he is forced to bribe and bribe again. As polling-day approaches, he begins to fear defeat, but there is no such peripeteia. He has paid through the nose for the seat and he wins it. This, Naipaul's dead-pan manner suggests, is the way things work in Trinidad. Everyone and everything has a price and to succeed one must pay it. The ground rules are clear enough. The irony of this, Naipaul's most richly comic novel, emerges not from exposure of the characters' moral aberrations, but from the implicit suggestion that this is a society in which concepts of justice and morality do not operate.

¹⁴ 'Portrait Gallery', Naipaul interviewed by David Bates, Sunday Times Magazine (London), 26 May 1963, p 13.

¹⁵ See Finding the Centre, London: André Deutsch, 1984, pp 17-33.

It is a view of society which is articulated more clearly in Naipaul's Caribbean travel journal, The Middle Passage (1962), in which he writes about the supremacy of the trickster figure in Trinidad and claims an affinity between the society in which he grew up and the amoral world of the Spanish picaresque novel:

Every person of eminence was held to be crooked and contemptible. We lived in a society which denied itself heroes. . . . For talent, a futility, the Trinidadian substituted intrigue; and in the exercise of this, in small things as well as large, he became a master.¹⁶

By 1960 Naipaul's British reputation was already considerable. He was the author of three successful books, two of which won prizes, and he had been reviewing fiction for the New Statesman since 1957. He was, however, still struggling to make a living as a writer. He was hard at work on A House for Mr Biswas, his longest novel and the work which many critics regard as his masterpiece.

Mr Biswas is both a minutely circumstantial account of an individual life and a novel which may be read as an allegory of the East Indian's situation in Trinidad, or of the colonial predicament more generally. Naipaul has described the colonial mentality as a kind of existentialist impotence, a condition in which the individual feels powerless to exercise freedom of choice:

. . . to be a colonial is, in a way, to know a total kind of security. It is to have all decisions about major issues taken out of one's hands. It is to feel that one's political status has been settled so finally that there is very little one can do in the world.¹⁷

From early on in his life Mohun Biswas is a victim of this condition; he feels a sense of displacement and resolves to own a house of his own. The succession of houses in which he lives—mostly as a tenant—forms a structural pattern which covers many aspects of Hindu life in pre-Independence Trinidad and, by extension, the colonial psychology. Central to this pattern is Biswas's alternation between periods of passive dependence on his in-laws, the Tulsis.

¹⁶ The Middle Passage, pp 43–4.

¹⁷ 'Without a Place', V S Naipaul in conversation with Ian Hamilton, Times Literary Supplement (London), 30 July 1971, p 897.

LITERARY PROFILE

who represent the older Hindu way of life, now struggling to maintain a sense of distinctiveness in the larger Creole society of Trinidad, and attempts to assert his independence (to decolonise himself?) which are mainly channelled into the ideal of the house.

Two early attempts at building his own house fail and, since throughout there is a correlation between Biswas's psychic health and the houses in which he lives—he breaks down when the first of these two houses is destroyed in a storm—the suggestion seems to be that he is not yet a sufficiently emancipated person to stand alone. Finally he is duped into paying too much for a jerry-built modern house where he dies at the age of forty-six. The wheel has come full circle, since the novel's Prologue has adumbrated this conclusion, but now that the full story has been told, the ending is fraught with ambiguity. Though Biswas has been cheated and though the expense and worry of the final house may well have contributed to his early death, he has succeeded in attaining his ideal of the house, in claiming his own 'portion of the earth'.¹⁸ The Prologue has concluded with the remark that it would have been 'terrible' for Biswas to have died 'unnecessary and unaccommodated'¹⁹ and this has been averted, since he is accommodated both literally and metaphorically. The acquisition of the final house may be seen as representing a partial freedom, a limited movement beyond the colonial psychology.

After completing A House for Mr Biswas, Naipaul was awarded a three-month scholarship by the Trinidad and Tobago government, which enabled him to return to Trinidad. While he was there, the Prime Minister and distinguished West Indian historian, Dr Eric Williams, suggested that he should write a book about the Caribbean, and the scholarship was extended to enable him to visit other parts of the region. Naipaul spent a total of seven months travelling in the Caribbean, visiting Dutch and French societies as well as other Anglophone territories. The Middle Passage, the first of Naipaul's many non-fiction works, was the result of these travels. The book is as much a social investigation as a traveller's journal and throughout it demonstrates a concern with cultural identity in the Caribbean and Guianas. While the section on British Guiana (Guyana) is the longest, the Trinidad chapter looms largest, for here Naipaul is writing as much from past experience as from his present visit, and the result is a response characterised by provocative remarks about the island's inhabitants, such as: 'Port of Spain is the noisiest city in the world. Yet it is forbidden to talk,'²⁰ and 'Like monkeys pleading for evolution, each claiming to be better than the other, Indians and Negroes appeal to the unacknowledged white audience to see how much they despise each other.'²¹

Not surprisingly, such remarks have made the book notorious in the West

¹⁸ A House for Mr Biswas, London: André Deutsch, 1961, p. 13.

¹⁹ ibid.

²⁰ The Middle Passage, p. 58.

²¹ ibid., p. 87.

Indies and attacks on it include a review by the Jamaican novelist, John Hearne, who raises the charge of negrophobia.²² Outside the Trinidad chapter, the writing is more matter-of-fact and, while the remainder of the work is not without its moments of waspish satire, it lacks the vitriolic and tendentious quality of this section.

Now launched on a second career as a travel writer, Naipaul in 1962 received a Phoenix Trust Award to write a book about India. He has always felt it necessary to be physically absent from the places he is treating in his fiction and while in India he wrote his only novel with an entirely English setting and protagonist, Mr Stone and the Knights Companion (1963). Despite the change in setting, this is a work which demonstrates considerable similarity with the two masterpieces of Naipaul's fictional oeuvre so far, A House for Mr Biswas and The Mimic Men. Like these two novels, it is a fable about cultural identity and like his most recent work, The Enigma of Arrival (1987), it is a 'Condition of England' novel.²³

In a 1971 interview Naipaul said:

In writing my first four or five books (including books which perhaps people think of as my big books) I was simply recording my reactions to the world; I hadn't come to any conclusions about it. . . . But since then, through my writing, through the effort honestly to respond, I have begun to have ideas about the world. I have begun to analyse.²⁴

This suggests that a change occurred in his attitude to writing and responding to experience about the time he first went to India and the journey to the sub-continent did mark a watershed in Naipaul's development. Never having felt at home in Trinidad or England, he travelled to India in the hope that it would offer a culture where he would experience a sense of belonging. He came away feeling 'It was a journey that ought not to have been made; it had broken my life in two.'²⁵ His experiences in India are recorded in An Area of Darkness (1964), but an article reprinted in The Overcrowded Barracoon (1972) provides the most succinct account of his reactions as a returned colonial:

A colonial in the double sense of one who had grown up in a Crown colony and one who had been cut off from the metropolis, be it either England or India, I came to India expecting to find metropolitan attitudes. I had imagined that in some ways the largeness of the land would be reflected in the attitudes of the people. I have found . . . the psychology of the cell and the hive.²⁶

An Area of Darkness is a highly personal book, finally far more an account of personal trauma than an analysis of the social malaise Naipaul detects in India.

²² Caribbean Quarterly, 8 December 1962, p 65-6.

²³ This theme is developed in my article 'Naipaul's English fable: Mr Stone and the Knights Companion', Modern Fiction Studies 30(3) Autumn 1984, pp 497-503.

²⁴ 'The Writer as Colonial', V S Naipaul interviewed by Adrian Rowe-Evans, Transition (40) 1971, pp 56-7.

²⁵ An Area of Darkness, London: André Deutsch, 1964, pp 279-80.

²⁶ 'In the Middle of the Journey', The Overcrowded Barracoon, p 44.

It does, however, attack India on several levels. The hierarchical division of labour occasioned by the caste system, the Indian lack of a sense of history and the conflicts he finds between Hindu tenets on cleanliness and the omnipresent excrement he sees are all particular objects of his irony. Though Naipaul may appear to be attacking a variety of targets, virtually all the Hindu failings which he documents in An Area of Darkness can be traced to the influence of karma, the doctrine that says that one's fate in life is determined by one's behaviour in previous incarnations. Naipaul sees it as a paralysing, defeating philosophy, which induces a quietism that precludes Western-style self-realisation and progress.²⁷

Naipaul's voice in An Area of Darkness purports to be that of a detached outsider. Throughout, however, he emerges as an irritable and hypersensitive traveller and this has the effect of undermining the credibility of his reportage. Towards the end, this pattern comes to a head, when he goes on a pilgrimage to see the Shiva lingam in the Cave of Amarnath. Disgusted by the insanitary habits of his fellow-pilgrims, he finally refuses to enter the cave. His Muslim companion returns to say that no lingam has formed this year, but this does not obviate the fact that Naipaul has declined to encounter the symbol of the Hindu continuity. He remains a spectator, retaining an aura of detachment through non-participation. It is an attitude which is close to the karma-induced resignation that he deplores and, to his credit, Naipaul subsequently admits as much in a passage which links Indian non-involvement with his own: 'It is only now, as the impatience of the observer is dissipated in the process of writing and self-inquiry, that I see how much this philosophy has also been mine.'²⁸ It would appear to be this discovery that makes for the more analytical stance in Naipaul's later work.

In 1966 Naipaul spent six months as Writer-in-Residence at Makerere University in Uganda. During this period he travelled in East Africa and Zaire. It provided the material from which the title-novella of In a Free State (1971) grew. Towards the end of his time in East Africa, Naipaul lived in a hotel in western Kenya. While in Uganda and Kenya he wrote the London sections of The Mimic Men; the West Indian parts were written in London.

The Mimic Men (1967) is another major exploration of the colonial psychology, as the protagonist, Ralph Singh (né Ranjit Kripalsingh), seeks, like Mr Biswas and Mr Stone, to impose order on his life. The novel takes the form of Singh's autobiographical memoir and finally he concludes that the act of writing has provided the order for which he has previously searched without success. This is a direct development of themes explored in Naipaul's previous two novels. One of the avenues through which Mr Biswas seeks self-fulfilment is writing and Mr Stone's Knights Companion scheme is very much a literary project.

²⁷ See India: A Wounded Civilization, London: André Deutsch, 1977, p 25.

²⁸ An Area of Darkness, p 198.

For the first time in his career Naipaul is strongly indebted to Joseph Conrad, the novelist who supplanted his early masters, Charles Dickens, and H G Wells, as the most significant literary influence on his work. In The Mimic Men the Conradian influence can be seen in incidental allusions, but more generally it is manifest in the use of a fragmentary and unchronological narrative structure, a form employed by Conrad in such novels as Lord Jim and Nostromo, and in the use of a narrator through whom events are filtered to the reader. In Conrad Naipaul found a kindred spirit. Both are non-English writers (Conrad was Polish) whose absorption into the English tradition has done little to dispel their sense of displacement. Such displacement shows itself in their work on both formal and thematic levels. Formally, the disjointed narrative method and the use of a narrator whose values may be questioned, have the effect of creating a relativistic atmosphere, far removed from the certitudes of most traditional English novels. On a thematic level, Naipaul attempts to dramatise the relationship between the socio-political and the psychological consequences of imperialism in The Mimic Men and, in words he was later to use in an essay on Conrad, follows the Pole in writing:

Not as a man with a cause, but a man offering, as in Nostromo, a vision of the world's half-made societies, as places which continuously made and unmade themselves, where there was no goal, and where always 'something inherent in the necessities of successful action . . . carried with it the moral degradation of the idea.'²⁹

Singh's quest for an ideal order takes many forms: he looks for it in London ('centre of the world'³⁰), the Aryan past of his ancestors, the Edenic state of pre-Columbian America, the pastoral world of Latin literature and even, when he dreams of retiring to one of the few cocoa estate houses remaining on Isabella, in the heyday of the plantocracy. Yet, from the outset, the voice of Singh the narrator makes it clear that 'All landscapes turn eventually to land, the gold of the imagination to the lead of reality.'³¹ He fails to find the fulfilment he is seeking through any of these avenues and turns all too easily to vapid sexual encounters and a cynical political role which involves "the moral degradation of the idea". Only writing appears to offer any release from the disorder that he feels characterises his life, but even here the problematic use of Singh as the narrative persona leaves open the question of whether he has truly progressed. More complex than any of Naipaul's previous novels, The Mimic Men ushered in a new period in his writing, in which there is a more overt concern with imperialism and its latter-day consequences.

In The Middle Passage Naipaul had written about the difficulties encountered by historians trying to find an appropriate tone in which to write about the West Indies. In The Loss of El Dorado (1969), a highly personal history of Trinidad, he faced the problem himself. The method he adopted was unusual. He decided to confine himself to an account of 'the two moments when Trinidad was touched by "history"' ³²; the latter stages of the quest for El Dorado by Sir Walter Raleigh and the Spanish conquistador, Antonio de Berrio; and the attempt to make Port of Spain a lucrative trading-post during the period of political turmoil in the Caribbean at the end of the eighteenth century.

²⁹ The Return of Eva Perón, London: André Deutsch 1980, p 216.

³⁰ The Mimic Men, p 22.

³¹ ibid., p 13.

Both stories are fully documented and bring to life figures who receive comparatively little attention in other historical accounts: de Berrio; Thomas Picton, the British governor of Trinidad at the end of the eighteenth century; and Luisa Calderon, a mulatto girl falsely accused by her lover of theft, in the latter period. But despite the scholarship which informs The Loss of El Dorado, it is 'a novelist's history', ³³ characterised by an accretion of circumstantial detail and an authorial stance which denies colonial society any autonomous life of its own. The tone is much less dispassionate than that of most historians and one is always aware of a voice which, without ever quite identifying itself with the coloniser, holds itself aloof from the society that is being discussed.

By this point in his career Naipaul had won all Britain's leading literary awards, with the exception of the Booker Prize which he received in 1971 for In a Free State. In a Free State (1971) brings together a novella, in which two English expatriates journey through an independent East African country, and a number of shorter pieces: a Prologue and Epilogue from an otherwise unpublished Egyptian travel-journal and two stories about displaced Indians. All the sections treat the theme of displacement in the neo-colonial world. In the first story, 'One Out of Many', Santosh, a Bombay domestic, goes to Washington with his diplomatic employer and finds himself lost in the 'capital of the world', ³⁴ in 'Tell Me Who to Kill' two Trinidadian brothers are affected in different ways by their experience of deracination in England; in the novella which gives the work its title, neither of the two protagonists belongs in England any longer. The excerpts from the travel-journal centre initially around an elderly English tramp, a self-styled 'citizen of the world' ³⁵ who, during a crossing from Piraeus to Alexandria, succeeds in stirring up his cabin-mates' enmity through an unspecified offence, and, in the Epilogue, around the ultimate displaced character of Naipaul's fiction, the author himself. Naipaul has confessed to being 'totally involved' ³⁶ in all the characters of In a Free State, and here in the final section the mask drops, at least partially, as he intrudes himself as the central persona.

In each of the sections freedom proves to be an uneasy, anguished state. The ³² The Loss of El Dorado, Harmondsworth: Penguin: 1973, p 15.

³³ Robert Hamner, V S Naipaul, New York: Twayne: 1973, p 30.

³⁴ In a Free State, London: André Deutsch, 1971, p 25.

³⁵ ibid., p 11.

³⁶ 'Life on Approval', Naipaul interviewed by Alex Hamilton, The Guardian (London), 4 October 1971, p 8.

geographical freedom of the tramp of the Prologue renders him an outcast and the reader is left feeling that his unrevealed crime may well be his failure to belong. Santosh runs away from his employer, only to find he has exchanged one kind of bondage for another, since he is now an illegal immigrant. In 'Tell Me Who to Kill', the Trinidadian Indian narrator, nourished on Hollywood myths, devotes himself to furthering his younger brother's education in England, but comes to realise that metropolitan achievement is as far beyond his brother as himself. He is left with a desire to kill the 'enemy' who is the author of his sufferings. But no enemy is to be found. Once again Naipaul is dramatising the psychology of the colonial, who has been denied freedom by forces beyond his control. And in the title-story Naipaul's English expatriates are seen to be leading equally constricted mental existences in their East African 'free state'.

Thus far, In a Free State follows the negative vision of Naipaul's earlier fiction, but in the Epilogue the author becomes involved in the action with a positive gesture of commitment. As he watches desert children being lured to approach an oasis rest house for scraps of tourists' food and then horse-whipped by the coffee waiter for coming too near, he suddenly becomes incensed, rushes into the middle of the scene in protest and abruptly stops the flagellation. Subsequently he feels the act has been futile, but it has demonstrated the extent of Naipaul's movement away from the inertia of the karma-psychology and the colonial mentality. Similarly, the more analytical mode of In a Free State represents a development in Naipaul's approach and, in the year of its publication, he said in an interview, 'I've decolonised myself through the practice of writing, through what I've learned from writing, looking at the world.'³⁷

After his first journey to India in 1962, Naipaul began to travel widely, often recording his impressions of the societies he visited in articles for the British and American quality press. The Overcrowded Barracoon (1972) brought together twenty-one journalistic pieces he had published between 1958 and 1972. Since its publication Naipaul has continued to engage in such journalistic writing, but has preferred in-depth pieces which have sometimes furnished him with the raw material for his fiction. In 1973 he travelled to Trinidad to do research for two long Sunday Times articles on the Abdul Malik ('Michael X') killings in Trinidad³⁸ and this material provided him with the germ for his next novel Guerrillas (1975), where Malik's career is paralleled by that of Jimmy Ahmed, another self-styled 'black' radical of mixed parentage.³⁹

There are, however, considerable differences between these two portraits of ³⁷ 'Portrait of an artist: what makes Naipaul run', Caribbean Contact (Bridgetown) May 1973, p. 18.

³⁸ Sunday Times Magazine, Part One, 12 May 1974, pp. 16-35; Part Two, 19 May 1974, pp. 24-41.

³⁹ For a discussion of similarities between Malik and Jimmy Ahmed, see my article "'Apparitions of Disaster": Brontëan parallels in Wide Sargasso Sea and Guerrillas', Journal of Commonwealth Literature 14(1) August 1979, pp. 125-6.

the false redeemer. In Guerrillas the treatment of Jimmy Ahmed is less concerned with the damage such a figure does to a certain section of society (the major emphasis in Naipaul's treatment of Malik) than with his own personal tragedy. The emphasis is shifted so that it falls mainly on Jimmy as a displaced person, a typical Naipaul protagonist, trying, like Ralph Singh, to order his life through writing and also very close to Mr Biswas in his belief that "men must claim their portion of the earth".⁴⁰ Jimmy is, however, only one element in a larger design, one of a triptych of main characters. The others are Jane, a middle-class Englishwoman who becomes involved with Jimmy, but has come to the island secure in her sense of being privileged and her knowledge that she has a return air ticket, and Roche, her lover, who, though he has the best of white liberal credentials (having been imprisoned and tortured in South Africa) is revealed as a man lacking in ideology or any form of personal belief. Both characters provide case-studies in what Naipaul has referred to, in his essay on Conrad, as the 'corruption of causes'.⁴¹

A 1975 return visit to Zaire provided Naipaul with source material both for another in-depth journalistic essay, 'A New King for the Congo'⁴² (included in The Return of Eva Perón (1980)), and for his next novel, A Bend in the River (1979). The relationship between fictional and non-fictional accounts is similar to that between 'The Killings in Trinidad' and Guerrillas. It is well summed up by Elaine Campbell who argues that 'a refinement of rage'⁴³ takes place between the writing of the essay, which is characterised by Naipaul's by now familiar dismissive approach to the Third World, and the novel, which is more concerned with the plight of individuals. In both works the present predicament of Africa is vividly encapsulated in a powerful image of a world gradually becoming increasingly clogged up and moving towards stasis, the image of the water-hyacinths on the Zaire river which in the last generation have increasingly disrupted navigation. However, whereas in 'A New King for the Congo' these are seen as threatening to 'imprison the river people in the immemorial ways of the bush',⁴⁴ in A Bend in the River they become a more multivalent image, relating to personal as well as social paralysis. Both texts show post-independence Africa as reverting back to the bush, after what the novel calls 'the miraculous peace of the colonial time',⁴⁵ but in A Bend in the River, while the personal and the public cannot finally be separated from one another, this situation is more the backcloth for another Naipaul study of individual displacement than the epicentre of the narrative.

The narrator/protagonist, Salim, begins his story with the words 'The World

⁴⁰ Guerrillas, London: André Deutsch, 1975, p 17.

⁴¹ The Return of Eva Perón, p 216.

⁴² The New York Review of Books, 26 June 1975, pp 19-25.

⁴³ 'A refinement of rage: V S Naipaul's A Bend in the River', World Literature Written in English 18(2) November 1979, pp 394-406.

⁴⁴ The Return of Eva Perón, p 184.

⁴⁵ A Bend in the River, London: André Deutsch, 1979, p 41.

is what it is; men who are nothing, who allow themselves to become nothing, have no place in it.⁴⁶ Survival is at the very heart of the fiction from this moment until the very end, which sees Salim taking flight from the town at the bend in the river (primarily based on Kisangani), where, after previously fleeing from the East African coast, he has built up a business as a shopkeeper. Salim, like so many of the characters of Naipaul's later novels, emerges as a casualty of Empire, a man who finds himself running short of places which offer him a secure existence. Where he differs from many of these characters, however, is in his capacity for pragmatic action to ensure his own survival. Naipaul has said that he chose the title of the novel for the 'uplift'⁴⁷ in it and, while at first sight this remark may puzzle many readers, Salim's capacity to adapt and take a new direction, when his world falls apart at the end, does offer a more positive vision than Guerrillas. On the other hand the presentation of Africa in A Bend in the River is remorselessly negative.

Naipaul's next book, The Return of Eva Perón with The Killings in Trinidad (1980), brought together four of his journalistic essays: the pieces on Michael X and Zaire, already mentioned; the long title-essay on Argentina; and a shorter piece on Conrad. While initially this volume may appear, like The Overcrowded Barracoon, simply to be a collection of Naipaul's journalism, in fact there are clear thematic parallels between the various component parts. The accounts of Malik, Eva Perón and Mobutu (the Congo's 'new king') and their societies all show how charismatic leadership ministers to the fantasies of those who find their lives in some way deficient. Yet it ultimately fails to offer anything other than a leadership cult which can destroy leaders and followers alike, while contributing nothing to the improvement of society. The essay on Conrad places everything which has preceded it into context by focusing on Conrad's absorption with the forerunners of today's Third World societies, the juxtaposition of cultures and the 'corruption of causes'. In each of the previous pieces there has been at least one reference to Conrad's work and now, in retrospect, his influence appears to have been underlying the whole volume.

During the latter part of 1979 and early 1980 Naipaul spent seven months travelling in Muslim societies in the Middle and Far East and this experience provided the subject of his next book, Among the Believers: An Islamic Journey (1981). He visited four non-Arab Muslim countries—Iran, Pakistan, Malaysia and Indonesia—and his account presents itself as a personal attempt to explain the 'Islamic revival'. The picture of contemporary Islam which emerges is for the most part a negative one, characterised by confusion and contradiction. The believers' passionate conviction is seen as a force which is impotent to bring about greatly needed social change. As in The Mimic Men, Naipaul suggests that it is paradoxical that Third World societies which reject the West nevertheless depend on it for its technology and material goods. Among the ⁴⁶ ibid., p 9.

⁴⁷ Naipaul interviewed by David Pryce-Jones, Radio Times (London), 24–30 March 1979, p 11.

Believers has been criticised by Muslim intellectuals, who have found it superficial, biased towards Western rationalism, guilty of identifying the 'Islamic revival with fanaticism'⁴⁸ and, finally, unrepresentative because of its exclusion of Arab and African Islamic societies. It is hard to disagree with such evaluations. Despite the considerable amount of penetrating first-hand observation and analysis offered in the text, its point of view remains blinkered and guaranteed to reinforce Western prejudices. The disenchanted polemical stance is comparable with An Area of Darkness and India: A Wounded Civilisation. All three works offer an account of how one of the world's great religions is stultifying individual development in Asia. But whereas the two Indian books are written out of a passionate love-hate relationship with Hinduism and considerable knowledge of the culture, Among the Believers finally comes across as more of a tourist's-eye view, redeemed only by sensitive witness and a sense of authorial integrity.

Naipaul's two most recent books, Finding the Centre (1984) and The Enigma of Arrival (1987) incorporate a greater amount of autobiography than anything he has written hitherto, and reveal the extent to which his personal experience has informed all his work. Finding the Centre is comprised of two very different narratives: 'Prologue to an Autobiography', described by Naipaul as 'not an autobiography, a story of life or deeds done', but 'an account of something less easily seized: my literary beginnings and the imaginative promptings of my many-sided background',⁴⁹ and 'The Crocodiles of Yamoussoukro', a travel-piece about a recent journey to the Ivory Coast. The two pieces have much in common, for both—like so much of Naipaul's work—concern a quest for signification. The search for a centre comes to stand both for the attempt by marginalised countries and peoples to find order, and for the writer's search for kernels of narrative which can express this predicament. In his Foreword, Naipaul says 'both pieces are about the process of writing' and 'seek in different ways to admit the reader to that process'.⁵⁰ The Enigma of Arrival (reviewed below) presents itself as a novel, but is in fact mainly autobiography—autobiography of the same kind as William Wordsworth's Prelude or Derek Walcott's Another Life, that is to say a text in which the writer explores the genesis and growth of his artistic impulse. Taken together these two recent works provide a fitting climax to Naipaul's career so far. They show him discussing his origins and how these have shaped him as the kind of writer he is—tetchy, alienated and élitist, yet unfailingly committed to documenting his personal vision of the world with a consistency of purpose and an integrity which make him difficult to put aside even when he is at his most illiberal.

⁴⁸ Amin Malak, 'V S Naipaul and the believers', Modern Fiction Studies, 30(3) Autumn 1984, p 564.

⁴⁹ Finding the Centre, p 9.

⁵⁰ ibid.

LITERARY FEATURE REVIEWS

Taking stock of dead people: Argentina's reflections on the 'Dirty War' years

Nick Caistor

A State of Fear: Memories of Argentina's Nightmare

Andrew Graham-Yooll

London: Eland. 1986. 180pp. £9.95hb/£4.95pb

Requiem for a Woman's Soul

Omar Rivabella

London: Penguin. 1986. 116pp. £2.95pb

The Duke: Memories and Antimemories of a Participant in the Repression

Enrique Medina

London: Zed. 1985. 120pp. £8.95hb/£3.95pb

The Shadow by the Door

Gerardo Di Masso

London: Zed. 1986. 96pp. £8.95hb/£3.95pb

The Long Night of Francisco Sanctis

Humberto Costantini

London: Fontana. 1985. 184pp. £3.50pb

'I don't take no stock of dead people' Huckleberry Finn

The ghastly terrors of the Second World War holocaust led many writers of poetry and fiction to feel that whatever they had to say was pointless. Faced with the evidence of man's inhumanity to man, the written word seemed utterly irrelevant. The torturers' own imaginative efforts appeared to have far outstripped those of the imaginative writers. People working to achieve some grasp of life and emotion in the unyielding black and white of the printed word felt themselves overwhelmed by the scale of the horror perpetrated by the Nazis, and by minds that could imagine the death of whole categories of human beings. Some writers chose silence. Others turned to prayers. Most American and British writers retreated into the easier anguishes of the bedroom, drawing room or common room.

Mercifully, Western Europe and the USA have been spared direct experience of man's apparent capacity for boundless cruelty since then. They have of course exported some of their own: to Malaysia, Algeria or Vietnam (remember My Lai?), but have gradually and gratefully allowed themselves to forget the horrors of the 1930s and 1940s. This lapse in memory has produced a smugness which locates barbarity in the Third World and sees it as one of the things, like over-population, extreme poverty, subsistence farming, or revolution, that these unfortunate developing regions are to be encouraged to give up in the name of progress and civilisation.

Unfortunately for this view, much of the horror in the modern world is itself enacted in the name of that civilisation. Argentina is a case in point. In the 1970s, that country degenerated into a state of violence in which guerrilla kidnappings and murders were answered by a monstrously bloody campaign by the armed forces. Following its coup d'état in March 1976, the military killed at least 9,000 people between 1976 and the return to civilian rule in 1983, in what they described as a guerra sucia or 'dirty war'. The first leader of the military junta, General Jorge Videla, spoke of their enemy as 'not just someone with a gun or bomb, but also someone who spreads ideas that are contrary to Western and Christian civilization'.¹

To fight this threat, Videla and his colleagues ordered thousands of people to be seized illegally from their houses, places of work or from the streets. They were carried off to secret detention camps, routinely tortured for information, then killed when they were no longer considered of any use. Throughout, the armed forces denied any knowledge of these people, and tried to destroy all records proving their existence. At the root of all the books under review is the determination that this terror shall never be allowed to happen again; they are there to provide a record, as a deliberate act of remembrance, since, as Andrew Graham-Yooll puts it: 'Argentina has never had the capacity to recollect that it loses some of its life every time it loses its memory'.

First came the lists. Within Amnesty International, the International Red Cross, and then inside Argentina itself, the names of the desaparecidos ('disappeared') were collected. It seemed futile, ridiculous, to be trying to figure out simply how to spell a person's surname correctly, piecing together from scraps of information just when and where he or she was last seen. Yet this effort has proved vital in countering the plans to make so many people disappear into thin air, without even allowing their names to survive. Andrew Graham-Yooll also set himself the task of compiling a day-by-day chronicle of all the news items related to the violence and repression, while he was still able to work as a journalist in Argentina. In A State of Fear he is the honest witness who observes all that is going on around him and tries to maintain some basic sense of decency, some belief that the society in which he was born and grew up cannot be wholly evil. He does not seek to glorify his own role, nor to derive sensational effects from the horror, but powerfully conveys the sense of being engulfed by such a situation while able to do little to prevent it, except to cling to a stubborn kind of personal integrity. For his pains, his life was threatened many times and he was forced into exile in September 1976. Perhaps the most disturbing part of his book are the final chapters which concern his return to Argentina six years later. Here he describes his meeting with a torturer—smart, alive and well and living in Buenos Aires—and it is obvious that this man's cruelty, like that of many others, still remains a threat, simply awaiting orders to be unleashed again.

¹ The Times (London) 4 January 1978, quoted in Nunca Más (Never Again): A Report by Argentina's National Commission on Disappeared People, London: Faber and Faber, 1986, p. xiii.

Graham-Yooll is circumspect in his description of torture, being more concerned with discovering the motivation behind it. In their report, Nunca Más (Never Again), the members of the Argentina's National Commission on Disappeared People decided that they would only describe one person's experience of torture in detail, so that they would not be providing 'merely an encyclopedia of horror'.² Requiem for a Woman's Soul left me distinctly uneasy in this respect. Purporting to be a novel ('a remarkable piece of literature' according to Norman Mailer on the back cover) the book is in fact all taken from the testimonies in Nunca Más. These testimonies are woven into the story of a priest who is given fragments of notes written by one of the disappeared which relate her terrifying experiences in a secret torture camp. As the priest sifts and orders these notes, he finds himself increasingly despairing and isolated from his community and his Church hierarchy. His only friend, a bishop, dies at the end in a suspicious car accident (again, this is based on a true incident, the death of Bishop Angelelli of La Rioja, as related in Nunca Más), which event finally tips the priest into madness. Omar Rivabella is described as being 'a strong advocate of human rights' whose work has been published in Penthouse, but this book is a distasteful example of the voyeurism of horror that Graham-Yooll avoids by his honesty, and Nunca Más by its reticence. Rivabella spares us absolutely none of the grisly details of torture, but fails to make literature of it. By this I mean that it serves no other purpose than to horrify, and lacks the saving grace of any imaginative attempt to take us beyond the terror, to explain and even reconcile it at some deeper level. This must surely be the claim that literature upholds, however difficult it may be to fulfil in the light of Auschwitz, the killing fields of Cambodia, or the clandestine camps of Argentina.

Some such attempt is what makes The Duke by Enrique Medina, a fifty-year-old Argentine novelist, more palatable and more interesting, despite the brutal sadism of some of its scenes. The 'Duke' in question is an ageing boxer, who now makes his money by torturing and killing people for an underworld gang. One strand of the book is the Duke's monologue (to his last companion, a rat) as he prepares to escape from the revenge threatened by another gang which he has double-crossed. His monologue ranges over his life, pointing up the deprivation and lack of love that has characterised it, while interspersed with brief moments of glory in the boxing ring, where, as everywhere else, society's rules have been to batter the opponent into submission, to kill if necessary. The brutality of the boxing-ring is mirrored in his treatment of women, which is in turn explicitly compared to his job as a slaughterer in one of Argentina's huge slaughterhouses (it is no coincidence that the main instrument of torture turned against the 'disappeared' was the electric prod used to control cattle on their way to slaughter):

² Nunca Más, p 20.

the girl was great it's no different from spending the day banging cows on the head in the end I started liking it and felt something like pleasure when the tip of the hammer hit the mark it was like I felt a charge of electricity or something from the handle of the hammer from the cow's brains to my hands and my whole body that was the only way to get used to it to like the work and when I was able to find it a pleasure was when I beat Mirna for the first time.

Another strand of the novel consists of interviews with people who knew him, suggesting that his attempt to escape has been a failure, while the third component is his involvement with the sadistic killer, Walter (who, like Hitler, was a weekend painter).

Medina's virtue is to take to the extreme the attempt to shock, and to make the printed word convey outrage. As the world is increasingly interpreted through visual images—such as the stark television pictures of a man shot through the head in Vietnam, children starving to death in Ethiopia, a US newsman executed in Somoza's Nicaragua, the massacres in the Palestinian refugee camps in Beirut—as our memory and sensibility become dominated by this graphic flood, so writing and the intellectual effort of interpreting abstract hieroglyphs on a page may appear increasingly distant from actual horror and the possibility of acting to avert it. Yet, books can perhaps have a more profound effect, not so easily dismissed as the mundane images of the 'banality of evil' presented by television and the Press. This possibility seems to lie at the heart of the appeal that Medina is making to his reader, that of not forgetting so easily.

Memory is also central to Gerardo di Masso's short novel, The Shadow by the Door. Here the main protagonists are members of a guerrilla organisation of the kind which in the 1970s sought to resolve the social injustices within countries such as Uruguay, Chile or Argentina, with their own brand of revolutionary nationalism. Ill-prepared both ideologically and militarily, they fell easy prey to the armed forces who were only too happy to engage in the 'dirty wars' necessary to wipe them out. Here, as in the other books, we are offered scenes of torture, and the stock character of the torturer who outside the chamber leads a 'normal' life, but this novel offers memory as the only refuge from the horror. The past offers consolation and warmth, images of love and nature that can sustain in a moment of utter defeat. It also offers, beyond individual memory, the image of struggle as part of the historical memory of Latin America, and from this image is conjured a slender hope: 'to start again, to continue the tireless struggle, totally involved in a history which is scarcely theirs, inextricably caught in a beautiful dream handed down from the naked Indian and the Conquistador pinned to a tree by a lance . . .'.

In Humberto Costantini's book The Long Night of Francisco Sanctis, this guerrilla has become Lucho, a scared, emaciated youth whose revolutionary dreams have been shattered by the reality of state terror. He sits in a café cut off from everyone, trying desperately to escape from Buenos Aires before he is caught. Even so, he represents the last hope that Francisco Sanctis has of avoiding involvement in the world of Argentine hidden violence. Sanctis, a forty-one year-old book-keeper who is Buenos Aires' 'Mr Average', has suddenly had thrust on him the responsibility for warning two men that they are in danger of 'disappearing'. He has until dawn to do this, but as the hours of the evening and night drain away he realises that there is no one, not even his wife or friends, with whom he can share the burden. One of his best friends turns out to be all in favour of what the armed forces are doing: 'Get rid of two hundred thousand and the country'll run like clockwork' is his view. This meeting and his encounter with Lucho finally convince Sanctis that the horrifying events which until then had been mere rumours for him in his routine existence are frighteningly true, and he is inextricably caught up in them. Dawn finds him desperately trying to save at least one of the men, but 'he still hasn't seen the two shadows emerging from behind the elevator nor the car slowly drawing up from Olazabal Street nor the glint of the gun-barrel pointing at him from the darkness of the building site next door'.

Writing from exile in Mexico, Costantini has not only provided us with a distressingly convincing picture of how ordinary people become sucked into the maelstrom of violence, but has brought us full circle both to the word as witness as in Andrew Graham-Yooll's book and to the lists of the disappeared. The very last page of The Long Night of Francisco Sanctis is the original Amnesty International list of desaparecidos: 'Sanctis, Francisco Nicodemo, 41, book-keeper, Buenos Aires, 12 Nov 1977'. Lists and prayers.

Caribbean contrasts

Michael Gilkes

Frangipani House

Beryl Gilroy

1986. 111pp. £3.50pb

Apata: The Story of a Reluctant Criminal

Harold A Bascom

1986. 279pp. £3.95pb

Beka Lamb

Zee Edgell

1986. 171pp. £3.50pb

The Wine of Astonishment

Earl Lovelace

1986. 146pp. £3.50pb

The Lights on the Hill

Garth St Omer

1986. 119pp. £3.50pb

London: Heinemann Educational Books (Caribbean Writers Series)

In Georgetown, British Guiana, during the late 1940s there was a retirement home for upper middle-class ladies called 'The Gentlewomen's Home'. It was a chintzy, exclusive place, set aside for elderly whites, and near-whites, of 'good' background but impecunious circumstances. Beryl Gilroy's Frangipani House with its 'sleepy-headed windows dressed in frilled bonnets of lace . . . sleek and comfortable on the town's edge' (p 1) recalls that genteel establishment. But hers is a fictional Home for working-class black women in colonial Georgetown, and sets out to give dignity to the lives of those forgotten 'relics of work-filled bygone days', consigned to Frangipani House by relatives glad to be directly rid of them. The story revolves around Mrs Mabel Alexandrina ('Mama') King, an ailing grandmother in her seventies who shows remarkable energy and resourcefulness. The author, in attempting to give Mama King dramatic stature, makes her a kind of picaresque, poor black Caribbean Queen Lear. Discarded by her 'pelican' offspring, she begins to fear madness, fantasising about her past and brooding on the ingratitude of her family. She escapes from the Home in the company of a group of itinerant Hindu beggars ('the only real kindness I ever get was from beggars'), is attacked by 'choke-and-robbers' and falls into a coma from which she awakes in hospital. Surrounded by her now concerned offspring, all wanting to take care of her, she chooses to go with her granddaughter, Cindy, who is pregnant. The novel ends with the birth of Cindy's twins (Mama King having taken over from the starchy midwife) and the re-establishment of the old woman as loved matriarch.

The novel's intention—to protest against the institutionalising and isolating of the elderly—is admirable, but badly served by a hyperbolic, self-conscious style: 'Every step to hospital was like an orchestral instrument contributing its part to a symphony of pain . . . pain tailored by fate to fit her frail body.' (p 76) When the women in the Home decide to sing a hymn, one of them says: 'I'll call the others. Let us blend our voices in a thick, heavenly sound.' (p 30) The brown, middle-class 'Matron' is a kind of dragon lady ('The resentment in her voice could have roasted a dozen yams'), and while the beggars' natural goodness is contrasted with uncaring middle-class attitudes, 'the unstirring contentedness of their lives' to which Mama King is admitted, comes across as pseudo-pastoral nostalgia. The novel is effective, however, in its rendering—through a dialect voice—of Mama King's inner life, her memories of the past. Through the unwinding of the reel of memory, 'my whole life pass before me—like a film at a picture show.' (p 16) The picture of colonial Guyana that emerges (of the hard but vital life of the black working class and of the colour-based, hierarchical society in general) is imaginatively and powerfully evoked:

I go to a fete with Ginchi and we meet two boy. One name Cyril and the round-face one name Danny. They follow us like two dog. I like Danny and the next day I look he out by the market . . . he say . . . 'you want to start friendsing with me?' . . . 'He too black'. Ginchi Thorley say. 'We must wash out we children.' (p 6)

Harold Bascom's Apata, also set in colonial Guyana, is a fast-moving tale of a police manhunt in the rainforested interior. Subtitled 'The story of a reluctant criminal', it was inspired by a real event: the 1959 manhunt in the jungle of British Guiana for the criminal, Clement Cuffy. The hero, Michael Apata, is an orphan of African and aboriginal Indian parentage: a 'black Buck'. A brilliant student, he suffers the double humiliation of poverty and colour prejudice, losing a scholarship to higher education because of his short temper and inability to suffer fools gladly. Gradually, resentment turns to violence, then to robbery and finally to murder. A potential hero is subverted by a colour-based, colonial society to become a fugitive gunman and killer. The novel's thrust is clear. Apata himself spells it out: . . . 'I'm bloodywell tired of being "us humble people" . . . What we have here is a colour movement, not true? "White sees the light. Brown stick around, BLACK STAY BACK!" (p 99)

In creating a 'reluctant criminal', however—a good man turned the wrong side out—the author leaves us with a one-dimensional, moral tale: cut is the branch that might have grown full straight. The villains are Imperialism and the Colonial Mentality. Nowhere is there a suggestion of individual failing or responsibility. A fatalistic note underscores the novel where flashbacks and flashforwards are signalled by the words BACKSWING OF THE PENDULUM: and FORWARD SWING OF THE PENDULUM: The final, colonial irony comes when, the manhunt over and Apata safely dead, 'the colony settled down to anticipate the arrival of Her Gracious Majesty the Queen'. (p 279)

Mr Bascom's intention is both to expose the roots of prejudice that lie beneath the social tragedy and to write a good adventure story. If the former seems a trifle strident, the latter is nevertheless very well executed indeed. This is an exciting tale, moving with great speed and power. The style suggests film technique (the novel was originally conceived as a film):

The launch rides in against the stream but many within her are apprehensive. Adam's apples rise and fall. Lips are pursed and licked. Throats grow dry and are cleared on the sly. Eyes stare. A flight of blackbirds bursts from a thicket. (p 214)

The characters speak a Georgetown dialect that sounds authentic, but may occasionally leave the non-Guyanese reader struggling for meaning. When it is discovered that the post office bank has been robbed, a bystander comments: 'No pension rass. ALL DE MONEY GAWN FUH CHANNA!' Similarly, only a Guyanese ear can fully grasp the mixture of fear and awed respect in the outburst of a member of the crowd listening to an announcement by the police of the growing list of Apata's victims: 'RASS BHAI! APATA IN 'E RIKATIKS!'

Nothing is made of the tantalising correspondences between the twentieth century fugitive, Clement Cuffy, and Cuffy the ill-fated leader of the 1763 slave rebellion in Berbice county. Nor, more surprisingly, is any correspondence suggested between Michael Apata and Michael X (Abdul Malik), a famous Trinidadian fugitive who was hunted down in the Guyanese interior in the late 1970s. Nevertheless, the ending of the novel does leave the reader with the image of Apata as Archetypal Fugitive Spirit. The body is never found, and by the dawn of the seventh day the search is abandoned. Apata passes into legend.

The blend of narrative activity and social concern is more effective in Zee Edgell's Beka Lamb. The young Belizean girl, Beka, wins a scholarship and, that evening, asleep on her parents' verandah, dreams the novel in flashback. Her 'dreaming' is also an act of remembrance, a 'wake' for her friend, Toycie, killed in a recent hurricane. Belize is facing independence on one hand and a territorial threat from Guatemala on the other; and the link between politics and Beka's scholarship is made early on by her grandmother, a member of the People's Independence Party: '[she] felt she deserved some credit for the shift Beka was making from the washing bowl underneath the house bottom to books in a classroom overlooking the Caribbean Sea.' (p 2)

The novel is a loving evocation of Belizean life and landscape. Place-names such as 'Manioc Road', 'Rum Lane' and 'Haulover Creek', like the mixture of African, European, Carib and Hispanic elements in the population, add to the uniqueness and flavour of the book. Characters like Mandolyn Jawbone Greasy, Miss Flo and Granny Ivy move through the narrative with a zesty life of their own. But while the power of provincialism is celebrated, it is also seen as an impediment, holding the community in a static, colonial posture. Father Nunez's journey from 'beans and tortillas almost every day, to ordination as a Jesuit priest in Rome', while an occasion for local pride, alienates him from his provincial flock. The social message is clear, but not obtrusive. In one flashback sequence Beka and Toycie notice that Toycie's guitar, the gift of an English lady, is labelled 'made in Spain'. Toycie decides to alter the label: 'I doubt if we make guitars like this one here, Toycie.' 'One day we might.' Toycie said determinedly, poking the pencil through the hole to scrawl 'Belize' on the label. (p 37)

In the multiracial, colonial society of Belize, however, independence will involve far more than a change of labels. The hurricane that kills Toycie is a reminder of the unknown dangers ahead. The book ends with a positive image, however: Beka's Bougainvillea, cut back at a neighbour's insistence, has begun to put out new shoots.

The Caribbean folk-figure of the hero turned 'bad-John' is central to Earl Lovelace's The Wine of Astonishment. The novel is a fictional treatment of the banning of the Spiritual Baptist Church (the 'Shouters') in Trinidad by the British colonial government in 1917, and its reinstatement in 1951. It is a Black church, and therefore 'undesirable' in colonial eyes. Bolo, a powerfully-built, champion stickfighter, is the hero of this poor community. He sees the threat to the people's church as a challenge to their dignity and self-respect, but in opposing the colonial authorities and their spokesmen, he is forced into the role of troublemaker and bully. Bree, the pacifist leader of the church, begins by condemning Bolo's determined stance as a lawbreaker and vagabond. When Bolo affronts the community by abducting two of its nubile daughters, however, Bree finally understands: 'Why don't you just call the police for him? . . . is their job,' I tell Bree. 'No. This is something we self have to do. We have to show him we is a people.' (p 121)

The degraded poor of Bonasse village are forced to confront the real enemy; their own apathy as a community.

Lovelace writes with the immediacy of a living vernacular; his people sound utterly authentic, at one with their surroundings:

Then the rain really fall. I mean it had rain. Rain, rain, rain with thunder and big lightning flashing. I, home, hear the news from Trotman who come running up the road bawling above the rain; . . . (p 128)

The story is narrated by the village matriarch (a device not without its problems), and effectively serves Lovelace's continuing high purpose: to reinforce the sense of community as the foundation for true 'personhood'. It is a positive, engaging and direct response to the all-too-familiar theme of Caribbean 'identitylessness' and fragmentation.

By contrast, Garth St Omer's The Lights on the Hill pictures a community caught in the backwaters of colonialism, like gulls in an oil slick. The constipated 'hero', Stephenson, meanders through life doomed to the status of a perpetual spectator. He is the Caribbean Marginal Man par excellence. Racially mixed and illegitimate, he is 'Ti Béké' (little white man) in the country, 'white Nigger' in the town. Both terms define him as an outsider. His sense of directionless drifting, of chance as the controlling factor in life, sounds existential; but he is a casualty of colonial Caribbean inertia. The novel is set in the late 1950s, just prior to the failure of the West Indies Federation. Hailing from small-island St. Lucia, Stephenson is keenly aware of the fragile, fragmentary nature of island reality. As a graduate of the new, Jamaica-based University College of the West Indies (part of the Federal experiment) he has merely escaped any claims his island may have on him. His aimless affairs (too casual even to be called 'womanising'), like his refusal to think beyond the present, reflect a neurotic fear of involvement. He is a 'castaway' within his own society. Even the death of the one friend he admires (he is struck by lightning at a football match!) brings not grief, but a sense of relief: 'He had been envious of Eddie. Now there was nothing to envy any more.' (p 112)

St Omer's laconic, economical style brings to mind V S Naipaul's wittily ironic approach, but reveals an even more uncompromising vision of the society's impotence. As a boy, Stephenson remembers seeing a group of black American sailors beat up a local policeman:

They beat the fallen policeman until he no longer moved. The street was empty. Everybody looked from behind closed windows. Nobody went to help. Later they took the policeman to hospital and he went with the other boys to look at the blood on the street. (p 95)

Stephenson is one of many St Omer protagonists who bear witness to a society's collective paralysis, and who are all linked by a 'commitment to futility'. Originally published as part one of Shades of Grey (1968), The Lights on the Hill shares with other St Omer novels an unnerving sense of the fragility of personhood, the feeling that madness waits just below the surface. The book begins and ends with the shrieking of one of the inmates of the local lunatic asylum. Its most disturbing image is of a snail, subjected repeatedly to a torturing probe, finally refusing to emerge from its shell.

LITERARY REVIEWS

Thinly-veiled autobiography

The Enigma of Arrival

V S Naipaul

London: Viking, 1987. 318pp. £10.95hb

Between 1963 and 1979 V S Naipaul published novels at regular four-yearly intervals. After 1979 he brought out three non-fictional books, but no new novel appeared until The Enigma of Arrival and at first glance this hardly seems to be fiction at all. Naipaul's previous book, Finding the Centre (1984), contained a 'Prologue to an Autobiography' and it is not difficult to read The Enigma of Arrival as the life-story apparently presupposed by this piece. It is thinly-veiled autobiography: a personal meditation by a Trinidadian writer, whose origins replicate Naipaul's, who has written a series of books which (although never named) exactly match Naipaul's own and who, since around 1970, has, like Naipaul, been living on Salisbury Plain, the area which provides the novel with its main setting.

Besides barely being fiction—only some of the portraits of the novelist's Wiltshire neighbours seem to depart significantly from fact—the book contains few of the staples of the novel form: it is thin on both narrative momentum and sustained characterisation. The former is replaced by reflective soliloquy; the latter by a series of thumb-nail sketches of individuals encountered on or around the manorial estate which is the pivotal point of such action as there is. The rotundity of a work such as A House for Mr Biswas is nowhere in evidence. What is left is an account of the protagonist's personal wrestling-match with himself, written in a spare and unembellished style and, while this psychomachia may be absorbing for confirmed Naipaul watchers, there will be others who find it 'precious waffle'.

But such a reading misses much. The Enigma of Arrival is also a 'Condition of England' novel and another investigation of the theme which has dominated Naipaul's work since the mid-1960s, here referred to as 'that great movement of peoples that was to take place in the second half of the twentieth century'. It is a book about writing and a novelist's gradual discovery of his subject, as he learns to reject the bogus metropolitan material of his early fantasies for the territory he has made uniquely his own. Far more than personal indulgence is involved. As in A House for Mr Biswas and The Mimic Men, a private history functions as a microcosm of late colonial/post-colonial historical processes.

The England of the novel in which the writer is living is an ancient, multi-layered landscape, containing numerous 'sacred sites' including Stonehenge, Winchester—a candidate for King Arthur's Camelot—and Victorian churches expressive of the certitudes of the Indian Summer of Empire. Initially his imagination perceives it through the filters provided by his own cultural baggage—Wordsworth, notions of a Book of Hours, a sentence from King Lear, Constable's paintings of the area, Sir Gawain and the Green Knight and E H Shepard's illustrations for The Wind in the Willows. However, even as he subjects the local countryside to these refractors, he has a vision of it as 'natural' and immutable and it is only after a period of time that he comes to realise the extent to which it is a 'constructed' landscape, liable to change and decay, forces which begin to loom particularly large in the latter stages of the book.

LITERARY REVIEWS

His particular situation as a tenant on a decaying Victorian-Edwardian estate is a central image. The estate is presided over by a reclusive landlord who has been suffering from 'accidie' since his early manhood and, though actually in residence, is effectively almost as much an absentee as many of the owners of the sugar plantations of Naipaul's Caribbean origins were in the heyday of imperialism. This image suggests the writer's ambivalent relationship to a vanishing England which has helped to shape his sense of literary vocation, as well as, more generally, his identity. Far from being accidental, his presence on the estate proves to be a product of the migrations occasioned by Empire and he identifies with the inertia of his landlord who is allowing ivy to proliferate and gradually to strangle the trees in his grounds. As so often in Naipaul's writing, an accretion of precisely realised circumstantial detail, after all the essence of the realist novelist's craft, assumes a broader allegorical force. The colonial son has found a resting-place in a landscape that seems 'benign' to him, but the manor where he has his cottage is a 'semi-ruin', without the traditional appendages of farms and lands; and the remains of the older Establishment that it represents collapse in the course of the narrative.

Loss is central to the novel in other ways. The title derives from a surrealist painting by Giorgio de Chirico, which had caught the writer's attention shortly after he moved to his Wiltshire valley. He had hoped to write a story based on the painting, which would tell of a traveller's arrival in a classical city, his involvement in a mysterious religious ritual, his gradual realisation that he is its intended victim, his narrow escape back to the wharf where he arrived and his discovery that his ship has gone and that his life is over. Ostensibly this story—perhaps not surprisingly, since it is more Borgesian than Naipaulian—has never been completed. But the writer comes to see that it has permeated an African story he was writing at the time (fairly obviously the title-novella of In a Free State) and beyond this fact, it is the story of his own life and of the present work.

The idea of enigmatic arrival informs all the book's major concerns: the writer's journey to a metropolis which fails to match his youthful fantasies; his relationship to his Hindu past; his success as a writer exploring the predicament of colonial fragmentation which he has tried to escape; his disappointment when the history of Trinidad that he wrote in the late 1960s (exactly similar to The Loss of El Dorado) was rejected by the publisher who had commissioned it, and failed to afford him the sense of fulfilment he had anticipated; and his discovery that his Wiltshire surroundings are largely a product of human artifice, rather than organically whole.

Like the traveller in the fiction, he is left contemplating the prospect of his own mortality. Death is prominent throughout this elegiac, autumnal work and in the final section entitled 'The Ceremony of Farewell', the writer is taken back to Trinidad by the death of his younger sister. The remnants of Hinduism—now even more vestigial than in Naipaul's early novels—which he encounters there suggest that the valediction of the title of this section is as much a requiem for his ancestral culture as for his sister. It is typical of Naipaul that the book should come to rest here. But, from the opening dedication to his brother Shiva who died at the age of forty in 1985, to this conclusion, the whole work is pervaded by intimations of mortality. It is ultimately as much a generalised lament for human transience and an expression of the writer's own sense of vulnerability, as an elegy for any particular individual or community.

The Enigma of Arrival may not be the surrealist work that the de Chirico painting initially promised to inspire, but in its absorption with language and the process of writing, it does share many of the preoccupations of a writer such as Borges. In passages like that in which the writer describes himself as 'living in a world where the signs were without the meaning intended by their makers', it offers penetrating commentary on the problematics of using English in Third World contexts. It is a novel which, through its constant stress on the 'constructed' nature of landscapes and life-styles, forces a reassessment of the view of Naipaul which sees him as laying bare the 'realities' of situations and experiences through the use of a transparently lucid style. And it is a disturbing book, not only because of its emphasis on artifice or because it is a sustained memento mori, but also because of the exclusions it practises. Its commitment to the 'I' pronoun seems to make for a kind of linguistic solipsism which leaves one pondering the absences it implies, not least among them that of the real writer's wife, who is never allowed to intrude into the pages of the 'novel', even in an impersonal 'we'. Perhaps it is just such omissions that have led Naipaul to term the book a 'novel' and not an 'autobiography'.

JOHN THIEME

Polytechnic of North London

Unmasking Mexico

The Good Conscience

Carlos Fuentes

London: André Deutsch. 1986. 148pp. £8.95hb/£3.95pb

A Change of Skin

Carlos Fuentes

London: André Deutsch. 1986. 462pp. £6.95pb

The Old Gringo

Carlos Fuentes

London: André Deutsch. 1986. 199pp. £8.95

Carlos Fuentes (born 1928), the Mexican novelist, essayist and polemicist, has recently spent a year at Cambridge University as the Simón Bolívar Professor of Latin American Studies. The three novels under review provide a rich image of the kind of writer he is. They range from an early novel, The Good Conscience, published in 1959 and translated in the USA in 1971, and A Change of Skin published in 1967—the boom years of the Latin American novel—and first published in translation by Cape in 1968, to a recent novel, The Old Gringo, published in 1985 and translated in 1986.

Fuentes perceives himself to be in the same position as any foreigner who first crosses the frontier into Mexico; all his fictions and essays are probes into the opaque mysteries of an alien land that seems to refuse to reveal itself, even to its own confused inhabitants. The attempt to understand Mexico, its cities, its peasants and plutocrats, its landscape and history, is the starting point for Fuentes; his fiction tries to explain deeply perplexing enigmas. In each of the three novels under review there is a poignant moment when characters are forced to reveal repressed secrets that contribute to unmasking the false image of official Mexico. For Fuentes, the novelist is the subversive, the interrogator, the mocker who establishes the reader as a kind of witness and judge of events. The central paradoxes of Mexico, as manifest in these novels, are: the Revolution of 1910 and its aftermath, the cynical changing of the old guard, the chasm of misunderstanding between the powerful USA and Third World Mexico, and within these conflicts, the problem of how to live as a poet, that is, authentically.

LITERARY REVIEWS

These concerns can be detected as early as in his second novel, in the dedication and epigraphs of The Good Conscience, part of a trilogy Fuentes never completed. Fuentes dedicates this novel of Sartrean overtones (bad conscience), to Luis Buñuel, the surrealist film-maker exiled in Mexico, and a close friend. Like Buñuel, Fuentes is prone to centring his plot on grotesque set-scenes, vast visual symbols: in The Good Conscience it is a gaudy Christ who under his robes tapers to a piece of wood, in front of which the protagonist masturbates; in A Change of Skin it is Cholula, the enormous Aztec pyramid destroyed by Cortés, that today supports over 400 churches; in The Old Gringo it is a grand hacienda ballroom lined with hundreds of mirrors where the revolutionary peasants—and the main characters—see themselves for the first time. All these set-scenes take on a didactic intensity that allows the reader immediate, even obvious, access to Fuentes' intentions. As in Buñuel's films (The Exterminating Angel or Viridiana, for example) these scenes furnish critical symbols that undo the characters' certainties and falsities. It is not unfair to say that Fuentes is as interested in understanding Mexico as in exploring the idiosyncracies of his characters in the conventional novelistic sense; his characters represent more than the sum of their individuality, in the way that Artemio Cruz in The Death of Artemio Cruz (1962) (surely, with Terra Nostra, one of his best novels?) lives a life of cynical choices that explicitly mirror key moments in twentieth-century Mexican history, with dates and all. Artemio Cruz embodies a collective Mexican experience of inauthenticity.

The Good Conscience follows the birth, childhood and adolescence of the last member of an immigrant family made good in provincial Guanajuato. Jaime Ceballos is adopted by his sterile businessman uncle and pious, unloved aunt. His weak father is brushed aside and his mother, spurned, turned into a whore. We follow him through his prissy, privileged education, a religious crisis and a forbidden friendship with a poor Indian scholar, until he finally comes to his senses and conforms to his class duties. It is a novel exposing the hypocrisy of the provincial bourgeoisie which successfully adapts to whatever political and historical events befall Mexico, even the Revolution. There is one moment when young Jaime is offered an alternative future, when he shelters a trade unionist on the run, but he lacks the courage to abandon his class and education and join the real revolutionaries. There are some stunning scenes such as that already mentioned, of Jaime masturbating in front of a Christ, or that when he discovers his two-faced uncle dancing in the brothel.

Yet on the whole the novel remains a case-history, and Fuentes as narrator does not penetrate sympathetically into Jaime's subjectivity; the main pious characters become stereotypes, easy targets for a Balzacian satire where a corrupt, self-satisfied class clings to its past, and limps through life, more dead than alive. The novel tries to become an alternative and shocking history of a Mexico on the make, but in its obvious didacticism, as it pins personal events to historical ones, it fails to achieve its artistic goals. Sam Hileman's translation is faithful, but to the point of being too literal.

By the time of A Change of Skin, the technique involving the reader in the process of judging the characters has been subtly refined. The earlier omniscient narrator now enters the fiction, and A Change of Skin, as its title implies, becomes a mea culpa of a Mexican generation—Fuentes' own—faced with the New Age of beatnik, hipster, Vietnam draft dodger, 'druggy' and Beatle fan. This active narrator addresses his principal characters as 'you'. He provokes them, through jogging their memories, to face up to their past, their string of little cowardices and failures, and in a psychoanalytical way, to confront themselves. The novel takes the archetypal form of a journey from Mexico City to Cholula in 1965, with countless flashbacks to Greece, Germany, New York, Buenos Aires and wherever else the four main actors have lived, until they penetrate the labyrinthine catacombs of the vast, ruined Cholula pyramid where Franz, on the run from a Nazi past is, or appears to have been, murdered. Fuentes makes much of how in Mexico the past feeds on the present. None of the characters escapes the acts committed in their pasts as they try to discover their true identities.

However, this open, sprawling novel is far more than a revelation of guilty characters. Fuentes has followed Julio Cortázar's lead in Hopscotch (1963), a novel crammed with such a density of information and debate that Fuentes called it 'a Pandora's box'. In A Change of Skin (itself dedicated to Cortázar) Javier, the failed poet turned bureaucrat, is writing an unfinished novel called Pandora's Box. And out of this book-box come discussions and digressions on love, sex, machismo, fidelity, travel, writing, reading, pop music, Nazism, Jewishness, cinema, Machiavelli and more, in a frenzy of allusions that include Fuentes' own, earlier fictional characters. This collage technique works reasonably well until the final section of the novel where the narrator reveals himself, and invites some American rock musicians and hippies called the Monks to act and judge the earlier characters. Here, time has been cruel to this novel. Fuentes gives us a kind of Ken Kesey 'happening', as if in 1965 he really believed that a New Age of sexual liberation was being ushered in. The Monks, and the generation who listened to the Beatles and rock music, such as the sexually free Isabel, become prototypes and judges of Mexicans still captive to Victorian upbringings, unable to liberate themselves from their past and their desire for a clean, moral life. Sadly, this illusion faded, the 1960s flower children growing as old and guilt-ridden as the four who took the car journey to Cholula into murky, devious pasts, where permanent revolution—for a country such as Mexico with its official revolution—is just media hype.

A novel, then, betrayed by its last hundred pages; yet I feel it was worth resurrecting A Change of Skin, for it anatomises a generation of cosmopolitan Mexico City Mexicans whom the narrator addresses as wanting 'your own opium trip, for you should have wanted risk, confusion, a crazy mixture of things', middle-aged beatniks refusing to grow old. The novel is also a fine exploration of a stale and childless marriage between Javier, the pill-addicted poet 'with his busy little prick', and his promiscuous American wife, Elizabeth; a conventional theme lurking behind the heady 1960s glamour. Fuentes satirises these Mexicans hooked on Pepsicoatl—his catch-phrase for the attraction of Yankee consumer culture—where Mexico is a land 'that has given up its poverty in order to achieve only vulgarity, only to ape the lousy States'; the problem lies in the ambiguity of a USA that also offers hippies and New Age liberation.

Faced with a dead Revolution and a country run by 'pompous mummies' (ie, its politicians), Fuentes derives the energy of this novel from a vision of Mexico as the only country in the world where the gods are 'still on the loose, laughing, mocking, setting everything upside down, making national heroes of the most blatant traitors . . .'

LITERARY REVIEWS

It is in The Old Gringo that Fuentes movingly renders into novel form this alternative, dark Mexico, antidote to gringo progress, order and civilisation. He takes as a subject an old gringo who crosses over into Mexico in order to die; only at the end do we realise that this old man is Ambrose Bierce, the writer who in 1913 disappeared in Mexico. Fuentes has created a plausibly sought-after death, as well as a character as rich and quirky as Artemio Cruz. The novel is movingly narrated by Harriet Winslow in old age, remembering the days when she came to her fullest realisation of life in the hurly-burly of Pancho Villa's Revolution in northern, desert Mexico. She formed a triangle of intimacies with macho General Arroyo and bitter old Bierce; she is seduced by Arroyo in an overtly symbolic love-scene where Arroyo's 'rattlesnake' of a penis is compared to the 'dismal dwarf' of Harriet's New York fiancé, and where Fuentes waxes on the theme of the Latin lover's compensatory vitality. But she takes her revenge on Arroyo, who shoots Bierce in the back after he has burnt the General's land deeds, and himself is executed by Villa.

Into this narrative Fuentes has woven crucial symbolic encounters: the ballroom of mirrors; a scene where the future General is handed the keys to the hacienda, and the land deeds, but where, more tellingly, Fuentes dramatises the differences between gringos and Mexicans, where Mexico stands for awakened senses, emotive landscapes, and feelings. The novel also shows how the Revolution stirs Mexicans from a 'drugged' sleep, and sets them in motion, 'forgetting their ancient fealty to one place and one landscape and one graveyard'. Each of the three main characters, as well as the General's Mexican mistress, confess their secrets. The novel ends with Harriet, the governess who invented the death of her father to save family honour, discovering new ways of seeing Mexico, having learnt to live with it, rather than trying to change it into a mimic version of the USA. For Fuentes in this novel 'each of us carries his Mexico and his United States within him, a dark and bloody frontier we dare only cross at night . . .'. The novel has added attractions: wonderful descriptions of the desert, and fluent shifts between characters, what they say and what they think. It is admirably translated by Margaret Sayers Peden and Fuentes himself.

Behind these three novels, as with all Fuentes' work lies a fascination with Mexico as a 'fatally foreign land whose only reality was the stubborn determination never to be anything other than its eternal miserable, chaotic self'. His characters slowly reveal the lies and evasions that prevent them from embodying this anarchic land.

JASON WILSON

London

Alternative realities: novels from Brazil

Dona Flor and Her Two Husbands

Jorge Amado

London: Serpent's Tail. 1986. 553pp

High Art

Rubem Fonseca

London: William Collins Sons. 1987. 345pp. £9.95

Maíra

Darcy Ribeiro

London: Picador, Pan Books, 1985. 353pp. £3.50

Dona Flor and her Two Husbands depicts a universal human dilemma, and one which not many of us—except Dona Flor—seem to have any success in resolving: the need for the comfortable routine that allows us to plan, organise and control, and, at the same time, the craving for the unexpected, fascinating chaos of the realm of spontaneity.

In Dona Flor's case the dilemma is experienced in terms of her sexuality, or perhaps more accurately in terms of how she wishes to experience her sexuality. The story is simple. Dona Flor is married to that breed of charming scoundrel who, apart from being a constant source of problems for her, is able to provide the most exciting—and tender—love-making she has ever experienced. Vadinho is indeed a remarkable character, whose phenomenal ability to take advantage of every opportunity presented to him is matched by a true innocence. Perhaps it is this innocence which prevents Dona Flor from realising her secret desire to leave him. But Vadinho suddenly dies; his unexpected death brought about by the intensity and madness with which he chooses to lead his life. It is with Vadinho's death that Dona Flor perceives that though he had brought anguish and problems to her life, he had given her a precious opportunity to realise her sensuality.

After a few years, during which Dona Flor maintains a willing and determined mourning, she finally gives in to the pressure of family and friends by marrying a man who in everyone's eyes is potentially the perfect husband. Dr Teodoro Madureira is everything that Vadinho was not: responsible, caring, mature and—unfortunately—essentially boring.

For the first year Dona Flor, who is only just tasting the agreeable feeling of responsible love, does not realise that when the predictability of life is guaranteed, it becomes hard to endure. But Vadinho comes to her rescue in an ethereal form which nonetheless—for all practical purposes—restores the spontaneity and fascination that was lacking from her life. Yet, she now faces a new dilemma: that of making fidelity and loyalty to her new husband compatible with the full realisation of her sensual longings, which only Vadinho seems able to help her fulfil. Dona Flor's final response to that dilemma could only happen in a novel, but Jorge Amado's skilful treatment leads us to imagine—at least in theory—that similar resolutions could be open to us all.

There is in Dona Flor an absence of moral judgment, a genuine recognition that in the many different ways in which we can choose to go through life, there exists a degree of honesty and inevitability: Vadinho can be exasperating, cruel and single-minded, but we are always reminded that he is as he is in spite of himself. The same is true for Dona Flor, Dr Teodoro and most of the other characters who populate the world we are presented with. Dona Flor would like to be endowed with consistency, faithfulness and loyalty. Alas, reality is different. Dr Teodoro can only love in the way he knows. After all, the sign on the wall of his pharmacy—'A place for everything and everything in its place'—merely encapsulates his true self, the real bureaucrat for whom life can only be experienced in an orderly fashion.

LITERARY REVIEWS

Dona Flor also represents, in a disguised form, the truly independent woman, whose career (we have to remember she is a real artist as far as cooking is concerned) is as important as her love life. She never relinquishes that right even when Dr Teodoro unsuccessfully attempts to make her give up her job. It is not just the money, she argues, it is something she wants to do. It is precisely this right and the sense of the legitimacy of her own wishes when all the social pressures are against her, that makes Dona Flor an independent woman. But Dona Flor is a complex character and the process of discovering her true self is a difficult one. In the long run she gets away with murder—that is in her own eyes—and the final proof of her own independence is that she does not rely on anyone's approval or disapproval. This acceptance of herself as she is is Dona Flor's major achievement, something that perhaps few women manage to achieve in their lifetime.

There are also some delightful secondary characters, and in this respect Dona Flor's mother deserves some special attention. Dona Rozilda indeed epitomises the stereotypical Latin American mother-in-law, whose main objective in life is to acquire some sense of personal importance through her offspring's successful marriages. But once again, even in her worst moments, she cannot help being the way she is.

This is a remarkable and fascinating book, with a very rare capacity to allow us glimpses of other possible realities and to bring them to life, while leaving us wondering about their fictional characters. It is also a sheer joy to read. Amado's outstanding talents for description and character creation are reminiscent of some of the classics of contemporary literature. Yet this is not a classic in all respects. It is a truly Brazilian novel, insofar as the characters could not exist outside Brazil, or even Bahia, and certainly not outside Latin America. In this respect Amado shares the talents of Gabriel García Márquez, including the ability to transform fantasy into reality and make it credible. García Márquez once remarked that in writing One Hundred Years of Solitude he had simply given literary form to some of his childhood experiences. Amado has done something similar, in capturing what could be called a purely Brazilian way of being in the world. By this I mean a willing acceptance of some quite exuberant and complex elements of reality which are not always susceptible to rational scrutiny.

High Art, by Rubem Fonseca has been described as an accurate portrait of contemporary Brazilian society, but in contrast to Dona Flor and Her Two Husbands, the picture of Brazil that we are presented with is a very violent one. Set in Rio de Janeiro, the novel tells the story of a lawyer's attempts to solve the murder of two prostitutes. Gradually it grows into a complex mystery which combines individual perversion with the intrigues that seem to characterise a world inhabited by the rich and powerful. It is not an easy novel to read; perhaps our appreciation of it depends on the importance we attribute to violence as a defining element of our reality.

It does seem that the author attempted more than what is usually expected from the average mystery novel; that is, a good plot which keeps you interested for the pure sake of discovery. Fonseca tries to go further, and I am afraid he does not succeed. If his original intention was to uncover the secret underpinnings of the Brazilian power structure, he falls short. If, on the other hand, his aim was simply to reveal the very complex, dubious and tortuous elements that are sometimes present in sexual behaviour, this kind of novel will contribute nothing to the debate, even in its literary form. Regarding elements of some importance such as character development, it is possible to say that we do form some kind of picture of the storyteller. Mandrake, the lawyer, appears as a fairly indecisive, dissolute and generally incompetent sort of professional. If the message is that murder cases sort themselves out regardless of the effort particular individuals put into solving them, then it is effectively conveyed.

Judging from the treatment of his women characters, Fonseca appears to have a tendency towards misogyny. In High Art women seem incapable of love or generous feelings. Women are at their best naïve; at worst ruthless manipulators. Even in the case of Ada, the woman whom Mandrake is supposed to love, we are presented with a mildly vain creature who has the bad luck to be in the wrong place at the wrong time. Or if women are capable of love, they suffer from the naïvety of believing that love can be reciprocated by men. The following paragraph early in the novel is representative:

I listened to the noises coming from the kitchen. The first time: Ada walking across her living room appreciating herself through my eyes, as if my eyes were the mirror in the studio in which she made love to her own body. That was how Ada walked toward my embrace; and sensing her narcissism, I had turned my body away slightly, to prevent the embrace from becoming more intimate.

Or further on: 'I loved Ada. But that didn't prevent me from being interested in other women. (Ah, men)' Yes, 'Ah, men.' This is not supposed to be a feminist novel, therefore things should not be asked of it that it is not intended to deliver. It is nevertheless sad to find that, in a novel which attempts to be more than just a mystery story, the female human condition is depicted in such ungenerous terms.

As for other characters, particularly that of Lima Prado, a crucial pawn in the game, Fonseca spends too few words to reveal their complexities. Surely murderers and their accomplices have some redeeming features? Or do they?

The perpetual theme of High Art is violence: its characters are divided into two kinds, those who inflict violence and those who are subjected to it. I would question this as the main defining element in an accurate portrait of Brazilian society. Dona Flor and Her Two Husbands exists to prove it.

A different kind of violence is depicted in Maíra by Darcy Ribeiro—perhaps a more credible and real kind of violence: dominant white culture struggling to reach the ends of the earth; with the ends of the earth and their inhabitants presenting due resistance.

Like High Art, Maíra is a difficult novel, but for very different reasons. Set in the Brazilian jungle, the story also begins with a death. In this case that of a woman whose body has been found on a beach of the river Iparana. It is a particularly macabre form of death, given that the thirty-year-old woman died in childbirth, giving birth to twins who are found dead beside her. The Swiss citizen who happens to find the body has given his statement to the police:

He also verified that she had bled during childbirth. He verified that on her forehead there was a small scar from an old wound, now a cicatrix. And, more over, that her face, hands and legs were marked by striated scratches, some of which were partially infected. These latter considerations prompted him to assume that a crime might have been committed.

The scene is set. From it, develops a very complex and intriguing mystery. Yet, it is the kind of mystery that reveals alternative conceptions of reality. What would a white woman be doing in the middle of an Indian village? Why did she die in such horrific circumstances? Slowly the mystery begins to unravel, and we come to know the characters step by step. Religion or the world of myths—'primitive' and 'civilised'—play an important part in this novel. How do we come to believe what we believe, and how are the realities we inhabit and the actions we accomplish determined by those beliefs?

LITERARY REVIEWS

This is an interesting novel, partly owing to the fact of Ribeiro's training as an anthropologist. He manages with reasonable success to describe the inner conflicts of both the 'primitive' and 'civilised', and we can see that both worlds are inhabited by frightened beings, desperately trying to come to terms with their own ghosts. A thoughtful novel, well worth the struggle that the reading of the first few chapters will require.

MARIA ALICIA FERRERA-PENA

BBC Latin American Service, London

Perceptions of Nicaragua

To Bury Our Fathers

Sergio Ramirez

London: Readers International. 1984. 253pp. £5.95pb

Stories

Sergio Ramirez

London: Readers International. 1986. 118pp. £3.95pb

The Jaguar Smile: A Nicaraguan Journey

Salman Rushdie

London: Picador. 1987. 171pp. £2.95pb

Vice President Sergio Ramirez of Nicaragua is also one of the region's most celebrated novelists and short story writers. He spent many years in exile in both Central America and Europe, and it was during his two years in Berlin from 1973-5 that he wrote To Bury Our Fathers. It was first published in Caracas in 1977, to be followed by other Latin American and Spanish editions and translated into German, Norwegian and Dutch. In 1985, it became the first of Dr Ramirez's works to appear in English.

Despite the racy colloquialism of this translation, To Bury Our Fathers is a book entirely outside any European tradition, and equally outside the 'magical fantasy' material which European readers of Jorge Luis Borges and Gabriel García Márquez so frequently anticipate. By Ramirez's own account (as given to Salman Rushdie, among others) the book is literally true, and further substantiates the common observation that truth is far stranger than fiction. The fruit of years of research into the Sandino period from 1930 to 1961, it uses a novelist's range of skills in blending characters and situations from actual and written records with a dense plot and much dramatic action. At times the complexity of plot is so excessive that it seems impossible to keep track of this or that personality, of who did what to whom and when; time sequences become confused through the continual use of flash-backs and flash-forwards, and the scene shifts vertiginously as the four central characters slip in and out of internal and external exile.

What carries the book along so inimitably is its perfectly tuned pace, so pitched that the details of time and space become irrelevant, as the reader is hurtled forward automatically into the next neatly devised sequence of incidents.

The novel is thematic rather than logical, and its themes are at once the strictly national concern of a country's liberation struggle, and the universal one of human behaviour when fighting for survival. How people behave in such extremity has little to do with their own intellectual or psychological reasoning and everything to do with their surroundings. In circumstances where life is almost unbelievably cheap, and both death and sex are a haphazard and messy business, three compañeros struggle to do their bit for the revolution but with such a chaotic lack of organisation and communication that, rather than being instigators of action, they repeatedly find themselves merely reacting to events from which they constantly strive to escape.

On the other side of the country's divide is Catalino López, a colonel in the National Guard, who is ambushed in a cinema by Sandinistas under Pedro Altamirano, and escapes as sole survivor of the ensuing rout and fire by hiding in the projection room. Neither his cowardice, in failing to shout an order and in hiding under a bed, nor the Sandinistas' brutality in systematically despatching the survivors of their gunfire, their 'machetes being put to work, smashing through bones, splintering through benches, raising sparks from the floor', are described with any kind of moral overtones. Catalino's relationship with Indio Larios is depicted with touching gruffness even to the point where, when Altamirano's head is brought home in triumph on a pike, Indio defects from the National Guard in a miraculous escape and retires to piñata-making and revolution-mongering in neighbouring Guatemala.

Behind them all stands el hombre, the dictator Anastasio Somoza, so much less substantial in every way in real life than the aura that surrounds him would suggest. The aura is the carefully-promoted display of immutable power, yet, even with the full weight of Franklin D Roosevelt behind him (headlined together, in Las Americas magazine, as 'Champions of Continental Democracy') there is always something faintly ridiculous about Somoza's entourage, which lacks any real presence at the centre to hold it all together. Somoza is first seen through the eyes of Taleno's proud father, come to observe his son's graduation ceremony as a cadet, who 'suddenly finds himself staring straight at el hombre's face, motionless under the lights of a film camera . . . el hombre in the centre of the platform, flanked by high-ranking officers standing to attention, their caps under their arms, and at one end Catalino López, caught out by the anthem before he could reach his place'.

This sense of something being amiss in the state is always a circumstantial one: not even in the mouths of the most consistent revolutionaries (among whom number the erstwhile model cadet, Taleno) is there a single diatribe against the monstrous iniquities perpetrated by the dictator who fed human beings to wild animals and had his Guards dismember infants before their parents' eyes. The rottenness seeps out into the city and the land, so that a fraudulent election (lost, through ballot box-stuffing, to the grandfather of the third roving revolutionary, Jilguero) is followed by debris and dull despair: ' . . . the side-street wind as always sweeping dust, seeds, bits of vegetation into the shops and the deserted ironmongers, with their bales of cloth and cotton prints, rolls of barbed wire, tin pails, and shop-soiled stock laid out on the pavements, the rubbish yellowing and rotting in the deep ruts left by the oxcart wheels or clogging up the drains of the corner laundries, where mosquitoes started to swarm'.

LITERARY REVIEWS

The fortunes of Taleno, Jilguero and Indio, linked by a common cause, overlap with those of relatives, rivals and former colleagues whose claims on their lives prove definitive. The image of the wheel of fortune, bought by Taleno's father from a dying fairground traveller, is constant. At once a companion and a master, it accompanies its owner through the everyday inevitabilities: 'downpours, droughts, the horrors of war, train crashes and flooded rivers, knife-fights in gambling dens and cock-fighting pits, the wheel always rolling out its fortune, bringing its luck, taking it away, on all the saints' days in Nicaragua'. Paradoxically, its message is not of the immutability of fate but of the exciting vagaries of fortune.

Ramirez's Stories, written mostly in the mid-1970s with the addition of a final couple from the mid-1980s, share much of the rapid movement and some of the same motifs of the earlier novel. The ship that never docked at San Rafael del Norte (to collect the cargo of caged monkeys that Taleno's father had carefully amassed in order to make his fortune selling them to the USA for castration in the interests of science and impotent men) is transformed into Mrs Onassis' yacht, for whose arrival the Managua Lions Club waits indefinitely aboard the specially bought and bedecked Queen Elizabeth, which bears a giant heart-shaped wreath of red flowers inscribed with the story's title, 'To Jackie with all our Heart'. Indio's reminiscences of the 1942 Baseball World Championship, lost 'because of drink . . . The pitchers could hardly stand up when they went out to warm up', becomes the family tragedy of 'The Perfect Game' in which once again Cuba puts paid to Nicaraguan hopes. The pants-wetting terror of Colonel Catalino crawling under his bed is reborn in 'The Siege' as Septimio's fear, again 'under the bed for shelter . . . hit by the smell of stale urine, spit and foul shoes'.

The mythic dimensions afforded To Bury Our Fathers by quotations from Blake and Aristophanes are re-embodied in angelic presences, the contradictions inherent in our notions of the eternal ('Charles Atlas Also Dies') and the possible ('Nicaragua is White'). But the influence of foreign countries and the incapacity of the First World to treat the culture of the Third as anything but a folkloric joke are also illustrated. Ramirez's years in Germany resurface in the cruel story of a Venezuelan student desperately seeking employment as a party Father Christmas in Berlin. While his employer reprimands his drunken wife for giving 'a false impression to foreigners—stressing the word foreigners to emphasise how unthinkable her conduct was', Frau Schleting herself persists in her desire to shout and 'dance Que Viva España with her Spanish Santa Claus', too careless to remember his true nationality. The final irony is that the student is abandoned to police investigations: 'Filled with the bitterness and frustration he'll take back with him to Maracaibo, he knows in an instant that he'll be dubbed, with pitying sarcasm: the German. Forever.'

The problem of exile is not merely the condition of having to live abroad. Each Central American country not only has its economy but its culture violently distorted by the USA. Baseball, perhaps the most assimilated of these influences and Nicaragua's national sport, features in two of the stories; the impossibility of North American information ever being wrong, or even misleading, is the subject of both 'To Jackie' and 'Nicaragua is White'. 'Charles Atlas' is the more pathetic and less ludicrous for lifting the veil on the otherwise apparently impermeable monolith of the USA. It begins to expose the realities of the much-vaunted social melting-pot and the whole American dream as Atlas confesses to his real name (Angelo Siciliano) and his origins in Calabria, in 1927. As the gauze mask, which cancer of the jaw obliges him to wear, is gradually lifted, so the mask slips from the face of the omnipotent, all-North American Superhero.

The cover describes the book's contents well as 'Eight elegant and ironical tales'. They are also witty and beautifully-crafted, and however macabre the undertow they never lapse into polemics or cynicism. Like Aesop or Aristophanes in their deft moral content, they linger in the mind long after reading. Nick Caistor, who translated both books (and provides a welcome guide and chronology to To Bury Our Fathers) is so at ease with his craft that one is left with the slightly disquieting sensation of having read an unmistakably Nicaraguan author in the original.

The Jaguar Smile is a book about Nicaragua written by a non-Nicaraguan author. Enormously popular and effective, its broad audience accessibility and clear style are undoubtedly among its greatest assets.

Based on a journal Salman Rushdie kept while participating in a delegation visiting Nicaragua, and written in the form of a travelogue, The Jaguar Smile, is named after an anonymous limerick which runs:

'There was a young girl of Nic'ragua
Who smiled as she rode on a jaguar,
They returned from the ride
With the young girl inside
And the smile on the face of the jaguar'.

This limerick leads Rushdie to muse on its possible conservative and radical interpretations; if 'the young girl was taken to be the revolution, seven years old, fresh, still full of the idealism of youth, then the jaguar was geopolitics, or the United States . . . but what if the young girl were Nicaragua itself, and the jaguar was the revolution? Eh? What about that?' Rushdie's own sympathy lies with the former interpretation. Setting himself firmly within the politico-literary traditions of Defoe and Swift in order to defend the turning of his private sentiments into public opinion, he concludes that, for all its flaws and petty contradictions, the revolution is not in the process of devouring itself as so many others have before it.

The Jaguar Smile is substantially more than a mere 'portrait of a moment, no more in the life of that beautiful volcanic country'. It cleverly interweaves Nicaragua's past and present with her optimism for the future. The timing of Rushdie's three-week-long visit there in July 1986 is used to maximum advantage in eliciting and recording responses from the 'nation of poets' presenting their country's case for survival: as Rushdie says elsewhere 'You can hardly call the victim of such monumental aggression the guilty party'. In June 1986, the International Court of Justice followed up its findings that Nicaragua's harbours had been illegally mined, with proof that the invading 'Contras' were being armed and financed in defiance of international law. Almost at once, President Reagan managed nonetheless to have another $100m of 'aid' voted through the House of Representatives for his counter-revolutionary 'freedom fighters', analogising them to the Lincoln Brigade who went out to join battle with the Republicans during the Spanish Civil War.

The fact of this decision attracted considerably less international outrage than Ortega's closure of the opposition daily La Prensa under the terms of the declared state of siege. Rushdie doesn't mention that this followed the disclosure of evidence that it was being funded through the US Embassy in Managua, and occurred on the day it was to appear with a triumphant cover portrait of Reagan celebrating the acquisition of his '100m blood money. He does, however, include full reports of the case as stated both by Violeta Chamorro, La Prensa's editor, and Sandinista government members. For himself, while mistrusting 'this aristocratic lady' who proved to be 'the hardest person, of all the people I spoke to, to pin down to specifics', Rushdie also mistrusts Nicaraguan 'ears and instincts which read into La Prensa a CIA-backed fifth column—further evidence of North America's willingness to sabotage by whatever means it could buy. Censorship is ever an issue to evince an energetic parade of categorical moral scruples, but Rushdie comes down firmly on the side of Western liberalism, favouring the maintenance of controls but not the imposition of closure.

In alternating the relevant statistics recording 'Nicaragua's considerable post-revolutionary achievements with his personal impressions, Rushdie avoids falling into the emotionally-charged pitfalls exemplified by Jean Didion's book on Salvador four years previously. Yet, even while he comes across as considerably more wry and friendly than Didion, there's a tone running through his opinions that (were he less of a plainly likeable character himself) one might be tempted to attribute to that most heinous of crimes, a neo-colonialist attitude. Having once sensed it, all the protestations about being an 'escritor hindú' from a fellow Third World country seem merely disingenuous. Somewhere along the way, the question of class is bound to rear its hydra heads; while a close understanding of another culture is always enormously difficult, empathy becomes almost impossible when an anglicised Indian of impeccable education and cultivation encounters a popular culture as homegrown from below as Nicaragua's.

The Jaguar Smile lapses occasionally into a certain quaint folklorism regarding Nicaragua's natives. Of the statements that left me most uncomfortable, the pronouncement that 'Sandino had become his hat' is at best meaningless, at worst an obscure insult. While the stencilled cartoons that decorate walls around the country do indeed emphasise the hat (just as Fidel's cap and cigar are his hallmark in Cuba), ask any newsboy—as I did—and even the most modest schooling will already have informed him of some essential facts about 'the father of the revolution'. And what does one make of Rushdie's speculations on President Ortega's fast during a presidential dinner party? He surmises that while refraining from eating 'could have been a sign of nervousness' it was 'more likely, an attempt to make himself seem a man apart, different from the crowd'. Why? Why on earth didn't Rushdie simply ask Ortega the reason, before drawing what seems such an unlikely conclusion? Perhaps the man didn't eat because he wasn't hungry or had already eaten with Rosario and the eight children or, as has elsewhere been suggested, suffered damage to his oesophagus under torture during his seven years in Somoza's jails, and finds it embarrassing to eat with people he doesn't know.

While one longs for a bit of journalistic interrogation to establish the truth (or otherwise) of such statements, other mistakes of fact could—and should—simply have been removed by a competent editor. Doris Tijerino was not massacred in a 'safe house' in Managua 'resisting the might of Somoza's tanks and heavy artillery' (p 19) but is alive and well and has been Chief of Police these past several years. 'Grey Panthers' is not a 'nickname' dreamed up by youthful Nicaraguans for 'a group of Californian old age pensioners' (p 62) but the name chosen by a thriving national organisation of North American senior citizens, après the Black Panther movement of the 1960s. Whoever compiled the list of Contents should note that every page reference after Chapter 1 is wrong.

Rushdie is, however, at his best with anecdotes, and in his own particular mixing of dialogue—often on a high and animated plane—with the incursions of an often banal surrounding reality. There is one example, in which Rushdie is travelling with Sergio Ramirez and Luis Carrion, (members of the nine-man FSLN National Directorate) along Nicaragua's notoriously bumpy roads. The conversation turns from censorship to a recent and suspicious report on the country by the International League for Human Rights:

Ramirez began by saying that the most important human rights organisations had given Nicaragua a pretty clean report. Then he lost his temper. 'You see,' he cried, 'if we do not murder and torture as they do in Salvador, it just proves that we are so fiendishly subtle.'

A cow strolled across the road and the driver braked violently . . . 'One must understand one's animals,' Luis Carrion said mildly. 'A cow will never deviate from its chosen direction, never turn around. A dog, however, is unreliable'.

Neither dogs nor cows are native to Nicaragua. The jaguar, however, is.

AMANDA HOPKINSON

London

The double yoke: women's writing from the Third World

Other Fires: Stories from the Women of Latin America

Edited by Alberto Manguel

London: Picador. 1986. 222pp. £3.50pb

Unheard Words: Women and Literature in Africa, The Arab World, Asia, the Caribbean and Latin America

Edited by Mineke Schipper

London and New York: Allison and Busby. 1985. 288pp. £4.95pb

A Double Colonization: Colonial and Post-Colonial Women's Writing

Edited by Kirsten Holst Petersen & Anna Rutherford

London: Dangaroo Press. 1986. 188pp. £15.95hb/£8.95pb

All three books take as their subject women's writing in ex-colonial countries, and the titles are already indicative of their editors' points of view. Alberto Manguel underlines the 'otherness' of the female, as do the best of the stories in his anthology. Mineke Schipper's over-ambitious collection mourns the passing of oral cultures in the Third World, a demise that further diminishes the traditional social and cultural role of women, while Kirsten Holst Petersen and Anna Rutherford equate gender oppression with national subjugation.

Manguel's anthology is impeccably selected. The reader must be grateful both for his knowledge of Latin America's literature and for the ability he possesses as a translator, which has made available in English—in most cases for the first time—work by this rich group of authors, whose sex appears to have excluded them from the world-wide success enjoyed by their male counterparts. The geographical distribution of the authors chosen is an accurate reflection of Latin American literary production, though Manguel pointedly rejects the concept of 'Latin American literature', attributing it, and the generalisations it implies, to Eurocentrism.

LITERARY REVIEWS

A common voice does not emerge from the collection nor many common themes. What unites the authors is simply their second-rate status within their national cultures, and delayed international recognition as they have had to wait for the full impact of First World feminism to be felt by publishing houses. Suicide is an unfortunate response to the unresolved dilemma between creativity and gender, yet two of the authors anthologised—Marta Lynch and Alejandra Pizarnik—felt compelled to follow that destructive path.

Angélica Gorodischer and Vladý Kociancich, two further River Plate authors, explore a genre favoured by their male colleagues; the fantastic. Silvina Ocampo, a great stylist, examines the way in which we construct reality, and the arbitrariness of the world's morality. These voices are not distinctively feminine, but Beatriz Guido's appropriation of a traditional male preserve—the erotic, and the fascination for perverse sexuality—is definitely so, as is the voice of Pizarnik who chooses similar themes.

For Armonía Sommers, a latter-day Uruguayan surrealist, reality is only apprehensible as subjective experience. In 'The Fall', with a clearly feminist focus, she re-writes the story of a Virgin Mary who does not want to 'be alone among her sex'. Rejecting her role as a sexless object of male fantasies, she takes possession of her body through the sexual act. Human at last, Mary leaves behind her resignation and iconic status—a male invention—and claims revenge for her son's death. Sommer's story and that of Clarice Lispector are the most truly subversive in the anthology. In Lispector's 'The Imitation of the Rose', the female narrator's voice has been thinned down to a whisper. Midway between madness and suicide (traditional 'female maladies') she is aware that the world outside belongs to the male, and that all that is required of her is to look beautiful, keep house and remain silent. This existential uncertainty and the fear of chaos, the male dictum of female nature, leads to obsessions with order and cleanliness and to a preoccupation with the minimal; the abstract, like causality, being a male preserve. Guilt accumulates with an unawareness of the rationale behind man-made laws. The world outside is truly alien and the narrator's only defence is to wish for invisibility, to lose her voice. There is no co-existence, just despair and alienation.

Mexico's Inés Arredondo rejects the Mexican male writers' tradition, firmly rooted in history, and re-writes myth from a female viewpoint, while another Mexican, Elena Garro, comments on the strength of women's imaginative powers. Her compatriot, Elena Poniatowska, is that rare flower; a humorous feminist. Her story, 'The Night Visitor', turns the tables on the usual Mexican model and has the female as the bigamist; an innocent, generous creature aware that the men need her. By showing up the judge's incomprehension of her motives, Poniatowska not only demonstrates the repressive rhetoric of power and a fraudulent morality, but identifies 'law-speak' with 'male-speak', thus cracking the solemn façade of society. In 'Death of a Tiger' Rosario Castellanos's compassion does not hide the fact that submission has a degrading effect; the Indian and the woman in her story are one in her eyes, choked with despair.

Unheard Words is a pell-mell, arbitrary and necessarily unrepresentative selection. How can anyone attempt to summarise in 288 pages the entirety of women's cultural production throughout the Third World? Why was such a feat even attempted? Are women so unproductive that 288 pages suffice? Obviously not; the result is a confused text, with some chapters better than others, but devoid of unifying criteria and lacking in analysis. The book fails to reflect social realities and prevents the reader from gaining an understanding of a very complex and varied situation.

Each chapter covers a huge geographical area and is opened by a compilation of proverbs—the first in the Latin American section is a quote from Schopenhauer—which seeks to prove the essential anti-feminism of popular culture. Inadequate attempts to provide panoramic views of very complex issues follow, and the chapters close with interviews with prominent writers. Such is the wide angle used, that each chapter begins to resemble the others in the impression it gives of improvisation and under-research. Nevertheless, some central facts, shared experiences and parallel traditions emerge. Oppression, repression and lack of expression persecute women writers in the Third World. These writers, ignored both by their peers and by publishers, are hindered in their practice by their families. Severely limited by the disproportionate rate of illiteracy among women (it is four times higher than among men in Africa) and by their restricted access to education, women find that even their role as story-tellers, so central in largely oral cultures, is being eroded by the relentless forces of modernity, a predicament that leads some writers to join the nostalgic chorus in regretting the passing of traditional cultural forms which were themselves responsible for female oppression. In her introduction, Mineke Schipper tries to place the book within a socio-political framework, but while it may be true that globally two-thirds of working hours are performed by women and only one-hundredth of the wealth is owned by them, to pretend that women across the range of countries examined face similar problems, is a misrepresentation. Women have in common their conditioning on the basis of biology but most of the writers from Latin America, the Arab world and India, unlike those from Africa, are enabled to carry on their work because they have a maid of their own as well as the requisite room. And the view that promiscuity is a form of liberation for women may be possible in the sophisticated English writings of some Indian novelists, but it would be inconceivable in Africa, where virginity is a prized treasure and childlessness the ultimate punishment.

From orality to poetry, to the short story. This is the path followed by most women: poetry is a 'hiccup' art which does not require continuous practice; the short story, a 'reduced' version of the novel favoured because it does not depend on a publishing industry but can be accommodated in newspapers and magazines. For Africa and Asia the 'modern' world starts with European colonisation, which was arguably a liberating influence for women. Even today's writers such as Buchi Emecheta, have used the European experience to isolate and describe their African concerns, the double yoke that falls on African women caught halfway between the demands of modernity and the pressures of tradition. The way out for Emecheta is through individual salvation. For Miriam Tlali, the central concern of South African women writers arises from the conflict between militancy and motherhood. They accept the taboos of the patriarchal society—avoiding writing on the loss of virginity, or on sex with the white man—while the black male is free to see white women not simply as desirable, but as a symbol of freedom. Meanwhile, they accuse their womenfolk of being 'colonised' if they attempt to free themselves from traditional strictures.

LITERARY REVIEWS

The chapter on Arab literature attempts to summarise a rich culture in just two pages and is hopelessly outdated as it does not take into account the fundamentalist revolution that invalidates the chapter's thesis of a gradual betterment of women's condition. Marriage and writing emerge as incompatible, and because of public perceptions of feminine literature as autobiographical the weight of taboos is, simply, crippling. North African women writers, like those of India, add to the existing problems by writing ostensibly in the language of the coloniser, thus placing their work out of reach of their needy sisters and exposing themselves to the charge of writing exclusively for national bourgeoisies or for First World markets. Assia Djebar decided to abandon the printed word and take up the camera as a way of reaching her illiterate sisters, and the increasing numbers of Third World women film-makers has been an encouraging development.

The Caribbean and Latin American chapters are confused and therefore confusing. The data on translation can, at best, be said to be whimsical in its incompleteness. The reader will never know what material is available in translation, and the careless handling of dates (sometimes the translation date, and at other times the original publication date, appears next to the title) adds to the general obscurity. I would seriously question the inclusion of River Plate authors within a Third World anthology. Hugely sophisticated, their concerns are in the mainstream of First World preoccupations. The panoramic intentions of the Latin American chapter lead to wild generalisations. The haphazard selection of writers—what is that great seventeenth-century nun, poet and student of science, Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz, doing in an anthology about modern women?—does a disservice to the literary production of women from twenty republics. Many points jar: Perón never did use the feminist movement because it simply did not exist; he worked closely with his wife, and her undoubted influence gained women the vote and workers their paid holidays. While it may be true that the desire to renew the language is a central concern, it is not a women's preserve, but the emblem of modernist and post-modernist writing in Latin America, from Ruben Dario to Severo Sarduy. As for the task of impressing on language the identity of the continent, the reader is free to wonder whose identity? Amerindian, African, Iberian, Italian, Arab, 'criollo' or mestizo? Or is the critic implicitly advocating a 'universal' Latin American culture that will paper over all the painful cracks which are still visible? Yet, if this is the case, how can a chapter ostensibly on Latin American literature overlook Brazil which, as is evident from Manguel's anthology, boasts some of the most astonishing women's writing?

The clear theoretical introduction to the Caribbean chapter is marred by a hopelessly confused examination of actual texts. Ineke Phaf appears to favour the recounting of story-lines and the use of unsupported assertions. A lack of respect for the texts, and even for literature itself, strips them of their complexities and reduces them to the status of mere plots—even in the case of Guillermo Cabrera Infante's Tres tristes tigres, where the author deliberately sets out to destroy plot and conventional characterisation. The author's account of Cecilia Valdes leads me to suspect that she has not read the book very attentively. All the Cuban writers chosen are male. Not only Dora Alonso, Fina García Marruz and the new Cuban writers are ignored, but similarly overlooked are that formidable pair of literary critics (a rare breed among women, as so many of the contributors have remarked), Camila Henríquez Ureña and Mirta Aguirre, who in magazines, periodicals and at university exerted a decisive influence on twentieth-century Cuban culture. Spelling mistakes may be the fault of the typesetters, but to describe the protagonist of Habanera as a black psychiatrist is to have neglected to see the film whose white protagonist was Daisy Granados, the wife of the director. The film was much criticised by politically-minded Cubans who saw the preoccupations of the prosperous characters as inherently bourgeois. Although the director of De Cierta Manera was a black Cuban woman, the film is not concerned specifically with black problems; all the main characters are white (significantly the girl), or almost white. Oscar Lewis's Four Lives is not the 'first' testimony from the mulatto girl, and what the author identifies as a specifically Caribbean stereotype, the sexy mulatto, is in reality merely a regional variation (others exist in Brazil and elsewhere) of the European 'femme fatale', who in the nineteenth century was dressed up in exotic clothes. I suspect that Ineke Phaf is not a literary critic or even a sympathetic reader, otherwise how could she claim that women's novels are subjective—implying that men's are not—or assert that women writers never present the reader with stereotypes?

The most interesting chapters of A Double Colonization are those covering ex-colonial First World countries: Australia, Canada and New Zealand. These provide an illuminating contrast with the concerns of Third World women writers. The editors have a point of view, a theoretical framework and a good knowledge of the materials anthologised. A Double Colonization is not a descriptive book. It sets out to invent strategies of dealing with existing myths, and to create both a new consciousness that will change the present and a new language that will begin to erode the dominance of 'male-speak'. The non-African contributors are aware that they are middle-class and that feminism itself is also, for the time being, largely a middle-class movement, but this awareness of privilege does not annul the double colonisation they experience.

The question of a 'difference' between male and female writing is a crucial one, concerning not only the Third World, but the First World, whose recent colonial past has exaggerated male domination and male-oriented myths deriving in the main from the conquest of the land. If nostalgia is one of the sources of literature it becomes doubly so in the colonial countries where the loss of Eden is repeated in the act of exile. Aritha van Herk, from Canada, points to Genesis as the source of misogyny; woman, the result of an afterthought at the Creation, is the direct cause of the loss of innocence. She is the sinner, the impure. Man, on the other hand, can recover his purity in the vast open spaces where the erotic impulses are absorbed by hard work; The founding myth is of a male living outdoors, in the bush or in the prairies: the cowboy, bushman or gaucho. The necessity to create an identity for the new countries turns these myths into the national culture. The newly-independent nation becomes identified with the male, and woman—declared reactionary and puritanical by the new man—is identified with the colonial yoke. Displaced, woman wishes to return to her native land, as in the new country she is even more incapable of changing events. She retreats further into herself and into the household and traditional women's preoccupations such as love and the writing of 'romances', which do not have the same 'universal' appeal as adventure stories—the distinctive male genre in nineteenth and early twentieth-century Commonwealth literature. Male literature is seen as realistic, normative and positive, while female literature is romantic, deviant and negative. Woman, as in Freud's analysis, is an anti-civilisation force.

LITERARY REVIEWS

This identification of the national with the male is also remarked in the Jamaican, Bev Brown's critique of Braithwaite's theories of creolisation, a process of cultural adaptation in which sexual relationships play a crucial bridging role. The link between ideology and sexuality results in a male-centred memory of the history of creolisation; when Braithwaite looks for myths to underpin his theories he uses only those which emphasise the patrilinear, like the Sun God. On the other hand, two women writers from the Caribbean, Jean Rhys and Zee Edgell shun the sun and focus on young women whose personalities develop through their identification with women-centred experiences.

The issue of 'difference' is already present in the work of these two writers, but has become paramount in the New Feminism which tackles the issue of female specificity in an attempt to overcome the negative associations of 'otherness' and sexual oppositions. Language is identified as the first patriarchal structure, and the importance of this issue may help to explain why women's writing based on the notion of 'difference' is distinctly avant-garde. But then so is the writing of men whose central concern is language itself. So, where is the 'difference'? It could be argued that by opposing realism, the New Feminists place their writing beyond the reach of most women, ignoring the fact that oppression is produced and functions within very specific economic and social structures. Living alone, single parenthood, lesbianism, the appropriation of eroticism and humour are pressing concerns for First World women writers, but not so for those of the Third World: a global community of women is an escapist dream, as is 'sisterhood' because it can operate only in limited locations, within the same culture, the same race and the same class.

NISSA TORRENTS

University College London

Future landscapes

A Sport of Nature

Nadine Gordimer

London: Jonathan Cape. 1987. 396pp. £10.95hb

A Land Apart: A South African Reader

Edited by André Brink and J M Coetzee

London: Faber and Faber. 1986. 256pp. £9.50hb

Until quite recently the white woman tended to be marginalised in the literature of imperialism. Fictional treatments of the colonial experience featured male 'adventurers', with the daughters of Empire firmly relegated to a subordinate role. Of late, however, the marked resurgence of interest in Victorian female travellers and explorers, together with such literary figures as Olive Schreiner and Karen Blixen, has provided a welcome correction to literary and political readings of empire which concentrate exclusively on the male. J M Coetzee's recent 'Robinsonnade', Foe (1986), which rewrites Robinson Crusoe to import a female consort on to the all-male island of Defoe, Ballantyne, Golding and Tournier, is a significant case in point. It is therefore no surprise that Nadine Gordimer's latest novel, A Sport Of Nature, should take as its focus a female adventuress, thus simultaneously overturning literary and cultural norms.

From the beginning of her career, Gordimer has proceeded from a recognition of the complex interaction of gender with genre. Both her first and second novels offer examples of the Bildungsroman, first with a female, then with a male protagonist, illustrating the different meanings of 'the novel of development' in sexual as well as political terms. Both were, in a sense, family romances, The Lying Days (1953), charting the heroine's escape from bourgeois family repressions which were identified equally with the mother and the motherland, and A World of Strangers (1958), testing a young male's vexed relation to the worthy liberalism of an apparently enlightened family. Love, particularly stifling family love as a microcosm of political restrictions, has long been Gordimer's subject. Occasion for Loving (1963) registers the terminal malaise of the South African liberal position through an account of an inter-racial love affair. In The Late Bourgeois World (1966) the heroine's political commitment is re-awakened with her sexuality. A Guest of Honour (1971) draws upon Wilhelm Reich's psychosexual analysis of the failure of revolutions (here, in the context of a newly independent African ex-colony) to argue for a necessary rearrangement of sexual intimacy as the first prerequisite of successful revolution. More recently, The Conservationist (1975), the rewriting of the story of an African farm in post-Schreiner terms, was followed by the similarly intertextual Burger's Daughter (1979), which approached issues of racism through Conrad and The Tempest, and by July's People (1981) a novella set in a future South Africa in which white refugees depend utterly for their survival on their 'Man Friday'.

A Sport of Nature reworks many of Gordimer's major themes (the family romance, African nationalism, a chilling dissection of the South African bourgeoisie, a vigorous repudiation of reformist liberalism, an emphasis on sexuality as innately radical) against a background which embraces most of Africa and extends in time from the early 1950s to (one hopes) a near-future, independent black Republic of South Africa.

Hillela, the heroine of the novel, is described by its title as a lusus naturae: According to the OED, 'a plant, animal, etc., which exhibits abnormal variation or a departure from the parental stock'. A spontaneous mutation, Hillela enters the novel as the child of an adulterous mother, Ruth, who has departed for Mozambique and a Portuguese lover, abandoning her daughter to the care of her two sisters, Olga—arch-bourgeois representative of a world of swimming-pools and expensive objets d'art—and Pauline, the committed reformist wife of a radical lawyer, who is progressively embittered by her exclusion from the black world in which she formerly exercised her social conscience. Expelled from school in Rhodesia for consorting with a 'coloured' boy, Hillela returns to South Africa only to outrage her adoptive family's norms by a quasi-incestuous affair with her cousin/adoptive brother, Sasha. Rejected by both sisters, this latter-day Cinderella embarks on a series of picaresque adventures. She appears successively as a go-go dancer, the lover of a deceitful white journalist (who transports her to East Africa and abandons her), a 'beach bum', the mistress of a Belgian diplomat (in Tanzania, in an unspecified francophone African country and Accra), the wife of a black South African freedom-fighter (assassinated in Ghana), and thence via an aid-related career in the

LITERARY REVIEWS

USA returns to South Africa for its independence celebrations as the wife of the President of the Organisation of African Unity, General Reuel.

The narrative technique of the novel is highly unusual. Throughout, Hillela is viewed almost entirely from an external point of view. The narrator pieces together her history as if researching the biography of a public figure, admitting lacunae in the account, speculating as to motive, and tracking an evanescent subject through multiple changes of identity. Named in honour of a Zionist great-grandfather, Hillela sheds her awkward forename to assume the protective colouration of 'Kim', amidst the Susans, Clares and Fionas of her Rhodesian school. Reverting in South Africa to Hillela Capran, she is later transmogrified into Mrs Whaila Kgomani, and finally rebaptised Chiemeka (Igbo: 'God has done very well') by her second husband. Various historical figures enjoy walk-on parts (Oliver Tambo, Joshua Nkomo, Archbishop Desmond Tutu) as does the fictional Rosa Burger.

It is tempting to perceive this narrative technique as consciously Marxist, as Hillela changes according to the forces of circumstances and history. The external view certainly registers the crisis of the liberal view of the individual subject, with its accompanying assumptions of the organic coherence of the individual, transcending social conditions. On the other hand, as the narrator remarks, the gaps and silences in the life-story also associate Hillela, via similar lacunae, with the lives of individual heroes. Indeed, her mysterious paternity, early abandonment, surrogate parents, expulsion as taboo-breaker, exile, wanderings, trials and triumphal return all link Hillela to the paradigm of the mythical (male) hero, as delineated by Joseph Campbell. A strong mythical undertow runs as a subtext to the novel which pullulates with references to Greek tragedy, myth, folk- and fairy-tales. (Whaila first encounters siren Hillela in the sea, not long after a discussion of Qamata, the Xhosa god who emerges from the sea to chase away the Christian gods of submission.) Poised between myth and history, however, Hillela remains, by the freak of her background, unconditioned by the family and outside the cultural norms of her native land, recreating herself at every turn, sloughing off successive lives in order to move on. In interview, Gordimer described her narrative method as carefully chosen to reflect the fact that external events are moving too swiftly in South Africa to permit the writing of an 'internal' novel, in which a character might contemplate her own navel. Gordimer also drew attention to the confluence of sexual and political radicalism in the novel. Though apparently growing into political militancy through the force of historical circumstances, Hillela's self-creation proceeds on grounds of instinct rather than ideology. Her personality is of itself so luxuriant that she remains unattracted by material luxury. In the midst of the cruelty that is South Africa, individual love appears as selfish, white 'brotherly love' is an idea beset by sophistry, as Hillela's own love-making with her 'brother' demonstrates to her ostensibly liberal family. Only sexual love remains, for her, as a touchstone of integrity.

If there is a driving force which transforms Hillela's various desultory adventures into a purposive quest, it is the desire for a home and a family of a radically different type. By the accident of her early abandonment, Hillela becomes an exile from birth, an eternal guest of honour, going 'home' in the school holidays to a family location chosen arbitrarily for her by others. Knowing her real mother only as a sexual being, through a discovered cache of explicit love-letters, Hillela avoids the 'Calvinism and koshering' of her mother's background, learning a furtive expertise in illicit sexual adventurism which stands her in good stead in later, less adolescent, activities. Accustomed to displacement she readily learns to move to successive postings at the behest of her political 'family': 'Without a cause is without a home.' The abstract relations of her childhood mean that she is free from conventional family conflicts. The central event of the novel, perceived by her aunts as a definitive break with the taboos of the bourgeois family, is for Hillela not incest at all. Her emergent sexuality strips the family of its illusions, simultaneously making a political point: that there can be no 'family life' for whites while blacks are denied it, that Hillela can no longer set up home in a house where only white people can live. In the novel, imperialism is envisaged in family terms, originally in the interrelated monarchies of the nineteenth century (Queen Victoria's cousins), then with foreign national economies providing the extended family of the West. Hillela thus moves less from lover to lover than through a series of families, as surrogate daughter to the Belgian ambassador to whose children she is nanny and big sister, then as hopeful mother of a 'rainbow' interracial family, a project cut short by Whaila's death, thence to a narrow escape from the nuclear model in America, to end up as one of three wives of an African General, in a non-matrilineal, newly-invented family paradigm, based on her protection and (it is hinted) seduction of the General's son by another wife. (Reuel is so free from the exclusive loyalties of family that he has this favourite son kidnapped (and worse) for political ends.) Hillela's own pride in her daughter, named Nomzamo in honour of Winnie Mandela, depends precisely on a reversal of usual parental feeling, a delight in not having reproduced herself all over again in another advantaged white child. Her commitment to the extended family of African nationalism develops from a clear-eyed unsentimental perception of the reality of the 'rainbow' family, memorably described:

The real rainbow family stinks. The dried liquid of dysentery streaks the legs of babies and old men and the women smell of their monthly blood. They smell of lack of water. They smell of lack of food. They smell of bodies blown up by the expanding gases of their corpses's innards, lying in the bush in the sun.

If Hillela appears eventually to succeed in combining a cause and a home, ironies remain nonetheless. The implicit connections with a children's revolt of a more specifically political nature, and with the image of whites as child-killers in present-day South Africa, are made explicit in the fate of Sasha, Hillela's male counterpart, who remains caught in the tragic House of Atreus of his South African family. Imprisoned for political activism, Sasha finds himself 'thrust up back again into the womb', incommunicado apart from permitted visits from his gorgon mother, who succeeds in reasserting the maternal role only via her son's incarceration. In the final courtroom scenes, it is as much the parents who are on trial as their son who, despite becoming a hero to the blacks, fails to participate in the visionary futurity of the closing pages. Gordimer leaves only time to tell which of the pair, Hillela or Sasha, is the 'sport of nature', which the representative hero.

If this review has devoted most of its space to Gordimer's epic novel, this is not to undervalue the strengths of A Land Apart, a selection of recent prose and poetry from South Africa, both in English and translated from Afrikaans. The only flaw in the volume is the absence from it of any work by either of its over-modest co-editors. Apart from these omissions, it provides an excellent introduction to the writing (excluding drama) of the post-Soweto generation, oriented towards the work of younger writers (no Lewis Nkosi, Alex la Guma, Dennis Brutus or Es'kia Mphahlele, though Nadine Gordimer is included). The laconic notes on contributors tell their own stories. ('Born c. 1957', 'died under unexplained circumstances', 'jailed 1976-83', 'drew heavily on his previous experiences as a prison warder'.)

The stories themselves are a revelation. Though the English-language selection includes some writers who already enjoy international reputations (Sheila Roberts, Christopher Hope, Mazisi Kunene) it is the Afrikaans material, even in translation, which is unforgettable. Etienne Van Heerden, Jeanette Ferreira, George Weideman, P J Haasbroek, to name only a few, introduce the reader to an apocalyptic landscape of war, violence, rape, and lost innocence, much of it focused upon women and children, or mediated through feminine experiences. If a real sense of doom emerges from the content, the stories none the less give voice to contemporary South Africa in a dynamic mode which is entirely individual.

JUDIE NEWMAN

University of Newcastle upon Tyne

Satires of class and power

Out of India

Ruth Praver Jhabvala

London: John Murray. 1987. 288pp. £10.95hb

Rich Like Us

Nayantara Sahgal

London: Hodder and Stoughton. 1987. 268pp. £3.95pb

'It was a novel about India, written by an English lady: well-written too, Amrita could see that, all the proper accoutrements of style and sensibility, but Amrita could not understand why the lady had given Indian names to her characters.'

Such quizzical, sometimes dismissive and occasionally patronising attitudes towards Indian writing in English are much the fashion today. An oft-quoted view suggests that writing on India in English is for foreigners; those who participate in such an exercise, however creatively, are themselves in some sense uprooted. Since the colonial past must be disowned, the future of its language forms the subject of constant debate, entailing a great deal of antagonism to its development or indeed to its very presence on Indian soil. The paradox lies in the fact that much of this debate is itself conducted in English, which continues to be the gateway to many areas of economic advancement; those who do not wield the language are often eager to acquire the skill.

Ruth Praver Jhabvala, an outsider by birth, has been unsparing in her scrutiny of India and of herself in India, which is perhaps why she took account of such critical views even in her first novel, To Whom She Will (1955). Yet, her work since then, has undeniably been a projection of urban Indian Life at the level at which she, a European, would meet it or indeed understand it. This is not to suggest a superciliousness or incomprehension in her approach, but the existence of a screen that prevents her from discerning complexities, although she does appear to be aware of them.

There is very little about urban, middle-class India as a scene for the comedy of manners that escapes the sharp focus of her lens; indeed, it is possible to argue that she is the first to have recognised this source of creative entertainment, and to have explored and refined its dimensions in her work. Out of India is a selection of stories that includes the essay 'Myself in India', an incisive expression of the emotional cycle experienced by Westerners in India which finally settles into the love/hate relationship typical of colonialism.

Jhabvala's social observation and satirical studies have occasioned comparison with Jane Austen and Anton Chekhov, obvious parallels being provided by the superficial similarities in mores and manners and the class and society they respectively depict—post-Independence urban elites in India, the landed gentry of Regency England and the parallel society of pre-Revolutionary Russia. Commendable indeed, is Jhabvala's acute observation, her feel for the comic incongruities of Indian life, her clear-eyed view of spiritual seekers from the West cushioned by spiritual frauds from the East, and her sensitivity to the experience of those caught in the often destructive clash of cultures. Yet, her greater, and often unacknowledged achievement, is the ability to capture the cadence of the urban bourgeoisie's Indian English idiom, whether it be that of the cultivated brown sahib or of his less pretentious fellow-Indian who uses English more naturally.

The stories reveal a nexus of social relationships, and the human predicament, but with a suggestion of deliberate withdrawal from more complex truths of Indian experience. Jhabvala remains the detached observer, quite uninvolved in the emotional upheavals she records so vividly. Her ironic stance lacks the dimension that comes with compassion and involvement, or indeed with a more clearly articulated vision of the values trampled in lost worlds which underlie her work. Perhaps the mode of distant observer is a defence, a necessary weapon developed from her own personal history of displacement and expatriation—a family of Polish Jews who emigrated to England from Germany in 1939; a further expatriation to Delhi in 1951 after marriage to an Indian.

The trouble is that unsparing use of a caustic pen on classic targets of satire—egotism, vanity, affectation, insensitivity—can be mistaken for cynical attacks upon India. The stories in this collection are no exception, Out of India contains some of Jhabvala's most powerful work—'Desecration', 'How I Became a Holy Mother', 'The Widow' and the introductory 'Myself in India' which expresses the author's honest and provocative understanding of her own predicament. 'Desecration' analyses female consciousness, as do many of the short stories at various levels. Here it is the experience of a sensitive and passionate woman, a Muslim of ambiguous ancestry, married to an ageing and civilised rajah who respects and adores her; the passionate abandon of her affair with a brutal and violent man reveals the subtle depths of a woman's dreams that lead her to debased self-destruction.

Jhabvala's sensitivity to the conflicts of culture and class takes various forms: 'Desecration' rests on assumptions that can blight relationships between the mainstream and minorities—here the confrontation is Hindu-Muslim; 'An Experience of India' and 'A Spiritual Call' offer glimpses of Western sensibility seeking a home in an enticing but alien environment. Her Europeans when young choose to stay on in a deliberate but misguided manner; others as in 'Two More Under the Indian Sun' and 'A Man with a Dog' have no choice but to remain. The relentless light cast on these attitudes is also turned on the sentiment and insensitivity, the sentimentality and unintentional cruelty of relationships in a joint family setting. However, it needs to be said that the Indian family as composed of scheming relatives, weak or domineering men and frustrated or ambitious women, contains elements of fact but does not quite add up to the truth.

Out of India straddles various layers of the leisured class of post-Independence India—business and professional, exiled and expatriate, spiritual seekers, Westernised Indians and Western Indophiles. On occasion, as in 'On Bail', and in the person of the clerk, Har Gopal, in 'Passion', Jhabvala attempts a glimpse into the pressures on clerical workers in Delhi's jungle of power. Nayantara Sahgal understands the world of power and she captures its complex nuances in Rich Like Us, a novel that won her the Sinclair Award. Although it lacks the controlled precision of Jhabvala's craftsmanship, and even in some instances the detail of character that makes Jhabvala's vignettes come to life, Sahgal's novel says much through the sweep of cultural history it portrays.

Rich Like Us is dedicated to 'The Indo-British Experience and what its sharers have learned from each other'. These lives, as many individual histories, make up the scope of the novel which encompasses not merely the impact of Western education but indigenous reform movements, colonial law, and a Hinduism which 'is not taught, [nor seeks converts]. It simply is.' The novel echoes with the hushed voices of generations striving to be heard within the more strident tones of modern India. As a niece of Jawaharlal Nehru, and in her own right, Nayantara Sahgal has had a privileged view of the top echelons of government and industry, a position which makes her an insider by more than birth, and she describes the machinations of power groups with considerable verve and honesty.

The focal point of the novel is the Indian Emergency of 1975–77, a traumatic time when, in the name of modernisation and social change, the fundamental structures of a democratic State and the rule of law were overthrown. Some of the ignominious aspects of this time are recreated in Salman Rushdie's novel, Midnight's Children (1981). Both Rushdie and Sahgal use the period to illustrate various confrontations: between liberal traditions and technological imperatives such as birth control; between a severely stratified society and masses seething to break constraints; between modern infusions and the intransigence of a reality that cannot be facilely relegated to the status of economic, social and political 'evils'. The turn of the century will no doubt witness a shift in focus, with extremist and separatist claims taking the place of the Emergency as the new power fragmenting India. With historical hindsight, however, there may be increasing justification for the view that the fragile infrastructure of law, values, administration and a unifying political ethos, was irreparably damaged by the sweeping and overriding powers that arrived with the Emergency and continue to lurk today.

Sahgal's insights are distilled through the experience of Sonali, an idealistic, Oxbridge-educated administrator in the aftermath of Independence, thirty years on. Her commitment has been nurtured by a father who belonged to the first generation of Indian administrators within colonial government—a 'civil servant whose body had served the sovereign power and his heart and mind, satyagraha' (Mahatma Gandhi's doctrine of passive resistance). The narrative suggests regional differences, even clashes, between the 'sparkling self-assured, softly contoured world' of Sonali's Kashmiri mother and the harsher terrain of her father, part of a family from the coast who moved to plateau country and thus became part of Shivaji, the Mahratta warrior's legendary history. A many-layered history, woven a little too thickly to be contained in Sonali's first person narration in a story that also extends to a treatment of sati (the obligatory burning of widows) forced on an unwilling forebear.

Yet, with corrupt politicians, businessmen and bureaucrats at the centre and a beggar on the periphery, Rich Like Us offers a cohesive and intimate portrait of the intrigues of power. If the satire is sometimes suspect, it is because Sonali's resignation from the Civil Service—she is unwilling to betray the underprivileged in favour of sweeping modernisation to please the urban consumer—suggests the disillusionment of a power group that has found itself displaced.

More forthright are the revelations attempted by Sahgal at the trader level of business, and through Rose, the cockney memsahib whose robust matter-of-factness cuts through the cant, hypocrisies and subterfuges of opinion-makers, socialites and wielders of power. Largely unaware of the refinements of liberal sensibilities in working-class England, she remains unaffected by the urbane and worldly values of her husband, Ram, and eventually wins the respect and understanding of her hard-nosed, orthodox father-in-law, a small trader.

The novel's many voices recreate interactions of family, social and public life but only remotely touch the repercussions of the Indo-British experience outside the structures of power. Sahgal confronts the erosion of liberal traditions but does not lend much time to thoughtful illumination of a more crucial strain on the Indian psyche—that created by the imposition of an ill-defined secular ideal upon a fundamentally spiritual land. A discussion of issues such as Sahgal attempts should extend beyond the history and displacement of elites to a recognition of the forces of the land and its people. Such a recognition Jhabvala achieves indirectly, and Rushdie suggests in depth, both in the structure and characterisation of Midnight's Children. If English, still the language of a privileged elite in India, could not encompass this wider and more fundamental reality, then its many detractors within the country would indeed have a point about its limitations as a creative tool within the Indian context. Yet, Indian poetry in English has transcended the limitation, as have the novelists of the previous generation who were inspired by pre-independence dreams of freedom.

MARIA COUTO
London

The oil of acceptance

Talkative Man

R K Narayan

London: William Heinemann. 1986. 123pp. £7.95hb

R K Narayan's latest novel, Talkative Man, published in his eightieth year, adds, even his greatest admirer must admit, not much more than a charming grace note to the weight of fifty years of distinguished literary production. There are in Talkative Man some authentic Narayan touches, an ardent, easily impressed hero and a menacing central character, Dr Rann, who takes up residence in the waiting-room of Malgudi railway station, having come to the town on some mysterious ploy of his own, before establishing himself in the Talkative Man's house in Kabir Street. Dr Rann is related in character and significance to other figures in Narayan's work who represent an impersonal and negative influence most inimical to the free flow of life.

In a postscript Narayan expresses his puzzlement at the way in which this novel—really hardly more than a conte—decided, in spite of anything he did or felt, to end itself. Yet surely this is no more than a signal of naturally declining powers, a phase of life which has to be endured, even by Narayan. Yet this novel gives us an opportunity to remind ourselves of Narayan's special and splendid contribution to the novel.

Narayan was born in 1907 in Madras, of an old Brahmin family. The family—they spoke Tamil at home—moved early to Mysore where he learned his English in a small school, taught by a model for the ferocious but by no means inefficient schoolmasters who appear in his fiction. His higher education was at Maharaja's College—now part of the University of Mysore—but he does not appear to have made any particular mark as scholar. His first book, Swami and Friends, was published in 1935 and he has continued to produce regularly ever since.

His novels are regional, in that they convey an intimate sense of a given place, without being parochial. They include the intimate resonance given by village life as well as the more sophisticated tone of the impersonal city.

Narayan is much preoccupied with the skills and problems of various kinds of work; commerce, teaching, journalism, money-lending, sweet-making. Within this scope, however, his habit is to focus his attention sharply and to proceed with an instinct for limitation. He writes of the middle class, his own class, the members of which are neither too well off not to worry about money and position, nor dehumanised by absolute need. The family provides the immediate context in which he operates, and his novels are remarkable for the delicacy and precision of the family relations depicted—those of son and parents, and brother and brother in The Bachelor of Arts (1978); of husband and wife, and father and daughter in The English Teacher (1978); of father and son in The Financial Expert (1952); of grandmother and grandson in Waiting for the Mahatma (1955).

The firmly delineated town, therefore, is the outer circle of the action; within it is the subtler and more wavering ring of the family. At the centre stands, or rather flinches, the Narayan hero, a tentative, spiritually sensitive, appealingly limited yet ardent character, in whom modesty is a positive force, whether he be the leathery old proprietor of a tiny industry, like Jagan in The Sweet-Vendor (1967), the converted 'con man' Raju (apologetically converted, in spite of himself) in The Guide (1958), or the nervous editor of the press on Market Road, Nataraj, in The Man-Eater of Malgudi (1961). The characteristic Narayan figure is wry about himself and sufficiently conscious to have an active inner life, and to grope toward some existence independent of family. Yet he always has the capacity to be surprised by the turn of events. His individuality has a certain formlessness, a lack of finish, as though the definition of his personality depended upon the play of external influences—which of course in India, with the immense weight of inherited tradition, is perhaps frequently the case. This quality of incompleteness in the person implies a further capacity, not just to be startled by external events, but to be at least in part reconstituted by them. The procedure followed by a Narayan novel is almost invariably one of renovating or reforming character in response to the encouragement or provocation provided by events. This process, however, is never total enough to be revolutionary, but is simply sufficient to create a new bend in the flow of continuity. Yet, if this is how the process appears to the observer, it reveals itself to the protagonist in terms of his own efforts to achieve a more explicit and articulate sense of self.

Narayan's novels are comedies of sadness, evoking, as Graham Greene observed, comparisons with Chekhov, rather than anything in English literature. The sadness is twofold: it stems from the painful experience of dismantling the routine self, which in the Indian context seems less a private possession than something distilled by powerful and ancient conventions; and from the reconstitution, more frequently passive than active, of another personality. The comedy arises from the sometimes bumbling, sometimes desperate, sometimes absurd exploration of different experiences in the search for a new, perhaps exquisitely inappropriate, role. The complex theme of Narayan's serious comedies, then, is the rebirth—one need not balk at the word in an Indian context—of self and the process of its initial conception or education, the set of conditions in which rebirth takes place. Friction between the two parts of the composition is prevented by a subtle oil of acceptance, secreted both by the inclusive and tolerant stance of the author, and by what is ultimately a fundamental attitude of acceptance on the part of the characters. These characters occupy a universe characterised by both the influx and the plurality of being. Things flow, an infinite variety of things, men and manners, relations and women, avocations and degrees, joys, disappointments and disasters. To the author this is the nature of reality, to the characters it is what they will perhaps, with a moderate kind of happiness, finally accommodate themselves to.

Malgudi, the locale of Talkative Man, as of all the novels, is a metaphor of India. Whatever happens in the one happens in the other, but also, the reader begins to believe, whatever happens there happens everywhere. Against the background of a single place, and amidst the utter variety of human kind, the single individual engages with the one, universal problem: the effort not simply of being, but of becoming, human.

The realisation of this reading of experience is effected in the novels by means of a triple capacity of the author. First there is the minute fidelity with which the surface of Malgudi life is effortlessly reproduced; the streets, the houses, the shops, the temples, the trades, the routines and crises of the family, the exact grain and patina of place and people. Next there is the author's unblurred perception of the complicated play of a whole throng of motives, each member of the group ousting another, and being replaced in turn, in even the simplest action. One of the most brilliant exhibitions of this gift for psychological and moral analysis occurs in The Guide,⁴ in the way in which each thread of deception and sincerity is teased out by the author's nimble and tactful fingers. Accuracy on the surface is accompanied not only by this deftness of diagnosis but by a third quality, a subdued, suggested poetry, implicit in the natural relation Narayan finds between on the one hand, human actions and their purposes—conscious or not—and on the other, the ancient, complex Indian myths. The orchestration of his work at this level adds another and more profound dimension to his perception.

This complicated cargo is carried along by an English style which is limpid, simple, calm and unaffected, natural in its run and tone, and beautifully measured to its purposes. It has neither the American purr of the combustion engine nor the thick marmalade quality of British English; it communicates with complete ease a separate, Indian sensibility.

A quiet version of such a vision and such an art sustains Talkative Man throughout.
WILLIAM WALSH
University of Leeds

Occupied Palestine: the writer as eyewitness

The Secret Life of Saeed: The Pessoptimist

Emile Habiby

London: Zed. 1985. 169pp. £9.95hb/£3.95pb

Wild Thorns

Sahar Khalifeh

London: Al Saqi. 1985. 207pp. £3.95pb

Critics such as the 'orientalist', H A R Gibb, were of the opinion that modern Arabic fiction could not be regarded as a part of world literature.¹ They felt that it was more interesting as social document than for its literary merit. The two works of prose fiction under review are, however, both social documents and literary achievements in their own right. Palestinian resistance literature gained new impetus when these two works were published in the original Arabic in the mid-1970s. The writers were Palestinian eye-witnesses who were recounting events in contemporary Palestine and describing the conditions under which the Palestinian Arabs had been living in Israel.

Both Khalifeh and Habiby chose to stay in Occupied Palestine, enduring the hardships of living under occupation, while continuing to write. Habiby (born 1919) is one of Israel's best-known Arab journalists and editors, a communist and a long-time member of the Israeli Parliament and a novelist with an uncompromising pen. Khalifeh (born 1941) is a teacher at the University of Iowa and Bir Zeit University in the West Bank. Her first novel was confiscated by the Israeli authorities; her second was published in Cairo and Wild Thorns is her third.

The Pessoptimist (a combination of 'pessimist' and 'optimist') is a long allegorical letter addressed to a friend from outer space, describing the hardships, struggles and second-hand citizenship of Palestinian Arabs who remained in Israel after the exodus following the 1948 and 1967 wars. Habiby chose comic and episodic prose fiction to describe the chaotic and sometimes farcical present in Palestine, where Arabs are repressed and discriminated against. The witty anecdotes show a frenzied search for a deeper structure underlying the chaos of events in contemporary Palestine and the 'miracles of this strange age'.

The work has no consistent central setting. Times and places are combined in a haphazard manner. In one chapter, the reader is carried from the Jazzar Mosque in Acre to Lebanon then back to Haifa. Graceful flights between centuries take place throughout the book, where sometimes the narrative starts in the twentieth century and then jumps back to the thirteenth and fourteenth. The chapters are arranged in three main 'books' each of which is named after a female character with whom Saeed was in love. First, Yuaad, a word meaning 'once more'; second, Baqiyah, 'she who remains behind'; and third, the Second Yuaad.

¹ M J L Young, 'Modern Arabic Fiction in English Translation', Middle Eastern Studies 16(1).

Saeed, the main character, is a comic figure who sees his relations with the world as simple and comprehensible. No matter what happens to him, he believes that a potentially greater disaster was thereby averted, and he habitually thinks 'thank Him that it was no worse'. While writing his letter, he soars with his friends, creatures from outer space. Right from the beginning he associates himself with an ass, the stupid ass who is exploited by both Arabs and Israelis, the ass that did most of the donkey work to build modern Israel and the ass who does not 'raise an eyebrow if kings are deposed or if they stay'. In Keshet, Nattityahnu Peled said, 'Always the people are seen running away without exactly knowing why.'² However, Saeed returns to his homeland, crossing the border with his sister's lover. The fine line between his naivety and his knowingness is carefully drawn throughout the novel. When a guerrilla fighter in prison calls him 'father', the transition in his character takes place. He turns into a visible human being with a distinctive identity and becomes 'free at last'.

Saeed finally ends up sitting on a long stake, scanning the choices he has as a Palestinian Arab living in Israel. His future is full of promises of weddings and deaths. Jacob the Sephardic Jew is sitting on another stake. The Ashkenazy Jew denies the existence of a stake and asks for peaceful collaboration. The young man carrying the newspaper, a symbol of the communist party, wants to chop down the stake with his axe. Baqiyah, her son Walaa and the guerrilla fighter, invite Saeed to take part in the armed struggle. He rejects all these alternatives and departs with his friends from outer space, who symbolise death, a supernatural power or madness.

'For the sake of Truth and History', the account ends with an epilogue confirming the impaired mental capacity of the narrator. The writer's attempt to shake the reader's faith in the narrator is designed to offer an answer to the multi-dimensional problem described in the work. The fantastic nature of the narrator and his extra-terrestrial friends gives an indirect expression to doubts which society refuses to entertain. Trying to make life both manageable and satisfying is seen as an attempt to transcend human limitations, which elicits the label of insanity.

This novel, for which plans to adapt it into a film may be afoot, enjoyed great success in the Arab world and was highly praised by critics. This is a strong indication that the novel in the Arab literary tradition has begun to gain status after a long period of stagnation. The writing of Habiby is sharp, full of irony and historical parody. Because of its 'critical revisiting of the past' and its endeavour of filling new bottles with old wine, this work probably constitutes the first post-modern Palestinian novel.³ Edward E Said described it in his book, After the Last Sky, as 'the best work of Palestinian writing yet produced, precisely because of [it's being] seemingly disorganised and ironic'.⁴

Salma Jayyusi, describing the prose fiction of modern Arab writers, said 'Whether they wrote in the romantic or realistic tradition, in the tragic or heroic mode, they favoured a serious tone and a direct approach.³ Habiby's work was a fresh challenge to this traditional notion of perspective and to the novel as a genre.

² Nattityahnu Peled, 'Special Number on Arabic Literature', Keshet, Tel-Aviv, Spring 1970

³ Linda Hutcheon, 'Postmodernism', Textual Practice, Volume 1, Number 1, Spring 1987.

⁴ Edward W Said, After the Last Sky, London: Faber and Faber, 1986.

The solemn tone and direct message of Sahar Khalifeh's novel place it firmly within the category which Jayyusi has described. Wild Thorns is a socialist-realist novel which attempts to reveal the truth of contemporary political and social conditions in Palestine, and to record accurately and classify day-to-day life, in a deterministic way.

Occupied Nablus is the stage for the confrontations both between the Israelis and the Palestinian Arabs and among the Palestinians themselves. An aura of the 1970s pervades the romanticised locale which is always seen with a pair of loving eyes. Nablus is almost tangible with its Mamluki old houses and new social values. One of the main characters, Usama, has to cross the bridge across the Jordan river and to be interrogated and searched before being allowed to enter his home town. The lurking threat of an occupier is well-caught in the novel.

The linear narrative starts at the beginning of Usama's exploratory voyage, during which he inspects the conditions under which the Arabs of the West Bank live. He is the fighter from the outside who perpetually criticises people living in occupied Palestine without taking into consideration the dilemmas they face in everyday life. 'What's happened to the country? What's become of everyone?', Usama cries in a condemning voice, executing his premeditated guerrilla operation against Arab workers who are helping to build modern Israel through their offer of cheap labour. Usama is a symbol of the Palestinian who lives outside Palestine, in the Arab or Western countries, and comes back to scrutinise and sometimes punish the Palestinian Arabs who chose not to leave their country but to live under occupation, accepting all the complications and concessions that accompany that choice.

The novel is essentially anti-heroic because Adil, the main character and central consciousness, is incapable of heroic deeds. He spends most of his time helping the people of the neighbourhood and his fellow-workers. He seeks consolation in drinking at night and working during the day. There are no questions to ask nor any final answers in his world. He simply takes life as it comes. He fails to do anything to save his house from being blown up and his sole achievement is to leave behind the kidney dialysis machine which pumps life into his father, who in turn spends most of his time talking about the past to uninterested foreign journalists. Although prisoners continue to struggle in proliferating prisons, houses to be blown up and children to be arrested, 'nothing changed' for Adil. The nearest thing he achieves to a positive act is to put an end to that old generation who believe in miracles and archaic values.

Adil does not turn into a thorn, a guerrilla fighter, like Usama or Basil, but Zuhdie does. When he is faced with the choice of either killing a Palestinian or an Israeli, Zuhdie turns into a guerrilla fighter to kill as many Israelis as he can. Unlike Usama, he was forced to take up arms not from any desire but from necessity. Abu-Sabber is yet another symbol for the limited alternatives facing the Palestinians under occupation. He represents the mutilated Arab worker who is basically paralysed and can do little to bring change to his surroundings.

The novel's scene of the destruction of houses was a triumph for Khalifeh (pp 104-6) and does not backfire because the emotion it evokes in the reader is precisely that which the writer had in mind. It portrays vividly how the Israelis blow up houses in a mechanical, nonchalant way and how the Palestinians show their rejoicing and happiness because they consider it one of several methods of struggle and steadfastness. The atmosphere in the neighbourhood is well captured and the reader can hear the voice of the old man whose house has been destroyed, when he stands on a neighbouring roof and calls for prayer 'Allahu Akbar'. "'God is great", repeated the neighbourhood in unison . . . women raised their voices in loud ululations, while the girls continued to beat a rhythm on empty cans.' The particular dialect of colloquial Arabic which is spoken in that part of Nablus is presented in Um-Sabir's speech when she says, for example, 'May God break your arm! May seventy evil eyes get you! May your children all die young! May God destroy you, by the glory of the Prophet Muhammad.'

³ Salma Khadra Jayyusi, Introduction to the Pessoptimist, London: Zed Books, 1985.

The major problem of this novel is its voice and perspective. Authorial voices and those of characters overlap and fly into each other. The reader may become confused by the similarity between the respective trains of thought or mental images of Usama and Adil. In certain scenes the voice cannot be attributed to anyone but the author, despite an evident wish not to present her point of view in this particular fictional work. Some scenes are sketchy (p 30), some are melodramatic (p 39) and others are not justified within the context of the novel (p 36). It is worth noting, however, that all the above mentioned technical faults have been ironed out in Khalifeh's subsequent novels. The Sunflower (1980) is a follow-up to Wild Thorns, both titles having been taken from Fadwa Tuqan's poem 'The Song of Becoming' in which the Palestinian grows up in the shadow of bitter Wild Thorns and takes up arms to become a Sunflower.⁶ The feminist theme in The Sunflower and the realistic, down-to-earth language have, meanwhile, been beautifully developed in her latest novel Memoirs of a Non-Realistic Woman (1987).⁷

The influence of Western literature on both Wild Thorns and Pessoptimist is evident. Habiby ridicules the critics who said, 'he ended up falling short of Candide by a couple of hundred years.' Saeed's extraterrestrial friend accuses him of imitating Candide and he defends himself saying, 'Blame our way of life that hasn't changed since Voltaire's day, except that El Dorado has now come to exist on this planet.' The satirical tone of Habiby is obvious while he was defending the first edition. The combination of 'real' and 'supernatural' to create a more comprehensive world and adequate language may remind the reader of Kurt Vonnegut's Slaughterhouse Five where Billy becomes unstuck and meets the Tralfamadorians who 'were simply able to give him insights into what was really going on'.⁸ The supernatural or madness are the only refuges from the ugly reality that Billy witnesses when Dresden is destroyed by the allies' aerial bombing of 1945-6. The effect Sahar Khalifeh tries to achieve is also similar to that of many Western realist novelists.

The translation of Habiby's novel by LeGassick and Jayyusi is one of the best the reader may encounter. The excellence of the writer's Arabic language finds its match in the translator's sharp English. The constant search for the closest English expression to Arabic idioms and the translator's extensive historical and linguistic research is evident throughout the work. On the other hand, the translation of LeGassick and Fernea of Khalifeh's novel is not as good. It is hard to determine whether this is attributed to the simple, realistic language of the writer or to the foreignness of the translators.

⁶ Sahar Khalifeh, The Sunflower, PLO, 1980.

⁷ Sahar Khalifeh, Memoirs of a Non-Realist Woman, Beirut: House of Literature, 1987.

⁸ Kurt Vonnegut, Slaughterhouse Five, London: Traid Grafton Books, 1979.

LITERARY REVIEWS

The message of both works of fiction is essentially the same: the Palestinian issue is a complex phenomenon in contemporary history. Living in Palestine is not as easy as it may look for the theoreticians and engineers of revolution living outside, far from the big iron fist of the Israelis. The necessity of earning a living in such conditions might lead some people to make partial compromises. In such circumstances, writing becomes as futile as pouring paint in the 'bottomless bucket of the madman'. Habiby expresses this sense of futility in his novel when he writes:

'Give me the voice' I exclaimed.

'Continue writing to your friend.'

Many adopt literature because they lack power for anything more, while others avoid taking a stand by moving abroad. In such a situation, everyone is under scrutiny; Palestinians living in Occupied Palestine, Palestinians and Arabs living outside Palestine, Arab systems, immigrant writers and these novelists themselves. Under this scrutiny, according to the writers, we are all found guilty of passivity based on naïve optimism.

FADIA A FAQIR

University of East Anglia

Poetry and politics

Modern Poetry of the Arab World

Translated and edited by Abdullah al-Udhari

London: Penguin. 1986. 154pp. £3.95pb

The appearance of an anthology of modern Arabic poetry in English translation is an event to be welcomed by all lovers of Arabic poetry who would like to see it better known to the English-reading public. This is all the more so when the volume is published in such a popular and widely circulating series as The Penguin Poets. This book is an anthology not of the whole of modern Arabic poetry, but of poetry published only during the last thirty years, the earliest poem dating back to 1957 while the latest was written in 1984 and revised in 1985. Although the anthology is entitled Modern Poetry of the Arab World the poets included in it come exclusively from Iraq, Syria, Lebanon and Palestine; no other part of the Arab world, not even Egypt, is represented.

Within its limitations this anthology has much to recommend it. The translation is generally readable and at times even elegant, which is more than can be said for much 'academic' translation of Arabic verse. Abdullah al-Udhari was certainly wise to seek the advice of two distinguished sympathetic literary figures: John Heath-Stubbs and George Wightman. Moreover, the anthology succeeds in illustrating forcefully and poignantly the extent to which in their work the contemporary Arab poets have bravely confronted 'the shattering events that have overtaken the Middle East since the Second World War'. It provides yet another instance of what seems to be an inevitable preoccupation with political issues in the literature of the Third World. It is this preoccupation which probably more than any other factor, distinguishes the poems in this volume from the work of most contemporary Western poets. However much they may be troubled by perennial or metaphysical questions arising from the nature of the human condition, contemporary Arab poets, for obvious historical reasons, seem unable to escape the impact of politics, be it the tragic sufferings of the Palestinians, following the loss of their homeland, or the suppression of individual liberties and the affront to human dignity caused by internal authoritarian regimes. The result is that the reading of this volume is a deeply moving experience.

Yet it must be pointed out that the limitations of this anthology are very serious indeed. First and foremost is the editor's seemingly inexplicable omission of all Egyptian poets. While very minor Lebanese, Syrian and Iraqi poets are represented, the volume does not contain a single poem by an Egyptian poet, not even by leading figures such as Salah 'Abd al-Sabur and 'Abd al-Mu'ti Hijazi who both formally and thematically made significant contributions to the Modernist movement in modern Arabic poetry. The obvious political bias of the anthology, which bears the dedication 'For Beirut', leads to the conclusion that there must be a political explanation for this otherwise baffling phenomenon. It is as if by excluding all Egyptian poets the editor wished to make a political statement, objecting to Sadat's Camp David Peace Agreement with Israel in 1978 which removed Egypt from the Arab-Israeli conflict. It is sad to see politics interfering so damagingly with literary and aesthetic judgement, and the result is that this anthology, despite its title, cannot be regarded as a fair representation of contemporary Arabic poetry. No one unacquainted with Arab literature who reads this book would suspect that Cairo was an important cultural centre of the Arab world.

Secondly, regarding the poets included, there is a disturbing imbalance in the amount of work presented. For instance, while there are no fewer than eighteen pages allotted to each of the two probably most translated Arab poets, Adonis and Mahmoud Darwish, the Lebanese Khalil al-Hawi (surely one of the major figures in modern Arabic poetry by any standard) is represented by an insignificant piece of five short lines containing no more than twenty-six words, less than half the number of words used in the biographical note provided on him.

No less eccentric is the classification scheme of the volume. It claims to trace four major trends or movements to which it gives the names 'the Taf'ila Movement' (Iraqi School) 1947-57; 'the Majallat al-Shi'r Movement' (Syrian School) 1957-67; 'the Huzairan (June) Experience' 1967-82, and 'the Beirut Experience' 1982 onwards. The dates given lend a false air of neat chronological sequence. Yet many of the poets listed under one heading or another belong in fact to all four categories at once. For instance, it is not clear why Adonis is listed under 'the Majallat al-Shi'r Movement' and not under the so-called 'Beirut Experience', despite the fact that one of the longest poems in the entire anthology, running to twelve pages, was directly inspired by Beirut and given the title 'The Desert: the Diary of Beirut under Siege, 1982'. The confusion arises from the lack of clarity and consistency in the criteria of classification, and from the mixing of formal and thematic principles. The Taf'ila Movement, as the name suggests (taf'ila being a prosodic unit), describes experimentation in the metrical form of the poem, experimentation, incidentally, which was by no means confined to the Iraqi poets, but was common to many of the poets included in this anthology. The 'Majallat al-Shi'r Movement' describes a group of poets who published in the eponymous avant-garde poetry magazine, in which, it must be remembered, Iraqi poets no less than Syrian or Lebanese also published their work. The two last so-called movements are not movements at all, but they denote themes or subjects about which poets, of all categories, have written: namely the June war and the subsequent traumatic events in Beirut, ranging from the civil war to the Israeli invasion.

LITERARY REVIEWS

As far as the accuracy of translation is concerned, the editor forestalls criticism by providing this disarming footnote (on page 25): 'To avoid misunderstanding, I should point out that a few poems have been edited with the approval of the poets concerned.' I shall therefore confine my few remarks to poems by al-Sayyab who died in 1964 and was therefore in no position to give the translator his approval, although it is difficult to see why in 'The New Noah' (p 59) Adonis wanted to change what should be translated as

The earth trembled and God rushed to say to me
'Noah, save the living'

to And the earth trembled and God was mad
And Noah asked me: 'Save the living' or in 'The Wound' (p 62) what should be

The charm cast by your eyes
In the last kingdoms
Is left neither tempting sail nor island
Since the wound has passed over it to The wound is beyond the fate

Your eyes cast
On the lost civilizations.
It's left no sails
Nor islands.

Or in 'A Mirror for the Twentieth Century' (p 63) what should be

A wild beast approaches, bearing a flower altered to A wild beast hidden in a flower.

Equally it is not clear why Mahmoud Darwish wished to have his 'huwat al-ritha'i', which means 'amateur mourners', rendered as 'professional mourners' (p 139).

In Al-Sayyab's 'Rain Song' (pp 29ff) 'turiq al-kurum' or 'the vines burst into leaf' is translated as 'the vines flower'. In the line 'like a little boy raving about his mother' the words qabla an yanam or 'before he goes to sleep' are omitted. 'Tasiffu min turabiha' should be 'Eating soil', not 'Licking soil'. Similarly, in 'The River and Death' (p 32)

Tower bells lost at the bottom of the sea should be 'Bells of a tower lost at the bottom of the sea', 'lost' referring to the tower and not to the bells. Likewise,

I wish I could walk in the dark should be 'I wish I could run ('adawtu) in the dark.' Towards the end of the poem (after the first line on p 34) the translator quietly omits two important lines, which could be translated as

I wish I could rush to lend my support
To those engaged in the struggle
Clenching my fist to strike Fate in the face.

These are but a few examples to show the rather cavalier manner in which the translator sometimes treats the text of his original.

As for the nine-page introduction to the volume, the less said about it from a scholarly point of view the better. Although it undoubtedly expresses the editor's enthusiasm and commitment, it is full of sweeping generalisations and wild, unsubstantiated assertions. It grossly exaggerates the significance and influence of Jibran and Rihani. While rightly drawing attention to the relevance of the political ideas of Antun Sa'ada, it tends to underrate the direct influence of Western poets such as T S Eliot and Edith Sitwell. Clearly, al-Udhari has not benefited from the various scholarly studies of modern Arabic poetry that are now available in English. This is a pity, because had he done so and had he been less guided by political considerations, his view would have been more catholic and his anthology might have afforded a more accurate picture of contemporary Arabic poetry. Here was a great opportunity sadly lost. A more comprehensive and less idiosyncratic Penguin anthology would have been a most effective means of introducing an interesting chapter of an old and fascinating poetic tradition to a large number of English readers with little or no knowledge of the Arabic language.

M M BADAWI

St Antony's College, Oxford

Spanning Muslim Literature

The Worlds of Muslim Imagination

Edited by Alamgir Hashmi

Islamabad: Gulmohar. 1986. 270pp. $12.95hb

Pakistani Literature

Edited by Alamgir Hashmi

Islamabad: Gulmohar. 1987. 107pp. $10.00hb

Devised and published by Alamgir Hashmi, these two volumes are well-planned anthologies of writing from Third World countries. Both books are roughly divided into three sections: Prose, Poetry, Critique; plus an index of contributors, including both writers and translators. Selections have obviously been made with a view to interesting the general reader. The short stories are both entertaining and reflective of the society and literature of the countries from which they originate—in the case of The Worlds of Muslim Imagination, these can be as culturally removed from one another as Indonesia and Egypt. The poetry sections of this volume, further sub-divided into poems written in English and those translated from other languages, are infinitely rich and varied in theme and character. Sarmad Sehbai's evocative Second Portrait (p 93) starkly reminiscent of Pakistan's inner-city streets, Yahya Kemal's elaborately painted and romanticised Night, translated in measured rhythm and rhymed couplets by Roger Finch (p 153), and Majid El Houssi's stylish and structurally complex Alternatives, translated from the French by Eric Sellin (p 157), demonstrate the extraordinary aptness of the title.

The English language market in international literature, in terms of material on and by Indian writers in English, has been fairly well served for the major part of this decade. Translations of Arab and Franco-Arab modern classics have been popular far longer, though perhaps somewhat more marginalised in marketing terms as translations than such mainstream authors as Anita Desai and Salman Rushdie. However, it is only in the most general terms, as 'Third World Literature', that these works have ever been considered collectively, until this ingeniously conceived collection. Hashmi's anthology brings together modern classics and popular writing, poetry and fiction, both in translation and in the original English, from several Muslim countries. Thus we see such internationally acclaimed literary giants as Najib Mahfuz alongside writers who have received far less exposure, such as the Pakistani poet, Kaleem Omar. The collection includes the work of African, Arab, Iranian, Indonesian, French and Turkish writers but the focus is heaviest on writers from the Indian sub-continent writing in languages as diverse as English, Urdu, Hindi, Bengali and Tamil. The quality of translation is frequently of the highest calibre, having been handled in the main by well-respected American academics specialising in translating the writers concerned. In addition, many Urdu translations derive from the pens of established Pakistani poets of English, such as Taufiq Rafat and Athar Tahir.

The criticism section is perceptive and informative, providing valuable historical background to the material included, as well as information on general social and political trends within the various countries whose literature is included.

While the content of The Worlds of Muslim Imagination is necessarily more complex, encompassing as it does both original English writing and translations, Pakistani Literature provides a fuller flavour of the English material deriving from Pakistan. It includes a variety of short stories covering, for example, the experiences of a dilettante diplomat ('Under the Juniper Tree', Ahmed Ali, p 5), those of an immigrant Pathan factory worker on his way back to Pakistan ('Shore leave in Port Said', Shuaib bin Hasan, p 30), and the growing pains of a callow post-pubescent student, whose guilt-laden forays towards his first sexual experience are reminiscent of the fiery remonstrations of patriarchs exhorting men to see their sister in every woman ('Encounter', Athar Tahir, p 14). In contrast are the colourful Brazilian characters ('With Music by Dmitri Tiomkin: A Short Story', Z Ghose, p 23) who have peopled nearly all Ghose's novels other than The Murder of Aziz Khan (1967). Interestingly, Z Ghose's poem 'A Memory of Asia' (p 43) throws light on his feelings about his native Pakistan—'. . . the memory of the temple/is of no importance. It means nothing to me./There are temples all over Asia. And this one's/like a picture of an old calendar one has left/on the wall and can't help seeing from time to time/and reminding oneself half-heartedly to take it down/but somehow it still hangs there, its colours remarkably/gaudy after all these years, though the dates have yellowed.'

The male Pakistani poet writing in English is an established phenomenon who finds his forum in magazines, newspapers, Western anthologies, competitions and international writers' circles. A prolific poet, also editor and contributor to at least two anthologies of Pakistani poems for the Oxford University Press, is Kaleem Omar, whose work is described by Coppola in his essay 'Recent English Poetry from Pakistan' (p 90) as 'consciously "poetic"' in terms of discourse and syntax, in contrast to that of Ghose and Hashmi (both living and working in America) whom he describes as, for better or worse, having joined 'the mainstream of modernity in Western poetry'.

Pakistani Literature is a lively and energetic selection of work by the best known and most representative writers. Generally well-presented and obviously intended for the enjoyment of a wide readership, it has the further advantage of informed expert comment from Carlos Coppola and Beatrice Stoerk.

The three-page index of contributors is a valuable appendix to the anthology since, unlike their Indian counterparts, many of the writers included are not known to the general English-reading audience outside Pakistan. However, the book was first published in 1978 and the 1987 edition suffers in that the index has not been properly updated. It is said that Shahid Hosain '... lives and works in Rawalpindi' (p 106); Hosain has been a resident of Britain for several years.

This anthology is a valuable contribution to the study of South Asian writers in English and in particular, a useful pointer towards an area as yet largely unexplored in Britain and one which might well provoke popular publishing interest as well as indicating a new area of academic research.

SHAHIRUKH A HUSAIN

London

BOOK REVIEWS

Soviet Interests in the Third World

Edited by Robert Cassen

London: Sage, for the Royal Institute of International Affairs. 1985. 329pp. £27.50hb/
£10.50pb

Ethiopia, the United States and the Soviet Union

David A Korn

London: Croom Helm. 1986. 199pp. £19.50hb

Soviet Power and the Third World

Rajan Menon

New Haven and London: Yale University Press. 1986. 261pp. n/p

Soviet relations with the Third World contributed more to the decline of East-West détente than any other aspect of Soviet defence and foreign policy. It was believed in the West that under cover of détente, the Soviet leadership had adopted an expansionist policy into areas traditionally considered at least neutral, if not firmly within the Western sphere of influence. A new and dangerous Soviet activism was detected in the role played by Cuban troops (with Soviet logistic support) in Angola in 1975 and in Ethiopia in 1977. The climax was the direct intervention of Soviet troops in Afghanistan in 1979. Détente deteriorated into a new Cold War and US Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger was soon warning that 'regions that were once free from the threat of Soviet armed forces have now come under the shadow of Soviet military power' (cited by Menon, p 130).

In fact, Soviet policy in the Third World has been rather less successful than the conventional wisdom of the second Cold War suggests. Moreover, it has usually been reactive, a response to events, rather than the execution of a long-term plan to expand either the Soviet empire or international communism. The number of socialist-oriented states has grown to about fifteen. But while the Soviet Union enjoys diplomatic and economic relations with nearly one hundred less-developed countries (LDCs), can usually rely on their support in the United Nations and has useful strategic arrangements with some of them, the opportunity costs have been high. The collapse of détente was perhaps the most expensive cost. But there have been dramatic failures in Soviet Third World policy and the economic returns have been disappointing. Arms transfers have earned hard currency, but military programmes have sometimes rebounded. The Soviet model of development has proved inapplicable or unacceptable to the majority of LDCs. The cumulative result has been a more pessimistic Soviet view about the potential for socialist development in LDCs.

These three books concentrate on different aspects of these failures. Korn, head of the American Embassy in Addis Ababa from 1982 to 1985, is concerned to present a favourable record of American efforts to reach a better understanding with the Ethiopian government. He believes that American overtures were unavailing because Mengistu Hail Mariam feared that better Ethiopian-American relations would be interpreted by the Soviet leadership as a weakening of Soviet-Ethiopian ties. He also explains that the Somali invasion of the Ogaden in 1977 (which forced the Soviet leadership to choose between Somalia and Ethiopia) took place 'because the Soviet Union recklessly armed Somalia in the years before' (p 45). Many of the contributors to the book edited by Cassen demonstrate that the first of these two arguments is far too simplistic. By the 1980s, the Soviet Union was actively encouraging socialist-oriented LDCs to seek economic and other relations with the capitalist world—the rejection of Mozambique's application to join CMEA in 1982 and Soviet acceptance of the Nkomati accords in 1984 indicate that the Soviet Union had abandoned the idea of exclusive relations with socialist-oriented states.

There is some justice in his view that without Soviet arms, Somalia could not have attacked Ehtiopia. But the argument is counter-productive from someone whose avowed purpose is to get a better press for American Third World policy. The data presented in Menon's book (p 80) of arms transfers to the Third World from 1976 to 1983 (before which the two superpowers sold equal amounts or the USA was the undisputed leader) prove that in 1976, 1978, 1982 and 1983, America supplied a larger proportion than the Soviet Union of the total arms transfers to LDCs. If recklessness in arms sales is measured by the incidence of wars initiated by recipients, the American record is no better than that of the Soviet Union. Ethiopia, the United States and the Soviet Union is a fairly interesting account of the frustrations of being an American diplomat in Ethiopia, but an inadequate analysis of Ethiopian, American or Soviet policy.

Korn would have benefited from studying the other two books with which the review is concerned. The book edited by Cassen (the outcome of a Chatham House study group) consists of fifteen short essays (with an introductory overview by the editor) divided into three parts: the regional context; the Soviet economy and the Third World; and six country case-studies. Although the contributors are not unanimous in their conclusions, the prevailing view is that the Soviet Union is 'a beleaguered major power' (p 2), that there are strong economic motives in many Soviet–Third World links and that the Soviet Union has had limited 'ambitions in the Third World and capacities to pursue them' (p 12) in recent years.

Limited economic and political capabilities, economic motives and the privileged position of the military industry within the Soviet economy help to explain the increased salience of military power in Soviet Third World policy since 1970, the subject of Soviet Power and the Third World. But an important contributory factor is the new capacity for force projection. Menon examines three selected aspects of Soviet policy: Soviet theory on East–West competition in the Third World; the status and significance of Soviet power projection forces; and the role and usefulness of arms transfers. He writes lucidly, carefully refuting counter-arguments to his well-substantiated views. He concludes that 'the Soviet Union understands not only the opportunities provided by the shifting sands of Third World politics, but also the perils and burdens associated with competition' (p 254).

Soviet Interests in the Third World and Soviet Power and the Third World both demonstrate that the frequently found tendencies to over-simplify Soviet policy by interpreting it in terms of a single motive and to treat LDCs as passive objects of Soviet and American policy do not serve to elucidate the complexities of international relations.

MARGOT LEIT
University of Surrey

BOOK REVIEWS

The Soviet Union and the Third World: An Economic Bind

Elizabeth Kridl Valkenier

New York: Praeger. 1985. 188pp. n/p

There are those who see Soviet relations with the Third World on the model of predator and prey; for others, the Soviets are the one major power which has the true interests of the Third World at heart. Neither of these extreme views can survive careful examination. In this book, Elizabeth Valkenier enquires into the economic relationship, quite explicitly as a means to understanding Soviet foreign policy. It is a distinguished work, and though originally published in hardback four years ago, still well worth reading today.

Professor Valkenier discusses aid and trade, and Soviet views of the world economy, development theory and the New International Economic Order. In each case Soviet attitudes and practice have changed almost in parallel over time, following major political change inside the Soviet Union. The main account begins with the Khrushchev era, when Moscow pursued thrusting and confident policies around the globe. Soviet development theory viewed economic backwardness as a function of colonialism, and saw the escape from it as a state-led strategy with little room for market forces, and economic relations with socialist countries as a major source of support. Soviet aid, particularly for large state sector projects, was given generously to a variety of countries where political gains seemed likely.

In the mid-1960s a harder-headed stance began, with aid to be used much more for economic advantage, particularly by investment in producing goods in Third World countries that the Soviet Union wished to import. After a number of reverses, when countries which they had befriended (often at great expense) imprisoned Communist parties, broke off relations, and even repudiated debts, the Soviet Union began to be more selective in the choice of countries with which ties were to be fostered. In the 1970s further policy adjustments were made, as the desire for hard currency earnings played an ever greater part in trade, and the Soviet Union showed less and less inclination for involvements in remote parts of the world where costs could be high and benefits temporary.

Side by side with these groups went gradual rethinking about the nature of development. More sophisticated perceptions dawned of categories of developing countries, the more and the less advanced. Soviet development theory, while still giving primacy to the role of the state, began to discriminate more among types of countries, and accept the usefulness of other instruments, including private capital, for economic advance. Mnogoukladnost, the multi-structural character of economies and societies, began to appear as a key theoretical concept, permitting more refined analyses of the specifics of individual countries—and also a considerable variety of interpretations within the academy, even debate.

In NIEO discussions the Soviet Union never accepted the programmes of the Group of 77, even if they enjoyed the criticism of the Western industrial countries which came with them. Today the Soviet Union, rather than assent to NIEO views, puts forward its own account of the 'new international division of labour', in which its own concerns for raw material supplies receive far from 'new' expression; it stresses the need for developing countries to achieve self-reliance through better use of their own resources, and offers exchanges itself based on clear mutual advantage. The Soviet Union does not enjoy Third World demands for more aid and better access to their markets, even less the growing tendency of Third World countries to lump the socialist bloc into an undifferentiated and reprehensible 'North'.

It is very clear that economic self-interest plays an increasing part in Soviet relations with the Third World. There is no better guide to the subject than Valkenier. One of her themes is the role of Soviet academic analysers in the formulation of Soviet policy. One would like to think that Western policy might be guided by understanding as sophisticated as hers.

R H CASSEN

Queen Elizabeth House, University of Oxford

Superpower: Comparing American and Soviet Foreign Policy

Christer Jonsson

London: Frances Pinter. 1984. 248pp. £18.50hb

Comparative analysis of the international behaviour of the superpowers is an inherently difficult problem. Most efforts in this underdeveloped field lapse either into a Manichaean juxtaposition of good and evil or into a facile equation of the United States and the USSR as dual hegemon and co-exploiters of the rest of the world. Reasoned discussion of the subject is inhibited not only by the ideological stakes inherent in it, but also by a methodological dilemma pertinent to comparative politics as a whole. In attempting to reach forceful and useful generalisations about different states, we tend to under-emphasise the dissimilarities in historical, cultural, and geopolitical heritages which render each unique. Objective and rigorous efforts to weigh the similarities and differences between the two superpowers are rare.

Professor Jonsson's book is a useful effort to fill this gap in the literature. Drawing upon the secondary Western literatures dealing with Soviet and American policy, he attempts to answer three principal questions: Do the superpowers behave similarly in foreign affairs? Are the superpowers equally powerful? Has a superpower condominium been established? In the attempt to answer these questions, he discusses first of all the determinants of superpower foreign policy. He posits that the nature of superpower status and role, similarities in ideology, history, and decision-making structure may lead to parallel outcomes in Soviet and American behaviour. He then notes that this possibility is circumscribed by clear disparities in Soviet and American capacities to influence international events.

The last half of the book is devoted to an effort to apply the theoretical analysis and conclusions to three case studies of Soviet and American foreign policy behaviour: aid relations with the Third World; crisis management in the Middle East; and, nonproliferation. He concludes that in these three issue areas, there are a number of important similarities in Soviet and American behaviour. These are the product largely of Soviet emulation of American conduct. Behavioural differences between the two are attributable largely to asymmetries in power and leverage which generally favour the United States as the more established power, possessing a wider array of the instruments of power. The three issue areas display a wide spectrum in levels of cooperation—tacit or explicit—between the superpowers, from very low levels on the question of aid to reasonably impressive ones on the question of non-proliferation. These disparities reflect varying degrees of conflict and community of interest. Cooperation of the two at the expense of the rest is constrained at a more profound level by the role that the 'enemy image' of the other plays in the role definition of each superpower and in the legitimation of its policies.

BOOK REVIEWS

These conclusions are rather modest, and one might have hoped for more startling and exciting ones. But they appear to be all that the evidence will bear. They are, moreover, a balanced antidote to the 'holier than thou' approaches of so many American and Soviet apologists and to the somewhat paranoid and conspiratorial analyses of the 'pox on both your houses' school.

A number of specific aspects of the book stand out. The analysis of the growing sophistication of Soviet-American crisis management in the Middle East is well argued and makes very interesting reading. Given the continuing problems in the region, Jonsson's conclusions on the subject are somewhat reassuring.

As with any work of this scope, there are many bones for the reviewer to pick. Methodologically, the analysis could perhaps have been enriched by greater attention to primary sources in the analysis of Soviet and American perspectives and policies. For example, in noting that both powers had learned the perils of 'appeasement', Jonsson cites the Western experience in Munich and the Soviet experience with the Nazi-Soviet Pact (p 41). There is little evidence in Soviet commentary to suggest that Soviet analysts and policy-makers consider the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact to have been a failure of Soviet diplomacy. As such, one wonders whether this is merely mirror-imaging, rather than a substantiable element of the Soviet perspective on international relations.

The attempt to deduce similarities and differences between Soviet and American behaviour through a comparison of the secondary literatures on American and Soviet foreign policy carries with it a second methodological difficulty—a tendency to over-estimate the degree of consensus in each of the two bodies of writing in order to facilitate forceful comparison. For example, the author quotes Robert Wesson on p 226 to the effect that the USSR feels compelled to represent itself as the 'harbinger of historical justice, the flood tide which must sweep over all . . . Russia is and must be unconditionally opposed to the open pluralistic state system'. There is some evidence which arguably supports this view, but it is certainly not an uncontested one in the literature on Soviet foreign policy. Why should we accept Wesson's view a priori, rather than, let us say, that of those who argue that, as the Soviet polity and society mature, the role of ideological messianism in both role definition and in legitimation has diminished and that as bipolarity in world politics decays, Soviet diplomacy has not only adapted to but has sought to take advantage of incipient multipolarity? Without further explanation, one suspects that the author accepts the one view while ignoring the others because the former suits his preconceptions concerning the nature of 'superpower' rather better.

It is to the credit of the author that these difficulties do not detract significantly from the value of the work as a whole. Professor Jonsson's work is an important contribution to the comparative analysis of Soviet and American foreign policy, providing not only perceptive analyses of specific cases, but a useful theoretical framework in which to situate them.

S NEIL MACFARLANE

University of California, Berkeley

Pills, Policies and Profits: Reactions to the Bangladesh Drug Policy

Francis Rolt

London: War on Want. 1985. 114pp. £2.95pb

Bitter Pills: Medicines and the Third World Poor

Dianne Melrose

Oxford: Oxfam. 1982. 277pp. £4.95pb

Pharmaceuticals and Health in the Third World

Surendra J Patel

London: Pergamon. 1983. 100pp. £11.50hb

Conflicts between Third World governments and trans-National Corporations (TNCs) are rarely as sharply exposed as they are in the area of pharmaceutical policies. Perhaps the only issue in development that contrasts population welfare and commercial self-interest as acutely is the co-existence of starvation in developing countries with the destruction of food surpluses in developed countries.

While potential or actual conflicts exist in other economic sectors, nowhere else could lives that were lost have been saved at so little cost. Market mechanisms provide one solution to the problem of resource allocation, but they clearly do not provide the best solution—at least from the point of view of those unfortunate individuals who die unnecessarily. Active state intervention in the pharmaceutical market could result in immense health benefits and at the same time yield significant foreign exchange savings.

The core issues can be summarised as a rational choice of drugs (restricted drugs lists and an elimination of non-essential items on a prescription), the rational purchase of drugs (the use of bulk import orders by competitive tender), the use of rational drug nomenclature (generic rather than brand names), and the encouragement of domestic production of drugs.

The three books reviewed here all deal with the political economy of pharmaceutical policy. Pills, Policies and Profits by Francis Rolt is a detailed case-study of the evolution of pharmaceutical policy in Bangladesh. The government of Bangladesh was one of the first of the growing number of Third World governments to attempt to implement some part of the World Health Organisation (WHO) recommendations that developing countries should adopt restricted drug lists. Out of a total of 4140 drugs on the market, 1700 were scheduled for a phased elimination from the market in June 1982. While this is a long way from restricting purchases to the 225 or so drugs then on the WHO essential drugs list, the policy did nevertheless incur significant hostile reactions from the pharmaceutical industry as well as a number of developed country governments. As the case study indicates, many of these reactions were either empty threats or simply irritants. Most agents reacted rationally. US investment in the country did not fall, and TNC pharmaceutical manufacturers increased domestic production of essential drugs at reduced prices. For strategic details I would suggest reference to this original and highly readable work.

BOOK REVIEWS

Bitter Pills by Dianne Melrose and Pharmaceuticals and Health In the Third World edited by Surendra Patel are both more oriented towards providing overviews. The titles are misnomers. The former has a greater emphasis on health status than the latter. The former, though well referenced and systematic in its treatment of the major problems, is more vividly journalistic and anecdotal, providing a wealth of case histories, quotations, and reproductions of advertisements for drugs that speak for themselves. Concrete examples include multi-item prescriptions in which only the (unnecessary) vitamin pills are affordable and advertisements for anabolic steroids marketed as a safe means of promoting growth in children. In developed countries, a series of serious side-effects are conventionally listed and packaging explicitly states that they are not to be used for children.

A chapter on traditional medicines describes both good and bad practices currently in use, and some of the attempts that are being made to formalise the role of this sector by evaluating herbal remedies and training traditional healers in the use of modern drugs.

A series of small-scale solutions—including Gonoshasthayta Pharmaceuticals Limited, the Bangladeshi pharmaceutical enterprise, as well as schemes in Nepal, India and Mexico—are described. The final section of the book focuses on 'Healthy solutions' and 'The rich world's response'.

If Bitter Pills emphasises the problems and solutions experienced by communities and people, Pharmaceuticals and Health is more rooted in the policy-making and academic traditions. It is a book of readings from experts in various fields (including Dianne Melrose, whose contribution is titled 'Double deprivation: public and private drug distribution from the perspective of the Third World poor'). The readings are classed in four major sections. The first is a global overview of the major political, economic, and policy issues. The selection of essential drugs, the roles of patents and trademarks and the economic savings associated with various types of pharmaceutical policies are given special attention.

The second major section is a series of case-studies reviewing national approaches to critical issues. These are drug selection in Mozambique, drug procurement and production in Cuba, drug control in India, restricted drug lists in the United Kingdom, the evolution of the Egyptian drug industry, the political economy of pharmaceutical production in Mexico, and the Bangladesh 'Report of the Expert Committee'.

Part three deals with emerging responses and includes an article on the suppliers' point of view, the perspective of consumers' organisations, and the evolution of regional collaboration between developing countries who have found economies of scale in purchasing and production agreements. The last section replicates a series of essential documents including the WHO revised model list of essential drugs, the IFPMA code of pharmaceutical marketing practices, and the Health Action International proposals.

That the interactions between drug producing TNCs and the Third World have at times been bitter is hardly in doubt. It seems, nevertheless, worthwhile to remember the great improvements in health that the Third World has made in the post-war period. Some part of this progress has been due to improved availability of essential drugs. Although the market has not worked perfectly, not all the pills were bitter.

The pharmaceutical industry may righteously feel slighted by some critics. Car manufacturers are not blamed for selling cars to careless drivers, or to people who do not need them. It is, nevertheless, clearly the case that pharmaceutical products that have been banned or restricted in developed countries have been marketed in the Third World with misleading claims. These products are harmful in themselves, irrespective of the user. This type of moral issue has affected the 'market image' of drug companies, and is well documented in Bitter Pills.

The rest is pure economics. Brand name loyalty does not last forever even in the best of conditions, as we have seen with cars and electronics, both industries that require a relatively high level of industrial development. It is increasingly clear to Third World governments that there is no advantage in importing non-essential drugs or in paying inflated prices. If the TNCs continue to sell essential drugs at inflated prices, they will soon be put out of business by producers in developing countries who will find an initial market niche in that area. Pharmaceuticals and Health and Pills, Policies and Profits give clear indications of how this might come about.

MAHESH SURENDRA PATEL

Institut Universitaire de Médecine Sociale et Préventive, Université de Lausanne

Patriarchy and Accumulation on a World Scale: Women in the International Division of Labour

Maria Mies

London: Zed. 1986. 251pp. £18.96hb/£6.95pb

Women in Development: A Creative Role Denied? The Case of Tanzania

Marja-Liisa Swantz

London: C Hurst, New York: St Martin's Press. 1985. 177pp. £12.95hb/£5.95pb

Development, Crises, and Alternative Visions: Third World Women's Perspectives

Gita Sen and Caren Grown for DAWN (Development Alternatives with Women for a New Era)

New York: Monthly Review Press. 116pp. $7.50pb

Piecing together the puzzle of women in the development process requires an understanding of international economic relationships, the state and public policies, and the enormous variation in indigenous social formations. Rarely do all these factors come together, although these three volumes approach that task.

As her title warns, Maria Mies tackles an enormous intellectual agenda in her Patriarchy and Accumulation on a World Scale. The book is even more sweeping than Gerda Lerner's The Creation of Patriarchy (New York: Oxford University Press, 1986), but less thoroughly documented. While Mies makes the obligatory tribute to women of the world defining their own feminisms, the bulk of this work suggests that all but the strongest attack on patriarchal accumulation—both in its capitalist and socialist forms—represents co-optation. The common denominator which sparks feminist consciousness is what Mies calls 'body politics', or violence against women in many forms.

Mies' analysis is best when tracing the linkages between women labourers in the underdeveloped world and women consumers in the overdeveloped world through the process of 'housewifisation'. Her chapter on violence against women, drawing largely on her field expertise in India, is positively chilling. She manages to link women together well in multinational export processing, the 'flesh trade', and frivolous consumption in an integrated world economy that divides women politically.

The analysis falters, however, in her complex construction of the emergence of accumulation which necessarily subordinates women's productivity. Men's power emerges from their hunting tools, giving them the means to destroy and providing the potential to establish relationships of exploitation and domination. Mies calls this the 'predatory appropriation mode' based on a patriarchal division of labour and says this becomes the paradigm for exploitation relations. Witch-hunts against millions of women, she says, resulted in men consolidating their control over women's labour and sexuality and establishing 'civilised' housewives. The most ambitious of chapters, it jumps from epoch to epoch and universalises case-study generalisations, ultimately raising more questions than are answered.

For Mies, accumulation as the world now knows it and female emancipation are mutually exclusive. Readers might very well gasp at the implications of this approach for practice. Mies does, however, come up with strategies that are consistent with, though not quite up to this gargantuan political agenda.

Marja-Liisa Swantz could not offer a more striking contrast in her grassroots, field-oriented empirical study of several regions of Tanzania to Mies' abstract theoretical tome. Swantz's theoretical question asks how women's customary significance in the generation and sustenance of life—'reproduction', broadly defined—has altered to produce what is clearly a grim set of circumstances for contemporary women in terms of arduous physical labour and little control over their time or the fruits of their labour. Literally hundreds of women speak through Swantz in participatory research during her seven-year stay in Tanzania. While there is no doubt that her contemporary generalisations are valid, her rich cultural and historical description provide little evidence of a pre-capitalist (pre-accumulation, à la Mies?) reality free of female subordination. Accelerated accumulation, however, does appear to generate more unpaid work for women, less value for reproduction, and men's abuse of customary prerogatives. Paradoxically, though, these abuses hinder accumulation processes by stifling female productivity.

Swantz presents case studies of Bukoba and Moshi Districts, the coastal region, and women in towns, including several Ujamaa villages. Contrary to much Africanist literature now critical of the state, Swantz paints the picture of a somewhat benevolent, if distant and weak, state which occasionally allies itself with progressive reform for women such as communal plot income distribution according to labour input instead of allocation to husbands of working wives. While women are subordinate in all areas, the nature and form of that subordination varies. This variation is ever so much more complex in a world-system analysis.

Swantz's occasional prescriptions are little more than general admonitions that planners avoid adding more work to women's burdensome load, and that women be compensated directly for their labour (though she acknowledges that, for the latter, men would contribute even less). As for women's past valued reproduction, it will take more than a few symbolic crumbs from a resource distribution table, but rather a fundamental alteration of gender in social and material relations. Is such alteration compatible with accumulation? At least, now, many women seek to accumulate more to free themselves of servile and dependent relationships with men.

Writers for Development Alternatives with Women for a New Era (DAWN), a project of international women based first in India and now in Brazil, link micro- and macro-level perspectives to assess the impact of development. In Development, Crises and Alternative Visions, they say poor women provide the best vantage point for such understanding and its implications for a practice envisioning a 'future free of the multiple oppressions of gender, class, race, and nation' (p 10) in which women's nurturant values characterise social relationships (p 80). Participants in the Non-Governmental Organisations Forum at the United Nations End-of-the-Decade Conference in Nairobi will be familiar with this widely circulated platform document. Potential readers now have Monthly Review Press to thank for reissuing this succinct, lucidly argued book that deserves wide dissemination.

Development theory and practice is, the authors argue, in crisis in much of the world, and women's activities are central to resolving the crisis. Their particular focus is on market economies which worsen inequities: multilateral institutions press for structural adjustments—usually detrimental to women—of national economies but not of international economic relationships. Compounding these detrimental effects for women are militarism and government-abetted sex tourism. Although the perspective is world system and the critique, dependency, DAWN's strategies to realise alternative visions rest on organisational activity, global networks, and self-sufficiency. For DAWN, though, accumulation is not so much the problem as are the structural relationships surrounding accumulation. But the visionary future lies neither with the multilateral structural adjusters nor the critical economists who are blind to gender, but with women and those who recognise the fundamental importance that altered gender values will bring.

KATHLEEN STAUDT

Scripps College, Claremont, California

Calculated Kindness: Refugees and America's Half-open Door 1945–Present

Gil Loescher and John A Schanlan

London: Macmillan. 1986. 346pp. £17.95hb

Despite growing concern with United States refugee policy, few reliable or up to date accounts of its evolution since 1945 have emerged. This work represents an attempt to fill this research gap. Loescher and Scanlon provide a detailed well documented study embodying three main objectives. Firstly, to present a detailed historical account of the development of US refugee policy since 1945; secondly, to indicate the major participants in the refugee policy areas; thirdly, to argue that the nature of American refugee policy is a reflection of foreign policy 'ideological' goals.

Historical analysis is presented in the form of ten chapters corresponding to a distinctive period in the evolution of refugee policy from 1945 to the present. In their introduction Loescher and Scanlon document an evolving 'cold war' politics of escape which has overwhelmingly favoured those claiming to be oppressed by left-wing rather than right-wing regimes. Moreover, they argue that despite the ideological neutral standards set by the 1980 Refugee Act, this discrimination continues. Secondly, they identify three major groupings that have historically influenced the admissions process: the restrictionist view, whose principal objective is to limit overall immigration and contend that refugees are difficult to assimilate and compete with native Americans for jobs and services. Opposed to the restrictionists are a second group made up of two sections. Religious and ethnic groups that undertake lobbying and campaigns for displaced friends and relatives abroad and humanitarian interests that advocate an almost 'open door' policy for all foreign victims of persecution and tyranny. The third group consists of those inside government who believe that refugees are not merely immigrants or victims, but also valuable assets in a continuing struggle with communism. Members of this group sit in the White House, the State Department and the CIA. Since 1945 well over 90 per cent of those admitted to the United States have fled communist countries.

However, the book does have some shortcomings. Its opening chapter only briefly touches upon the broader foreign policy issues without either implicitly or explicitly placing refugee policy within its parameters. As Spanier and Uslaner in their book Foreign Policy and the Democratic Dilemmas have shown, there are three types of foreign policy issues: those concerning intermestic issues, those involving national security issues and crises decisions. Each of these three types display a different policy-making process, although they share some common features such as the significant role of bureaucracy. Intermestic issues (among which refugee policy would neatly fit) are those in which it is exceedingly difficult—because of the growing interdependence between American society and the outside world—to disentangle foreign and domestic policy. Yet the implications for refugee policy is never really drawn out, although hinted at in several passages in the book. For example, although tensions between different departments within the executive arena are clearly shown, the growing assertiveness of Congress in the last decade is never fully developed. Yet one of the key Congressional factors in shaping refugee policy in recent years has been the Senate Judiciary Committee, under Edward Kennedy, and especially its sub-committee on Immigration and Refugee Affairs.

Further, the final chapter covering the Reagan Administration ends rather abruptly. In the absence of a conclusion it leaves the various narrative threads somewhat dangling in the air rather than tied up together comprehensively. In addition, the broader international relations perspectives, while implied, are never really discussed, particularly as the authors adopt a critical approach towards the older 'cold war' model and the re-emergence of the new 'cold war' realism of the Reagan Administration. Yet the authors themselves are clearly adopting the liberal internationalist-interdependent model, without recognising the inherent limitations of this approach in comparison to other perspectives, such as the dominance and dependence model, or the new 'realist' model.

Nevertheless, despite these criticisms, this is an excellent book in an area which has often been neglected, and it is hoped that this publication will inaugurate a growing academic interest in the refugee policy of other political systems, particularly those within the EEC, given the increasing restrictionist trends in Europe, notably towards Third World refugees.

RONALD KAYE

Glasgow College of Technology

Qadhafi's Libya

Jonathan Bearman

London: Zed. 1986. 297pp. £18.95hb/£6.95pb

Qaddafi and the Libyan Revolution

David Blundy and Andrew Lycett

London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson. 1987. 230pp. £12.95hb

Libya: Qadhafi's Revolution and the Modern State

Lillian Craig Harris

Boulder, Colorado: Westview/London: Croom Helm. 1986. 157pp. $24.95hb

Before I begin this review, let me first reveal what connections I have—or am supposed to have—with these books, for in two of them—Harris, and Blundy and Lycett—my name is mentioned in the acknowledgements. I read drafts of several of Dr Harris' chapters and discussed aspects of Libyan politics and history with her more than once during the course of the preparation of the manuscript. By contrast, I believe I spoke to Andrew Blundy once in person, and perhaps once on the telephone, but I had no role in the writing of the book worthy of mention. It may be that since Blundy and Lycett provide no documentation, footnotes, or citations for their assertions and arguments they mean to suggest by their list of 'people who, in various ways, helped us with this book' sources for material they read. Certainly, I provided offprints of a number of my own writings, as I do to all visitors who express an interest.

In any event, it gives me no particular satisfaction to report that the best of these books—indeed, in my view, the best account of Qaddafi's tenure in power yet to appear—is the one with which I have no connection. Jonathan Bearman has done a masterful job of putting Qaddafi into his Libyan context and of describing the evolution of the intellectual rationale and the policy of the regime over the course of seventeen years.

As Mr Bearman makes apparent, Qaddafi's longevity in power is a consequence not only of the oil revenue which the state enjoyed during the 1970s—itself not an insignificant factor—but also of the increasingly ambitious and radical agenda of the regime. Each wave of new policy initiatives, which consistently caught erstwhile supporters by surprise, brought in new groups to replace those alienated and new vehicles for popular organisation to replace those abandoned. Bearman identifies four phases: development of state capitalism; creation of a state monopoly on foreign trade; expropriation of industrial, or productive, capital; and, finally, expropriation of large sections of commercial capital. By the mid-1980s a government which came to office supporting and supported by 'non-exploitative capitalists' had virtually eliminated private capitalism.

So, too, the regime's early Arab nationalism and reliance on an Egyptian-style Arab Socialist Union gave way to the revolutionary political structures of popular committees and congresses outlined in the Green Book and eventually to the 'supplementary' revolutionary committees: by the mid-1980s, though Bearman does not go so far as to say so, it is clear that Qaddafi had also virtually eliminated any semblance of democracy, direct or otherwise.

This is so in my view—and here Bearman and I part ways—because Qaddafi had run out of constituents. Bearman claims that while 'the commercial bourgeoisie and the small productive bourgeoisie have been eliminated . . . the working class has grown in size and social importance.' (p 276) I do not think that is true; on the contrary, there is still almost no indigenous working class in Libya, because there is almost no industry, and what industrial labour there is is done by foreigners.

There are other failings in Bearman's book. The discussions of the USA are not nearly as careful as those of Libya—Harlem is an area of New York, not a street—and Claudia Wright's Foreword is largely irrelevant and not a little silly. It must be said, however, that although some of Bearman's associates and associations—he mentions Louis Eaks and The Main Event in his acknowledgements—have come under fire from opponents of Qaddafi, the discussion of the opposition is quite fair-minded. Indeed, despite its imperfections, it must be said that this is a serious, intelligent and thoughtful work about a country and a political figure rarely accorded such treatment.

More typical, in fact, is the approach of Blundy and Lycett whose book is designed more to titillate than to inform. Much is made of the reports by foreign women journalists of Qaddafi's having made passes at them and of stories about other of his rumoured sexual liaisons, including the suggestion that he bedded Imelda Marcos. What influence these stories, if true, might have had on politics is not clear. Clearer, perhaps, is the implication of our being told, again without substantiation, that 'Qaddafi's hatred of Israel, Zionists and Jews in general is almost Hitlerian', and of the chapters titled 'Terror, Inc.' and 'Murder in London'—this last being an excruciatingly detailed discussion of the events surrounding the death of Policewoman Yvonne Fletcher in St James Square in April 1984. Apparently there is a market for sex and violence dressed up as current events. In fact, Blundy and Lycett evince a contempt for their subjects—Qaddafi and his countrymen—barely concealed by their leering preoccupation with vice. The historical discussions are garbled and inaccurate: the Sanusiyyah did not extend to India, Ahmad al-Sharif did not lead the resistance against the Italians in the 1920s and 1930s, the 'Wafala' tribe is the Warfala. I can understand why people might buy a book like this but I cannot understand why anyone would write one.

Lillian Harris introduced her book as 'a descriptive account—a briefing, if you will'. Like a briefing paper, it is short, concise and given to annotated lists: Qaddafi's personality traits, the main opposition groups, even the country's non-migratory birds. Also like a briefing paper, and more importantly, it is policy oriented. Like the other authors, Harris views the American bombing of Tripoli and Benghazi in April 1986 as having been a mistake. She goes further than the others, however, in ending her book with a discussion of policy options, including the difficulty of identifying 'the correct way for democratic societies to handle Qadhafi'. (p 133) As such the book may speak more to the debate in the USA during the Reagan Administration over what should be done to 'deal with' Qaddafi than to analytical or scholarly disputes over the circumstances which produce and sustain regimes like that of Libya.

Taken together, these three books illustrate the state of the art of modern Libyan studies, and as such, they prompt one final comment. None of them draws upon any Arabic language sources. Indeed, Blundy and Lycett go so far as to make the ludicrous observation that, when pronounced by Libyans, Qaddafi's name is 'incomprehensible'. In principle and in practice, Arabic is the language of the land and the leader about which these books are written; it is time to recognise that in research and writing.

LISA ANDERSON

Columbia University, New York

The Lure of Zion: The Case of the Iraqi Jews

Abbas Shibliak

London: Al-Saqi Books. 1986. 177pp. £16.00hb/£4.95pb

This carefully researched and well-documented book is a history of the last years of one of the most deeply rooted and profoundly integrated of all the Middle Eastern non-Muslim communities, the Iraqi Jews. It concentrates particularly on their mass exodus to Israel in 1950 and 1951.

It is clear that, in common with most of their co-religionists in the Arab world, the bulk of the Iraqi Jewish community was not attracted to Zionism. Zionist emissaries to Iraq in the 1920s, 1930s and well into the 1940s were not well received, and their activities were evidently unwelcome to the Jewish community there. Politically active Jews in Iraq involved themselves in the national movement in the broadest sense, and their participation in it was fully accepted by their non-Jewish compatriots, as Shibliak shows in a telling quotation from a right-wing pan-Arabist newspaper in as late as February 1948.

Shibliak deals well with the farhud, the anti-Jewish rioting in Baghdad at the beginning of June 1941 in which some 250-300 Jews were killed. In common with another recent analyst, (see Reeva S Simon, Iraq between the Two World Wars: the Creation and Implementation of a Nationalist Ideology, Columbia University Press, 1986, p 160), he sees these events as an expression of anti-British rather than of anti-Jewish feeling, which could most probably have been prevented or at least suppressed very quickly if British troops encamped a few miles away had been allowed to enter the city.

Of course, the creation of Israel transformed the situation of the Iraqi Jews, and the government immediately began to take discriminatory measures against them. In addition, like Jews elsewhere, they became the objects of a widespread Zionist campaign intended to convince doubters that their only safety lay in emigrating to Israel, and that they would always be vulnerable if they stayed where they were. Shibliak adduces interesting evidence to show that the Denaturalisation Law of 1950 was conceived against a background of British Foreign Office encouragement of a somewhat fanciful scheme of a transfer of populations, of Palestinians to Iraq in exchange for Iraqi Jews to Israel. Although this did not materialise, there is ample evidence that both Britain and the USA were pressing the Iraqi government to 'facilitate' Jewish emigration. Again, Shiblak shows that the bomb attacks in Baghdad on Jewish lives and properties in 1951 were organised by Zionist activists sent from Israel with the sanction of senior Israeli politicians.

BOOK REVIEWS

It is a shabby and squalid story, but it is also a deeply tragic one. It is greatly to Shiblak's credit, and a measure of his humanity, that he has conveyed these two aspects so convincingly and so movingly.

PETER SLUGLETT

School of Oriental Studies, Durham University

Indonesia: The Rise of Capital

Richard Robison

Sydney, Australia/London: Unwin and Hyman. 1986. 425pp. £11.95pb

Last year, during a not untypical hiccup in Australian-Indonesian relations, the Indonesian government suspended permission for Australian-Indonesian relations, the over Indonesian airspace. At the time it was widely assumed that Indonesia was retaliating against the publication of a book by the Australian academic, Richard Robison, which presented a detailed analysis of Indonesian capitalism. Such is the sensitivity of President Suharto's authoritarian regime towards discussion of its management of the economy. But, as Indonesia sinks deeper into recession after the collapse in world oil prices, the regime is finding its economic policies subjected to ever more thorough scrutiny by the banks and governments in the West which have hitherto been its most uncritical supporters. Suharto was said to have been outraged by a number of articles in the Australian and US media last year exposing the corrupt business practices of his ruling military elite; the offending publications were banned in Jakarta and some of their correspondents expelled. Richard Robison's book has certainly made a timely arrival.

But at the start of his book Robison states his intention to challenge the commonly-held view that Indonesia is dominated by a patrimonial military dictatorship serving only its own narrow interests. He argues that Indonesia's capitalist class has become strong and influential on government policy and should not be thought of as a feeble tool of the military or of international capital.

Tracing the history of capitalism in Indonesia back to the colonial period, Robison accepts and investigates the traditional weakness of the indigenous capitalists, overshadowed on the one hand by the intrusions of large-scale Dutch enterprise and on the other by the successful Chinese minority. The absence of an assertive capitalist class left a power vacuum in Indonesia after independence in 1949. Control of political power was decided only in 1965 when General Suharto led a military coup against President Sukarno and eliminated the Indonesian Communist Party in a series of purges and massacres that cost up to one million lives. But control of the economy was decided only in so far as Suharto crushed the proponents of a socialist system and received the broad endorsement of the capitalist and land-owning classes.

Under Suharto's 'New Order' government an old debate has persisted in Indonesia as to whether the country should have an open economy in which international capital plays a major role, or whether the state should manage the economy and take responsibility for growth and development. Since 1965 Indonesia has shifted uneasily between these two positions, but, Robison argues, the military rulers have not had the debate to themselves. He believes that all the important economic groups in Indonesia—the Suharto military clique, the politico-bureaucrats, indigenous and Chinese entrepreneurs and representatives of international capital—have held some sway over economic policy and that all have made gains under Suharto, particularly from the high levels of state spending in the 1970s brought on by the oil boom. As a result one can now see among these groups the perceptions and interests of a distinct capitalist class independent of the political elite.

The core of the book, and surely the most valuable part of it, is the excellent research into the structure of Indonesia's main business groups and the links between them and the state. Freedom of action for the Suharto regime, Robison shows, has been limited by its need to provide the conditions for the indigenous capitalist class on which it had pinned its hopes for an economic revival after 1965 to prosper. And that capitalist class has grown out of Indonesia's heterogeneous business interests and thrived despite the drain on the economy imposed by the military elite's need to finance its own hold on state power. Robison insists that we examine the Indonesian state in terms of a symbiotic partnership between it and capital. It is not correct to interpret the state as representing either 'rational' capitalism or 'irrational' patrimonialism. There are, he believes, both distinct capitalist interests and distinct state interests at work in the Indonesian government but the distinction between them is blurred at the level where the officials of business and the state have dealings with each other and may be one and the same person. Under Suharto the state has tried to meet the demands both of a patrimonial elite and of a growing indigenous capitalist class whose voice, Robison believes, will be increasingly heard in Indonesia, perhaps leading to the development of an authoritarian capitalist state on the lines of South Korea or Singapore when the military steps down.

The question is, will the military step down in the foreseeable future? And will its needs be subordinated to those of capital? I think the author's assessment of the long-term strengths of Indonesia's capitalist class are misplaced. The key factor is oil. Few observers, perhaps including Robison, have allowed for the extent of the Indonesian economy's dependence on high oil prices during the 1970s. Oil provided over 70 per cent of state revenue in 1982 which is a vital consideration in view of the central role that state spending played in fostering the growth of an indigenous entrepreneurial class. It is right that our attention should be drawn to this class: no longer just the Chinese and the multinationals and more influential than has usually been supposed. As Robison admits, ethnic Indonesian entrepreneurs, described as pribumi or asli, are the weakest part of this rising class, dependent on joint ventures with foreign or Chinese capital or on state contracts. It is the first group to suffer during a recession such as Indonesia is undergoing at the moment and the one most damaged by the severe contraction in government spending which has accompanied it.

The long term political consequences are serious. A capitalist class in which the Chinese and foreign elements are seen to be the most healthy and important will not be able to build roots among Indonesia's huge and largely impoverished population which it would need to replace the authoritarian rule of the army. The disaffected pribumi entrepreneurs could become a source of stronger opposition to the Suharto regime when it has yet had to face, joined as it would be by a host of even more dependent smaller sub-contractors and middle-men whose livelihoods are being ruined by the economic crisis. And there is no reason to suppose that the military will always protect the interests of capital, now that it is so sorely short of cash. Under threat the Suharto regime has often shown in the past a tendency to retreat into inward-looking, nationalist policies which do not suit the requirements of business. In one of his many enlightening comments Robison suggests that Suharto's business empire, for all its size and range, does not have good long-term prospects without the President's influence. But Suharto is an extremely adept political manipulator whose main concern is power, not economics. He has ruled Indonesia for an unusually long period of time, and he will face serious obstacles overseeing an orderly transfer of power to a chosen successor; but we can be sure his preoccupation with this task, while enforcing political stability and the predominance of the military, will be a deciding factor in the course of Indonesian politics for the foreseeable future.

BOOK REVIEWS

JONATHAN HEAD

London

Elections and Democratisations in Latin America, 1980-85

Edited by Paul W Drake and Eduardo Silva

San Diego, California: University of California. 1986. 335pp. n/p

Latin America. Bankers, Generals and the Struggle for Social Justice

James F Petras et al: Totowa, New Jersey: Rowman and Littlefield. 1986. 187pp. $28.50hb/$12.50pb

In retrospect, the first half of the 1980s might well prove to have been a significant quinquennium in modern Latin American affairs, though the cautionary word 'might' is used advisedly, given the unpredictability of the continent in the past, the short perspective of today, and the massive imponderables of tomorrow. Yet, few would deny that a major political characteristic of the period for a fair number of countries was the transition from authoritarian military government—each with its own degree of repression—to democratic forms and the restoration of civil liberties. In South America, Argentina, Brazil and Uruguay, for very different reasons and through dissimilar processes, took that course, while Peru, with the election of Alan García in 1985, consolidated that development. The most long-standing democracies—Colombia and Venezuela—reinforced that tradition, leaving Stroessner's Paraguay and Pinochet's Chile in rather less than splendid isolation. Similarly, in Central America, no less long-standing military regimes in Guatemala, Honduras and El Salvador handed power over to civilian hands, though, the sceptic might say, more as leasehold than freehold. Still, the comparison with the mid-1970s was striking.

Such political developments coincided, more or less, with an economic depression for the entire region for which, in this century, only the Great Depression of 1929-31 invites comparison. Its causes were complex and its outcome still remains, for the vast majority of states, uncertain. All the new democratic regimes inherited from their military predecessors enormous economic problems, in which the size of the external debt was a major factor. Public pleasure—in most cases euphoria—at the withdrawal of the military has been increasingly tempered by the, perhaps, no less harsh reality of the economic situation.

Though the two books reviewed here are quite disparate, their subject matter is interrelated, since Elections and Democratisation focuses on politics, Latin America. Bankers, Generals and the Struggle for Social Justice on economics. And, indeed, the titles themselves indicate their very different nature and purpose. The first is an excellent series of papers, detailing the transition to democracy in the former military-ruled states, assessing the significance of the electoral process which marked it, and suggesting possible future panoramas. A brief 'overview' by the editors is followed by a series of individual papers, one on El Salvador, two on Nicaragua, three on Mexico—which, strictly, not in the same category as the others but important both for its continental weight and for internal political change in the period—three on Argentina, two on Uruguay and two on Brazil. The volume resulted from a conference in February, 1985, and the essays published here are, in effect, the papers presented there. It would be a little invidious to name only a few—for lack of space—of the fourteen contributors, apart from the editors: suffice to say that specialists on Latin America will have full confidence in their quality as regional experts, while not necessarily sharing all their opinions. This is a most timely and interesting collection of studies highly relevant to anyone interested in contemporary Latin America.

While, obviously, the economic dimension of the transition of democracy, and the problems it entails for the success of that process, is not ignored in this book, its essential thrust is political. The book by Petras and his colleagues is a different kettle of fish and, unlike the dispassionate appraisal of the other book, has much of the character of the polemic. There is nothing particularly wrong in that: the writers are clearly committed to a view about US policy, the IMF and socialism as the panacea for a solution of all the ills afflicting the economic and political evolution of Latin America. And, it has to be said, they do provide some very solid data to support their views. The first part of the book consists of four essays on 'Perspectives on Development'; the second, three essays on 'US-Latin American Relations', and a concluding chapter on 'Authoritarianism, Democracy and the Transition to Socialism'. One is still left with the uncomfortable feeling that the conspiratorial interpretation of history looms too large. Nevertheless, this book should be read by anyone interested in the continent: it has a lot of recondite information and is an interesting interpretation of the political and economic forces—internal and external—shaping the continent's future.

Most of the writers in the first book avoid prescriptions and are cautious in their prognostications: most of those in the second are less reticent on the former but hardly less so on the latter. Both books should be read by Latin Americans and their sympathisers as we grope for solutions.

HAROLD BLAKEMORE

Institute of Latin American Studies, University of London

BOOK REVIEWS

The Dominican Republic: Politics and Development in an Unsovereign State

Jan Knippers Black

London: Allen and Unwin. 1986. 163pp. £22.95/£7.95pb

The importance of the Dominican Republic within the Caribbean is not always recognised by those who live outside the immediate area. Yet it is the second most populous nation in the region and has a history of political turbulence and foreign intervention, much of it of recent origin. It also currently faces intractable economic problems and major political dilemmas which threaten the tenuous 'progress' the country has made in the last two decades. All this is central to Professor Black's introductory volume to the politics of what she rightly terms 'an unsovereign state'. Following a brief introduction to the history of the country she plunges into the contemporary period setting out the context in which its present politics is given its particular form. She then identifies, with considerable skill and economy of style, the economic and social structures, political institutions, social sectors and interest groups which all play a part in the domestic formation of policy. Of particular note here is her skilful use of information gleaned from interviews with the Dominican political elite in 1985 and which provide fascinating commentary on the complex and often hidden political processes at work in the country. However, as she makes clear in a chapter on international politics, external factors must also be considered as these frequently play a decisive, often a detrimental part, in policy outcomes. So much so, in fact, that members of the Dominican political elite adopt policies of self-censorship in respect of programmes that are advanced, seeking always to ensure US support or tolerance of them. Finally, Black examines the difficulties and promises of the two Dominican Revolutionary Party administrations 1978-86.

While her sympathies clearly lie with the forces of social and economic change which were anticipated in their accession to office, her judgement of them is largely negative, noting how much was sapped and squandered by leaders placating and supporting the 'traditional' features of Dominican political life. This is a point she re-emphasises in her conclusion when she affirms that Dominican politics is essentially 'a family affair' and that the basic cleavage in the polity rests 'less on class than on traditional versus modern and rural versus urban orientations'. (p 147).

This book is to be welcomed. It condenses a great deal in a style which is both accessible and informative. Students of Latin American and the Caribbean will find no better introduction in English, and certainly not one which conveys with as much conviction the passion and the frustration in the republic's politics as it presents itself to its people.

PAUL SUTTON

Centre of Developing Area Studies, University of Hull

BOOK NOTES

The Economist World Atlas of Elections: Voting Patterns in 39 Democracies

Dick Leonard and Richard Natkiel

London: Hodder and Stoughton. 1987. 159pp. £45.00hb

The purpose of the World Atlas of Elections is to enable the reader to obtain, at a glance, details of the most recent parliamentary and presidential elections in each of thirty-nine democratic countries. For each of these countries a map is provided showing the actual electoral areas, or constituencies, from which its parliamentarians or congressmen are elected.

How do the compilers arrive at the figure of thirty-nine democracies? The following selection criteria were established in 1985: a minimum population of 200,000; independence for at least five years preceding 1985, with a minimum of two contested parliamentary elections in that period; and a ranking in the 'free' category for at least five years before 1985, based on Freedom House surveys. Leonard and Natkiel defend their rigorous criteria of freedom and independence: 'it is not a purpose of the authors to lend a spurious respectability to regimes whose concept of freedom of choice for their fellow citizens does not extend to the right to give marching orders to their rulers.' These thirty-nine nations, then, are said to be the only democracies amongst the world's 169 sovereign territories.

The volume will be a useful tool for businessmen, politicians, journalists, academics and diplomats alike.

South America, Central America and the Caribbean 1986

Europa Publications

London: Europa Publications. 1985. 582pp. £45.00hb

The latest edition to Europa's series of international reference works, this volume will in future be published biennially. Essays written by over twenty specialists on the region, include Harold Blakemore on dictatorship and democracy in Latin America, and the history and economy of Argentina and Chile; Colin Clarke on sovereignty, dependency and social change in the Caribbean; and Peter Calvert on Central America's foreign relations. Regional organisations listed include the Andean Group, the Caribbean Community and Common Market, the Central American Common Market, the Inter-American Development Bank, the Latin American Association, and the Organisation of American States.

Compiled according to the high standards for which Europa is renowned, this volume is a recommended addition to every Latin American and Caribbean scholar's bookshelves.

The Book Notes were written for Third World Quarterly by Ruth Bowden.

International Terrorism: A Bibliography

Amos Lakos

London: Mansell/Boulder, Colorado: Westview. 1986. 481pp. £30.00hb

The alarming proliferation in recent years of politically motivated acts of violence and the growing number of interest groups willing to use terrorism for political objectives have resulted in a vast body of literature describing and analysing terrorist activities. In this comprehensive bibliography, Lakos—a librarian specialising in political science materials at the University of Waterloo, Ontario—has annotated English-language materials covering terrorist activities over the last two decades, including monographs, journal articles, government documents, conference reports and doctoral dissertations. 'Geographical subdivision' is the longest section, covering all aspects of terrorism, with the emphasis on geographic locations and specific terrorist incidents. Arrangement here is by continent, state and incident.

Elsewhere in the volume the literature is categorised by tactics, security counter-measures, the nuclear threat, media coverage, international legal perspectives, and the psychology of terror. Major works in each category are abstracted, and materials cross-referenced where appropriate.

International Guide to Research on Mexico

Center for US-Mexican Studies, University of California and El Colegio de la Frontera Norte, Tijuana

San Diego, California: Center for US-Mexican Studies, University of California/Tijuana, Mexico: El Colegio de la Frontera Norte. 1986. 502pp. n/p

This bilingual edition contains abstracts, each in Spanish and English, on 835 unpublished research projects being conducted by 1,150 researchers located in fifteen different countries. The directory lists a majority of researchers in Mexico (769) and the United States (340). While the social sciences and history continue to be most strongly represented among the projects summarised, forty-seven disciplines are represented and the scope of research is seen to extend across a broad spectrum including business administration, criminology, forestry, veterinary science, theatre and oceanography.

The International Foundation Directory

Europa Publications

London: Europa Publications. 1986. 434pp. £35.00hb

Now in its fourth edition, this directory of international foundations, trusts and other similar international non-profit institutions claims to provide a comprehensive picture of foundation activity on a world scale. It lists not only organisations operating internationally but also large international foundations with an international impact. Information of 770 institutions in forty-nine countries includes details of each organisation's finances, activities, awards, publications and officers, and is arranged by country. Justice is certainly done to the proliferation of philanthropic activity in North America and Europe, with eighty pages devoted to America. But the reader cannot help remarking that there is only one entry under the People's Republic of China and wondering if there are not other bodies—academic or political—active in international affairs that deserve a mention here.

Syria

Ian H Seccombe

1987. 376pp. £45.00hb

Sri Lanka

Vijaya Samaraweera

1987. 240pp. £29.00hb

Barbados

Robert B Potter and Graham M S Dann

1987. 356pp. £47.75hb

Pacific Basin and Oceania

Gerald W Fry and Rufino Mauricio

1987. 508pp. £59.95hb

Oxford: Clio. World Bibliographical Series

These four volumes are the latest in the steady output from the World Bibliographical Series (wbs), now numbering seventy-seven volumes.

Ian Seccombe's study takes in a range of recent as well as older, more standard sources on Syria. The largest sections are devoted to the foreign relations, minorities and history sections.

Potter and Dann's study of Barbados reflects the focus of the publishing trade on travellers' accounts, languages and dialects, social conditions, women's studies, the history of plantocracy, peasantry and slavery. The reader is made aware of the somewhat dated store of publications currently available on the country.

The Sri Lanka volume allocates prime space to religion and history, and is a timely publication, given the increasing attention prompted by the present ethnic conflict.

The compilers of Pacific Basin and Oceania, the largest of the four books, have adopted one of the broader geographical delineations of the Pacific region, which includes all island areas in the Pacific and regions which have Pacific coasts, such as Siberia, China and the Pacific Northwest in North America, and which contains approximately 43 per cent of the world's population. Fry and Mauricio's study departs from the standard wbs format to introduce sections dealing with ocean service, environmental issues, small boat voyages, culture and social change, and separate sections under the geographical headings of Melanesia, Micronesia and Polynesia, with subsequent sections devoted to the individual islands of those areas. The section

BOOK NOTES

'Contemporary foreign relations—towards a Pacific community' annotates the literature on the controversial community concept of this highly diverse region.

Third World Guide 1986-87

Edited by Neiva Moreira

New York: Grove Press for Third World Guide, Rio de Janeiro. 1986. 642pp. $22.50pb

This is the third English-language edition of the Guide, published by the Mexico, Uruguay and Portugal-based editorial teams of the Third World magazine, 'An independent, non-profit network of professional journalists which aims to provide alternative information on the Third World.'

Each country has its own entry containing information on geography, demography, government, political parties, trade unions, economics, health, armed forces, communications, education and an overview of political history to 1985. The book is divided into sections on: countries of the world, diplomacy, history, economy and a rather ambiguously-entitled 'problems'. The political focus is—as shown by the 1979 Spanish edition—not claiming to be "objective" but excluding the constant deformations and distortions that characterised the European or US-eye-view publications of capitalist enterprises.'

Sixty-five pages have been allocated to a new section entitled 'Other countries', requested by African teachers who use the Guide as a support text, and here Japan, Europe, the USA and the Soviet Union feature in the context of their relations with the Third World.

A standard reference text in Latin American and African schools and universities, this volume is (in spite of unclear referencing of sections, and a regular scattering of inaccuracies in typography and spelling) to be highly recommended as an encyclopedic introduction to Third World studies, and also as a useful reference tool for the more seasoned researcher.

The Middle East and North Africa 1987

Europa Publications

London: Europa Publications. 1986. 911pp. £52.00hb

Now in its thirty-third edition, this yearbook continues to be a major source of reliable information. The format is comprehensive: two preliminary sections contain a series of essays providing background information on history, economics, politics and culture and a list of regional organisations. Rodney Wilson's article on Islamic Banking and Finance, which the 1986 edition carried, has been updated, and Malise Ruthven's survey of Islamic Politics has been expanded to include a more detailed consideration of the impact of a resurgent Islam on the countries of the region. Fifty pages are devoted to detailing activities and addresses of organisations such as the Arab States of the Gulf, the Islamic Conference, OAU and OPEC, as well as the United Nations and its agencies.

THIRD WORLD QUARTERLY

Introductory articles analyse the main themes in contemporary Middle Eastern affairs. A study of the oil industry by Richard Johns and Michael Field gives a historical background, comparative tables of production, existing reserves, government revenues, prices and refinery capacity. There are details of the major companies holding concessions in the area. An article by Chris Cragg examines the role of natural gas in the region.

A separate chapter on each country contains: articles on geography and social history; an economic survey; a statistical survey covering area and population, employment, trade, agriculture, oil, industry; details of the political, judicial and religious systems; directories of diplomats, banks, the press, publishers, and trade organisations. Addresses, telephone and telex numbers are supplied, and enhance the practical value of this essential reference tool.

Encyclopedia of the Third World: Third Edition

George Thomas Kurian

Oxford: Facts on File. 1987. 2,128pp. £95.00hb

A fully updated edition of this three-volume international reference work, providing concise descriptions of the dominant political, social and economic systems of 124 nations of the Third World.

The publishers state their aim of overcoming the developed world's disinterest and misunderstanding of the Third World at a time when growing interest is rarely satisfied by the scant and often unreliable information that is allowed to filter out.

Each entry comprises a basic fact sheet, followed by sections on location and area, climate, population, ethnic composition, language, religion, colonial experience, constitution and government, human rights, civil service, local government, foreign policy, parliament, political parties, economy, agriculture, industry, energy, labour, transport, defence, education, the legal system, health, food, media, culture, social welfare, a chronology of the country's history, and a bibliography. This is a long list, and is witness to Kurian's tireless efforts in producing easily-read text with a digestible measure of statistics, rendering the information accessible and relevant to both the scholar and the general reader.

A Handbook for African Writers

Edited by James Gibbs

London/Munich: Hans Zell. 1986. 218pp. n/p

This volume grew out of a recommendation made at the 1984 London Conference on 'New Directions in African Literature' and is a pioneering effort to gather together practical information and advice for African authors.

Finding a publisher, how to present a manuscript, dealing with literary agents, advice regarding contracts, remuneration, copyright and piracy, writing for children, relations with publishers, correcting proofs, and information on publicity and review outlets, feature alongside the more personalised chapter 'Patterns of publication' in which accounts of eleven well-known African authors provide case-studies on major issues confronting aspiring creative writers. A short bibliography indicates further reading on specific countries and topics. This represents an indispensable source of information, from a publisher with a sound reputation in the African market.

BOOK NOTES

World Encyclopedia of Political Systems and Parties: Second Edition

Edited by George D Delury

Oxford: Facts on File. 1987. 1,296pp. £120.00hb

Coups, revolutions, elections, constitutional reforms and wars have made significant changes in the structure of world governments since the previous edition of the World Encyclopedia in 1983. Over 100 political systems have been toppled, reformed and replaced. The new edition tracks these changes in a series of commissioned country studies that cover the essential components of the political systems of 169 sovereign nations and eight dependent territories. Each entry includes details of: the country's electoral systems and political parties—their origin, organisation and function; legislative, judicial and regional government systems; other forces of political importance (the army, religious and ethnic groups and national movements); the nation's prospects for continuing or attaining political stability in the near future; and recommendations for further reading.

Africa South of the Sahara 1987

Europa Publications

London: Europa Publications. 1986. 1,141pp. £65.00hb

The sixteenth edition of Africa South of the Sahara covers the wide spectrum of political, social and economic developments that have taken place during the past year in the fifty-one countries and territories of the region. The background to the upheaval in South Africa and its impact on neighbouring states, coups d'état in Lesotho, Nigeria and Uganda, and the continued famine in the Horn of Africa are analysed in a series of essays, including Basil Davidson's extended view of Africa in historical perspective, Robin Luckham's piece on the political and social problems of development, Tony Hill on Africa and the EEC, and Peter Lawrence with Ian Livingstone and Diana Hubbard on economic issues. The South African territories of the so-called 'Bantu Homelands' (Bophuthatswana, Ciskei, Transkei and Venda) receive individual attention, and are listed on the contents page. Maps at the end of the volume provide information on languages spoken, with a further map on Bantu language dispersal, and colonial and trade history.

Statistical Yearbook of China 1986

The State Statistical Bureau of the People's Republic of China

Oxford: Oxford University Press/Wanchai, Hong Kong: Economic Information and Agency/Beijing: China Statistical Information and Consultancy. 1987. 761pp. £70.00hb

In comparison with the previous yearbook, this latest edition is improved in contents, indicators and form of presentation. Newly-added information includes detailed figures which reflect economic development at a macro level, such as total product of society, material consumption, national income, accumulation, consumption, sources and distribution of commodity purchasing power, revenue and expenditure of public finance, and regional breakdowns of major indicators on the economic and social development of the country in 1985. The book is divided into sixteen chapters, giving comprehensive coverage of the country's economic activity. Two appendices deal with principal economic indicators of Taiwan and China's economic and social statistics in comparison with other countries.

Appropriate Technology Sourcebook

Ken Darrow and Mike Saxenian

Stanford, California: Appropriate Technology Project (distributed in the UK by Intermediate Technology Publications, London). 1986, 800pp. $26.95hb/$17.95pb (concessionary price: $9.00pb)

Over 50,000 copies of previous editions of this sourcebook have been used in 145 countries, and have proved indispensable in locating technical books needed for small technology and community development projects. In the new edition, 1150 publications from international and American sources are reviewed or abstracted, covering a wide range of applications from small water supply systems and beekeeping to crop preservation, and small business management. The volume is illustrated throughout. Local groups in developing countries may obtain the bibliography at a reduced price when paying with their own funds.

African Economic Handbook

Michael Hodd

London: Euromonitor. 1986. 335pp. £45.00hb

The African Economic Handbook sets out to explore the differences in economic performance and structure which exist in Africa south of the Sahara, both between and within the regions of East, West, Central and Southern Africa, and also examines Africa's position compared with the rest of the world. Each country survey gives an overview of economic and political stability, economic structure (including education, literacy rate, and health and welfare) and economic performance. Economic profiles of three major economies in each of the four regions are also included together with a statistical fact-file on all African countries south of the Sahara.

BOOK NOTES

The information is clearly presented, and will be indispensable to both academic and business readers. Previous titles include Caribbean Economic Handbook and forthcoming editions will cover the Middle East, and South America.

The Encyclopedias of India

Henry Scholberg

New Delhi: Promilla. 1986. 109pp. n/p

India produced encyclopedias in Sanskrit seven or eight centuries before Diderot's Encyclopédie or the first Britannica. Forty-seven general encyclopedias in the several languages of the country form the output to date: one in Assamese, six in Bengali, three in Gujarati, four in Hindi, three in Kannada, four in Malayalam, six in Marathi, five in Oriya, one in Punjabi, six in Sanskrit, two in Tamil and four in Telegu; and also two in Urdu. The author has treated the whole subcontinent as one single linguistic area.

This is the first 'encyclopedia of encyclopedias'. Promilla will shortly be publishing an index to the biographical dictionaries of South Asia, and are also planning a biographical dictionary of Greater India.

Comprehensive coverage of human rights research and policy.

Human Rights Quarterly

Human Rights Quarterly provides the comprehensive coverage you need to understand complex issues in human rights. No other human rights journal brings together contributions from so many disciplines.

International in scope and non-partisan by design, Human Rights Quarterly:

- publishes the latest human rights research in law, philosophy, and the social sciences,
- presents critical commentaries on public and international policy, and
- probes the fundamental nature of global human rights.

Published quarterly in February, May, August, and November

Bert B. Lockwood, Jr., Editor
University of Cincinnati

Sponsored by the Urban Morgan Institute for Human Rights, College of Law, University of Cincinnati

Human Rights Quarterly

Subscription Order Form

Please enter my one-year subscription. ☐ $19.50, individuals ☐ $51.00, institutions

Payment Options: ☐ Check or money order enclosed made payable to the Johns Hopkins University Press ☐ Bill ☐ VISA ☐ MasterCard

Acct. # _____ Exp. date ____/____/____

Signature _____

Name _____

Address _____

City, State, Zip _____

Send orders to: The Johns Hopkins University Press, Journals Publishing Division, 701 W. 40th St., Suite 275, Baltimore, MD 21211

Subscriptions are available on a calendar-year basis only. Prepayment required for shipment. Foreign postage: $3.50, Canada and Mexico; $6.00 outside North America. Maryland residents add 5% sales tax. Payment must be drawn on a U.S. bank or made by international money order.

EA 87

Johns Hopkins

RECENT PUBLICATIONS

BOOKS*

- Agrawal, Govind R et al: South-South Economic Cooperation. New Delhi: Radiant Publishers with Research and Information System for the Non-Aligned and Other Developing Countries. 1987. 263pp. Rs125/$25.00hb.
- Ahmed, Ishtiaq: The Concept of an Islamic State: An Analysis of the Ideological Controversy in Pakistan. London: Frances Pinter. 1987. 235pp. £22.50hb.
- Ali, Desmond et al: Technological Change: Enhancing the Benefits. London: Commonwealth Secretariat. 1987. 113pp. £8.00hb.
- Ali, Sheikh R: Oil, Turmoil and Islam in the Middle East. London: Praeger. 1986. 237pp. £26.95hb.
- Allen, J A (ed): Politics and the Economy in Syria. London: Centre of Near and Middle Eastern Studies, University of London. 1987. 142pp. n/p.
- Archetti, Edouardo P, Cammack, Paul and Roberts, Bryan (eds): Latin America. London: Macmillan. 1987. 357pp. £20.00hb/£6.95pb.
- Atwood, Rita and McAnany, Emile G (eds): Communication and Latin American Society: Trends in Critical Research 1960-1985. London: University of Wisconsin Press. 1987. 220pp. $36.00hb.
- Bacchus, M Kazim: Educational Policy and Development Strategy in the Third World. Aldershot, England: Gower. 1987. 234pp. £19.50hb.
- Ball, Desmond et al: Crisis Stability and Nuclear War. Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Peace Studies Program with American Academy of Arts and Sciences. 1987. 105pp. n/p.
- Becker, Peter (ed): The Pathfinders: The Saga of Exploration in Southern Africa. London: Penguin. 1987. 281pp. £3.95pb.
- Beling, Willard A: Middle East Peace Plans. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 240pp. £18.95hb.
- Biswas, Asit K and Geping, Qu (eds): Environmental Impact Assessment for Developing Countries. London: Tycooly International for United Nations University. 1987. 232pp. n/p.
- Bose, Sugata: Agrarian Bengal: Economy, Social Structure and Politics, 1919-1947. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1987. 306pp. £27.50hb.
- Boyce, James K (ed): Agrarian Impasse in Bengal: Institutional Constraints to Technological Change. Oxford: Oxford University Press. 1987. 308pp. n/p.
- Bruckner, Pascal: The Tears of the White Man: Compassion as Contempt. London: Macmillan. 1987. 244pp. £10.95hb.
- Burnell, Peter J: Economic Nationalism in the Third World. Brighton, England: Harvester Press. 1986. 294pp. n/p.
- Castera, Justin Emmanuel: Bref Coup d'Oeil sur les Origines de la Presse Haitienne 1764-1850. Port-au-Prince, Haiti: Imprimerie Henri Deschamps. 1986. 147pp. n/p.
- Chatterji, Manas (ed): Hazardous Materials Disposal: Siting and Management. Aldershot, England: Gower. 1987. 331pp. £27.50hb.
- Chomsky, Noam: On Power and Ideology: the Managua Lectures. Boston, Massachusetts: South End Press. 1987. 140pp. $8.00pb.

* This is a list of books that have been received by Third World Quarterly for review; they are not available for sale through Third World Quarterly.

- Chomsky, Noam (ed): Pirates and Emperors: International Terrorism in the Real World. New York: Claremont Research. 1986. 167pp. n/p.
- Cole, John: Development and Underdevelopment: A Profile of the Third World. London: Methuen. 1987. 104pp. n/p.
- Cordesman, Anthony H: Western Strategic Interests in Saudi Arabia. London: Croom Helm. 1987. 308pp. n/p.
- Dawisha, Adeed: The Arab Radicals. New York: Council on Foreign Relations. 1986. 171pp. $17.50hb/$8.95pb.
- Desai, A R (ed): Agrarian Struggles in India After Independence. Delhi: Oxford University Press. 1986. 666pp. Rs250hb.
- Drakakis-Smith, David: The Third World City. London: Methuen. 1987. 116pp. n/p.
- Farid, Abdel Majod and Sirriyeh, Hussein (eds): The Decline of Arab Oil Revenue. London: Croom Helm with Arab Research Centre. 1986. 200pp. £22.50hb.
- Findlay, Allan and Findlay Anne: Population and Development in the Third World. London: Methuen. 1987. 84pp. n/p.
- Friis-Hansen, Esbern (ed): Changes in Land Tenure and Land Use Since Villagization and their Impact on Peasant Agricultural Production in Tanzania: The Case of the Southern Highlands. Copenhagen: Centre for Development Research. 1987. 155pp. n/p.
- Gosh, Ratna and Zacharian, Mathew (eds): Education and the Process of Change. London/New Delhi: Sage. 1987. 301pp. £19.00hb.
- Grunfeld, A Tom: The Making of Modern Tibet. London: Zed. 1987. 277pp. £7.95pb.
- Hameed, Mazher A: Saudi Arabia, The West and the Security of the Gulf. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 189pp. £19.95hb.
- Hawes, Gary: The Philippine State and the Marcos Regime: The Politics of Export. Ithaca, New York: Cornell University Press. 1987. 196pp. $27.50hb.
- Helleiner, Gerald K (ed): Africa and the International Monetary Fund. Washington DC: IMF. 1986. 277pp. n/p.
- Hirashima, S and Muqtada, M (eds): Hired Labour and Rural Labour Markets in Asia. Geneva: International Labour Organisation with Asian Employment Programme, New Delhi. 1986. 180pp. $US12.00hb/$8.00pb.
- Hoagland, Edward: African Calliope: A Journey to the Sudan. Harmondsworth: Penguin. 1987. 272pp. £3.95pb.
- Holley, H A: Developing Country Debt: The Role of the Commercial Banks. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul for Royal Institute of International Affairs. 1987. 85pp. £5.95pb.
- Humana, Charles: World Human Rights Guide. London: Pan. 1987. 339pp. £4.95pb.
- Iglesias, Enrique: Energy 2000: A Global Strategy for Sustainable Development. London: Zed. 1987. 76pp. n/p.
- Islam, Rizwanul and Muqtada, M (eds): Bangladesh: Selected Issues in Employment and Development. Geneva: International Labour Organisation with Asian Employment Programme, New Delhi. 1986. 297pp. $US12.00hb/$8.00pb.
- Ismael, Tareq Y (ed): Canada and the Arab World. Edmonton, Canada: University of Alberta Press (distributed in the UK by Clio). 1985. 217pp. £8.90hb.
- Iyer, Raghavan: The Moral and Political Writings of Mahatma Gandhi, Volume 3: Non-Violent Resistance and Social Transformation. Oxford: Oxford University Press. 1987. 640pp. £55.00hb.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS

- Jimenez, Emmanuel (ed): Pricing policy in the Social Sectors: Cost Recovery for Education and Health in Developing Countries. Baltimore, Maryland: The Johns Hopkins University Press. 1987. 170pp. £16.50hb/£11.80pb.
- Kahama, C George, Maliyamkono, T L and Wells, Stuart: The Challenge for Tanzania's Economy. London: James Currey/Portsmouth, New Hampshire: Heinemann/Dar Es Salaam: Tanzania Publishing House. 1986. 384pp. £25.00hb/£9.95pb.
- Kamil, Leo: Fueling the Fire: US Policy and the Western Sahara Conflict. Trenton, New Jersey: Red Sea Press. 1987. 104pp. $12.95hb/$4.95pb.
- Kassim, Anis F (ed): The Palestine Yearbook of International Law. Volume II. Nicosia, Cyprus: Al-Shaybani Society of International Law. 1985. 236pp. n/p.
- Khader, Bichara and Badran, Adnan (eds): The Economic Development of Jordan. London: Croom Helm. 1987. 246pp. £25.00hb.
- Khan, Kushi M (ed): Multinationals of the South: New Actors in the International Economy. London: Frances Pinter. 1987. 250pp. £18.50hb.
- Khurshid, Salman: At Home in India: A Restatement of Indian Muslims. London: Sangam Books. 1987. 221pp. £12.50hb.
- Kohli, Atul: The State of Poverty in India: The Politics of Reform. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1987. 262pp. £25.00hb.
- Lamb, David: The Arabs: Journeys Beyond the Mirage. New York: Random House (distributed in Europe by European Book Service). 1987. 333pp. $19.95hb.
- Lappé, Frances Moore: World Hunger: Twelve Myths. New York: Grove Press for Food First. 1986. 208pp. $7.95pb.
- Lewin, Keith M: Education in Austerity: Options for Planners. Paris: UNESCO. 1987. 131pp. Fr40.00pb.
- Lubec, Paul M: Islam and Urban Labor in Northern Nigeria: The Making of a Muslim Working Class. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. 1987. 362pp. £27.50hb.
- MacPherson, Stewart and Midgley, James (eds): Comparative Social Policy and the Third World. Brighton, England: Wheatsheaf Books. 1987. 228pp. £20.00hb.
- Magubane, Peter: Soweto: The Fruit of Fear. Trenton, New Jersey: Africa World Press. 1987. 40pp. $29.95hb/$14.95pb.
- McNamara, Robert: Blundering Into Disaster: Surviving the First Century of the Nuclear Age. London: Bloomsbury Publishing Company. 1987. 212pp. £12.95hb.
- Malik, Hafeez (ed): Soviet-American Relations with Pakistan. London: Macmillan. 1987. 431pp. n/p.
- Matsumoto, Miroshi and Sopiee, Noordin (eds): Into the Pacific Era: Southeast Asia and its Place in the Pacific. Kuala Lumpur: Institute of Strategic and International Studies. 1986. 52pp. n/p.
- Miller, Rory (ed): Region and Class in Modern Peruvian History. Liverpool: Institute of Latin American Studies, University of Liverpool. 1987. 207pp. £10.95hb.
- Mizaffari, Mehdi: Authority in Islam: from Muhammad to Khomeini. New York: M E Sharpe. 1987. 127pp. $29.95hb.
- Momsen, Janet H and Townsend, Janet (eds): Geography of Gender in the Third World. London: Hutchinson. 1987. 424pp. £9.95pb.
- Mowoe, Isaac James and Bjornson, Richard (eds): Africa and the West: The Legacies of Empire. London: Greenwood. 1986. 274pp. £32.50hb.
- Nalloy, James M and Seligson, Mitchell A (eds): Authoritarians and Democrats:

- Regime Transition in Latin America. Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania: University of Pittsburgh Press. 1987. 268pp. $25.95hb/$12.95pb.
- Netton, Ian Richard (ed): Arabia and the Gulf: From Traditional Society to Modern States. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 259pp. £29.95hb.
- Nonneman, Gerd: Iraq, the Gulf States and the War: A Changing Relationship, 1980-1986 and Beyond. London: Ithaca. 1986. 224pp. £17.00hb/£9.00pb.
- O'Kane, Rosemary H T: The Likelihood of Coups. Aldershot, England: Avebury. 1987. 162pp. £18.50hb.
- Okte, Fail: The Tragedy of the Turkish Capital Tax. London: Croom Helm. 1987. 95pp. n/p.
- Omer-Cooper, J D: History of Southern Africa. London: James Currey. 1987. 287pp. £25.00hb.
- Osanam, Abdul Rahman: The Dilemma of Development in the Arabian Peninsula. London: Croom Helm. 1987. 203pp. £25.00hb.
- Painter, David S (ed): Private Power and Public Policy: Multinational Oil Companies and US Foreign Policy, 1941-1954. London: I B Tauris. 1986. 302pp. n/p.
- Panchampykhi, V R, Raipuria, K M Mehta, Rajesh and Kumar, Nagesh: The Third World and the World Economic System. New Delhi: Radiant Publishers with Research and Information System for the Non-Aligned and Other Developing Countries. 1986. 309pp. Rs125/$25.00hb.
- Peck, Malcolm C: The United Arab Emirates: A Venture in Unity. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 176pp. £22.50hb.
- Peterson, J E: Defending Arabia. London: Croom Helm. 1986. 275pp. £25.00hb.
- Ramazani, R K: Revolutionary Iran: Challenge and Response in the Middle East. London: Johns Hopkins University Press. 1987. 311pp. £21.60hb.
- Ridd, Rosemary and Callaway, Helen (eds): Caught in Conflict: Women's Responses to Political Strife. London: Macmillan. 1986. 246pp. £20.00hb/£6.95pb.
- Riddell, Roger C (ed): Foreign Aid Reconsidered. London: James Currey. 1987. 309pp. £25.00hb/£9.95pb.
- Rodwin, Lloyd (ed): Shelter, Settlements and Development. London: Unwin and Hyman for United Nations. 1987. 476pp. £30.00hb.
- Rodd, William R (ed): Islam and the Political Economy of Meaning: Comparative Studies of Muslim Discourse. London: Croom Helm. 1987. 295pp. £25.00hb.
- Rubenberg, Cheryl A: Israel and the American National Interest: A Critical Examination. Chicago, Illinois: University of Illinois Press. 1986. 446pp. n/p.
- Saeed, Syed Mumtaz: Managerial Challenge in the Third World. London: Praeger, with Academy of Ideas, Karachi. 1986. 382pp. n/p.
- Seavoy, Ronald E: Famine in Peasant Societies. London: Greenwood. 1986. 478pp. £40.50hb.
- Sertima, Ivan Van (ed): Cheikh Anta Diop. New Brunswick, New Jersey: Transaction Books (distributed in the UK by Clio). 1986. 378pp. n/p.
- Sesay, Amadu (ed): Africa and Europe: From Partition to Interdependence or Dependence? London: Croom Helm. 1986. 250pp. £25.00hb.
- Shepherd, Andrew, Norris, Malcolm, Watson, John: Water Planning in Arid Sudan. London: Ithaca. 1987. 206pp. £18.00hb/£9.00pb.
- Shukla, K S (ed): The Other Side of Development: Social-Psychological Implications. London/New Delhi: Sage. 1987. 255pp. £18.00hb/£7.50pb.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS

- Singh, Andrea Menefee and Kelles-Viitanen, Anita (eds): Invisible Hands: Women in Home-Based Production. London/New Delhi: Sage. 1987. 273pp. £17.00hb.
- Spalding, Rose J (ed): The Political Economy of Revolutionary Nicaragua. London: Unwin Hyman. 1987. 255pp. n/p.
- Stare, Mekta: Global System of Trade Preferences: Prospects for Yugoslav Trade in Manufactured Goods with Developing Countries. Ljubljana, Yugoslavia: Research Centre for Cooperation with Developing Countries. 1986. 100pp. n/p.
- Stowasser, Barbara Freyer (ed): The Islamic Impulse. London: Croom Helm with Centre for Contemporary Arab Studies, Georgetown University, Washington DC. 1987. 329pp. £25.00hb.
- Sundrum, R M: Growth and Income Distribution in India: Policy and Performance since Independence. London/New Delhi: Sage. 1987. 356pp. £21.50hb/£10.00pb.
- Sutlive, Vinso H, Altschuler, Nathan, Zamora, Mario D and Kerns, Virginia (eds): Modernization and the Emergence of a Landless Peasantry: Essays on the Integration of Peripheries to Socio-economic Centers. Williamsburg, Virginia: Department of Anthropology, College of William and Mary. 1985. 403pp. n/p.
- Tiruchelvam, Neelan and Coomaraswamy, Radhika (eds): The Rule of the Judiciary in Plural Societies. London: Frances Pinter. 1987. 193pp. £22.50hb.
- Tolha, Mostafa Kamal: Sustainable Development: Constraints and Opportunities. London: Butterworths. 1987. 221pp. £26.00hb.
- Tolley, George S and Thomas, Vinod (eds): The Economics of Urbanization and Urban Policies in Developing Countries. Washington DC: The World Bank. 1987. 181pp. $15.00hb.
- Walder, Andrew G: Communist Neo-Traditionalism: Work and Authority in Chinese Industry. London: University of California Press. 1986. 302pp. £25.00hb.
- Wells, Clare: The UN, UNESCO and the Politics of Knowledge. London: Macmillan. 1987. 281pp. £29.50hb.
- Wennergren, E Boyd, Plucknett, Donald L, Smith, Nogel J H, Furlong, William L and Joshi, Joan H: Solving World Hunger: The US Stake. Cabin John, Maryland: Seven Locks Press. 1986. 102pp. $7.95pb.
- Wheeler, Joseph C (ed): Development Cooperation: 1986 Review. Paris: Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development. 1987. 292pp n/p.
- Wright, Stephen and Brownfoot, Janice N (eds): Africa in World Politics. London: Macmillan. 1987. 214pp. £27.50hb.

PAMPHLETS

- Ahmed, E and Stern, N H: Taxation for Developing Countries, Volumes I and II. London: London School of Economics. 1986.
- Berge, Noel, Ingle, Marcus D and Hamilton, Marcia: Microcomputers in Development: A Manager's Guide. West Hartford, Connecticut: Kumarian Press. 1986. 29pp. $13.95pb.
- British Parliamentary Human Rights Group and Americas Watch: Human Rights in Guatemala: During President Cerezo's First Year. London: BPHRG. 1987.
- Brown, Lester R and Jacobson, Jodi L: The Future of Urbanization: Facing the Ecological and Economic Constraints. Washington DC: Worldwatch Institute. 1987.

- Brown, Neville and Yu-Ying: South Africa: Sanctions or Targetted Aid? Birmingham, England: University of Birmingham. 1987.
- Clark, John: NGOs and Structural Adjustment. Geneva: United Nations Non-Governmental Liaison Service. 1987.
- Contee, Christine E: What Americans Think: Views on Development and US-Third World Relations. New York: InterAction/Washington DC: Overseas Development Council. 1987.
- Cornia, Giovanni Andrea: The Adjustment Statement: Conventional Approaches and New Ideas. Geneva: United Nations Non-Governmental Liaison Service. 1987.
- de Murguia, Valdemar: Capital Flight and Economic Crisis: Mexican Post-Devaluation Exiles in a California Community. San Diego, California: Center for US-Mexican Studies, University of California. 1986.
- Elkington, John: Double Dividends? US Biotechnology and Third World Development. Washington DC: World Resources Institute. 1986.
- Evenson, Robert E: The International Agricultural Research Centers: Their Impact on Spending for National Agricultural Research and Extension. Washington DC: World Bank. 1987.
- British Section, International Society for Human Rights, International Secretariat, Internationale Gesellschaft für Menschenrechte and USA Section, International Society for Human Rights: Apartheid: How Much Longer? London and Toms River, New Jersey: ISHR. 1986.
- Intergovernmental Group of Twenty-Four on International Monetary Affairs: The Role of the IMF in Adjustment With Growth: Report of the Working Group of G-24. Washington DC: Intergovernmental Group of Twenty-Four on International Monetary Affairs.
- Joenniemi, Pertti (ed): War, Peace and Culture. Tampere, Finland: Tampere Peace Research Institute. 1987.
- Karsh, Efraim: The Iran-Iraq War: A Military Analysis. London: International Institute for Strategic Studies. 1987.
- Kay, Reginald: Burundi since the Genocide. London: Minority Rights Group. 1987.
- Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development: Structural Adjustment and Economic Performance. Paris: OECD. 1987.
- Selin, Shannon: Canada, NATO and Arms Control. Ottawa: Canada Centre for Arms Control and Disarmament. 1987.
- Sheldrick, William: World Nitrogen Survey. Washington DC: World Bank. 1987.
- Singh, Chhatrapati: Common Property and Common Poverty: India's Forests, Forest Dwellers and the Law. Delhi: Oxford University Press. 1986.
- Thornberry, Patrick: Minorities and Human Rights Law. London: Minority Rights Group. 1987.
- Wolf, Edward C: On the Brink of Extinction: Conserving the Diversity of Life. Washington DC: Worldwatch Institute. 1987.
- World Bank: The World Bank Research Program 1986: Abstracts of Current Studies. Washington DC: World Bank. 1987.

Third World Foundation News

'Regional Conflicts and International Law' seminar, 10-11 April 1987

The Third World Foundation's two-day seminar on 'Regional Conflicts and International Law' was attended by some two hundred participants. The subject which had brought so many people to the Commonwealth Institute was the issue of contemporary regional conflict; its diversity, complexity and intensity and the seeming inability of multilateral institutions to find answers for some of the most pressing problems of the age. These problems were shared and discussed at the seminar through the medium of panel sessions and papers by twenty-six speakers from a variety of backgrounds. The key-note address was a paper prepared by Michael Manley, former Prime Minister of Jamaica. It was unfortunate that Michael Manley was not present to read his paper through illness, although copies of the paper were made available to the seminar. The seminar focused on regional tension and conflict primarily in the context of international law. The perspectives outlined by the majority of speakers emphasised the importance of understanding international law within an interdisciplinary context. It was stressed that international law could not be looked at in isolation from the dynamics of regional and global politics. Politics was seen as the factor which both determined the effectiveness of international law and the status of these multilateral institutions which attempted to formulate and then enforce international law.

Three principal areas of conflict were examined by the seminar: the Middle East and the Gulf, Southern Africa and Central America and the Caribbean. Each area was notable for the existence of a conflict which threatened to undermine Third World peace, security and development. Speakers pointed out that although economic intervention was probably the most pervasive source of conflict in a number of these areas, little had been achieved in the international arena to outlaw this most subtle form of intervention. Conversely, it was also noted that current definitions of conflict used by the international community also failed to provide support and solidarity for national liberation movements as well as for those states struggling against forms of economic as well as political domination.

A feature common to a number of the papers was the emphasis on interdependence as a factor in conflict and conflict resolution. Both Manley and Thomas in their papers on economic intervention emphasised global economic interdependence as the main characteristic of the international system rather than national sovereignty defined in terms of territoriality. Kopietz, introducing the arms trade and the Gulf War, argued that South-South interdependence based on arms transfers had considerably weakened the traditional leverage of the superpowers on Third World states by breaking their monopoly as arms suppliers. Similarly, Fitzgerald showed that in the case of Central America, Nicaragua's ability to survive the American trade embargo was due in no small part to its ability to diversify both trade and aid through extensive linkages with the Third World. These linkages had clearly not been available to Cuba when facing similar circumstances during the 1950s. In the Central America context again, Duran made it clear that the relative success of the Contadora group had been due to an acute awareness that economic and political wellbeing in the region was dependent foremost on a mediated solution to the US-Contra-Nicaragua conflict.

Although the questions posed for the seminar were numerous, two clear lines of enquiry seemed to arise from the proceedings. The first was a concern with the antiquated nature of formal definitions of national sovereignty used by multilateral institutions, which emphasised territoriality to the exclusion of other factors. The seminar was thus concerned with exploring how multilateral institutions could develop comprehensive definitions and legal principles to secure sovereignty, justice and self-determination in all its forms.

The second line of inquiry explored whether current trends in conflicts were indicative of a strengthening or weakening of international law and the role of the multilateral institution. Two rather contradictory conclusions were reached in this respect. The first was that there had been a significant shift in power to the North, eroding the legitimacy of multilateral institutions and reducing their ability to articulate and enforce international legal principles. This view held that without consensus among states, there was no basis for cooperation in international law. The second view suggested that new interdependent relationships were being formed beyond the nation-state, which required cooperation, and thus consensus and principled regulation in international terms. This view held that factors such as the globalisation of capital would of necessity lead to the strengthening of international law. It was concluded that with the demise of the nation-state, multilateral institutions would also tend to disappear given that their rationale had originally been based on the need for cooperation among nation-states.

The main points and conclusions reached by the papers presented at the seminar are outlined in summary form below.

Seminar Proceedings

Keynote Paper: Dominance or Equity: The Multilateral Institutions, by Michael Manley, Former Prime Minister Jamaica (1972-80) and Leader of the People's National Party, Jamaica.

Michael Manley's paper set out the context for much of the later seminar discussion, providing a historical review of the origins of multilateral institutions and the factors which have informed their responses to economic intervention. Manley argued that multilateral institutions such as the UN system were products of the North, created for the express purpose of providing a political framework for economic regulation of the international economy by the North. Manley argued that the emphasis on political sovereignty rather than economic sovereignty ensured continuing Northern dominance over the international economy. While newly independent states could elect parliaments and participate in multilateral institutions, their control over their own economies was so limited that benefits achievable through political sovereignty in the South bore little relationship to the benefits enjoyed through sovereignty in the North.

Manley felt that our perceptions of the current world situation would have us believe that decisions and choices to be taken by multilateral institutions were those that involved choices between 'anarchy' and 'order'; he suggested that this was a false dichotomy; the real choices to be faced today were not between 'anarchy' and 'order' but between economic 'dominance' and 'equity'. Because the North had no desire or interest in dismantling the multilateralism which had served to promote productive forces world-wide, multilateral institutions were likely to be used as a double-edged weapon; while the major nation-states 'needed multilateralism to create an appropriate environment for their growth', the world's peoples need multilateralism as the means to seek 'redress and equity'. Manley counselled that 'ordinary people of nation-states' must begin to realise the nature of the 'limits placed upon their national power by the internationalisation of production'. It was on this basis that he believed that a solution for the most pressing of problems—the problem of equity—could be sought and found within the international arena.

First Session: Sovereignty, Interventionism and Self Determination

Session Chairman: Professor Ian Brownlie QC, Professor of Public International Law at the University of Oxford. Discussants: Ken Coates, Bertrand Russell Peace Foundation; James Mayall, London School of Economics; P Saravanamuttu, University of Southampton and Christopher Clapham, University of Leicester

1) Economic Intervention and Third World States, by Caroline Thomas, Department of Politics, University of Southampton

Caroline Thomas addressed the problem of sovereignty and conflict, taking up some of the themes introduced by Manley in the keynote speech. She concurred with Manley in noting that the question of economic sovereignty had been notably absent in both political and economic debates in the North. If the principles of non-intervention were adopted internationally and applied to economic interests, this would necessitate fundamental revision in the international system and major changes in the corresponding distribution of benefits within that system.

Some quite significant steps had already been taken towards articulating a principle of economic intervention. Latin American states in particular had attempted to outline terms of reference for defining economic intervention. The 1948 Charter of the Organisation of American States expressly forbade economic intervention. In the more recent period, the 1974 UN Charter of the Economic Rights and Duties of States established the most legitimate expression of the principle of economic sovereignty for the overwhelming majority of states. It was concluded that while some Third World states had gained national control over resources, the recent shifts in power relations between North and South, and developments in finance, trade and debt made the prospects for strengthening economic sovereignty increasingly bleak.

2) International Law and Wars of National Liberation: Use of Force and Intervention, by Julio Faundez, Department of Law, University of Warwick

Julio Faundez's paper tackled the contradiction between General Assembly resolutions calling upon states to assist national liberation movements and the accepted norms of the international legal system which prohibited intervention in the affairs of other states. The questions that Faundez asked fell into two categories. First, whether General Assembly resolutions on this question had international legal status, and if so, did this reflect a capacity to adapt international law to changing political circumstances? Secondly, if such resolutions were recognised in law, did this not reflect a move towards the undermining of the international legal system by introducing a further element of instability into international affairs?

Faundez argued that the acceptance of the principle of assistance to liberation movements did not imply changes to rules governing non-intervention. It was noted that if wars of national liberation were defined as internal conflicts between government and population then such conflict was governed by customary law and the rule of non-intervention would apply. If the conflict was defined as external, then General Assembly resolutions would apply in a form recognised by customary law.

Faundez observed that General Assembly resolutions binding under international customary law affirmed the principle of self-determination and the inadmissibility of the use of force in depriving people of national rights. In such circumstances the law recognised that where struggles for self-determination were taking place, the territories concerned had separate status in international law. This status would not change until the people concerned were able to exercise their rights to self-determination. Conflicts were thus deemed 'external' where states illegally administered populations and frustrated their attempts at self-determination. In such circumstances, the national liberation movement acted as the legitimate authority in the area with the right to use force in self-defence and call for the assistance of other states. The actions of the liberation movement would remain legal in so far that its actions took place within the boundaries of the unit to be self-determined.

In conclusion, it was noted that the distinction between internal and external conflict was established within General Assembly resolutions and this distinction formed the basis for International Court of Justice rulings on customary law.

Second Session: The Middle East and the Gulf

Session Chairman: Dr Nazih Ayubi, Department of Politics, University of Exeter. Discussants: Baqer Moin, BBC Persian Services; Don Kerr, International Institute for Strategic Studies, London; Saiid Rizvi, Compass News Features, London

1) International Legal Implications of Conflicts in the Gulf and the Mediterranean, by George Joffe, Economist Intelligence Unit, London

George Joffe's paper expanded the theme of international law to examine conflict in the Gulf region and the Mediterranean. The paper explored how the principles and conventions of international law could be used both as a reservoir for ideas for the future evolution of international law and as a form of legal and political weaponry for pursuing national self-interest.

In the case of the Gulf of Sirte, Joffe noted that Libya's unilateral decision to treat the Gulf of Sirte as part of its internal waters in 1973 resulted in a uniformly hostile reaction from the North. The basic objection to the Libyan claim was that it did not conform to any standard definition of 'internal waters'. Joffe observed that there were precedents based on historical title, notably the USSR's closure of St Peter the Great Bay, the Tunisian closure of the Gulf of Gabes and Tunis, and major closures by Burma and Colombia, which should have allowed the Libyan claim to be taken seriously. In each of these cases, action was justified in terms of 'historic rights', rights sanctified by long and exclusive usage based on the security and the economic needs of the state concerned. Joffe argued that the concept of 'historic rights' was of major importance to the South where colonial development had emphasised littoral economic development with export patterns linked to concentrated coastal settlement. In such circumstances, the Libyan claim appeared reasonable given that the survival of the state was tied to its export trade and that the waters in question had never been subject to prolonged dispute over sovereignty,

In the case of the Shatt al-Arab issue, Joffe argued that international legal principles were both manipulated and re-formulated to reflect dominant patterns of relations between states. It was observed, however, that disputes concerning irridentist, maritime and navigational claims had become magnified not only by the Gulf War but also by the issue of offshore oil and gas. Joffe concluded by noting that despite the war situation, states in the Gulf sought to justify their actions through recourse to international legal principles. This had occurred even where states had shown little concern for legal principle in the past.

2) The Gulf War and Arms Sales, by Dr Hans-Heino Kopietz, International Institute for Strategic Studies, London

Hans-Heino Kopietz introduced his paper by noting that despite the Irangate controversy over arms transfers to Iran, this policy was more consistent with the interests of a superpower in the area than the boycott policies adopted by the USA in response to the issue of hostages and international terrorism. Kopietz justified his position by noting that arm sales had played a most important historical role in cultivating patron-client relations between dependent arms-consuming states and supplying states with a monopoly over arms production. In the case of the Gulf, he noted that there had been a significant erosion of this important foreign policy tool. Kopietz observed that before the war, both Iran and Iraq obtained 'major' weaponry from a limited number of sources, three suppliers in the case of Iraq, four suppliers in the case of Iran. This situation had changed quite dramatically during the war with Iraq obtaining military support from another ten suppliers and Iran increasing its total number of suppliers to eighteen. In the case of Iran only four of these suppliers were represented by industrialised countries and fifteen suppliers were supplying arms to both sides.

Kopietz argued that the rapid diversification of sources for arms supplies in recent years had upset a relatively homogeneous international system based on arms monopoly, with arms supplied solely by superpowers and Western states. The proliferation of Third World producers, such as Brazil or South Korea, had weakened not only the traditional arms transfer monopoly of the major states, but also the relationship between arms transfer and foreign policy. In conclusion, it was argued that the main issue behind Irangate was not so much the hostage crisis as the issue of Iran's future dependency on the West, in particular its dependency on the USA. Irangate was seen as an attempt by the US Administration to re-establish a previously reliable foreign policy option based on arms transfer. It was noted, however, that with the emergence of arms suppliers from the South this option was becoming increasingly untenable, limiting the capacity for superpower action in regional conflicts.

Third Session: Southern Africa

Session Chairman: Randolph Vigne. Discussants: Brian Wood,

Namibia Support Committee; Alan Brooks, Anti-Apartheid Movement; Dorothy Keet, Mozambique Information Office and Ian Linden, Catholic Institute for International Relations

1) Namibia: The Politics of Linkage and Repression, by Peter Katjavivi, Institute of History, University of Joensuu, Finland

Peter Katjavivi's paper drew attention to the fact that, despite unanimous agreement within the international community that Namibia should become independent, none of its resolutions on the Namibia question had been implemented. In this respect he noted that the case of Namibia was unique. Namibia was the only territory to fall directly under the jurisdiction of the UN, and yet even with this authority, the UN seemed incapable of acting decisively. Katjavivi observed that not only was the issue of Namibia at stake, it also presented a challenge to the international community in upholding the authority of the UN.

Katjavivi charted the background to the present impasse faced by both Namibians and the international community. He observed that developments over Namibia had moved through several stages. During the 1960s and 1970s the problem had been how to gain widespread international recognition of the UN's authority in Namibia. In the period from 1981 onwards, the problem had shifted to trying to enforce UN resolutions against South Africa. The problem was no longer that of UN legitimacy, but of UN effectiveness. It was observed that one of the major stumbling blocks for the UN was the point at which the issue moved from the General Assembly to the Security Council. Katjavivi argued that the triple veto used by France, Britain and the USA against resolutions calling for an end to diplomatic ties with South Africa had also paralysed movement on past UN resolutions. In addition, he noted that Western regional interests had led to the deflection of the issue away from Namibia itself, to Namibia's role as a buffer-state between South Africa and Cuban troops in Angola. The convergence of interests between South Africa and the West had merely resulted in increasing talk to avoid action. Katjavivi concluded his paper by calling for the Namibia question to be judged on its own terms and for international sanctions to be imposed on South Africa.

2) South Africa's Destabilisation Policies, by Dr Joe Hanlon

Dr Hanlon's paper focused on the regional implications of apartheid, and South Africa's destabilisation strategy. Hanlon noted that South Africa had not only waged war against its internal population, it had also waged full-scale war against independent states in the region. Since 1980, 700,000 people had died in the Front-line states as a result of South Africa's destabilisation policies, in addition, four million have been made homeless. The cost of destabilisation in economic terms had amounted to US$25 million, two and half times the value of all aid received by Front-line states during the same period. Hanlon argued that the scale of South Africa's destabilisation was linked not only to the need to keep war outside its borders, but also to the need for regional control.

Hanlon identified three factors underlying South Africa's regional policy. First, the military requirement to keep pressure on Front-line states in order to force them to mute their opposition to apartheid. Secondly, a political and ideological consideration, both for internal white South African consumption and for the international community as a whole. Hanlon pointed out that one of the main arguments used in support of apartheid was that majority rule would bring chaos to South Africa. Evidence of successful majority rule in the region would thus effectively undermine this premise. Hanlon argued that destabilisation was an effective means for ensuring the continued identification of chaos with majority rule. The third factor outlined by Hanlon was the economic consideration. Destabilisation ensured that the Front-line states remained economically dependent on South Africa with substantial profits accruing to South Africa from its neighbours.

Destabilisation was seen to be principally aimed at deflecting the threat of sanctions. Hanlon argued that the most serious threat to apartheid lay in the implementation of sanctions, a fact appreciated by both the Front-line states and by South Africa itself. Destabilisation was seen by Hanlon as the means for perpetuating the circular argument that sanctions would hurt the blacks more than it would apartheid. He observed that dependency also hurt and that without the implementation of sanctions, dependency and destabilisation would continue. Hanlon concluded that, when faced with such circumstances, the only conceivable investment that Front-line states could make towards their future was the swift imposition of sanctions. Sanctions represented the only means possible for ending the threat of further destabilisation.

Fourth Session: Central America and the Caribbean

Session Chairwoman: Maria Elena Hurtado, South Magazine.

Discussants: Jenny Pearce, Latin American Bureau; James Painter, Latin American Bureau and Reggie Norton, formerly with the Washington office on Latin America

1) Contadora: Legal Framework or Empty Act, by Esperanza Duran, Royal Institute of International Affairs

Esperanza Duran in her paper explored some of the themes touched upon earlier by Thomas, namely, the central role of the rules and principles of international law in Latin and Central American Affairs. These she noted were central to the development of the Contadora process and its approach to conflict resolution in Central America. Two important aspects of the relationship between international law and Central America were outlined.

Firstly, it was noted that regional law, encapsulating non-intervention and self-determination were largely the product of the historical experience of US domination and intervention. Secondly, such interventions had always carried with them significant spill-over effects on neighbouring states. The need for cooperation to minimise disruptions to the region as a whole and the requirement for some form of mechanism to resolve border disputes had led to a fairly advanced system of regional cooperation on legal matters.

These considerations Duran suggested, also helped to explain part of the success of the Contadora group set up by Venezuela, Mexico, Columbia and Panama in 1983. Duran noted that contemporary Central American problems, such as the Nicaragua situation, had significant implications for other states, particularly in regard to the stability of their economies and political systems. The rationale for cooperation thus lay with preserving and strengthening links which already existed, with the conflict resolution element of cooperation arising from past legal precedents. Duran located the importance of the Contadora process in that it served as a 'safety valve' averting all-out regional conflagration, while providing a permanent forum for dialogue and negotiation. Duran concluded that the level of cooperation achieved through the Contadora process was not the result of any inherent superiority in legal forms of cooperation, but arose from concrete political and economic considerations which had demanded a forum for regional consultation and consensus.

2) Destabilisation and International Justice: The Case of Nicaragua and the USA by Professor E U K FitzGerald, Institute of Social Studies, The Hague

Professor FitzGerald's paper reintroduced a number of points made by previous speakers, particularly Hanlon on economic destabilisation, Thomas and Manley on economic interdependence, Kopietz on the role played by South-South linkages in minimising the effects of superpower intervention and Duran on the significance of regional linkages in a conflict zone. FitzGerald noted that destabilisation and interventionism was aimed principally at the economy and the services most closely associated with Nicaragua. FitzGerald told the seminar that since 1981, Nicaragua's export capacity has been reduced by half as a result of economic sabotage and the trade embargo and problems of resettlement from the war zone had reduced production of basic foodstuffs by 33 per cent. He also noted that since 1983 economic growth had ceased and per capita income had declined.

At the regional level, FitzGerald's observations corresponded with those of Duran. The conflict has had a quite significant impact on the region as a whole. It had resulted in a break-up of national markets and this had further reduced the scope for productive economic activity. FitzGerald noted that small states such as those of Central America were generally of insufficient size to support industrial development on a national basis; cooperation was therefore required at the regional level in order to generate industrial growth and maintain the stability of regional markets. FitzGerald was more positive in his assessment of support given on a South-South basis. He noted that one-third of trade and aid support received by Nicaragua was derived from the Third World. The largest single donor was Mexico which had been providing oil on credit over the past five years. Algeria had taken up Nicaragua's sugar quota immediately after the imposition of the trade embargo and India and China had provided help with transport infrastructure and farm machinery.

Concluding, FitzGerald pointed out what he thought to be a most interesting development with regard to American involvement in Nicaragua. Large numbers of US companies were still operating in Nicaragua, despite the US administration's opposition, using their non-US-based subsidiaries as a means of circumventing the embargo. This development FitzGerald stressed, had important implications for the future, particularly for small states. He suggested that multipolarisation in world politics, as with South-South interdependence and as a result of the mobility of world capital, was increasingly going to frustrate the actions of major states with hegemonic foreign policies. He suggested that the movement towards the internationalism of capital might well bring about some quite fundamental changes in the role of international law and multilateral institutions in world politics. He thought that the interests of world capital were such that they would not support destabilisation policies, instead they would articulate opposition to such policies by seeking a strengthening of international systems of law quite independently of any developments in the UN system. This he felt was a positive step forward for the protection of small states.

Closing remarks: Mr Altaf Gauhar, Secretary-General, Third World Foundation

The closing address to the seminar was presented by Mr Altaf Gauhar, Secretary-General of the Third World Foundation. In his address, Mr Gauhar outlined why the seminar had been organised around the theme of international conflict and international law, noting that this had also been a point put to him earlier during the two-day proceedings. Mr Gauhar observed that despite the wide-ranging nature of the topics explored during the seminar there was one common denominator which linked the various contributions together and which provided the seminar with both its focus and relevance. The primary objective of the seminar he felt had been to formulate a question concerning the nature of the economic world order as enshrined in the UN Charter. The question itself was relatively simple: did the world order of the 1980s correspond in any way to that envisaged by the UN Charter? If so was the order still there, or had the experience of the 1980s indicated that the order was weakening and crumbling? In other words, were we now faced with the need to conduct a post mortem, had the system failed to prove itself and what, if anything, existed to take its place?

Mr Gauhar stressed that to explore this question further, it was necessary to dissect the system, to examine its component elements and match each element with those embodied in the UN Charter. This required an examination of the principles underlying the Charter in relation to its main elements—sovereignty, security and non-intervention. In this respect he noted that the seminar had been quite successful in defining the ground rules for such an examination. The papers of the seminar had taken up issues related to the Charter, and these issues had been further elaborated in the discussions of the guest panels and the audience.

On a pessimistic note, Mr Gauhar suggested that the experience of the 1980s indicated a fundamental breakdown in the relationship between law and power. Regional and international law if it was to be effective, had to be informed by some form of social consensus. Law was based on consensus and without international consensus there was nothing to sustain international law. The experience of the 1980s had not been one of consensus, but one of governance by the most powerful.

In his conclusion, Mr Gauhar noted that two elements were emerging on the national and international arena which provided a basis for a hope for the future. The first was the force of public opinion. Public opinion had become a major catalyst for change. This was evidenced by public reaction to various events in the past few years and the increasing need on the part of some states to disseminate blatant public disinformation in support of their policies. Increasingly, public opinion had come to be seen as a force to be reckoned with within the international arena. The second element which had increasingly become a factor for change was a belief held by many people in the possibility of transforming destinies, whether their own, or theirs in conjunction with others. Mr Gauhar felt that it was these two factors, more than anything else, which would make Michael Manley's demand for 'productive opportunity and equitable outcome', a realisable proposition.

'The Politics of Exile' conference, 25–26 April 1987

This conference was co-sponsored by the Third World Foundation and South Magazine. It was attended by exiled writers, artists and politicians from the Third World, together with other intellectuals whose own displacement from their countries of origin afforded them insight into the problems and possibilities of exile. The participants, many of whom combine writing with political activism, included Ariel Dorfman (Chile), Claribel Alegria (El Salvador), Nuruddin Farah (Somalia), Buchi Emecheta (Nigeria), Abdulrahman Mohammed Babu (Tanzania), Dennis Brutus (South Africa), Fawaz Turki (Palestine), Nawal El Saadawi (Egypt) and Shirley Geok-Lin Lim (Malaysia).

Organised into four sessions, the conference discussed the nature of exile in relation to Latin America, Africa, the Middle East and Asia. Among the themes explored were:

- the intolerance of regimes which create the necessity for exile by refusing to countenance dissent or non-conformity;
- the use of exile as a tool of government control and an alternative to silencing by censorship or imprisonment;
- the dilemmas facing exiles in relation both to their host countries and their countries of origin, including the choices involved in engaging in political activism abroad;
- the manipulation of exiles for political purposes as occurs in Southern Africa and Central America, where rebel movements are fuelled by external funding;
- incidences of mass exile, including the 'black diaspora' resulting from the slave trade in Africa, and the Palestinians as a nation in exile;
- the possible cultural and political contribution which exiles can make, by virtue of their special perspective, as a bridge between different societies;
- the effects of exile on individuals' creativity, whether they be detrimental in terms of the despair and inertia induced by deracination, or inspirational in intensifying memory and enhancing objectivity;
- the fluid distinction between exiles and refugees or economic migrants;
- the relationship of language to exile;
- the role played by the 'myth of return' in the psychology of exile.

In addition to the more tangible phenomenon of geographical displacement, exile was considered as a pervasive metaphor for alienation or exclusion. As the Egyptian feminist, Nawal El Sadaawi, pointed out, the largest group of exiles in the world comprises women, who are exiled both within their own countries and from themselves.

The Politics of Exile conference papers will be published in Third World Affairs 1988, together with an account of the conference proceedings.

Speakers at The Politics of Exile conference in London in April 1987:

above: Professor Dennis Brutus, reading from his poetry

below left: Nawal El Saadawi

below right: Ariel Dorfman

Pictures by Carlos Reyes

JOURNAL

Institute of Muslim Minority Affairs

Editor: Syed Z. Abedin

VOL. VII NO. 2 NOW AVAILABLE

HIGHLIGHTS

Christian-Muslim Dialogue

Rights of Non-Muslims in Islam - William Shepard

Non-Muslims in Pakistan - Achilles de Souza

Christian Mission to Islam: A Muslim Response - Hasan Askari

Regional Studies

Kirghizia Between Islam and Nationalism - Guy Imart

Islam in China: The Internal Dimension - Ibrahim Ma Zhao-chun

The Pantbay Muslims of Burma - Andrew Forbes

Urdu Language and the Future of Muslim Identity in India - Omar Khalidi

The Arabs in Zanzibar - Abdulaziz Lodihi

The Gift of a Mountain: A 19th Century Swabli Document - Sharifa M. Zawawi

The Changing Role and Status of Women in Cameroon - Mario Azevedo and Gwendolyn Prater

Islam and Development in the Western Sabel: Engine or Brake? - Alan Frishman

Muslim Influences on West African Literature and Culture - Simon Battestini

Islam in the Netherlands - Jan Slomp

The Muslim Predicament in Yugoslavia - Abdullah Dedic

Are Turkish Speakers in Bulgaria of Ethnic Bulgarian Origin? - Ali Eminov

Along With

Research in Progress. An Islamic Agenda for Muslim Minorities, Book Reviews, Spectrum, Education of Muslim Minorities and a new section: Muslim Minority Profiles: Critical Relections on the Life of Malcolm X by Iamin Sanneh

ORDER YOUR COPY NOW

Institute of Muslim Minority Affairs
46 Goodge Street, London W1P 1FJ, U.K.

SUBSCRIPTION

	International	USA
1 year individual	£ 10.00	$14.00
1 year institution	£ 12.00	$17.00

ASK FOR OUR TENTH ANNIVERSARY SPECIAL OFFER

North-South Monitor

UN SYSTEM

▲ UN Convention on the Law of the Sea (UNCLOS)
Preparatory Commission for the International Seabed Authority (ISA) and the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea
Fourth Regular Session
New York, 12 August–5 September 1986

■ The Preparatory Commission resumed its fourth regular session, to discuss preparations for the new institutions to be created with the entry into force of UNCLOS. The Commission dealt with the rules and regulations under which the institutions of UNCLOS would commence their functions; the formulation of a mining code to govern activities in the New International Seabed Area; the formulation of procedural, administrative and financial rules for the ISA and for the Tribunal, the chamber dealing with disputes among seabed miners. The Commission also discussed the protection needs of land-based producers, the registration of 'pioneer investors' and the operation of the mining arm of the authority—the 'Enterprise'.

An issue outstanding from the earlier Commission session in Kingston, Jamaica (17 March–11 April) was resolved during this session.¹ Agreement was reached on the problem of overlapping claims by France, Japan and the Soviet Union to seabed mining areas in the north-east Pacific Ocean. The dispute had previously threatened the finalisation of arrangements over the rules of registration for 'pioneer investors', a category which gives states, or a group of states, exclusive rights to explore and exploit an ocean area. Of the four states qualifying for pioneer investor status, three were contesting the north-east Pacific area, the fourth, India, having an uncontested claim to the Indian Ocean. A formula was established whereby the north-east Pacific would be reserved for the exclusive use of France, Japan and the Soviet Union, given that part of the application area would be relinquished at a later date upon their registration as pioneer investors. These areas would then be reserved for possible future application from four consortia representing eight UNCLOS states. The same formula was also approved for India, recognising that country's exclusive rights to an area in the Indian Ocean.

The agreement on the north-east Pacific question paved the way for formalising the rules of registration for pioneer investors. The agreement allowed for two new developments:

- Developing countries were given the opportunity to submit applications of registration as pioneer investors, with the condition that they would be required to comply with UNCLOS requirements, by the time UNCLOS came into force.
- France, India, Japan and the Soviet Union were given a new date for the submission of revised applications for registration as pioneer investors. The applications were to be considered during the first two weeks of the Preparatory Commission's next session.

The North-South Monitor was written and researched for Third World Quarterly by Maya Jaggi and Richard Sexton.

North-South Monitor

Progress was reported in areas governing the institutional arrangements and rules of procedure for the Assembly and the Council of the ISA. The first reading of the rules of procedure for the Legal and Technical Commission (LTC) and the Economic Planning Commission (EPC) were completed. The LTC will function as the organ of the Council which reviews and makes recommendations on applications for mining contracts. The EPC will review trends and factors affecting supply and demand and prices of materials from seabed areas. The EPC will also deal with compensation and economic adjustment measures where developments are likely to affect adversely the economies of developing land-based mineral producers. Progress was also reported on the revised draft rules of the Tribunal which completed its second reading. The question of the Tribunal's seat was reopened, however, when several delegates questioned its proposed siting at Hamburg. It was pointed out that West Germany may not be a party to the Convention when it comes into force.

Representatives of the Commission were unable to agree on the status of the proposed compensation fund. The Group of 77 (G77) argued that a compensation fund was required to satisfy certain provisions of the convention. A group of West European and other countries argued that the Commission's mandate required it first to establish the need for such a fund before proceeding with implementation. It was further argued that seabed mining might make land-based mining more profitable given that seabed mining was dependent on favourable world market prices and that land-based mining had lower production costs. The secretariat was asked to prepare studies on the economic impact of seabed production on the mineral market and the legislative history of the idea of the compensation fund.

The session concluded by noting that progress had also been made on the mining authority—the 'Enterprise'. Chairman, Lennox Ballah (Trinidad and Tobago) observed that the Commission was moving towards agreement on three recommendations—arrangements permitting the Enterprise to function as a commercial entity, training obligations and a Chairman's advisory group to monitor economic conditions and carry out pre-feasibility studies. Work was also reported on the mining code with a preliminary examination of its draft regulations on contracts and payments to contractors.²

▲ UNCTAD Trade and Development Board (TDB)

Thirty-third Session

Geneva, 1–10 September 1986 and 3 October 1986

■ The 129 member-states of the TDB met for their Autumn session to discuss a range of issues, including the provisional agenda, date and location of UNCTAD VII, (a decision on which had been deferred from the special session of the Board held on 16–17 June 1986).³ The plenary of the Board's session was devoted to issues associated with the interdependence of problems of trade, development finance and the international monetary system and the debt and development problems of developing countries. The plenary used as the basis for its discussion UNCTAD's Trade and Development Report 1986, which had been released by the TDB in early August 1986. The work of the Sessional Committees I and II covered an in-depth review of the international trading system and a review of trade relations among countries with different economic and social systems. The main achievement of the session was to move forwards on the draft agenda proposal for UNCTAD VII. The vote on the agenda proposal was deferred to a special meeting on 3 October 1986 where the provisional agenda was finally adopted.

North-South Monitor

In his opening statement to the Board Mr Kenneth K S Dadzie, Secretary-General of UNCTAD, reiterated the main themes of the UNCTAD Trade and Development Report 1987 by branding deflationary forces as the 'single most pervasive threat to world prosperity, as well as the most important impediment standing in the way of efforts to restructure national economies and international economic relationships'. Mr Dadzie also drew attention to the need for movement in the key areas of international trade, commodities and debt, stressing the importance of greater trade liberalisation and multilateral action on commodities through the Common Fund for Commodities. In respect of debt, Mr Dadzie called for measures which included proposals for temporary reductions of interest rates and the linking of interest payments to the price of the debtor's major export commodity. Mr Dadzie noted that while steps such as the IMF's Structural Adjustment Facility (SAF) and the Baker Plan⁴ located debt and growth in a 'longer-term perspective', such measures had not been 'placed squarely in the context of a coherent international strategy for reviving growth in the world economy'.

The plenary meetings of the Board took up many of the points raised by Mr Kenneth Dadzie in his opening statement, with the UNCTAD report forming the main focus for discussion. Karim E Al-Shakar (Bahrain), on behalf of G77, said that his group endorsed the analysis of the report on the negative effects of deflationary forces on economic history. He went on to say that industrialised nations should coordinate more 'in order not only to correct the trade imbalance among themselves but also to cut real interest rates and to stimulate global growth which depends today on realising the potential demand in developing countries'. This view contrasted with that of Alex Oxley (Australia) for the OECD countries, who felt that there could have been 'a better balance between internal and external factors' and that the report should have given more weight to the importance of the national policies of developing countries in determining their development performance. A similar line of argument was followed by John Sankey (United Kingdom) for the EEC who argued that the report concentrated excessively on the macro-economic policies of developed countries, with little attention to the domestic economic policies of developing countries.

Saad Al-Faragi (Egypt), who was elected President of the thirty-third session, presented a summary of the discussion noting that while different groups attached varying degrees of weight to external and domestic factors, and while the acceleration of non-inflationary growth still remained a major policy objective, it was widely felt that there was now considerable scope for expansion. He also noted that future prospects were to a large extent dependent on external markets, terms of trade, the trade policies of developed countries and the level of financial inflow from official and private sources.

The provisional agenda for UNCTAD VII was adopted at a special meeting of the TDB on 3 October 1986. The provisional agenda was agreed on the basis of a ballot proposed by the USA. The Board adopted the provisional agenda, noting the negative US vote on the document. The main agenda items proposed by TDB for UNCTAD VII are:

North-South Monitor

- Revitalising development, growth and international trade, in a more predictable and supportive environment, through multilateral cooperation.
- Assessing relevant economic trends and global structural change, and appropriate formulation of policies and measures, addressing key issues in the following interrelated areas: (a) resources for development, including financial and related monetary questions; (b) commodities; (c) international trade; (d) problems of the least developed countries, bearing in mind the Substantial New Programme of Action for the Least Developed Countries.

The TDB also recommended to the General Assembly that the seventh session of UNCTAD be held in Geneva from 6 to 31 July 1987. The quadrennial UNCTAD Conference represents the largest international forum for consideration of North-South economic issues. The Republic of Zimbabwe was designated a member of the TDB. This brings the membership of the Board to 130.⁵

▲ The UNCTAD Committee on Shipping Twelfth Regular Session
Geneva, 10–21 November 1986

■ Representatives of the 101 member-countries of the UNCTAD Committee on Shipping, the main international body concerned with the harmonisation of national shipping policies on a world-wide basis, were joined by intergovernmental bodies and non-governmental organisations for their twelfth session. The session was dominated by the problem of dealing with excess tonnage and surplus shipbuilding capacity in the industry.

The Committee held discussions on five major areas relating to shipping policy. resolutions were past on four of the five areas covered. The four areas for which resolutions were agreed were as follows:

- The problem of excess tonnage in the world shipping industry. In this connection, consideration was also given to problems of protectionism and the high levels of subsidy extended by many countries to shipping and shipbuilding. In the final plenary meeting, representatives welcomed the decision to make this problem a priority item for the agenda of the thirteenth session. It was agreed that the seriousness of the problem merited the session being brought forward by six months and that international organisations representing shipping and shipbuilding industries, banks and financial institutions should be invited to attend.
- Member-states were invited to ratify or accede to the February 1986 UN Convention on Conditions for the Registration of Ships.⁶ The Convention seeks to establish an international standard for registration of ships. The instrument would help ensure the identification and accountability of ship-owners and operators by strengthening the link between ships and flag states. This would be achieved through the participation of nationals of the flag state in the ownership, manning and management of national flag ships.
- The protection of shippers' interests by improving consultation between liner conferences and shippers' organisations. This resolution aimed to improve the effectiveness of consultations between liner conferences and shippers' organisations through the adoption of 'fair and equitable methods of calculating and applying bunker and currency adjustment factors'. The resolution set out a list of issues on which consultations could be held. The UNCTAD secretariat was asked to prepare, for information, a report based on experiences in freight rate negotiations to assist shippers in their negotiation with conferences.

North-South Monitor

- This resolution was detailed in five parts—multimodal transport and technical developments, ports, international shipping legislation, technical assistance and training, and cooperation among developing countries. The first part invited states to become contracting parties to the UN Convention on the Carriage of Goods by Sea (Hamburg Rules) and to the UN Convention on International Multimodal Transport of Goods. With respect to international shipping legislation, the resolution promotes the early establishment of a Maritime Fraud Prevention Exchange for gathering world-wide information to combat marine fraud. The final part of the resolution called for the Secretary-General of UNCTAD to convene in 1987 an ad hoc intergovernmental meeting on cooperation among developing countries in shipping, ports and a multi-modal transport.

The fifth area for which no resolution could be agreed upon, was intended to bring into focus issues concerning the status of the Convention on a Code of Conduct for Liner Conferences, in preparation for the 1988 Review Conference on this subject.

The central issue tackled by Committee was the problem of surplus fleet tonnage and shipbuilding capacity. It was noted that the industry as a whole currently experienced record levels of surplus tonnage, with 25 per cent overcapacity in fleet carriage and 40 per cent excess in world shipbuilding capacity. It was also noted that the problem was exacerbated by the level of subsidy to shipbuilding industry, which was averaging 25 per cent of contract prices on a world-wide basis. Luis Alberto Amado Castro (Mexico), speaking on behalf of the Group of 77 (G77), said that protectionist policies coupled with large subsidies in developed market economy countries were the main factors responsible for the present glut, effectively negating any potential comparative advantage held by developing countries. Liz Zhimin (China) pointed out that developing countries' share of world shipping still fell short of the 20 per cent targetted for the end of the decade by the programme of the UN Third Development Decade.⁷

The view that developing country shipping contributed only marginally to the glut was indirectly supported by Giuseppe Papuli of the UN Industrial Development Organisation (UNIDO). He pointed out that UNIDO's activity centred around small carriers not exceeding a capacity of eight to ten thousand tons, noting that 'the impact of such activities on the present over-capacity is marginal'. On the question of whether developing countries might be encouraged to develop scrapyards, Papuli noted that they 'have neither the vessels nor facilities' for scrapping. Lalit M S Rajwar (India) requested that the secretariat's supplementary report on the imbalance between supply and demand in the industry, should include a detailed analysis of direct and indirect subsidies and other protectionist measures. In addressing the final plenary, Kenneth K S Dadzie, Secretary-General of UNCTAD, noted that the resolution on imbalance 'was of particular significance in stressing the need for a global solution to the problem'.

North-South Monitor

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND (IMF)/WORLD BANK

▲ Group of Twenty-Four (G24)

Ministerial Meeting

8 April 1987

Group of Ten (G10)

Ministerial Meeting

9 April 1987

IMF Interim Committee

Twenty-eighth Meeting

9-10 April 1987

IMF/World Bank Development Committee

Thirty-first Meeting

10 April 1987

Washington DC

■ Discussion at the mid-year meetings of the IMF and World Bank policy-making committees focused on the need for developed and developing countries to stimulate and sustain growth through structural adjustment and increased economic coordination. It was noted by the committees that such policies would have to be implemented against a background of uneven performance in the world economy, characterised by growing debt, trade imbalance, worsening terms of trade, increasing protectionism and declining capital flows to developing countries. Both the Interim and Development Committees reaffirmed the central role of the Bank and the IMF in promoting growth-oriented programmes and mobilising resources from both official and private sources.

The Committees noted that lower-income countries implementing growth-orientated adjustment strategies required more resources than were available under the International Development Association (IDA) and the newly-established Structural Adjustment Facility (SAF) of the IMF. Although the recent agreement on the $12.4 billion eighth replenishment of the IDA (IDA VIII) was welcomed,⁸ it was generally recognised that funds from this source were insufficient for adjustment strategies in lower-income countries. The Development Committee therefore requested a review of the 'adequacy of resource transfers to developing countries', to be prepared for discussion at its September 1987 meeting. Similar proposals were put forward at the Interim Committee for a review of the SAF. Ministers believed that the review's recommendations would lead to additional support. The Interim Committee also asked the IMF Executive Board to conduct a thorough review of adjustment programmes to ensure that they remained appropriate to the needs of lower-income countries.⁹

A proposal by the British and French representatives of the Paris Club creditors to assist low-income countries, particularly African countries, by extending debt repayment periods from ten to fifteen and twenty-five years was welcomed by the

North-South Monitor

Committees. No clear decision was reached on the issue of rescheduling terms, which was to be referred to the Paris Club's July 1987 meeting. Proposals put forward by G24 to the Interim Committee for concessional interest rates to African countries and a further allocation of Special Drawing Rights (SDR) were resisted. The Secretary to the US Treasury, James Baker, told the Committee that the USA 'was not convinced of the need for a new allocation of SDR'. His views were supported by the UK, Japan and West Germany, although a sizeable majority of members in the Committee were in favour of an additional SDR allocation. The Committee asked the Executive Board to continue to examine the issue.¹⁰

The Interim and Development Committees and the Group of Ten at their ministerial meeting reaffirmed the importance of the 'Louvre Pact' of February 1987 as a major step towards cooperation on exchange rates and trade imbalance.¹¹ The Interim Committee also affirmed the importance of economic indicators for strengthening economic policy and multilateral surveillance. The Committee asked that a progress report on this subject should be submitted to the next meeting in September 1987. An area of considerable concern was the decline in private capital flows to developing countries. It was acknowledged at both the Interim and Development Committees that the performance of commercial bank credit had been disappointing, particularly for countries which had been pursuing appropriate adjustment policies. While positive moves by the private sector concerning, for example, debt equity swaps were noted, it was recognised that there was a need for further policy measures on the part of multilateral institutions to stimulate expanded flows of private investment.¹²

Five other issues were discussed by the Development Committee: agricultural trade; industrial protectionism; commodity markets; environmental protection; and the vulnerability of marginal groups in development. The Committee identified protectionist policy as a major distortion in agricultural trade, depressing commodity prices, producing surpluses in production leading to major budgetary drains. The Committee welcomed the inclusion of agricultural trade in the Uruguayan round of GATT negotiations.¹³ The Committee also felt that liberalisation of industrial protection required serious attention. It requested both the Bank and the Fund to prepare a report on the impact of protectionism on industry. Serious consideration was given to the depressed commodity market situation. The Committee requested that a report should be prepared, detailing measures which might be used to broaden the export bases of countries dependent on commodities, in order to offset fluctuations in export earnings. Recommendations were also made on environmental protection and the position of marginal groups in planning and development.¹⁴

The Group of Twenty-Four (G24) at its ministerial meeting launched one of its strongest attacks yet on current international economic policies arguing that 'existing strategy offers no prospect for a lasting solution to the debt problem'. In its communiqué, the G24 emphasised the fact that for many countries the unfavourable external environment made it impossible to pursue a growth-orientated strategy. They noted that even where countries had embarked on a growth-orientated adjustment strategy, their situation would continue to deteriorate without some form of concessional funding. On debt, the communiqué estimated that in 1986, developing countries had transferred US$118 billion to industrial countries, not including debt interest payments. The earlier draft report of the deputies had argued with reference to existing policy that 'the mere cash flow approach to debt is no longer enough', and that it is necessary 'to assess whether the size and profile of the debt as well as the debt service are compatible with sustained economic recovery'. 'Debt reconstruction should replace mere debt rescheduling.'¹⁵

North-South Monitor

G24 also expressed dismay at the lack of progress in negotiations on general capital increases. It noted that there had been a general fall in the level of funding available from multilateral institutions and a declining flow of capital from the World Bank. While welcoming the recent agreement on IDA VIII, the G24 stressed that it did not represent a real increase in the level of resources available to low-income countries. In view of what G24 saw as a 'rapidly aggravating debt crisis entering a new and a dangerous phase', the communiqué included a statement for immediate action, the ministers called for:

- industrialised countries further to reduce interest rates, stabilise exchange rates, reduce protectionism and improve terms of trade. In particular, they were urged to increase provision of Official Development Assistance (ODA) as a matter of urgency and to recycle their huge current account surpluses, as well as increasing resources to multilateral institutions and reviewing lending policies;
- the creation of a representative Committee of Ministers which would form a joint subcommittee of both the Interim and Development Committees, to examine proposals for the reform and improvement of the IMF;
- the creation of a Council of Ministers to examine the debt problem, including specific solutions for low-income countries, particularly sub-Saharan Africa;
- the cancellation of official debt to low-income countries, the conversion of debt into the grants and the rescheduling of debt on concessional terms.¹⁶

The main development of the mid-year meetings was that closer cooperation was agreed upon by the major industrialised powers within the G10. No major initiatives were taken by the Interim Committee to ease the problems of major debtor countries, the Committee simply affirming that the IMF would continue to play a central role in assisting the enactment of adjustment programmes. The issue of possible agreement on policies for exchange market stability and lower interest rates still remains open. The Development Committee noted little movement on debt reconstruction or the issue of commodity prices. Developments in respect of the latter fell short of achieving international commodity stabilisation, and agreement had yet to be reached on rescheduling terms offered under Club of Rome proposals.¹⁷

COMMODITIES

▲ UN Conference on Natural Rubber, 1985

Fourth Session

Geneva, 9-20 March 1987

■ At their fourth attempt, in negotiations spanning two years,¹⁸ representatives of forty natural rubber producer and consumer countries reached agreement on a successor to the current International Natural Rubber Agreement (INRA). In force since 1980, the current INRA is due to expire on 22 October 1987, and is precluded by its terms from further renewal.

North-South Monitor

The new Agreement was to retain the reference price in effect at the expiry of the present Agreement, and currently fixed at 201.66 Malaysian/Singapore cents per kilogramme. The seven producer countries successfully resisted a proposal by the thirty-three consumer countries to lower the reference price if the buffer stock (currently at 360,000 tonnes) increased to 450,000 tonnes. The prices at which buffer stock operations would be activated remained 15 per cent above or below the reference price in the case of 'may sell/buy' prices and 20 per cent above or below the reference price in the case of 'must sell/buy' prices.

Changes in the mechanism of price adjustment largely entailed concessions on the part of producers towards the consumers' insistence that the prices defended by the new agreement should better reflect market trends. The frequency of price adjustment was increased, with reviews being held at intervals of fifteen months rather than the current eighteen months. The adjustment to be made in the reference price, when the daily market indicator price had been outside the target price range for six months, was to be an automatic one of 5 per cent, unless the International Natural Rubber Council decided on a greater adjustment. In the current agreement, the Council decides on the size of the adjustment. There was also to be an automatic adjustment of 3 per cent, or more if the Council decides, when the buffer stock reaches 300,000 tonnes.

The maximum size of the buffer stock was to remain at 400,000 tonnes, with an additional contingency buffer stock of 150,000 tonnes. Financing of the stock was to be shared equally by producers and consumers, according to their respective market shares within each group, but—in the wake of the tin débâcle¹⁹—provision for borrowing to finance purchases for the buffer stock was eliminated. As before, the buffer stock was to be the sole means of controlling prices under the agreement, to the exclusion of export quotas and production restraints.

The new accord was to be opened for signature on 1 May 1987 and required signature by countries accounting for 75 per cent of world exports and 75 per cent of world imports, in order to enter into force. It was not expected, however, that this would be achieved (with the requisite ratifications by national legislatures) before the expiry of the current Agreement. During an anticipated six-month hiatus between agreements, the buffer stock was to be frozen, and prices left to find their market levels.²⁰

● 'I regard this as an important achievement for international economic cooperation in the commodity sector, as we look ahead to UNCTAD VII in July, especially in renewing confidence in the value of the Integrated Programme for Commodities.' Manaspas Xuto of Thailand, President of the conference, making a sanguine assessment of the outcome of the negotiations. UN Press Release TAD/INF/1866, 16 March 1987.

North-South Monitor

▲ Inter-African Coffee Organisation (IACO)

Emergency Meeting

Abidjan, Ivory Coast, 20–22 May 1987

International Coffee Organisation (ICO)

Executive Board Meeting

Bali, Indonesia, 1–5 June 1987

■ Representatives of producer and consumer countries in the ICO failed to progress at their meeting in Bali towards practicable agreement on the restoration of export quotas, the price support mechanism of the International Coffee Agreement (ICA). The ICO's quota system had been suspended in February 1986 in order to compensate for an expected shortfall in the Brazilian coffee crop, but had not been reinstated at a session of the ICO Council in February–March 1987 owing to a deadlock over the principle of quota allocation.²¹ Oversupply and static demand were currently combining to contribute towards the lowest coffee prices in the ICO's twenty-five year history.

The eight consumer and eight producer countries of the Executive Board agreed on the need to support the market to achieve the ICA's target price range of 120–140 US cents per pound, and to reinstate export quotas to this end. Agreement, however, on the principles of distributing quotas remained elusive.

At the April 1987 meeting of the full seventy-five member Council, Brazil—the world's largest coffee producer—had stated its determination to retain its historic 30 per cent share of the global market, and was opposed both by the consumer countries and by a group of eight 'dissident' producers: Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Peru, Papua New Guinea, Indonesia, Honduras and India. These producers joined the consumers in demanding that quotas be allocated on the basis of 'objective criteria' as opposed to historical title, and Indonesia lobbied the Bali meeting to the effect that the relevant criterion should be that of 'exportable surplus'.

Following a meeting of the Inter-African Coffee Organisation in Abidjan in May 1987, the twenty-five African coffee producers of the IACO had also accepted the principle of 'objective criteria' in preference to the continued absence of quota restraint. It was understood that they were prepared to espouse the principle even at the cost of reductions in some of their own quotas, including that of the Ivory Coast, Africa's largest producer.²²

The ICO Executive Board meeting proved inconclusive once Brazil restated its commitment to the past system of allocation. It seemed likely that the reintroduction of quotas was not the priority for Brazil that it was for other coffee exporters. Anticipating a full crop in the 1987 harvest, Brazil was likely to compensate for lower prices simply by exporting larger volumes of coffee.

A meeting of the ICO Executive Board was scheduled to take place in London on 20–24 July 1987, prior to a full session of the ICO Council on 21–30 September 1987, though there was little optimism that an early reintroduction of quotas would be possible.²³

● It is important to determine 'the right annual quota based on a system of equitable distribution among the member countries'. Rachmat Saleh, Trade Minister of Indonesia, advocating a reformed system of quota allocation. Far Eastern Economic Review (Hong Kong) 18 June 1987.

North-South Monitor

'Nothing has happened in the world market to make Brazil change its position on quota.' Jorio Dauster, Brazil's chief spokesman in the ICO, insisting on adherence to the present quota system. Far Eastern Economic Review (Hong Kong) 18 June 1987.

DISARMAMENT

▲ Soviet Union–United States

Nuclear and Space Talks (NST): Seventh Round

Geneva, 15 January–6 March 1987 (26 March 1987 for Intermediate-range Nuclear Forces (INF))

Ministerial Meeting

Moscow, 13–16 April 1987

■ The seventh round of 'umbrella' NST, involving arms control in the three areas of INF, strategic nuclear weapons and space and defensive weapons, was dominated by moves towards a superpower agreement on INF.

Negotiations had been stalled since the end of the sixth round, when both sides had accused each other of having retreated from the ambitious goals espoused at the Gorbachev–Reagan summit in Reykjavik in October 1986.²⁴ A decision by both sides to upgrade their respective chief negotiators at the beginning of the seventh round seemed designed, however, to give the talks renewed impetus. The Soviet chief negotiator, Viktor Karpov, was replaced by the more senior Yuli Vorontsov, Soviet First Deputy Foreign Minister. Max Kampelman, the US chief negotiator, was meanwhile promoted to the position of Counsellor to the Secretary of State. The negotiators also took the decision to establish working groups in each of the three NST fields, to draft agreements in those areas.

In a statement of 28 February 1987, the Soviet leader, Mikhail Gorbachev, removed what had appeared to be the main obstacle to an agreement on INF, by abandoning his previous insistence at the Reykjavik summit that progress on INF be made conditional upon curbing the US Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI).²⁵ Entertaining the possibility of a 'free-standing' interim agreement on INF seemed to constitute a return to the Soviet position at the Gorbachev–Reagan 'fireside' summit in Geneva in November 1985.²⁶ Gorbachev's proposal was formally tabled in Geneva on 2 March 1987. It was based on the tentative Reykjavik accord, whereby, over a five-year period, both sides would eliminate all INF from Europe (a 'zero option' embracing Soviet SS20 missiles and US Pershing II and Cruise missiles) and reduce their numbers outside Europe, to leave both sides with 100 warheads on missiles in Soviet Asia and in the USA, respectively.

In line with the Soviet concession at Reykjavik, British and French nuclear forces were to be exempt from the restrictions. On short-range INF (SRINF) with ranges of 500–1000 kilometres, the Soviet Union said that on the signing of the INF agreement, it would withdraw its SS12 and SS22 missiles from Czechoslovakia and East Germany where they were deployed after 1983 in response to the deployment of US Cruise and Pershing II missiles. Without repeating its Reykjavik offer of a mutual freeze on the remaining SRINF, the Soviet Union expressed a readiness to begin immediate talks on reducing and ultimately eliminating these weapons. Soviet negotiators also agreed to the principle of on-site inspection as a means of verifying the INF agreement.

North-South Monitor

The USA responded on 4 March 1987 by tabling a draft INF treaty, after which the INF talks, due to end that day with the rest of the round, were extended until 26 March 1987. The main draft was followed by the tabling of a six-point verification plan on 12 March 1987. It included provision for:

- a guarantee of non-intervention in each other's national technical means of verification;
- restriction of the permitted remaining 100 INF missiles to specified areas and facilities;
- exchange of data on missiles and facilities;
- reciprocal up-dating of this data;
- procedures for the destruction, dismantling and conversion of long-range INF systems into short-range ones;
- on-site inspection and monitoring for the duration of the treaty.²⁷

The fifth point of the verification plan underlined differences between the two sides on SRINF, which emerged strongly at a subsequent ministerial meeting between US Secretary of State, George Shultz, and Soviet Foreign Minister, Eduard Shevardnadze, in Moscow. In the light of fears amongst the USA's NATO allies that the removal of INF in Europe would leave the Soviet Union with a virtual monopoly of SRINF, these forces had become a key issue for US negotiators. Shultz reportedly proposed a freeze on SRINF at their current levels, with the USA having the right to 'build up' their forces to the level of Soviet SRINF. Such a build-up would, according to the US plan, include the possibility of converting US intermediate-range Pershing II missiles (with a range of 1800km) to SRINF Pershing II missiles (with a range of 740km), a suggestion strongly opposed by the Soviet Union. Limits on SRINF would, moreover, have to be global rather than confined to Europe, since the missiles in question were mobile. In contrast to the suggestion of Soviet negotiators on 10-11 March 1987 that INF and SRINF talks be kept separate, the US seemed to be moving towards a position of regarding limits on SRINF as an integral component of an INF agreement. The USA also insisted on tactical nuclear missiles of a range of under 500km, forming the subject of negotiations immediately following the signing of any INF agreement.

The Soviet Union responded to these concerns by proposing a 'double zero option'. During Shultz's visit to Moscow, Gorbachev reportedly offered to eliminate all SRINF in Europe within a year, and to liquidate all shorter-range tactical missiles in Europe while advocating a mutual global SRINF limit.

Less progress occurred in the remaining fields of strategic weapons and space and defensive weapons during round VII, which ended on 6 March 1987. Both sides, however, tabled new proposals during the ministerial meeting in Moscow. The USA offered to adhere to the Anti-Ballistic Missile (ABM) Treaty for five years after any possible agreement on strategic weapons had been concluded, rather than the ten years Reagan had proposed at Reykjavik. The likelihood of an agreement taking two years to be reached, however, lengthened the effective period of compliance to seven years. In that period, the USA would adhere to a 'broad' interpretation of the treaty, or one which held that technologies unknown when the pact was first signed in 1972 (such as the space-based lasers integral to SDI) would be exempt from the ABM

North-South Monitor

Treaty's restrictions. The USA also proposed to increase the period for a mutual 50 per cent reduction in strategic arms from five to seven years, having abandoned totally the concept mooted at Reykjavik of eliminating all strategic ballistic missiles in ten years.

In response, Shevardnadze proposed a ten-year non-withdrawal pledge on the ABM Treaty, during the last two to three years of which negotiations would commence on the deployment of space defences. If at the end of the ten years, no agreement had been reached and one side began 'purposeful and practical' development of space defences, neither side would any longer be bound to the strategic arms agreement.

During round VII, the Soviet Union ended its unilateral moratorium on nuclear testing by exploding its first nuclear device for eighteen months, on 26 February 1987. The Soviet moratorium began on 6 August 1985 and had been extended four times, with unsuccessful appeals being made to the USA to join the moratorium as a first step towards the negotiation of a Comprehensive Nuclear Test Ban (CTB) Treaty.²⁸

● 'The Soviet Union suggests that the problem of medium-range missiles in Europe be singled out from the package of issues and that a separate agreement on it be concluded without delay.' The Soviet leader, Mikhail Gorbachev, in a statement on arms control. Financial Times (London) 2 March 1987.

'The Soviets have de-linked the issue of intermediate-range missiles from defence and space issues before. I hope this time it sticks.' Edward L Rowny, arms adviser to President Reagan, expressing scepticism on the Soviet offer. International Herald Tribune (Paris) 4 March 1987.

SRINF 'have to be an integral part of the [INF] treaty and have to be constrained. We think what we need is equality. The Soviets have a certain number. We think we ought to have the right to match them.' Maynard Glitman, head of the US delegation on INF at Geneva, speaking of the US desire to build up to Soviet SRINF levels. Financial Times (London) 5 March 1987.

'It would be a tragedy if the [SRINF] issue were allowed to block an INF agreement . . . The only equal ceiling we can envisage is zero.' Viktor Karpov, head of the Soviet Foreign Ministry's arms control directorate, speaking in London of the Soviet Union's opposition to making SRINF integral to an INF treaty, or allowing the USA to build up to Soviet SRINF levels. The Guardian (London) 13 March 1987.

WARSAW PACT

▲ Warsaw Pact Summit

Political Consultative Committee Meeting

East Berlin, 28-29 May 1987

■ The seven member-countries of the Warsaw Pact (Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, Hungary, Poland, Romania and Soviet Union) met for the annual summit of the Pact's highest body, the Political Consultative Committee. The summit was overshadowed by growing concern over the prospects for a breakthrough in arms negotiations on long-range and shorter-range intermediate-range forces (INF) (the 'double-zero' option: see above) and progress on tactical nuclear missiles in Europe. The summit followed a meeting of NATO Foreign Ministers in Brussels which had urged the alliance to increase defence spending on conventional forces by 3 per cent a year. Leaders of the Warsaw Pact emphasised that battlefield nuclear weapons with a range of under 500 kilometres could not be dealt with separately from conventional forces.

North-South Monitor

The Warsaw Pact summit dealt with five main issues:

- a change from an offensive to a defensive emphasis in Warsaw Pact military doctrine;
- the mutual withdrawal of the most dangerous conventional offensive weapons;
- a reiteration of the Pact's 'Budapest initiative' of 1986 on major troop reductions in Europe²⁹
- an endorsement of proposals to remove tactical missiles and nuclear weapons from Europe;
- support for an agreement with verification safeguards for outlawing chemical weapons;

A special declaration on military doctrine was issued by the Warsaw Pact which promised to re-fashion Warsaw Pact military doctrine as a purely defensive strategy. The final communiqué stressed that the Warsaw Pact would 'never, and under no circumstances, open hostilities' and would 'never be the first to use nuclear weapons'. The communiqué suggested that armies should be redeployed 'only within such a structure and such a style that they would be in a situation to repel an attack'. It also proposed joint NATO-Warsaw Pact consultations on ways of implementing new defensive doctrines.

The offer to give priority to limiting the capability of each side to take offensive action as proposed by a revised military doctrine was coupled with proposals to remove the most dangerous offensive conventional weapons from the zone of direct contact between the two military alliances. Wolfgang Meyer, the East German Foreign Minister had made reference to the proposals before the conference when he promised that the Warsaw Pact would examine 'practical measures' for the 'drastic reduction of forces and weapons of all kinds'. The measures represented an advance on proposals put forward at the June 1986 Budapest Summit which had been limited merely to troop withdrawals. These new proposals suggested, for the first time, recognition of the imbalance in conventional forces in Europe. The proposals were seen as a means of removing disparities in various categories of conventional weapons and as a positive step towards securing the minimum level of security required by both sides for defence.

The summit also reiterated a proposal for major troop withdrawals in Europe, previously put forward at the Budapest Summit. The proposals called for troop reductions of up to half a million by the early-1990s and the creation of a 300 kilometre-wide de-nuclearised corridor through Central Europe. These proposals had previously been rejected by NATO. The Warsaw Pact endorsed proposals to remove tactical nuclear weapons from Europe through multilateral negotiation. These proposals had been raised initially in talks between US Secretary of State, George Shultz, and the Soviet leader, Mikhail Gorbachev in Moscow in April 1987 (see above). The Summit also expressed support for a multilateral convention on chemical weapons. The chief Soviet negotiator on chemical weapons, Yuri

North-South Monitor

Nazarkin, had previously stated that the Soviet Union agreed in principle to 'quick challenge' inspections of suspected chemical weapons storage or production sites. This is believed to represent a significant step forward, although it was not clear whether the proposed system of verification addressed the key issue of non-refusal of inspection.³⁰

THE NORTH

▲ Group of Seven (G7)

Meeting of Finance Ministers

Washington DC, 8 April 1987

■ The Group of Seven industrialised countries, consisting of the finance ministers and central bank governors of Britain, Canada, France, Italy, Japan, the USA and West Germany, met to discuss international economic and financial matters in the run-up to the mid-year meetings of the IMF and World Bank policy-making committees (see above).

The main subject for discussion was the progress achieved in implementing the undertakings embodied in the 'Louvre Pact'³¹. Ministers and Governors reaffirmed their commitment to the cooperative approach on exchange rates, global economic expansion and trade imbalances agreed at their Paris meeting in February 1987. It was agreed that further action was required to resist protectionist measures, stimulate expansion and trade. No new measures or policies were announced, although it was affirmed that existing measures provided the basis for increased cooperation and the strengthening of economic policy.

The G7 communiqué³² welcomed Japan's proposals for 'extraordinary and urgent measures' to stimulate the Japanese economy, which comprised the early implementation of a large supplementary budget and increased public works expenditure. The Japanese government reaffirmed its intention to take further measures to open up its domestic markets to foreign trade. Also discussed was the use of a common system of indicators for coordinating economic policy. The use of indicators in a prescriptive as well as a descriptive role is enthusiastically supported by the USA and France and opposed by West Germany and Britain. Its proponents believe that the adoption of indicators would represent an important step towards formalising a system of international economic cooperation.³³

● The G7 communiqué is 'a weak response to a worsening situation'. Giovanni Goria, Italy's Minister of Finance, assessing the outcome of the meeting. The Economist (London) 18 April 1987.

▲ Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD)

Twenty-Sixth Ministerial Council Meeting

Paris, 12-13 May 1987

■ The finance, foreign and trade ministers from the OECD's twenty-four member-states discussed the international economy and agriculture at their annual meeting.

North-South Monitor

The meeting was overshadowed by an OECD Report which reported a steady decline in economic growth indicating that slow rates of growth, high unemployment and large trade imbalances were likely to persist unless strong action was taken by OECD member-states. The 'Economic Outlook' report was considered to be one of the gloomiest reviews by the OECD of the world economy in recent years.³⁴

Japan and West Germany were the major targets of attack for inaction in carrying out expansionary measures. At the reception for OECD ministers, President François Mitterrand called upon Japan and West Germany to use their massive trade surpluses to stabilise the world economy and aid developing nations. In a series of sharp exchanges of view, a similar line of argument was adopted by US Treasury Secretary, James Baker, who argued that low-inflation countries such as West Germany and Japan, should adopt more expansionary monetary and budget policies. Conflict over this issue resurfaced towards the end of the meeting when Britain attacked Japan for failing to take speedier action to open up its markets. The final communiqué succeeded to some extent in glossing over these differences, partly as a result of the undertakings by West Germany and Japan to bring forward expansionary measures, or adjust policies accordingly.³⁵

In their final communiqué, the twenty-four member-states agreed to strengthen cooperation towards promoting economic growth, reinforcing efforts to reduce trade imbalances and seeking stability in foreign exchange markets. Despite doubts over the continued credibility of the 'Louvre Pact'³⁶ by a number of senior monetary officials, the final communiqué urged effective implementation and support for the policies of the agreement.

Ministers welcomed a report by the Economic Policy Committee on structural adjustment and economic performance, which focused on possible micro-economic causes of slow growth and high unemployment in the 1980s. The report urged a complete reversal of many of the economic policies implemented by governments over the past two decades, and focused on structural adjustment policies required to increase free-market competition within and among countries. The report emphasised the need to:

- eliminate restrictive trade measures. International trade competition was seen to be the 'most powerful means of promoting economic efficiency and growth';
- liberalise financial markets;
- reform taxes to produce incentives for work, saving and investment;
- improve the responsiveness of education and training to technological and structural change.

The report also called for the need to reform and decentralise the public sector, 'ending programs where goals have been met or where underlying premises are no longer valued'. It called for appropriate public sector de-regulation and denationalisation in order to increase competition and efficiency. On employment, it stressed that unemployed people should be given 'incentives to get back to work'. Unemployment benefits should be taxable and linked to tests for availability for work. The report also argued that 'governments have committed themselves to providing old age pensions on a scale which is likely to be incompatible with budgetary constraints and present views on taxable capacity, even were growth rates to increase significantly'.

The other major background report at the meeting was concerned with agricultural reform. Research by OECD staff showed that total agricultural support amounted to more than one-third of the value of agriculture production in the industrialised countries. OECD agricultural policies were believed to cost over $100 billion a year and were responsible for 60 per cent of farm income in Japan and more than 40 per cent in the EEC. The report looked at the consequences of a 10 per cent cut in agricultural support measures over a four to five year period. Jean-Claude Paye of France, the OECD's Secretary-General, warned that 'the world food system is in a deep crisis that seems to be beyond the control of traditional mechanisms, national and international'. The final communiqué pledged 'a progressive reduction of assistance to, and protection of agriculture across all countries and commodities'. Senior US and European officials described the agreement as a 'historic breakthrough', while Mr Clayton Yeutter, the US Trade Representative, described it as 'the most comprehensive and forward-looking' policy he had yet seen from an international forum.

North-South Monitor

The agricultural reform agreement is to be based on the following principles:

- a progressive introduction of market forces into national and international agricultural policy;
- the introduction of measures which will reduce guaranteed prices and other forms of production incentives;
- support for measures which minimise possible economic distortions and which permit a better functioning of the market mechanism;
- farm income support to be de-coupled from price guarantees and factors of production. Farm income support where appropriate, would take the form of direct income support and be targetted at low income farmers, disadvantaged regions and farmers disproportionately affected by structural adjustment.

The reform agreement aims to give political impetus to the talks on agriculture included in the Uruguay Round of the GATT negotiations. Two aspects of the original proposals were not referred to in the final communiqué. No mention was made of a new OECD computerised system for measuring the relative levels of subsidy for each of the OECD countries. The main opposition to this programme came from Japan. The OECD staff were authorised to continue work on the system, although no final decision was made on its use. No agreement was reached on the time-scale for the 10 per cent reduction in subsidy contained in the OECD staff proposal. It was believed that a decision on this matter would follow indirectly from the Uruguay Round of GATT talks.³⁷

● 'With the continuation of present economic policies very little improvement in future economic prospects is in sight.' Kurt Mosbakk, Norwegian Trade Minister, speaking at the meeting. International Herald Tribune (Paris) 15 May 1987. 'Evidence to show that these policies are working should become evident no later than September.' US Treasury Secretary, James Baker, appealing for time to demonstrate the effectiveness of existing agreements among the industrialised countries in achieving balanced growth. International Herald Tribune (Paris) 14 May 1987.

North-South Monitor

▲ Thirteenth Western Economic Summit Venice, 8–10 June, 1987

■ The leaders of the seven major industrialised countries (Britain, Canada, France, Italy, Japan, the USA and West Germany) held their annual summit meeting in Venice.³⁸ The main topics discussed at the meeting were nuclear arms reduction; the situation in the Gulf; economic growth and cooperation; currency stability; trade and protectionism; AIDS (Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome) and terrorism. The summit's final declaration largely reaffirmed existing policies, leaving a number of key problems on the economic front unresolved. Although no significant initiatives emerged, it was deemed sufficient by the ministers that agreement had prevailed on such potentially divisive issues as the Gulf, economic cooperation, trade and protectionism.

An area which had been a significant cause of friction between the USA and Japan was eased slightly during the opening stages of the summit. The USA announced moves to lift partially the US$300 million of special tariffs and duties imposed on Japanese electronics in March 1987. The US move reduced by $51 million, or 17 per cent, the total sanctions package placed on DRAMS (dynamic random access memory chips), the mass-produced chips which had been heavily subsidised by Japan. Before the start of the summit, US Treasury Secretary, James Baker, had signalled the possibility of such a move when commenting on Japan's proposed $26bn package of expansionary measures, which he had referred to as 'a very positive development'. Although Japan privately expressed some disappointment at the limited extent of the US move, this did not deter Japan from announcing a further expansionary package to recycle credit worth a further $20bn to developing countries, over a three year period. It was proposed that the funds would be channelled bilaterally to heavily indebted countries, and on a multilateral basis through international development institutions. This $20bn brings Japan's total flow of funds to developing countries to $30bn, representing an addition to the $10bn announced last year.

Efforts to prevent a slowdown in economic growth were seen as the major task facing the summit. Its final communiqué³⁹ called for a 'further market-led decline of interest rates' and noted that further shifts in exchange rates would damage growth and efforts to control trade surpluses and deficits. The US Treasury Secretary stressed that there would be no specific moves taken at the summit to stabilise exchange rates. Instead, the leaders reaffirmed previous international agreements made in Paris and Washington. Ministers agreed that 'Louvre Pact'⁴⁰ had been successful, noting that exchange rates had been brought 'within ranges broadly consistent with economic fundamentals'. In regard to expansion, there was little evidence to suggest that Japan and West Germany faced further pressure at the meeting on expansionary fiscal measures, despite an earlier statement by the US Treasury Secretary suggesting that it was time for West Germany and other surplus countries to 'pick up the slack'. The final communiqué was ambivalent in this respect; while it was admitted that there were major problems with slowing economic growth and trade imbalances, and leaders were unable to agree that growth-orientated policies would be pursued at present. The final communiqué merely noted that stimulative actions should be postponed, unless 'world economic growth is insufficient'.

Progress was reported on the use of target performance indicators. The early announcement that agreement had been reached was unexpected. Both France and the USA had been pushing on this issue with some opposition from Britain, West Germany and Japan. It was agreed that the countries would provide each other with medium-term projections for their economies, based on 'objective indicators'. The indicators used would probably include growth of output, monetary growth, budget and current account deficits and exchange rates. It was agreed that the IMF would supervise the use of indicators and that finance ministers would meet to coordinate economic policy if performance deviated significantly from projections.

North-South Monitor

On the issues of trade, agriculture and world agricultural reform, the USA pressed for an international agreement to reduce subsidies. A US demand to end agricultural surpluses by the year 2000 failed to meet with the approval of a number of European countries. The final communiqué reiterated support for existing positions within GATT and the OECD. Canada expressed concern that several countries might wish to backtrack on the May 1987 OECD agreement to liberalise agricultural trade and dismantle farm subsidies (see above).

African debt was a major subject of concern, although the USA refused to endorse a British proposal to lend at subsidised rates to sub-Saharan African debtor countries. The British proposal, supported by Japan, called for the rescheduling of debts, the conversion of debts into loans and the introduction of concessional interest rates. A proposal was also brought to the summit by the World Bank, which called for US$20-25 billion in debt relief to Gambia, Madagascar, Mali, Mauritania, Niger, Togo, Zaire and Zambia. The final communiqué took note of the problems of sub-Saharan Africa and proposed that further consideration should be given to the possibility of applying lower interest rates to their existing debts. Agreement was reached on Third World debt in two areas: a proposal by the Managing Director of the IMF to increase the Structural Adjustment Facility (SAF) from $4 to $12 billion was agreed, with Japan indicating its willingness to fund 50 per cent of the increase; in addition, the final communiqué made reference to the financial stability of the World Bank, noting that its ability was increasingly constrained by a shrinking capital base. This was seen as giving further support to World Bank efforts to obtain an increase in funding. A French proposal to fix development aid at 0.7 per cent of GNP was blocked by the USA.

The summit also considered a range of political issues, with the Gulf War dominating the proceedings. A joint communiqué on the Gulf War supported the UN Secretary-General's attempt at mediation, calling for 'new and concerted efforts' to end the Iran-Iraq war. Concern had been expressed that the USA would try to deepen European involvement in the Gulf. US Secretary of State, George Shultz, had earlier stated that the USA was seeking a UN Security Council resolution that would urge a cease-fire, with 'enforceable' measures in the event of non-compliance. These measures were generally seen as aimed against Iran. The carefully worded communiqué calling for 'just and effective' measures was seen to imply equal treatment between the two parties, although George Shultz interpreted the statement to mean that the seven leaders would impose mandatory sanctions if Iran continued to reject calls for a cease-fire. The USA had hoped for support from the summit for a resolution 'with teeth' from the UN Security Council, in which the summit members form a majority.

Terrorism, South Africa, AIDS and East-West relations were the other issues discussed. Notable for its absence in the terrorism statement, in the wake of the US 'Iran-Contra' scandal, was the pledge made at the previous year's Western Economic Summit in Tokyo to 'refuse to export arms to states which sponsor or support terrorism'. In a separate annex, the summit strengthened its 1978 Bonn Declaration on terrorist attacks against civil aviation. The seven undertook to halt flights to and from countries which refused to extradite or prosecute those accused of committing acts of terrorism. Full-scale criticism of South Africa, and a draft declaration of the guiding principles for Western relations with Pretoria, were blocked by Britain. The British view was that it was the wrong time to launch an initiative so soon after the elections in South Africa (in which the white population alone had participated). Progress was made in highlighting the seriousness of the AIDS problem. A statement issued in the name of the summit's acting head, Amintore Fanfari, Prime Minister of Italy, aimed to place AIDS at the top of the international health agenda. The statement urged countries to join the World Health Organisation (WHO) in its support for the AIDS effort. A call by Britain's Minister of Health, Norman Fowler, for a ministerial-level meeting on this subject, focusing on AIDS education, was also supported. The statement by Prime Minister Fanfari and the call by Norman Fowler both implicitly rejected American approaches based on mandatory testing.

North-South Monitor

The summit included an unusual declaration on East-West relations, expressing the hope that recent developments in Soviet internal and external policies 'will prove to be of great significance for the improvement of relations between East and West'. The positive tone of the East-West statement was believed to be the result of pressure from West Germany. The statement also made reference to human rights in the Soviet Union and requested a 'rapid and total' Soviet withdrawal from Afghanistan. A West German appeal for greater economic collaboration between East and West Europe was rejected. On arms control negotiations, President Reagan was unsuccessful in coordinating an appeal to the Soviet leader, Mikhail Gorbachev, to drop objections to the US Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI) in order to move forward on negotiating nuclear force reductions. The final communiqué gave only general backing to US efforts to negotiate 'balanced, substantial and verifiable' intermediate-range arms reductions.⁴¹

NORTH-SOUTH

▲ Papua New Guinea—Solomon Islands—Vanuatu Summit

Rabaul, Papua New Guinea, 21 May 1987

South Pacific Forum (SPF)

Eighteenth Annual Summit

Apia, Western Samoa, 29–30 May 1987

■ At its annual summit, coinciding with the twenty-fifth anniversary celebrations of Western Samoa's independence, the South Pacific Forum increased its membership to fifteen with the admission of two former US territories, the Marshall Islands and the Federated States of Micronesia. Of the thirteen other SPF members, however, only twelve were represented at the summit: Australia, Cook Islands,

North-South Monitor

Kiribati, Nauru, New Zealand, Niue, Papua New Guinea (PNG), Solomon Islands, Tonga, Tuvalu, Vanuatu and Western Samoa.

Notably absent was Fiji, whose Governor-General, Ratu (Chief) Sir Penaia Ganilau, issued a statement to the Forum pleading 'preoccupation with important matters at home'. The matters in question were those arising from the coup d'état of 14 May 1987, led by Lieutenant-Colonel Sitiveni Rabuka, which, in the South Pacific's first military intervention against a democratically elected government, had ousted Fiji's four-week old coalition government of Dr Timoci Bavadra.⁴²

Reactions to the coup among Forum members were mixed. Most vociferous in their opposition were Australia and New Zealand, whose Prime Ministers, Bob Hawke and David Lange, threatened to boycott the summit if Fiji was represented by Sir Kamisese Mara, the Prime Minister of Fiji from independence in 1970 until the April 1987 elections, who was alleged to have supported the coup and was currently adviser on foreign affairs in the new Council of Advisers. Appointed by Fiji's Governor-General on 22 May 1987, this Council was staunchly criticised by a group of three former ministers from Timoci Bavadra's cabinet, who arrived in Apia to lobby SPF members. Criticising Sir Penaia Ganilau for appointing the Council in place of the duly elected government, as well as for granting Rabuka an amnesty for his part in the coup, and promoting him to the rank of full Colonel and head of Fiji's 2,700-strong army, the former ministers advocated non-recognition of the Council, the establishment of a peace-keeping force in Fiji, and the application of economic sanctions against the country.⁴³ An export ban had already been imposed on Fiji by trade unions in Australia and New Zealand, while New Zealand, in common with the USA, had curtailed aid to the country.

A 'spearhead group' of relatively radical Melanesian states (PNG, Solomon Islands and Vanuatu) had coordinated their own positions at a meeting in Rabaul before the summit. Officially deploring the coup, these governments tended to identify with the indigenous group in Fiji (representing 46 per cent of the island's population), whose political supremacy—lost in the April 1987 elections to a coalition government dominated largely by Indians (representing 49 per cent of the population)—the coup by the Fijian army had attempted to reinstate. In a communiqué, the three governments welcomed Sir Penaia Ganilau's steps towards a peaceful resolution to Fiji's problems, expressing concern over statements by Prime Minister David Lange that New Zealand was willing to provide logistical support to enable Fijian soldiers abroad to return to their country, should they be needed to depose the Rabuka regime. Criticising the interventionist stance of Australia and New Zealand, the leaders counselled that Fiji, like all the island states, should be allowed to determine its own future in its own time.⁴⁴

The coup in Fiji threatened to exacerbate existing tensions with the SPF over other issues. Australia in particular had been critical of Libyan overtures towards South Pacific states, particularly Vanuatu. In retaliation for what it considered to be undue interference in its own internal affairs, Vanuatu had banned visits by Australian warships and aircraft, and its Prime Minister, Father Walter Lini, had warned that any attempt to raise the issue of Libyan involvement in the region at the summit in Apia would signal the demise of the SPF.⁴⁵ The Melanesian leaders were also anxious that neither the coup in Fiji nor the question of Libya should be allowed to deflect attention from what they regarded as the most important regional issue;

North-South Monitor

that of New Caledonia's independence, which had been the subject of a special meeting of SPF foreign ministers in Auckland in March 1987.⁴⁶

The coup in Fiji was not an item on the formal agenda of the SPF summit but, largely due to the efforts of Bob Hawke, it dominated both unofficial discussions and the final communiqué. The SPF leaders agreed to offer assistance to Fiji's Governor-General and to send, at his request, a three-member mission to help mediate between parties in order to resolve the country's crisis. Led by Bob Hawke, the mission was to include the Prime Minister of the Solomon Islands, Ezekiel Alebua and Henry Naisali, former Finance Minister of Tuvalu and current Director of the SPF Secretariat, the South Pacific Bureau for Economic Cooperation (SPEC).⁴⁷

The final communiqué was strongly critical of French policies in New Caledonia, rejecting the proposed referendum which was to offer inhabitants a stark choice between total independence or continued French rule. 'In the circumstances,' the communiqué stated, 'such a referendum would be divisive, futile and a recipe for disaster.'⁴⁸ The leaders also agreed to an Australian proposal for a system of 'information exchange', involving the increased sharing of security intelligence among member-countries, apparently aimed at monitoring foreign incursions, including those of Libya, into the region.⁴⁹

The next SPF summit was scheduled to be held in Nuku'alofa, Tonga, in 1988.

● 'The situation in Fiji requires sensitivity and understanding, not reckless threats of military intervention.' The Rabaul communiqué by the leaders of PNG, the Solomon Islands and Vanuatu. Far Eastern Economic Review (Hong Kong) 4 June 1987.

'We draw your attention to the explosive situation building up in Fiji which threatens a breakdown of order and the outbreak of violence . . . These people have manipulated gullible indigenous Fijians along a path to racial confrontation that will certainly bring about a flight of people and capital from Fiji, widespread unemployment, food shortages and unnecessary suffering.' A written appeal to the SPF members by former ministers in the Cabinet of Timoci Bavadra. The Guardian (London) 30 May 1987.

'The Forum doesn't have any formula. What we have is a common desire to assist, if Fiji wants, in finding an acceptable outcome.' Bob Hawke, Prime Minister of Australia, speaking of the Forum's offer to send a mission to Fiji. The Independent (London) 1 June 1987.

'My government has a very profound concern about trying to ensure that what has historically been a Pacific region basically free of the tensions of superpower rivalry or destabilising terrorist-type activities should remain in that position.' Bob Hawke seeking to justify Australia's preoccupation with the question of Libyan involvement in the South Pacific. The Independent (London) 30 May 1987.

SOUTH-SOUTH

▲ Group of 77 (G77)
Sixth Ministerial Meeting
Havana, 20-26 April 1987

North-South Monitor

■ Over 660 delegates from 100 Third World countries attended the Havana ministerial meeting in preparation for the seventh meeting of UNCTAD (UNCTAD VII), to be held in Geneva in July 1987. The ministerial meeting was seen by the UNCTAD Secretary-General, Kenneth K S Dadzie, as a 'unique opportunity to strengthen multilateral cooperation for development and to consolidate the UNCTAD itself'. The Cuban Trade Minister, Ricardo Cabrisas, reiterated this position when he told the meeting that decisions produced by the ministers would serve as the basis for concerted action in North-South economic relations and lead to greater cooperation.

Agreement was expressed on the view that Third World debt could not be serviced and repaid under present conditions and without sustained economic development. G77 called upon UNCTAD VII to consider ways to overcome the situation. It was agreed that a positive trade balance could not be achieved while exports from the Third World faced major restraints and commodity prices were depressed. Ricardo Cabrisas argued that debt and trade 'should be the focus of the debate and the negotiating process in UNCTAD'. On Central America, G77 agreed to a resolution which demanded that the blockade imposed by the USA on Cuba more than twenty-five years ago be lifted. They also called for the revocation of the commercial embargo against Nicaragua, and demanded that the USA abide by the ruling of the International Court of Justice regarding the 'Contras'. They re-emphasised the need for peace in Central America through negotiated political settlement under the auspices of bodies such as the Contadora group.⁵⁰

▲ Non-Aligned Movement (NAM)

Extraordinary Ministerial Conference on South-South Cooperation
Pyongyang, 9-13 June 1987

■ The first meeting of the Ministerial Conference on South-South Cooperation was attended by 105 representatives from member-states of the Non-Aligned Movement and representatives from other states, liberation organisations and international bodies. The committee was formed in accordance with the decision of the eighth Non-Aligned Summit Conference held in Harare in September 1986.⁵¹

The Conference defined the duty and role of the committee and adopted the Pyongyang Declaration and a wide-ranging Plan of Action on South-South Cooperation. The Declaration called for changes in the international monetary system and proposed the holding of an international conference on money and finance. The Declaration also recommended the introduction of a common currency unit for the non-aligned countries. The Conference also set up a standing ministerial committee for economic cooperation. It was decided that the second session of the Committee should be convened during the forty-second session of the UN General Assembly.⁵²

▲ Contadora Group—Lima Support Group

Meetings of Foreign Ministers

Buenos Aires, 13 April 1987

San Carlos de Bariloche, Argentina, 16-17 April 1987

■ The crisis in Central America formed the subject of a meeting of foreign ministers of the Contadora Group (Colombia, Mexico, Panama, Venezuela) and its Lima Support Group (Argentina, Brazil, Peru, Uruguay).

North-South Monitor

In a declaration issued after the meeting,⁵³ the eight ministers expressed concern over what they termed the 'paralysis of the negotiating process' towards the signing of the Contadora Treaty for Peace and Cooperation in Central America. However, they considered auspicious the peace plan proposed by the Costa Rican President, Oscar Arias Sánchez (the 'Arias Plan') and a projected Central American summit, due to be held in Esquipulas, Guatemala, at which the plan was to be discussed.⁵⁴ They also acknowledged President Arias's assurances, conveyed in a letter to the eight governments of the Contadora and Support Groups, that his initiative was intended to supplement rather than supplant the Contadora peace process.

With prophetic disquiet, however, the ministers appealed to 'countries directly or indirectly involved' in the Central American conflict to 'refrain from any action, forceful action or intimidation' that could obstruct the prevailing propitious climate for dialogue between the Central American states, or affect the result of the Esquipulas summit. In the event, the Esquipulas summit, scheduled to take place on 25-26 June 1987, was cancelled unilaterally by El Salvador and Honduras, the chief allies of the USA, following a tour of the region by Philip Habib, President Reagan's Special Envoy in Central America.⁵⁵ It had been foreseen at the time of the announcement of the Arias Plan that many of its provisions would fail to find favour with the USA.⁵⁶

In San Carlos de Bariloche, the eight ministers met for the first time in their capacity as a permanent committee for consultations and political discussions, whose creation had been presaged at a previous meeting in Rio de Janeiro in December 1986.⁵⁷ Continuing the discussions which had begun in Buenos Aires, the ministers covered a broad range of topics far beyond the immediate crisis in Central America. Their ambitious goal, as stated in a final communiqué,⁵⁸ was to 'expand and expedite the Latin American integration and cooperation process through the reactivation of the existing institutional system', not least through revivifying the Latin American Parliament. Discussing a number of technical and legal aspects of Latin American integration, the ministers also requested the immediate convening of a technical-level meeting of the Cartagena Group (consisting of the eight countries minus Panama and with the addition of Bolivia, Chile, Dominican Republic and Ecuador, which are all signatories to the Consensus of Cartagena). They decided to promote the implementation of a Regional Emergency Food Assistance Treaty (TAREA) and to support an initiative of President Virgilio Barco of Colombia for an extensive programme to combat the 'extreme poverty in Latin America and the Caribbean'. The ministers also agreed to hold the first meeting of the technological-scientific commission in Buenos Aires in August 1987, when they would also convene another meeting of foreign ministers in Brazil.⁵⁹

▲ Argentina-Uruguay Summit

Montevideo, 25-26 May 1987

Argentina-Brazil-Uruguay Summit

Montevideo, 27 May 1987

■ President Raul Alfonsín of Argentina and Julio Maria Sanguinetti of Uruguay signed the Montevideo Act on 25 May 1987 ratifying previous political decisions to further bilateral integration. In a joint declaration at the end of their talks, they expressed satisfaction with the strengthening of cooperation between their two countries since the signing of the 1985 Colonia de Mayo Act, and described the Latin American integration process, which includes Brazil and all the other countries of the Latin American Integration Association (ALADI), as a basic condition for economic and social development in the region. They referred to the need to intensify the integration process through a number of specific projects.⁶⁰

North-South Monitor

Following the arrival in Montevideo of President José Sarney of Brazil, the three leaders expressed concern at recent rises in interest rates which to them represented a serious setback to their efforts to address their foreign debt problems. In a letter to the seven major industrialised countries due to meet at the forthcoming Western Economic Summit in Venice (see above), the leaders appealed for lower interest rates as well as curbs on growing protectionism within the industrialised countries. President Alfonsín called for the introduction of fixed rates of interest on debts; a hope, he said, that had been fuelled by the recent decision of Citibank, a major commercial creditor, to set aside US$3 billion for potential loan losses. Uruguay's Foreign Minister, Enrique Iglesias, spoke of a growing consensus among debtor countries that the interest on old debt should be fixed at 2 or 3 per cent over a long term. President Sarney said that his country's recent debt moratorium had been aimed at inducing banks to adopt a more flexible position on international debt—Brazil being the largest debtor, after Mexico, among developing countries. Speaking of Brazil's intention to resume negotiations with foreign banks within the next month, President Sarney said that Brazil would now expect to receive 'just treatment' in negotiations, which he went on to describe as permitting repayment of the foreign debt without suffering and without the collapse of Brazil's economy.⁶¹

● Brazil's decision to suspend interest payments had caused bankers and international organisations to be 'more flexible and comprehensive in reaching accord with diverse countries around the world'. President José Sarney of Brazil giving an optimistic assessment of Brazil's debt moratorium. International Herald Tribune (Paris) 30 May–1 June 1987.

-
- ▲ Association of South-East Asian Nations (ASEAN) Twentieth Annual Ministerial Meeting
Singapore, 15–16 June 1987
ASEAN—Australia, Canada, EEC, Japan, New Zealand, USA
Joint Ministerial Meeting
Singapore, 18–20 June 1987

■ Settlement of the Kampuchean question and the related problem of Indochinese refugees were key issues considered by the foreign ministers of ASEAN (Brunei, Indonesia, Malaysia, Philippines, Singapore and Thailand) and pursued in subsequent discussions with their six Western 'dialogue partners'.

The ASEAN meeting was opened by Lee Kuan Yew, Prime Minister of Singapore, on a note of cautious optimism. Voicing tentative hopes in common with other ASEAN states such as Indonesia, he suggested that recent changes within the Vietnamese government and its chief ally, the Soviet Union, had increased the chances of achieving a negotiated settlement in Kampuchea, which Vietnamese forces had occupied since 1978. Lee Kuan Yew reasoned that the new priority accorded to economic reform within Vietnam and the Soviet Union would lead to a realisation of the costs of the continued occupation, in terms of Vietnam's isolation and the consequent burden placed on its economy.

North-South Monitor

ASEAN ministers were nonetheless perturbed by the recent announcement in May 1987 by Prince Norodom Sihanouk that he was taking a year's leave of absence from his post as head of the UN-recognised exile Coalition Government of Democratic Kampuchea (CGDK). This resistance coalition, composed of the Sihanoukist National Army (SNA), the Khmer People's National Liberation Front (KPNLF) and the Khmer Rouge, had been created under ASEAN auspices and remained a key element in ASEAN's strategy towards solving the Kampuchean question. ASEAN ministers feared that the coalition's credibility would be undermined by Sihanouk's absence, which he attributed to continued Khmer Rouge attacks against his followers and human rights abuses in the refugee camps under Khmer Rouge control on the Thai-Kampuchean border.⁶²

Yet both Thailand and Singapore opposed the suggestion (made by a New York-based human rights group, the Cambodia Documentation Commission) to subject the Khmer Rouge leadership under Pol Pot to a trial at the International Court of Justice at the Hague, under the UN Prevention of Genocide Convention.⁶³ The removal of the 'genocidal Pol Pot clique' (whether defined as the highest leadership or a wider section of the Khmer Rouge) has long been a condition imposed by Vietnam for the withdrawal of its troops from Kampuchea and the attainment of a political solution.⁶⁴ Thailand and Singapore feared that attacking the Khmer Rouge would merely play into the hands of Vietnam by removing the main military opposition to its occupation within the CGDK.

In their joint ministerial communiqué, ASEAN and its six dialogue partners agreed to continue calling for the withdrawal of Vietnamese troops from Kampuchea, and to respond to any Vietnamese moves towards this end. Meanwhile, they determined to sustain their efforts to isolate Vietnam economically and diplomatically. The US Secretary of State, George Shultz, voiced a general disappointment with Vietnam's announcement during the meeting of the appointment of the relatively conservative Pham Hung as Prime Minister and Vo Chi Cong as President. The moves, in Shultz's words, 'snuffed out hopes for a more flexible leadership' which could prove more accommodating on the question of Kampuchea. There was general criticism of Khmer Rouge activities at the meeting, in an apparent vindication of Prince Sihanouk's accusations.

In their own communiqué, the ASEAN ministers criticised Vietnam's failure to stem the flow of refugees from Vietnam, Laos and Kampuchea, emphasising the need to tackle the refugee problem at its source in Indochina. At the same time, they expressed concern over the growing 'compassion fatigue' of Western resettlement countries, warning that reduced resettlement opportunities would merely increase the numbers of refugees in camps within ASEAN countries, and appealed to the West not to reduce their intake of refugees or impose difficult conditions on their entry.

In subsequent discussions, George Shultz acknowledged the ministers' concerns and said that the USA would continue to support refugee programmes and to resettle refugees 'in substantial numbers', subject to Congressional limitations. He appealed to countries of first asylum, such as Malaysia, Thailand and Hong Kong, to maintain their commitment to the humanitarian treatment of all those seeking asylum pending resettlement in the West, despite the problems posed by the continuing influx of refugees. By contrast, Australia's Foreign Minister, Bill Hayden, stressed the need for assurances that all those accepted for asylum and resettlement were 'genuine refugees', conforming to the UN definition of their having a 'well-founded fear of persecution', rather than economic emigrés. While ASEAN's dialogue partners gave assurances that they were seeking durable solutions to the problem of Indochinese refugees, none promised to increase the numbers accepted for resettlement.

North-South Monitor

ASEAN ministers once more expressed alarm at growing trade protectionism within the USA and Europe, and welcomed Japan's promises to increase its aid to their countries. They also agreed to continue consideration of the possibility of establishing a South-East Asian Nuclear Weapon-Free Zone (NWFZ), as discussed at the previous year's meeting.⁶⁵ In his enthusiasm for the project, Indonesia's Foreign Minister, Mochtar Kusumaatmadja, was supported by New Zealand's Deputy Foreign Minister, Frank O'Flynn, but opposed by the US Secretary of State. George Shultz argued that peace relied upon nuclear deterrence and that other ASEAN countries had voiced their opposition to the concept. The reference was understood to be to Singapore and Thailand most notably.⁶⁶

ASEAN is to hold the third summit in its twenty-year history in Manila on 14–16 December 1987—the first ASEAN summit in ten years.

● 'Hanoi knows her isolation is the direct result of her present policies, and this isolation has inflicted too heavy a burden on her economy . . . ASEAN is willing to help work out an honourable formula which represents the Cambodian people's rights as well as the security interests of Vietnam.' Lee Kuan Yew, Prime Minister of Singapore, at the opening of the ASEAN meeting. The Independent (London) 16 June 1987.

'It is high time the nuclear question should not be left to the superpowers to decide. The global balance and nuclear deterrent is one view, but concern should also be given to potential victims such as Indonesia of accidental spillage.' Mochtar Kusumaatmadja, Foreign Minister of Indonesia, arguing in favour of a South-East Asian NWFZ, which would also address the problems of nuclear waste. BBC Summary of World Broadcasts FE/8600/A3/5, 22 June 1987.

A NWFZ for South-East Asia, like that supported by New Zealand in the case of the South Pacific,⁶⁷ is 'an important assertion of the needs and rights of small nations which have nothing to gain from superpower rivalry'. Frank O'Flynn, Deputy Foreign Minister of New Zealand. Far Eastern Economic Review (Hong Kong) 2 July 1987.

▲ South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC)
Ministerial Council Meeting
New Delhi, 18–19 June 1987

■ A regular meeting of foreign ministers from SAARC's seven member-countries (Bangladesh, Bhutan, India, Maldives, Nepal, Pakistan and Sri Lanka) took place in an atmosphere of regional tension arising from the continuing dispute over India's aid to Tamil separatists in Sri Lanka. The dispute had been exacerbated following a

North-South Monitor

Sri Lankan military offensive of 26 May 1987 against Tamil strongholds in the northern Jaffna peninsula of the island. India had responded first by sending a flotilla of fishing boats carrying relief supplies to the Tamils, which had been turned back by the Sri Lankan navy, and subsequently with a successful air-drop of supplies into Jaffna, on 4 June 1987. Colombo lodged a complaint against India at the UN, for what it considered to be an illegal incursion into Sri Lankan airspace, and received the support of SAARC members, Pakistan (which already actively assists the Sri Lankan army against the Tamil guerrillas), Bangladesh and Nepal.⁶⁸

The SAARC meeting was initially jeopardised by Sri Lanka's threat to boycott the session in New Delhi, and India's response that it would in that case feel constrained to postpone it. Following diplomatic consultations in which Pakistan, Bangladesh, Nepal and the Maldives appealed to Sri Lanka to reconsider, the Sri Lankan Foreign Minister, A C S Hameed, consented to attend the meeting. By this time, Sri Lanka had announced the suspension of its Jaffna offensive on 10 June 1987, to be resumed if the main guerrilla group, the 'Tamil Tigers', declined to negotiate, and talks between Hameed and the Indian High Commissioner in Colombo, J N Dixit, had produced an agreement on the acceptance of relief ships at the northern Sri Lankan port of Kankasanturai.

The Tamil issue was not directly raised at the SAARC meeting, India's Foreign Minister, N D Tivari, having pointedly reminded the assembled ministers that 'bilateral and contentious issues' were explicitly excluded from SAARC's purview by the terms of the SAARC Charter.⁶⁹ Equally pointedly, however, the Sri Lankan Foreign Minister called for the adoption of a binding regional convention on the conduct of inter-state relations among SAARC member-countries, and India was in effect isolated by the other six states, whose ministers all reiterated the principles of the UN Charter affirming respect for national independence, sovereignty and territorial integrity. The unity of India's neighbours reflected their traditional fear of India's hegemony as a regional power, a fear which had been at least partly responsible for delaying the formation of the two-year old regional grouping.

Considering the report of a SAARC expert group on terrorism which identified a list of terrorist offences not to be considered 'political' for extradition purposes, the ministers agreed to enact or amend national legislation on extradition (though each country retained a degree of discretion in responding to other countries' demands for extradition). It was decided to convene a group of legal experts to draft a regional convention on terrorism, a subject which had previously eluded agreement among SAARC countries.⁷⁰ The ministers also agreed to establish a 200,000 ton reserve of food grain as security against regional emergencies, and endorsed five further areas of SAARC cooperation:

- the joint production of radio and television programmes through a SAARC audio visual exchange (SAVE), to begin in November 1987;
- organised tourism;
- joint chairs, fellowships and scholarships in the region's universities, beginning in the academic year 1988;
- a regional documentation centre;
- a youth volunteers programme.⁷¹

The third annual summit was to be held in Kathmandu on 2-4 November 1987.

- A regional convention on inter-state relations should 'bind the seven nations by a solemn declaration to respect one another's independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity by refraining from any acts of aggression, interference, violation or oppression'. A C S Hameed, Foreign Minister of Sri Lanka, advocating the signing of such a convention in the wake of India's air drop on Jaffna. Far Eastern Economic Review (Hong Kong) 2 July 1987.

North-South Monitor

'... we will end up in a stalemate and miss the immense opportunity that regional cooperation offers.' N D Tiwari, Foreign Minister of India, warning against the introduction of bilateral issues into SAARC's discussions. Far Eastern Economic Review (Hong Kong) 2 July 1987.

▲ Arab League

Eighty-seventh Ministerial Council Meeting

Tunis, 4-6 April 1987

Issues

■ Attempts to restore unity within the Arab world dominated the proceedings of the Arab League Council in an attempt to prepare the ground for a future Arab summit. It was recognised that the Gulf conflict and Syria's support for Iran against Iraq was a major obstacle to Arab solidarity. A unanimous decision by Arab League foreign ministers led to the formation of a committee to make visits to the five UN Security Council member-states (Britain, China, France, Soviet Union, USA) to urge an end to the Iran-Iraq war. The initiative seeks a Security Council resolution which includes sanctions against Iran if it refuses to adhere to a call for a cease-fire. The Arab League also mandated the Saudi and Algerian Foreign Ministers to visit Damascus to urge Syria to lend its support in efforts to end the conflict.

The League also adopted resolutions on the Palestinian issue. The Council is understood to have adopted a resolution which supports the holding of an international conference on the Middle East under UN supervision. The resolution includes mention of the participation of all parties, including the PLO, on an equal footing with other member-states. The Council also expressed its solidarity with Syria following the EEC boycott and Britain's accusations of 'state terrorism'. The Syrian Foreign Minister, Faruq al-Shar, at a press conference later, said that Arab countries would not resume the Arab-European dialogue until normal relations were restored.⁷²

▲ Gulf Cooperation Council (gcc)

Twelfth Meeting of Oil Ministers

Jeddah, 19 May 1987

■ Oil ministers of the six member-countries of the Gulf Cooperation Council (Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia and United Arab Emirates (UAE)) met to prepare for the OPEC conference in Vienna on 25 June 1987 (see below). Four of the gcc countries, Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, the UAE and Qatar are also members of OPEC.

The purpose of the meeting was to pave the way for agreement at the Vienna conference on the continuation of the OPEC agreement on quota levels for the remainder of the year. The original agreement was set at OPEC's December 1986 conference in Geneva. Before the meeting, UAE and Qatar had expressed concern about existing quota and price levels. The UAE Oil Minister, Dr Mana Saeed al-Otaiba, had insisted that the June 1987 OPEC conference should agree on higher output quotas for the UAE. Qatar complained that it still experiences severe marketing difficulties.

North-South Monitor

After the meeting, ministers issued a communiqué stressing their agreement on the necessity of adhering to the OPEC agreement 'to the production levels agreed on for each member, and to the production ceiling set in the agreement for each quarter until the end of 1987'. Dr Mana Saeed al-Otaiba indicated that he would defer his demand for a substantially higher quota until the end of the year.⁷³

▲ Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC)

Ministerial Council: Twenty-third Session
Jeddah, 6-8 June 1987

■ The six-member Ministerial Council of the GCC was dominated by concern over navigation in international Gulf waters. A carefully worded final statement provided political support for the USA's escort role for shipping in the Gulf. The GCC foreign ministers emphasised the US role in the context of the existing GCC position, namely that the safety of navigation in the international waters of the Gulf is the responsibility of the international community as a whole. Kuwait's Foreign Minister and Deputy Prime Minister, Shaykh Sabah al Ahmad, said in reference to recent press reports of US involvement, that his country had never given consideration to establishing US bases in Kuwait.

The Council issued a statement expressing solidarity with Kuwait. The statement discussed the 'escalation of threats against the State of Kuwait', denouncing 'terrorist' and 'subversive actions'. The reference was to the arrest of six Shi'ite saboteurs, and to threats made against Kuwaiti commercial and economic interests.

The Council also reviewed recent developments in the Middle East, expressing its condolences with the family of the late Prime Minister of Lebanon, Rashid Karami. The Council also reaffirmed previous resolutions on the territorial integrity of Lebanon. On the question of Arab unity, it noted the recent steps which had been taken towards increased Arab unity within the region and expressed satisfaction with the outcome of the Palestinian National Council meeting in Algiers in April 1987.

It also considered developments relating to military cooperation among its members, observing that there had been increased integration and coordination on the military front. The Council agreed to submit a draft of its newly proposed security strategy to the next session of the Supreme Council to be held in Riyadh. It also agreed to hold a joint ministerial meeting with EEC foreign ministers in Brussels on 23 June 1987. The purpose of the meeting would be to discuss a reduction of the duties on petrochemicals. There has been growing concern among GCC members about EEC tariff measures and it is believed that the GCC may make agreement on other issues conditional upon movement by the EEC in the area of petrochemical tariffs.⁷⁴

North-South Monitor

▲ Organisation of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries (OAPEC)
Ministerial Council: Thirty-eighth Meeting
Damascus, 10 June 1987

■ OAPEC oil ministers approved major budget cuts and a strategy to enable the Organisation to carry out a narrower range of functions, focusing primarily on research and training. The budget cuts and the review of objectives, administrative structures and programmes of the Organisation results from the greatly reduced oil revenues experienced by all OAPEC countries over the past year. The proposed budget for the Secretariat of $5.1 million is about half of its 1983 peak level. The organisation's budget deficit is estimated to be $14.4 million. In view of the severity of the measures to be taken, it was agreed that the Organisation would establish a Committee headed by Shaikh 'Ali Khalifah al-Sabah, Oil Minister of Kuwait, to implement a five year working programme starting in 1988.⁷⁵

Agreement was reached on the payment of overdue instalments by Qatar, Algeria, Tunisia, Iraq and Syria. Qatar met its 1986 payments and Algeria indicated that it expected to do the same. Tunisia, which withdrew from active OAPEC membership in 1986, paid the first of ten annual repayments of backdues. Tunisia did not send a delegation this year. Iraq and Syria have both agreed to meet their 1987 contributions on the basis that shortfalls in backpayments will be written off and paid by other member-states.⁷⁶

OAPEC announced that the next Council of Ministers' meeting will be held in Kuwait on 28 November 1987.

▲ Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC)
Eighty-first Ministerial Conference
Vienna, 25-27 June 1987

■ Oil ministers from OPEC's thirteen member-countries reached rapid agreement on an overall OPEC production ceiling for the remainder of 1987. The ceiling was intended to maintain prices at or above the official OPEC reference price of US$18 per barrel, which had become operative on 1 February 1987, following the previous ministerial conference in Geneva in December 1986. There, the decision had been taken to return to a fixed pricing system for OPEC oil, after a year of pursuing a strategy designed to achieve a 'fair market share' for OPEC members.⁷⁷

Prices had indeed been maintained above the $18 per barrel level since February 1987, and as the conference opened, Rilwanu Lukman, the Oil Minister of Nigeria and President of OPEC, criticised those non-OPEC oil-producing countries that had taken advantage of OPEC's efforts to support prices, in order to expand production, while contributing nothing themselves to stabilising the oil market. OPEC ministers nonetheless agreed to maintain their overall production ceiling at 16.6m barrels per day (b/d) for the remainder of the year (from the current ceiling of 15.8m b/d), rather than planning the increase to 18.3m b/d in the fourth quarter of 1987, that had been anticipated at the December 1986 meeting.

The decision on output represented a compromise between on the one hand Algeria, Iran and Libya, which advocated that output remain unchanged in the second half of the year, in order to push prices higher than $18 per barrel, and on the other hand, Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, which wished to follow the December 1986 plan. They considered that maintaining a price of $18 per barrel would discourage non-OPEC producers from further increasing their production, and thus safeguard OPEC's share of the market. A solution to the disagreement followed Saudi Arabia's compromise on increasing output, though Kuwait remained opposed to the accommodation.

North-South Monitor

The final output decision reflected the recognition that Iraq (which had dissented from the December 1986 decision and similarly refused to sign the Vienna agreement) was already producing above its official quota, and was likely to increase output by 500,000 b/d in September 1987, on completion of a new pipeline through Turkey. Other OPEC members, including the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait and Qatar, were also known to be exceeding their official quotas.

At Kuwait's instigation, a five-member committee, consisting of the oil ministers of Algeria, Indonesia, Iran, Nigeria and Venezuela, was established to monitor oil prices. It was empowered to convene an extraordinary ministerial conference before the next regular OPEC session in December 1987, if altered production levels were deemed necessary for maintaining market stability. A further group was created to monitor the depreciation of the dollar, as a prelude to suggesting measures for maintaining oil prices in real terms.⁷⁸

● 'The events of the past six months have once again underlined the fact that OPEC's intervention is necessary to defend price and restore stability to the oil market. This fact does not justify non-OPEC producers leaving the responsibility for market stability to OPEC alone, especially when the benefits of our organisation's policies are enjoyed by all oil-producing countries. I find it difficult to understand why some of the other oil producing countries should benefit at the expense of OPEC countries whose economies are totally dependent on oil. It is indefensible when a developed country with the advantages of a diversified economy, exploits our members. They should also appreciate that OPEC cannot continue to bear the heavy burden of price stability alone and that the only long-lasting remedy would be a concerted effort by all to cooperate.' Rilwanu Lukman, Oil Minister of Nigeria and President of OPEC. The Times (London) 26 June 1987.

▲ Communauté Economique de l'Afrique de l'Ouest (CEAO)

Twelfth Summit

Nouakchott, Mauritania, 20-21 April 1987

■ The twelfth summit of the francophone West African Economic Community was attended by Heads of State or Government from CEAO's seven member-countries (Benin, Burkina Faso, Ivory Coast, Mali, Mauritania, Niger and Senegal) together with observers from Togo and Guinea.

In his opening speech, Mauritania's President, Colonel Maaouya Ould Sid'Ahmed Taya, cited the CEAO as an expression of its member-countries' desire to break the cycle of under-development perpetuated by chronic drought, the world economic crisis, deteriorating terms of trade and an onerous debt burden. President Ould Taya went on to prescribe increased administrative austerity within CEAO as a means of strengthening its solidarity. The organisation had been shaken by a financial scandal involving the embezzlement of funds from its autonomous solidarity and intervention fund, FOSIDEC, by officials who were subsequently tried and imprisoned. Attempts at investigation of the financial mismanagement had met with some obstruction on the part of member-governments, which had led to the postponement of the twelfth CEAO summit, originally due to take place in October 1986.⁷⁹ The leaders agreed to cut CEAO's annual budget by 10 per cent, and to foster a stronger monitoring role for the organisation's secretariat.

North-South Monitor

Trade within the community became an issue of prime contention at the summit, with evidence of widening differences in the commercial strength of member-countries and their consequent ability to take advantage of CEAO's concessionary trade provisions, particularly as regards manufacturing goods. The President of Burkina Faso, Captain Thomas Sankara, accused Ivory Coast and Senegal of benefiting from easy access to the regional market while failing to assist the community's poorer states through reciprocal trade, choosing instead to import goods from outside the region, despite their ready availability within it.

President Mathieu Kerekou of Benin became CEAO's new Chairman, while President Ould Taya remained Chairman of the Non-Aggression and Defence Aid Agreement (ANAD), which groups the seven CEAO countries and Togo, and whose eighth summit coincided with the CEAO meeting in Nouakchott.⁸⁰

● 'The CEAO is a concrete expression of our desire to break the cycle of underdevelopment which afflicts our community of 40 million citizens.' Colonel Maouya Ould Sid'Ahmed Taya, President of Mauritania, in his opening speech. West Africa (London) 4 May 1987.

▲ Angola-Mozambique-Zaire-Zambia Summits

Luanda, Angola, 16 April 1987

Lusaka, Zambia, 30 April 1987

■ The presidents of three southern African Frontline States (FLS) and Zaire agreed on a scheme to rehabilitate the Benguela railway, which services the transport needs of Angola, Zambia and Zaire.

The rehabilitation scheme was officially launched at a summit in Lusaka, in accordance with a decision taken by the leaders in Luanda. The scheme was to cost a total of US$280m over a period of two years, and in a communiqué issued after the meeting in Lusaka,⁸¹ the leaders appealed to potential donor countries throughout the world to assist their efforts to minimise their dependence and that of the other FLS on transport routes through South Africa.

The Benguela railway track had been the target of repeated sabotage operations by the South African-backed rebel UNITA forces in Angola, led by Jonas Savimbi. Savimbi had maintained that UNITA was in control of the track, and would not permit its reopening unless the Angolan government of President José Eduardo dos Santos agreed to negotiate. Possibly under pressure from UNITA's allies, the USA and Zaire, however, UNITA had recently announced that it was prepared to allow the railway to operate, provided that it did not carry government soldiers or weapons. A further condition that UNITA members should be permitted to check the contents of each railway carriage was reported to have been rejected by President dos Santos.

North-South Monitor

According to the Lusaka communiqué, the four leaders also reviewed political developments in Southern Africa, calling on Pretoria to dismantle apartheid, end the state of emergency in South Africa, lift press censorship, allow the African National Congress (ANC) and other political organisations to operate, release Nelson Mandela and other political prisoners and initiate dialogue with what the communiqué referred to as 'the true representatives of the oppressed people of South Africa', towards the establishment of fair, democratic and representative government.⁸²

● Angola is prepared to take the necessary measures, within the context of its sovereignty, to make that railway function, so that there can be stability and peace in this region and we can serve our own interests and the interests of the neighbouring countries and the peoples of this region.' President José Eduardo dos Santos of Angola, speaking of the Benguela railway line at the close of the Luanda summit. BBC Summary of World Broadcasts ME/8546/B/1-2, 20 April 1987

▲ Lusophone African Countries

Seventh Summit

Maputo, Mozambique, 21-22 May 1987

■ The presidents of the five Lusophone African countries (Angola, Cape Verde, Guinea-Bissau, Mozambique and São Tomé and Príncipe) reviewed developments regarding Southern Africa since their last summit in April 1986, at which the Luanda Declaration on the situation in Southern Africa had been issued.⁸³

In their Maputo Declaration at the close of the summit,⁸⁴ the five leaders expressed satisfaction at the developing world consensus that the sole cause of the violence, terrorism and instability within Southern Africa was identifiable as the apartheid regime. They pointed to the increasing number of states contributing to the isolation of Pretoria, though President José Eduardo dos Santos of Angola had observed that the current level of international economic sanctions and diplomatic moves towards isolating the apartheid regime was still insufficient to provoke the requisite peaceful political change.⁸⁵

The leaders reiterated the need for all countries, particularly those in Africa, to deny aid or sanctuary to South African-backed rebel forces whose aim was to destabilise the governments of the FLS. They expressed concern at the fact that certain unspecified countries continued to assist rebels in Southern Africa, in flagrant violation of the principles of international law governing relations between states. Both Malawi and Zaire had been criticised in the past by the FLS for the assistance they afforded to the Mozambique National Resistance (MNR) and the rebel Angolan movement, UNITA.⁸⁶ President dos Santos repeated his country's refusal to negotiate with 'the UNITA puppets', while expressing a willingness to enter into a direct dialogue with the USA.

The leaders also repeated in their communiqué an appeal made in the Luanda Declaration for the USA to cease assistance to UNITA and to give unconditional support to Namibia's claim to independence. The Maputo Declaration reaffirmed that Namibia's independence could not with impunity be linked to 'extraneous issues', in a reference to demands by Pretoria and Washington that South Africa's withdrawal from Namibia be made conditional upon the withdrawal of Cuban troops from Angola.

North-South Monitor

Mourning the absence of the late President Samora Machel of Mozambique, the leaders suggested that South Africa was implicated in his death in an air crash on 19 October 1986. His death, they said, occurred in the context of a renewed escalation of aggression against the FLS, particularly Angola and Mozambique, and at a time when the FLS were taking diplomatic steps to wean other countries away from Pretoria's influence. At the time of President Machel's death, President Hastings Kamuzo Banda of Malawi was being successfully urged to cease his support for the MNR.⁸⁷

NOTES

In these notes the following abbreviations are used for newspapers and periodicals: Econ = The Economist (London); FT = Financial Times (London); FEER = Far Eastern Economic Review (Hong Kong); Gma = Granma (Havana); G = The Guardian (London); I = The Independent (London); IDP = International Development Policies (London); IHT = International Herald Tribune (Paris); MEED = Middle East Economic Digest (London); MEER = Middle East Economic Review (Washington DC); MEES = Middle East Economic Survey (Nicosia); Obs = The Observer (London); S = South (London); SN = Soviet News (London); SW = Soviet Weekly (London); ST = Sunday Times (London); SWB = Summary of World Broadcasts (London); T = The Times (London); TWQ = Third World Quarterly (London); UNPR = UN Press Release; USIS = US Information Service; WA = West Africa (London); XNA = Xinhua News Agency.

¹ See TWQ 8(4) October 1986, pp 1369–70.

² UNPR SEA/727 12 August 1986; UNPR SEA/728 13 August; SEA/761 27 August 1986; SEA/777 8 September 1986.

³ For further details, see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, p 1368.

⁴ On the Baker Plan for Third World debt, see TWQ 8(2) April 1986, pp 690–91.

⁵ UNCTAD Bulletin (Geneva) September/October 1986; UNPR TAD/INF/1435, 10 September 1986.

⁶ On the UN Convention on Conditions for the Registration of Ships, see TWQ 8(3) July 1986, pp 1032–3.

⁷ UNPR TAD/INF/1837, 11 November 1986; UNCTAD Bulletin (Geneva) December 1986.

⁸ On IDA VIII, see TWQ 9(3) July 1987, pp 1052–3.

⁹ IDP January–March 1987.

¹⁰ FT 6, 7, 11 April 1987; African Wireless File 13 April 1987.

¹¹ On the 'Louvre Pact' reached at a meeting of the Group of Seven (G7), see TWQ 9(3) July 1987, pp 1059–61.

¹² IDP January–March 1987.

¹³ On the agenda of the GATT Uruguay Round, see TWQ 9(1) January 1987, pp 311–14.

¹⁴ IDP January–March 1987.

¹⁵ IMF Survey (Washington DC) 20 April 1987, IDP January–March 1987.

¹⁶ IDP January–March 1987; IMF Survey (Washington DC) 20 April 1987.

¹⁷ IDP January–March 1987; FT 11 April 1987.

¹⁸ On the previous round of the UN International Conference on Natural Rubber, see TWQ 9(2) April 1987, p 684.

¹⁹ On the collapse of the sixth International Tin Agreement, see TWQ 8(2) April 1986, pp 696–9 and 8(3) July 1986, pp 1039–41.

²⁰ UNPR TAD/INF/1865, 10 March 1987, TAD/INF/1866, 23 March 1987; UNCTAD Bulletin (Geneva) April 1987; FEER 2 April 1987, pp 48–9; S June 1987, p 97.

²¹ On the February–March 1987 meeting of the ICO Council, see TWQ 9(3) July 1987, pp 1053–4.

²² FT 8, 28 May 1987; IHT 25 May 1987; WA 8 June 1987.

North-South Monitor

- ²³ G 15 June 1987; T 3 June 1987; FEER 18 June 1987, p 78; WA 22 June 1987; ICO Press Release PR-111/87, 9 June 1987.
- ²⁴ On the Reykjavik summit and subsequent Shultz-Shevardnadze ministerial meeting in Vienna in November 1986, as well as round VI of the Geneva NST, see TWQ 9(3) July 1987, pp 1055-9.
The previous rounds of the NST are covered in TWQ 7(4) October 1985, pp 1030-32, 8(1) January 1986, pp 289-92, 8(2) April 1986, pp 699-701, 8(3) July 1986, pp 1042-44, 8(4) October 1986, pp 1379-82.
- ²⁵ Gorbachev's statement is in SN 4 March 1987.
- ²⁶ On the US-Soviet 'fireside' summit in Geneva, see TWQ 8(2) April 1986, pp 702-15.
- ²⁷ The US verification plan is detailed in USIS Briefing Paper, 12 March 1987.
- ²⁸ FT 12, 13, 14 January 1987, 4 February 1987, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 9, 13, 14 March 1987; IHT 12, 21 January 1987, 10, 18, 25 February 1987, 2, 3, 4, 5, 9, 11, 12, 13, 14-15 March 1987; T 12, 13, 14 January 1987, 10 February 1987, 2, 3, 4, 5, 9, 11, 13 March 1987; I 14, 24 January 1987, 4, 18 February 1987, 2, 3, 4, 5, 9, 13 March 1987; G 13, 14, 16, 20 January 1987, 3, 5, 13 March 1987; Obs 1 January 1987, 15 March 1987; ST 1, 8 March 1987; Econ 7 March 1987, 18 April 1987. Armament and Disarmament Information Unit (ADIU) Report (Sussex) March-April 1987 and May-June 1987; Arms Control Today (Washington DC) March 1987, April 1987, May 1987; SN 15 April 1987.
- ²⁹ For the 1986 Budapest summit see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, pp 1384-6.
- ³⁰ I 28, 30 May 1987; FT 28, 30 May 1987; G 30 May 1987.
- ³¹ On the Louvre Pact of February 1987, see TWQ 9(3) 1987, pp 1059-61.
- ³² The G7 communiqué is in IMF Survey (Washington DC) 4 May 1987.
- ³³ IMF Survey (Washington DC) 4 May 1987; FT 8 April 1987; Econ 18 April 1987; IDP January-March 1987.
- ³⁴ See IHT 19 May 1987; for details of the twenty-fifth Ministerial Council meeting, see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, pp 1390-2.
- ³⁵ The OECD final communiqué is in OECD Press Release (Paris) PRESS/A (87)27, 13 May 1987; and IMF Survey (Washington DC) 1 January 1987.
- ³⁶ For the Louvre Pact, adopted by the G7 in February 1987, see TWQ 9(3) July 1987, pp 1059-61.
- ³⁷ FT 13, 14, 15 May 1987; IHT 11, 12, 13, 14, 15 May 1987; IMF Survey (Washington DC) 1 June 1987.
- ³⁸ Leaders present at the Thirteenth Western Economic Summit were Ronald Reagan of the USA, Yasuhiro Nakasone of Japan, Helmut Kohl of West Germany, François Mitterrand and Jacques Chirac of France, Margaret Thatcher of Britain, Amintore Fanfani of Italy, Brian Mulroney of Canada and Jacques Delors, President of the European Commission. For details of the Twelfth Summit see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, pp 1392-95.
- ³⁹ The Venice communiqué is in T 11 June 1987.
- ⁴⁰ On the Louvre Pact, agreed in February 1987 by the G7, see TWQ 9(3) July 1987, pp 1059-61.
- ⁴¹ T 9, 10, 11 June 1987; FT 9, 10, 11 June 1987; I 9, 10 June 1987; G 10, 11 June 1987; IHT 8, 10 June 1987; WA 15 June 1987; Econ 13 June 1987.
- ⁴² For background on the coup in Fiji, see FEER 28 May 1987, pp 10-11 and 4 June 1987, pp 40-41; Econ 16 May 1987.
- ⁴³ The three former ministers were Krishna Dutt, former Foreign Minister; Tupeni Baba, former Education Minister; and Joeli Kalou, former Labour Minister.
- ⁴⁴ On the Rabaul meeting, see SWB FE/8566/i, 13 May 1987, FE/8573/1, 21 May 1987 FE/8577/i, 26 May 1987; FEER 4 June 1987, p 41.
- ⁴⁵ SWB FE/8560/i, 6 May 1987 and FE/8565/i, 12 May 1987. For background on the dispute over Libyan involvement in the South Pacific, see FEER 21 May 1987, p 22.
- ⁴⁶ On the SPF meeting on New Caledonia, see TWQ 9(3) July 1987, pp 1062-3.
- ⁴⁷ The excerpts of the communiqué which concerns the coup in Fiji are in SWB FE/8583/A3/8, 2 June 1987.
- ⁴⁸ Notwithstanding these criticisms, the French government announced on 10 June 1987 that the referendum on New Caledonia's future would proceed on 13 September 1987. IHT 11 June 1987.

North-South Monitor

- ⁴⁹ FT 27, 28 May 1987; G 29, 30 May 1987, 1 June 1987; I 29, 30 May 1987, 1 June 1987; T 30 May 1987; ST 24 May 1987; FEER 18 June 1987, p 26; SWB FE/8582/A3/5-6, 1 June 1987.
- ⁵⁰ SWB ME/8549/D/3, 23 April 1987, ME/8554/iii 29 April 1987, ME/8554/D/1, 29 April 1987; WA 4 May 1987, 1 June 1987; UNPR TAD/INF/1875, 24 April 1987.
- ⁵¹ On the NAM summit in Harare, see TWQ 9(1) January 1987, pp 327-29.
- ⁵² SWB FE/8590/i 10 June 1987, FE/8594/i, 15 June 1987, FE/8595/i, 16 June 1987, FE/8595/C1/1-17 (A1-5) 16 June 1987. For full details of the Pyongyang Declaration and Plan of Action, see SWB FE/8595/C1/2-17, 16 June 1987.
- ⁵³ The Buenos Aires Declaration is in SWB ME/8544/D/1-2, 16 April 1987.
- ⁵⁴ On the Arias Plan and the proposed Esquipulas summit, see TWQ 9(3) July 1987, pp 1065-67.
- ⁵⁵ FT 15 June 1987; G 16-19 June 1987; I 19 June 1987.
- ⁵⁶ See TWQ 9(3) July 1987, pp 1065-67.
- ⁵⁷ On the Rio de Janeiro meeting, see TWQ 9(3) July 1987, pp 1064-65.
- ⁵⁸ The San Carlos de Bariloche communiqué is reported in SWB ME/8547/3-4, 21 April 1987.
- ⁵⁹ SWB ME/8543/D/1, 15 April 1987, ME/8544/D/1-2, 16 April 1987, ME/8547/D/3-4, 21 April 1987.
- ⁶⁰ On the previous summits among Argentina, Brazil and Uruguay, held to promote regional integration, in July and August 1986, see TWQ 9(1) January 1987, pp 320-21.
- ⁶¹ FT 27 May 1987; IHT 30 May-1 June 1987; SWB ME/8580/i and ME/8580/D/1-2, 29 May 1987.
- ⁶² These alleged abuses of human rights on the part of the Khmer Rouge are documented in a report of June 1987 published by Amnesty International.
- ⁶³ On Prince Sihanouk's decision to take a year's leave of absence, and the suggestion of a 'genocide trial' for the Khmer Rouge leadership, see IHT 29 May 1987.
- ⁶⁴ On the previous Indochinese and ASEAN approaches to a Kampuchean settlement, see TWQ 8(1) January 1986, pp 300-2 and 321-3, 8(3) July 1986, pp 1060-1 and 9(1) January 1987, p 317-20.
- ⁶⁵ For plans to draft a Southeast Asian NWZ Treaty, see TWQ 9(1) January 1987, p 318.
- ⁶⁶ FT 16 June 1987; IHT 16, 19 June 1987; I 16, 17, 20 June 1987; T 16, 19 June 1987; G 17, 19 June 1987; Econ 20 June 1987; FEER 11 June 1987, p 26 and pp 20-22, 25 June 1987, p 14, 2 July, pp 30-31; SWB FE/8595/A3/1, 16 June 1987, FE/8596/A3/4-5, 17 June 1987, FE/8599/A3/2, 20 June 1987, FE/8600/A3/3-6, 22 June 1987.
- ⁶⁷ On the South Pacific Nuclear Weapon-Free Zone ('Spinfiz'), see TWQ 8(1) January 1986, pp 292-3.
- ⁶⁸ On the SAARC Charter, adopted at SAARC's first summit in Dhaka in December 1985, see TWQ 8(2) April 1986, pp 724-7.
- ⁶⁹ For background on the Indian air-drop and the issue of Indian assistance to the Tamils, see FT 27 May 1987; G 6 June 1987; ST 7 June 1987; FEER 11 June 1987, pp 11-12.
- ⁷⁰ For the SAARC ministerial council meeting in August 1986 at which the issue of regional terrorism was discussed, see TWQ 9(1) January 1987, p 317.
- ⁷¹ FT 6, 11, 15, 19 June 1987; G 6, 9, 10, 11, 16 June 1987; FEER 2 July 1987, pp 16-17; SWB FE/8594/A3, 15 June 1987, FE/8597/A3/2, 18 June 1987, FE/8591/i and FE/8599/A3/1, 20 June 1987, FE/8601/A3/1, 23 June 1987.
- ⁷² MEES 13, 27 April 1987; MEED 9 May 1987; SWB ME/8535/i, 6 April 1987, ME/8536/i, 7 April 1987, ME/8537/i and ME/8537/A/i, 8 April 1987. See TWQ 9(3) July 1987.
- ⁷³ MEES 11 May 1987 and 25 May 1987.
- ⁷⁴ MEES 15 June 1987; SWB ME/8588/i, 10 June 1987; FT 23 June 1987; see TWQ 9(3) July 1987.
- ⁷⁵ MEES 15 June 1987; MEED 13 June 1987.
- ⁷⁶ MEES 15 June 1987. For details of Tunisia's withdrawal and the Thirty-Seventh Meeting of OAEPC, see TWQ 9(3) July 1987.
- ⁷⁷ On the OPEC meeting in Geneva in December 1986, see TWQ 9(3) July 1987, pp 1071-72.
- ⁷⁸ FT 22, 25, 26, 27, 29 June 1987; T 22, 26, 27 June 1987; IHT 22, 29 June 1987; G 26, 29 June 1987; I 27 June 1987; Obs 28 June 1987; WA 22 June 1987, p 1029 and 6 July 1987, p 1309; MEED 20 June 1987.

North-South Monitor

- ⁷⁹ On the CBAO financial scandal and the eleventh CBAO summit in Ouagadougou in March 1986, see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, pp 1410-11.
- ⁸⁰ SWB ME/8549/ii, 23 April 1987 and ME/8550/B/3-4, 24 April 1987; WA 4 May 1987, pp 857-8.
- ⁸¹ The Lusaka communiqué is in SWB ME/8558/B/1-2, 4 May 1987.
- ⁸² SWB ME/8546/ii and ME/8546/B/1-2, 20 April 1987, ME/8547/B/2-3, 21 April 1987, ME/8558/B/1-2, 4 May 1987; Obs 17 May 1987.
- ⁸³ On the Luanda Declaration at the sixth Lusophone African summit, see TWQ 8(4) October 1986, pp 1411-12.
- ⁸⁴ The Maputo Declaration is in SWB ME/8576/B/1-3, 25 May 1987.
- ⁸⁵ The speeches of President Chissano of Mozambique and President dos Santos of Angola are in SWB ME/8573/b/3-6, 23 May 1987.
- ⁸⁶ On the FLS accusations against Malawi and Zaire, see TWQ 9(1) January 1987, pp 326-7 and 9(2) April 1987, pp 644-5.
- ⁸⁷ South Africa's renewed offensive against the FLS following the FLS diplomatic moves towards Malawi was the subject of an emergency FLS summit in Maputo on 2 October 1986. See TWQ 9(2) April 1987, pp 644-5.
- SWB* ME/8575/b/3-6, 23 May 1987 and ME/8576/B1-3, 25 May 1987.

